

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. You can search through the full text of this book on the web at <http://books.google.com/>

ONE DAY
CIRC.

B 908,799

MUSE

ML

5

m84

V. 63

THE MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED IN THE YEAR 1844

JANUARY TO DECEMBER, 1922.

VOLUME LXIII.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED,
160, WARDOUR STREET, W. 1
NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

—
1922

10.
5-26-1923

FOUNDED
1837.

AGENTS
THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

GRANDS-UPRIGHTS.

AWARDS
for Good Tone:

LONDON . . . 189
PARIS . . . 186
LIMA . . . 187
CHRISTCHURCH
N.Z. 186
LONDON . . . 186

PLAYER-PIANOS

Showrooms: 60, WIGMORE STREET, W.1. 'Phone; Langham 1418.
FACTORIES - - - LEIGHTON ROAD, KENTISH TOWN, LONDON, N.W.6.

ESTEY ORGANS ESTEY PIANOS

ONLY ONE GRADE OF EACH.
THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE.

Largest Stock of Organs in the World.

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE POST FREE. CORRESPONDENCE INVITED.

Telephone: Museum 1317.

Telegrams: "ESTEY OX. LONDON."

Estey Organ Co.

- 12 -

RATHBONE PLACE,
OXFORD STREET,
LONDON, W. 1.

Played by Mr. DAN GODFREY, Winter Gardens, Bournemouth.
Mr. JULIAN CLIFFORD, Palace Pier, Hastings.
Mr. JAMES SALE, Palace Pier, Brighton.
Etc., Etc., Etc.

THE CZECHO-SLOVAKIAN FESTIVAL PRELUDE

COMPOSED BY

JUL. BOCHNÍČEK.

This Work consists of a Fantasia based on the traditional and National airs of Czecho-Slovakia and compiled and orchestrated by the famous PRAGUE musician.

Piano Solo (or Conductor), 2/6. Full Orchestra, 6/-. Small Orchestra, 4/-.
Extra Parts, 8d.

METZLER & CO. (1920), LTD.,

(ESTABLISHED 1788.)

142, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.2.

THE MUSICAL TIMES
FOUNDED 1844
JANUARY 1, 1922
No. 14
Price 6d.

SPENCER PIANOS
GRANDS ▽ UPRIGHTS ▽ PLAYERS
Sole Agents
MURDOCH MURDOCH & CO
Piano & Player Piano Experts
461 & 463 OXFORD STREET
And at BRIGHTON · PORTSMOUTH · SOUTHAMPTON
FOLKESTONE · DOVER · CHATHAM
BIRMINGHAM · CAMBRIDGE

ARCHIBALD RAMSDEN
LTD.
PATENT THREE COMPARTMENT TOP LID FOR GRAND PIANOS

We have already fitted over

1000 PIANOS

by most of the leading makers with this New Device.

Kindly send for Booklet giving particulars.

CECILIAN HOUSE,
65, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON.
12, Park Row, LEEDS.

Patented in AMERICA - FRANCE - GERMANY.

INDEX FOR 1922

MUSIC

SACRED

	No.		No.
Come, and let us return (Anthem) ...	G. M. Garrett 948	Behold the hour cometh (Chorus from Like as a Father (Anthem) ...	George C. Martin 951	the Advent Cantata, 'Blessed are Blessed be the Lord God of Israel (Full		they who watch') ...	Hugh Blair 956
Anthem, from 'Sing to the Lord')	Henry Smart 952
The God of Abraham praise (Anthem) ...	Harold E. Watts 954	Sing, O Heavens (Anthem) ...	Alfred Hollins 957

SECULAR

	No.		No.
The Night Wind (Part-song) ...	George Rathbone 947	Proud Maisie (Part-song) ...	John Pointer 955
Lowland Lay (Unaccompanied Part-song)	Gerrard Williams 949	Say, Shepherds, say (No. 2 of '6 Ayres
I weigh not Fortune's Frown (Madrigal		to 4 Voices') ...	Michael Cavendish for five voices) ...	Orlando Gibbons 950		(1598) 958
The Isle (Part-song) ...	Eric Fogg 953

EXTRA SUPPLEMENTS.—MUSIC

SACRED

	No.		No.
Now is come Salvation, and Strength		Oh, bring to the Lord (Anthem) ...	Hugh Blair 954
(Anthem) ...	Percy E. Fletcher 948	The Earth is the Lord's (Anthem) ...	Albert Lowe 955
Jesu, meek and lowly (Anthem) ...	Edward Elgar 949	How far is it to Bethlehem? (Christmas
I will not leave you comfortless (Anthem)	Bruce Steane 951	Anthem)... ...	Geoffrey Shaw 958
Save us, O Lord, while waking (Anthem)	Hugh Blair 952

SECULAR

	No.		No.
Serenade (Choral Song for S.A.T.B.) ...	Edward Elgar 947	Yea, cast me from heights of the moun-
Silent, O Moyle! (Four part song). Irish Air		tains (Part-song) ...	Edward Elgar 956
Arr. Joseph Seymour 950		Feasting I watch (Part-song) ...	Edward Elgar 957
It's oh! to be a wild wind (Part-song) ...	Edward Elgar 953

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS

	No.		No.
Harold Samuel ...	947	Carrie Tubb ...	952
Albert Sammons ...	948	Royal Academy of Music ...	953
Lionel Tertis... ..	949	The London String Quartet ...	954
Dorothy Silk ...	950	Henry George Ley ...	958
Robert Radford ...	951

ILLUSTRATIONS, PORTRAITS, ETC.

	Page		Page		Page
Béla Bartók ...	164	Johannesburg Town Hall, The Organ in	422	St. Lawrence Jewry. Organ ...	265
Court Dance 'Nasori,' Ancient Korean		Jones, R. Gwilym ...	627	Schering, Dr. A., Dr. Weissenborn,
dance. One of the two dancers ...	731	Lambeth Parish Church Organ—1701 ...	119	Mr. E. van der Straeten ...	488
— 'Shuntelka.' One of the four		— Present day ...	120	Tomb of S. S. Wesley in the Old dancers ...	731	Lewis, Joseph ...	172	Cemetery, Exeter, The ...	263
Cunningham, John ...	624	Lloyd Memorial Window, The, in		Trinity College of Music, The Entrance
Franck at the St. Clotilde Organ ...	841	Gloucester Cathedral ...	864	Portico ...	389
Franck Monument, The, before the		Mackenzie, Sir Alexander ...	474	— The Lecture Room ...	390
Basilica of St. Clotilde ...	843	Miniature Model Organ ...	267	Van der Straeten, E., Dr. Weissenborn,
Gloucester, In the Cathedral ...	707	Parry Memorial Tablet, The, in		Dr. A. Schering ...	488
Group at Gloucester, A ...	705	Gloucester Cathedral ...	709	Walker, James John ...	807
Handel Portrait, The recently dis-		Royal Academy of Music, The. Concert		Weissenborn, Dr., Dr. A. Schering, covered ...	489	Hall ...	473	Mr. E. van der Straeten ...	488
Handel's Birthplace ...	488	— Entrance Hall ...	469	Williams, Ralph Vaughan ...	159
Holst, Gustav ...	41	— in Tenterden Street ...	471

	Page		Page		Page
Aberdeen, Bach Choir	503	Baird, Dr. E. C. Recital	573	Bennett, Sterndale. Concert	117
— Music at	432	— Song, 'Come, lovers, follow me' (Review)	555	— 'God is a Spirit' (two-part arrangement)	555
— Oratorio Club	362	— Song, 'So sweet is she' (Review)	555	— 'The May Queen,' at Sydney	129
Aberystwyth, Music at	654	Baker, George (Recital)	44	Beratta, Celys. Recital	876
Ad Libitum. By 'Feste'	690, 770	Baker, Ralph H. (Obituary)	287	Beringer, Oscar. (Obituary)	276
Agnew, Philip. Chairman, Committee of Management, Royal Academy of Music	347	Balfour, H. L. New Conductor to Royal Choral Society	346	— Six Musical Illustrations (Review)	340
Alcock, Dr. W. G. Recital at Westminster Cathedral	799	Ballad in America. The (Correspondence)	352, 427, 510, 575	Berlin, Music at	59, 130, 585
Alexandra Male-Voice Choir at Manchester	812	Ballin, Cav. Carlo. Concert	795	Berlioz in Italy. By Claude Trevor	655
Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society	42, 190, 261, 729	Balokovik. Recital	498	Bernard, Anthony, and the London Chamber Orchestra	344
Alexeeva, Olga. Recital	876	Bangor, Music at	432, 584	Berners, Lord. Three Songs (Review)	640
Alford, Edith. Five Sketches from Grimm's Fairy-Tales (Review)	249	Banks, Harry Collingwood (Obituary)	872	Besly, Maurice. Song, 'The sleep that flits on baby's eyes' (Review)	856
All Hallows', Lombard Street. Harris Organ at	643	Barclay Squire, W. Pearsall's Letters	318	Best-Sellers, A Note on	174
All Saints', Battersea Park. Gounod's 'Redemption' at	799	Barclay's Bank Musical Society	53, 345	— (Correspondence)	268, 426
Allen, Sir Hugh. Musical Association paper, 'Music in the Universities'	426	— Male-Voice Choir (Correspondence) (see 718)	726	Bethesda, Music at	271
Allied String Quartet	44	Bark, Lancelot G. Anthem, 'Before the ending of the day' (Review)	339	Betjemann, Gilbert H. (Obituary)	54
Amateurs' Exchange, The (see 'Chamber Music for Amateurs').		Barkworth, J. E. Trio in A minor (Review)	783	Beyer, Barnet J. (see 'Caruso and the Art of Singing').
— Page (see above).		Barnesley, Music at	206, 271, 432	Biggleswade, Music at	433
Amber, Sidney J. The Organs in the Church of St. Lawrence Jewry	264	Barnstaple, Music at	206, 271, 432	Bingley, Music at	271, 877
American Head-Lines	241	Barrett, Francis E. Opera in London	117, 262, 346, 501, 568, 795	Binyon, Bertram. Recital	876
Amsterdam, Music at	130, 277, 360, 435, 512, 585, 735, 938	— Opera at Cambridge	192	Birmingham, Music at	57, 128, 206, 271, 358, 433, 804, 877
Ansell, Joyce. Recital	876	Barry Dock, Music at	433	— Quartet, The	252
Anstey, S. H. Appointment	44	Barry, Music at	432	— Repertory Theatre	583
Anston (Yorks). Musical	358	Hartók (see Béla Bartók).		— St. Germain's, Edgbaston. New Organ	266
Answers to Correspondents	587	Basingstoke, Music at	128	Bishop, Sir Henry. His first wife (Correspondence) (see 175)	653, 704
Antcliffe, Herbert. Modern Theme-Transformation	169	Bates, Una. Recitals	44, 499	Bishopworth. New Choral Society	826
Appleby Matthews. Concert at Paris	879	Bath, Music at	358	Bissley, J. G. Anthem, 'Content thyself with patience' (Review)	339
Appointments, Organists and Choirmasters	49, 123, 199, 266, 351, 425, 504, 574, 647, 722, 800, 865	Baton, René. Piano, 'Au Pardon de Rumenkol' (Review)	550	Blackbird's Song, The. By Alexander Brent-Smith	480
Archbishops' Committee on Church Music	549	Battersea and Wandsworth Evening Institutes Choral Union	346	Blackburn, King George's Hall Organ Music at	502
Archer, J. Stuart. Five Short Variations on a Scots Air (Review)	248	Battersea Town Hall Sunday Evening Concerts	796	— Music at	206
Art of the Ballad, The. By Gerrard Williams	55	Battistini, Mattia. At Queen's Hall	412	Blackpool, Music at	272
Arthur Nikisch. By Alfred Kalisch	173	Bauer, Harold. Recitals	497, 873	Blandford, W. F. H. Studies on the Horn: I. The French Horn in England	544
Arundell, Dennis. Nursery Tunes (Review)	113	Bax, Arnold. Concert	875	II. Wagner and the Horn Parts of 'Lohengrin'	622, 693
Ashton, Algernon. 'A strange omission' (Correspondence)	352	— Five Irish Songs (Review)	332	Blind Organists' Success	646, 722
Ashton-under-Lyne. Albion Church	47	— Full-Score, 'November Woods' (Review) (see 728)	246	Bliss, Arthur. Chamber Music, 'Conversations' (Review)	641
Atkins, Ivor. Bach's Organ Music	685	— New Viola Sonata	875	— Romantic Songs (Review)	116
— Song, 'The Shepherdess' (Review)	856	— Part-Song, 'Now is the Time of Christymas' (Review)	640	— Songs, Two Nursery Rhymes (Review)	114
Atterberg, Kurt. Fourth Symphony (Amsterdam)	130	— Part-Song, 'Of a rose I sing' (Review)	640	Blizard, Stanley. Organ Recital	424
Aubert, Louis. 'Habañera' at the 'Promenades'	628	— Piano, 'Country Tune,' and 'A Hill Tune' (Review)	555	Bloch, Ernest. Piano and Violin Sonata, at the Music Society's Concert	793
Aubry, G. Jean. (see Jean-Aubry).		— Second Violin Sonata, at Wigmore Hall	411	Blow, Dr. John. Commemorative Service (see 484, 554)	572
Andrey Chapman Orchestra	261	— Song, 'Across the door' (Review)	332	— 'Let Thy Hand be strengthened' (Review)	555
Audley, Dr. 'Organ Stops and their Artistic Registration' (Review)	183	— Song, 'As I came over the grey, grey hills' (Review)	332	— 'Lift up your heads' (Review)	554
Austin, Ernest. 'First Adventures on the Keyboard' (Review)	249	— Song, 'I heard a piper piping' (Review)	332	— Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F (Review)	555
— 'The Fairyland of Music' (Review)	779	— Symphonic Variations, at the 'Promenades'	792	Bognor, St. John's. New Organ	646
— Three Albums for Piano (Review)	341	Bayon, Arthur. Five Sketches for Piano (Review)	341	Bohemian String Quartet	190
Bach Arias (Review)	248	Baynton-Power, H. 'The Enchanted Garden' (Review)	249	Bolton, Music at	206
— Cantata: 'Bide with us' (Review)	555	Becher, Paul. British Music at Vienna	395	Borwick, Leonard. Recital	116
— Choir. The	42, 190, 342	— Korngold, Strauss, and others: 'Subjective' criticism	547	Boston Parish Church, Recitals at	646
— Complete edition of, and Saint-Saëns	114	Bedford, Music at	317	Boughton, Rutland. Glastonbury Festival: 'Alkestis'	719
— Elgar Fugue, The. By Harvey Grace (see 246)	21	Beer-Walbrunn, Anton. New Opera, 'Don Quixote' (Germany)	130	— Modern Music: and a Way Out	231
— Festival at Breslau	880	Beethoven, Some Contemporary Critics of. By Muriel Silburn	732	— Our Decadence (see 575, 577, 699)	474
— Motet: 'Jesu Priceless Treasure,' in Welsh (Review)	339	— The Truth about. By Ernest Newman	11	— 'The Immortal Hour,' at the Regent Theatre	795
— New Booklet of the Novello Publications	327	— Ludwig van. The Life of. By Alexander Wheelock Thayer (Review) (see 'The Truth about Beethoven').		Boulanger, Lili. Violin (or Flute) and Piano, 'D'un Matin de Printemps' (Review)	857
Bach's Organ Music, By Ivor Atkins	685	Beethoven's Piano. A 'cutting' from the Daily Express	851	Boulton, Adrian C. Sunday Concerts at the People's Palace	41, 115, 252, 792
Backhaus, Wilhelm. Recital	794	Beethoven's 'Jarring A flat' (Correspondence) (see 474, 575)	577	— and the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra	134
Baggioli, Attilio, at the Albert Hall	876	Beethoven's Piano, New Edition (Review)	112	Bourne, Una. Piano, 'Days of Old' (Review)	249
Bahr-Mildenburg, Anna. 'Reminiscences' (Review)	30	Beethoven's Works. Criticism (see Germany, 880)	624	Bournemouth, English Music at	357
Baines, William. Piano, 'Coloured Leaves' (Review)	188	'Bergar's Opera, The.' Nine Original songs introduced (see 502)	117	— McEwen, J. B. Symphony, 'Solway'	758
— Piano, 'Milestones' (Review)	781	Béla Bartók. Herzog Blaubart's Burg	513	— Music at	57, 128, 206, 272
— Piano, 'Silver Points' (Review)	188	— Recital at Aeolian Hall	344	— St. Stephen's. Mendelssohn Cantatas at	47
— (Obituary)	872	— Violin Sonata (Vienna)	815	Boyce, Ethel. Four Part-Songs (Review)	639
Bainton, Edgar. Concerto-Fantasia for Piano (Royal Philharmonic Society)	188	Belfast, Music at	57, 276, 435, 584, 735, 808, 879	— Piano, 'The Silver Thames,' three pieces (Review)	556
— Song, 'Valley Moonlight' (Review)	187	Bell, Lady, and Mrs. Herbert Richmond. 'The Cat and Fiddle Book' (Review)	780	— Two Part-Songs (Review)	640
— Two Dances (Review)	340	Ben Rhydding, Music at	271	Bovle, Ina. 'The Magic Harp': Full Score (Review)	642
		Bennett, Dr. G. J. (Lincoln). Presentation	58	Bradford, Music at	57, 128, 206, 272, 358, 805, 877
		— Election to Musicians' Company	543	Brahms Festival at Kassel, The (see 736)	513
		Bennett, May. Recital	117	— Twenty-fifth Anniversary of the death of (see 440)	490

	Page		Page		Page
Brent-Smith, Alexander. The Black-bird's Song...	480	Cameron, Ian. Negro Songs ...	431	Coleman, Satis N. 'Creative Music for Children' (Review) ...	779
— Song, 'The Cotswold Farmers' (Review) ...	640	Campbell, Colin M. 'Thais and Talmae' (Opera in London) ...	44	Coleridge-Taylor, S. Song, 'She rested by the Broken Brook' (Review) ...	247
— The Lure of Foreign Names... 237		Canterbury Diocesan Choral Union ...	47	— Song, 'The Gift Rose' (Review) ...	247
— The Negative in Music ... 839		— Leeds Choral Union ...	500	— Song, 'Until' (Review) ...	247
— Painted Music (see 867) ... 767		Cape Town Orchestra Concert Programmes ...	326, 361	— 'Three Fours' Valse Suite, transcribed by Oliver King ...	409
— Significant Chords ... 615		Capet Quartet ...	497	Colles, H. C. Lecture: 'Quality in Hymn-Tunes' (see 265, 427) ...	348
— Transflation and Transcription ... 169		Cardiff, Music at 272, 358, 433, 734, 805, 877		— 'The Growth of Music' (Review) ...	778
Brewer, Dr. Herbert. High Sheriff of Gloucester ...	849	— Richmond Road Congregational Church, Choir Anniversary Services at ...	197	Collingham, Music at ...	272, 805
Brian, Havergal. Four Miniatures (Review) ...	187	Cardus, Neville. 'A Cricketer's Book' ('Ad Libitum') ...	770	Cologne. Chamber Music Festival ...	737
Bridge, Sir Frederick, at the City Temple ...	350	Carey, Florence. 'Save us, O Lord, waking' (Review) ...	555	— Music at ...	880
— Gresham College Music Lectures ...	174, 421, 868	Carl Rosa Opera Company at Covent Garden. Opera in English ...	44	Colston Hall, Bristol (see Morgan, Ralph). Colum, Padraig. Song, 'Across the Door' (Review) (see Bax, Arnold). Song, 'The Pigeons' (Review) ...	332
— Lectures at the University of London ...	872	Carlisle, Music at ...	58	Colwyn Bay, Music at ...	197
— Presentation: Royal Choral Society ...	568	Carnegie Trust and the Palmer (Patron's) Fund ...	240	— St. Paul's Church. Brahms's 'Requiem' at ...	361
— Resignation from the Royal Choral Society ...	346	Carnegie Trust Music Publication Scheme (see 883) ...	420	Competitive Festival, Elizabethan Music ...	775
— 'The Old Cries of London' (Review) ...	105	Carse, Adam. 'Lullaby' for Violin (Review) ...	783	Competitive Festival Movement, The ...	849
Brighton Parish Church. Elgar Programme at ...	47	— Old English Violin Album (Review) ...	642	Concert Advertising ...	776
Brisbane Musical Union, The ...	642	— Sight-Reading Duets (Review) ...	408	Concert Notices in the Evening Press ...	399
Bristol, Esmond. Song, 'The old, bold Mate' (Review) ...	856	— Song, 'The tide rises, the tide falls': 4-part arrangement (Review) ...	640	Concert Prices: Plea for cheap seats ...	773
Bristol, Music at 57, 128, 206, 272, 358, 433, 511, 654, 734, 804, 877		Caruso and the Art of Singing. By Salvatore Fuciti and Barnet J. Bever (Review) ...	704	Cook, James Francis. 'Great Singers on the Art of Singing' (Review) ...	406
— Colston Hall (see Morgan, Ralph). St. Mary Redcliff: Church Music Society ...	266	Caruso Memorial Concert, A ...	62	Cooper, Gerald. Series of Concerts 261, 344
British Association, The, at Hull ...	718	Caryll, Ivan (Obituary) ...	54	Cooper, Sir Edward Ernest (Obituary) ...	167
British Music at Vienna. By Paul Bechert ...	395	Casals. Recitals ...	44	Copenhagen String Quartet ...	411
British Music Society. Annual Congress ...	485, 552	Castella. Five Pieces for String Quartet (Review) ...	187	Copland, Aaron. Humorous Scherzo (Review) ...	248
— London Branch of the ...	794	— 'Pagine di Guerra' (Review) ...	782	Corbett, Felix. 'A Little English Suite' (Review) ...	409
— Military Music Concert at the Albert Hall ...	559	— 'Pupazzetti' (Review) ...	113	Corelli. Full Score: Concerto Grosso No. 8 in G minor (Review) ...	332
British National Opera Company, The ...	191, 410, 500, 568	Catterall Quartet, The, and the London Chamber Concert Society ...	44	Cortot, Recitals ...	44
British Players and Singers:		Cecilian Glee Society. London Visit ...	877	— 'The Pianoforte Music of Alfred Debussy' (Review) ...	855
I. Harold Samuel ...	15	Celebrated Ballet Music of the 17th and 18th Centuries (Review) ...	113	Covent Garden. British National Opera Company's Season ...	500
II. Albert Sammons ...	83	César Franck, Organist. By Harvey Grace ...	840	— Russian Ballet ...	346
III. Lionel Tertis ...	157	Chaliapin. Recitals ...	252, 794	Coventry, Music at ...	272
IV. Dorothy Silk ...	229	Chamber Music for Amateurs (see 717) 45, 117, 203, 269, 355, 428, 504, 574, 647,		Cowen, Sir Frederic. Incidental Music to Pinero's 'The Enchanted Cottage' ...	262
V. Robert Radford (see 649) ...	307	Chamber Music Players, The ...	801, 869	Crastney, Ernest. Organ Recitals ...	865
VI. Carrie Tubbs ...	387	Chambers, H. A. 'O Lord, the Maker of all things' (Review) ...	411	Crawford, Thomas. Canadian Appointment ...	864
VII. The London String Quartet (see 624) ...	541	Chaminade. 'Gavotte' (Review) ...	555	Credo in Mozart. By Mrs. Frank Liebleich ...	768
VIII. Henry George Ley ...	837	Chantavoine, Jean. 'De Couperin à Debussy' (Review) ...	188	Croager, Edward George (Obituary) ...	584
British Symphony Orchestra 190, 252, 793		Chants, Quadruple (Review) ...	243	Crozier, Edward George (Obituary) ...	584
Britton, Thomas. The Musical Small-Coal Man. By C. Edgar Thomas ...	429	Chaplin, Nellie. 'Dances of the Suite' (Review) ...	339	Cromer Parish Church. Recital ...	722
Bromley, Music at ...	58	Chapman, Audrey. Orchestra, at the Northern Polytechnic ...	261	Cropper, Sibyl. Recitals ...	499, 876
Brough, Eric. 'A Word on the Organist' (Correspondence) ...	725	Charles Koehlin. By M.-D. Calvocoressi (see Paris, 132) ...	18	Crosshills, Music at ...	58
Brown, James. A Trial Chamber Concert of modern and classic stringed instruments ...	133	Chatham, Music at 128, 206, 358, 433, 511, 805		Crotch, Dr. Centenary (see 646) ...	573
Budleigh Salterton (Devon). New Orchestra at ...	877	Chausard, René. 'New York Pictures' (Review) ...	340	Crystal Palace Choral and Orchestral Society ...	42, 261, 345, 729
Burch, Ashmoor. Recital ...	874	Chelsea Congregational Church. Unique Organ Recital ...	722	Cudworth, Music at ...	272, 358
Burgess Hill Choral Society ...	516	Chelsea Town Hall Pops ...	345, 346	Cunningham, G. D. Recitals ...	799
Burnley, Music at ...	805	Chiswick Chamber Concerts Society ...	275	— Curse of the Concert Programme, The. By Robert Lorenz ...	98
Burrows, B. Twelve Studies in Style and Expression (Review) ...	249	Choir-Trainer's Dilemma, A (Correspondence) ...	867	Dale, Benjamin. New Violin Sonata ...	873
— 'Two Pictures' (Review) ...	556	Chopin. By Camille Saint-Saëns ...	321	D'Aranyi, Jelly. Recitals ...	44, 116
Butler, Leonard. 'Asterisks' (Review) ...	340	Choral Society Programmes: London and District ...	729	Dare, Marie. Recital ...	44
— 'Country Idylls' (Review) ...	340	Christ Church, Crouch End. Choir performances ...	350	Darke, Dr. Harold. Recitals 197, 425, 722, 863
— 'Flower Sketches' (Review) ...	556	Christ Church, Greyfriars (Newgate Street). Re-opening of the Organ ...	721	Daubeny, Ulric. Instrumentation: Some strange survivals (see 577) ...	482
Butt, Dame Clara. Concert ...	794	Chubb, Frederick. Bach-Wagner Recitals ...	646	— (Obituary) ...	512
Button, H. Elliot. Office of the Holy Communion in C (Review) ...	339	Church Music, Archbishops' Committee on ...	549	Davidson, Malcolm. 'A Christmas Carol' (Review) ...	114
Byrd, Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in D minor (Review) ...	554	Church-Music Society, Bristol Branch	799	— Song, 'Sorrow of Mydath' (Review) ...	114
Byrd and His Contemporaries. A Selection of Sacred Motets and Anthems (see 698) ...	421	Church-Music Society's Pamphlet	503	Davies, Henry Walford. Knight-hood ...	849
Cæcilia (Ladies) Trio Choir, The ...	807	Cinema, The, and Music (see 267) ...	175, 398	Davis, J. D. New Violoncello Concerto, at Berlin ...	271
Cahill, Freda. Recital ...	44	City Temple Choral Society ...	350	De Falla, Manuel. 'Cancion del Amor Dolido' (Review) ...	340
Calcutta, Chamber Music at ...	584	Clark, Edward. Orchestral Programmes at the Lyric Theatre ...	41	— 'Chanson du Feu Follet' and (Review) ...	856
— St. Paul's Cathedral ...	350	Clarke, Rebecca. New Trio at Wigmore Hall ...	874	— 'Homage' (Pianoforte arrangement) (Review) ...	408
Calverley (Yorks). Music at ...	358	— Pianoforte and Viola Sonata (Review) ...	247	— 'Danse de la Meunière' (Review) (see 781) ...	38
Calvocoressi, M.-D. Charles Koehlin (see Paris, 132) ...	18	Classical Concert Society ...	44, 116	— 'Recit du Pêcheur' (Review) ...	640
— Music in the Foreign Press (see 125) 39, 177, 242, 328, 407, 490, 631, 780, 851		Cleckheaton, Music at ...	805	De Groef, Arthur. Song, 'Apart' (Review) ...	332
— There and Here: A Retrospect and Comparisons ...	94	Cleveland Harmonic Choir in London	876	De Learner, Percy, and Martin Shaw. 'The Canon Book' (Review) ...	37
— What is 'Modern' Music? ...	765	Clifford, Julian (Obituary) ...	126	Dearth of Accompanists, The (Correspondence) ...	125, 202
Camborne, Music at ...	433	Coates, Albert. Concert Study (Review) ...	408	Debussy. 'Monsieur Croche' (Review) ...	178
Cambridge Operatic Society. Dr. Rootham's Opera: 'The Two Sisters' ...	192	Coates, John. Recitals 43, 116, 191, 260, 346		Delage, Maurice. 'Schumann' (Review) ...	38
		Cohen, Harriet. Recital ...	343	Delibes, Adeline. Recitals ...	117, 874
				Delius, Frederick. Pianoforte. 'Dance Rhapsody' No. 2: arranged (Review) ...	782

	Page		Page		Page
Delius, Frederick. 'Requiem,' and the Philharmonic Society ...	342	Erlebach, Rupert. Song, 'Lone Dove' (Review) ...	856	Gatty, Nicholas. 'The Tempest' at the 'Old Vic.' ...	410
Score (Review) ...	642	Etlinger, Florence (Obituary) ...	126	'Genial' Scriabin, The (Correspondence) ...	803
Dent, E. J. Mozart's 'Don Giovanni' ...	45	Eton. Windsor and Eton Choral Society ...	433	Gerhardt, Elena. Recitals ...	343, 419
Denza, William. Recital (Obituary) ...	207	Euterpe String Players, The (see 241) ...	208, 560	German, Edward. 'The Willow Song' (Review) (see 641) ...	556
Desmond, Astral. Recital ...	499	Evans, Amy. At Queen's Hall ...	568	German Gramophone Enterprise (Correspondence) ...	726
Dickens, Charles. Link with R.A.M. ...	549	Evans, Edwin. A Token of Appreciation to ...	327	Germany, Music in ...	59, 130, 278, 436, 513, 585, 657, 736, 808, 881
Dickenson, Clarence. Organ Lecture-Recitals ...	349	British Players and Singers: Lionel Tertis ...	157	Gibbs, C. Armstrongs. Reviews: 'A Song of Shadows' ...	332
Did Viadana Use Figures? (Correspondence) ...	595, 648	The Salzburg Festival (see 241, 441, 625) ...	628	'Five Eyes' ...	332
d'Oillone, Max. Trio in A minor (Review) ...	113	Evans-Williams, Laura. Recital ...	877	Five Songs 'Gray and Gold' ...	782
Dolmetsch family. Chamber Concert of old music on old instruments ...	116	Evening News. Concert Notices in the ...	399	John Mouldy ...	332
Donajowski, E. (Obituary) ...	360	Examinations, Musical ...	726	'Mistletoe' ...	856
d'Orlay, Georges. 'Le Chant Fatal' (Opera in London) ...	44	Exeter, Music at ...	206, 358, 433, 511, 805, 877	'Silver' ...	332
Drake, Harry. The Piano-Player Explained' (Review) ...	245	Cathedral Choir Festival ...	646	Three Sketches ...	408
The Pneumatic Player: Regulation and Repair of some Modern Types' (Review) ...	37	The Messiah' ...	646	Two Elizabethan Songs ...	782
Drysdale, Learmont. 'Tamo' Shanter.' Full Score (Review) ...	642	Fachir, Madame. Recitals ...	44, 117, 875	'Betrothal' Ballet, at the 'Promenades' ...	728
Dublin, Music at ...	58, 128, 206, 276, 435, 512, 584, 655, 735, 808, 879	Falmouth, Music at ...	872	Gigout, Eugène. 'One Hundred Short Pieces for Organ or Harmonium' (Review) ...	248
Dulsburg Musical Festival ...	657	Fancy, The. By Jeffrey Pulver ...	396	Gilbert and Sullivan Opera Revival ...	47, 117
Dulwich Philharmonic Society ...	116, 190, 261, 345, 729	Fanning, Cecil. Recitals ...	500	Gilbert, Horace. Pianoforte, Three Miniatures (Review) ...	556
Dumfries, Music at ...	272, 358	Farjeon, H. 'Ballet of the Trees' (Review) ...	555	Gilberthorpe, H. T. Samuel Sebastian Wesley's Tomb ...	262
Dundee, Music at ...	206	Farmer, Archibald. Organ Recital ...	122	Gillingham, Music at ...	358, 433, 877
Dunhill, Thomas F. 'Chiddingfold Suite.' Full Score (Review) ...	641	Father Howe (Correspondence) ...	202	Gillman, John. The Story of our Hymns' (Review) ...	246
Four Pieces for Violin (Review) ...	783	Fauré, Gabriel. Second Quintet (Review) ...	857	Glasgow Cathedral. Recitals ...	799
Dunn, John Petrie. 'Chopin's Ornamentation' (Review) ...	32	'Favorita, La,' or 'La Favorite' which language' (Correspondence) (see 597) ...	652	Music at ...	58, 128, 206, 272, 433
Dunstan, Dr. Ralph. 'Diatonic Modal Counterpoint' (Review) ...	553	Fayfax's 'Albanus' Mass at St. Alban's Cathedral ...	425	National Union of Organists' Associations: Congress ...	727
Dupré, Marcel. Recitals (see 401) ...	502, 503, 573	Federation of British Music Industries, The. Journal ...	101	Glasgow Orpheus Choir at Queen's Hall (see 454) ...	343
and English Organ Music (Correspondence) (see 401) ...	578	Military Music Concert at Albert Hall ...	559	Visit to Aberdeen ...	432
Durey, Louis. Songs, 'Images à Crusoe' (Review) ...	555	Propaganda Committee ...	552	Glastonbury Festival ...	327, 719
Songs, 'Le Bestiaire, ou Cortège d'Orphée' (Review) ...	114	Summer School ...	486	School ...	516
Durham, Music at ...	358	(Correspondence) ...	702	Gloucester Festival, The (see 625, 855) ...	435
Düsseldorf, Music at ...	736	Fenney, W. T. Pianoforte Duets (Review) ...	408	Balance-Sheet ...	849
Ealing Philharmonic Society ...	42, 425, 654	Ferguson, W. H. (see 'Easy Plainsong Settings of the Holy Communion') ...	408	(Correspondence) ...	802
Early Charters of Incorporation granted to Musicians, By Muriel Silburn ...	205, 283, 356	Festival Week at Oxford. By H. E. Wortham ...	402	Gloucester Musical Festival, The. By Herbert Thompson ...	705
Early Greek Hymn, An (Correspondence) ...	652, 724, 802	Fischer, Sarah. Recital ...	117	Goddard, Arabella (Obituary) ...	655
Easingwold, Music at ...	433	Fitzgibbon, H. Macaulay. A Guide to the best Flute Music of all kinds (Review) ...	855	Godfrey, Sir Dan. Knighthood ...	487
East Kirby Baptist Church. The Messiah' at ...	350	Fitzwilliam Museum Annual Report ...	485	Godowski, Louis. Recital ...	260
Eastbourne, Music at ...	433	Flonzalet Quartet, The ...	875	Goldsbrough, A. W. Appointment ...	863
Easton-in-Gordano, Music at ...	358	Flood, W. H. Grattan. 'Introductory Sketch of Irish Musical History' (Review) ...	853	Goossens, Eugène. Concerts ...	40
Easton, Robert. Concert ...	795	New Light on Early Tudor Composers: XXIII. John Lloyd ...	24	On Modern Developments in Music ...	269
Easy Plainsong Settings of the Holy Communion for Congregational Use. Edited by E. G. P. Wyatt and W. H. Ferguson (Review) ...	339	XXIV. Thomas Appleby ...	97	Pianoforte, 'Homage' (Review) ...	408
Edinburgh, Music at ...	58, 128, 206, 272, 433, 511, 805, 877	XXV. John Dygon ...	320	Goss-Custard, Reginald. Transcription of Dohnányi's 'March on a Ground-Bass' (Review) ...	248
Edmonds, Henry R. (Obituary) ...	277	XXVI. Sir William Hawte ...	845	Gounod, Charles, on Mozart's 'Don Juan.' By Camille Saint-Saëns ...	238
Edmonds, Paul. Four Indian Songs (Review) ...	856	Recognition of his services to Church Music ...	122	Gounod's 'Faust'? Who wrote. By A. Keay ...	846
Song, 'The Old Woman' (Review) ...	332	The English Litany of 1544-60 (see Correspondence, 266) ...	192	Gower, John Henry (Obituary) ...	654
Elgar, Sir Edward. Five Part-Songs (Review) ...	639	Fogg, Eric. Song, 'When Passion's Trance' (Review) ...	856	Grace, Harvey. César Franck, Organist Organ, Ten Compositions (Review) ...	188
Quintet, First performance in Africa (see 796) ...	718	'Songs of Love and Life' (Review) ...	247	The Bach-Elgar Fugue ...	21
Transcription of Bach's Fantasia of the C minor Fugue (Review) ...	641	Foster, Megan. Recital ...	419	The Organ Works of Bach' (Review) (see 'Bach's Organ Music') ...	586
Violoncello Concerto at Budapest (see 728) ...	241	Foulds, John H. Song, 'An Eastern Lover' (Review) ...	247	Graener, Paul ...	491
Elizabethan Music Competitive Festival Elkin, Robert. Pianoforte, 'The Light Heart' (Review) ...	781	Fox, K. Dorothy. 'Chant Elégiaque' (Review) ...	332	Graham, C. D. Music and Communism ...	324
Ellingford, Herbert F. 'The Art of Transcribing for the Organ' (Review) ...	703	Franck, César (see César Franck). Freeman, Andrew. 'English Organ-Cases' (Review) ...	702	Gramophone Notes ...	38, 114, 249, 341, 409, 557, 642, 709, 783, 858
Ellingham, Harry. 'How to use a Player-Piano' (Review) ...	853	The Organs of Lambeth Parish Church (see 196) ...	119	Gramophone Records (Correspondence) ...	53
Elman, Mischa. Recitals ...	190, 260, 346, 400	Froggatt, Arthur T. The U.G.M. at Cambridge ...	581	Grantham, Music at ...	358
Elwes, Gervase. Memorial Fund. Emmanuel Moor Pianoforte, The. By Ernest Newman ...	85	Fryer, Herbert. 'Tunes for Totola' (Review) ...	249	Graun's 'Antony and Cleopatra' (Correspondence) (see 776) ...	867
Encore Nuisance, The (Correspondence) ...	125	Fuciti, Salvatore, and Barnet J. Beyer (see 'Caruso and the Art of Singing') ...	876	Gray, Alan. Organ, 'Twelve Short Preludes' (Review) ...	248
'English as she is wrote' ...	327	Fujiwara, Yosie. Recital ...	876	Gray, Cecil. Zoltán Kodály ...	312
English Folk-Dance Society, The ...	515	Gainsborough, Music at ...	128	Gray, Dorothy. Recital ...	877
English Litany of 1544-60, The. By W. H. Grattan Flood ...	190	Gange, Fraser, at Queen's Hall ...	568	Great Eastern Railway Musical Society ...	53, 409
(Correspondence) ...	266, 352, 426	Garbled Reviews (Correspondence) ...	868	Great Musician, A (John R. Toms) (Correspondence) ...	351
English Singers, The. Sextet, at 'Æolian Hall' ...	42	Garde Républicaine, The, at the Albert Hall ...	559	Green, William Edward (Obituary) ...	584
Epwhistle, Gertrude. Concert ...	795	Gardner, Gale. Recital ...	44	Greenbaum, H. 'Parfum de la Nuit,' at the 'Promenades' ...	792
Epstein, Isador. Sarabande, Gavotte, and Musette (Review) ...	556	Gardner, George. Misdirection in Oratorio Singing ...	23	Greene, Plunket. Recitals ...	43, 499
		Garofolo, Carlo-Giorgio. 'An Important discovery of unpublished and unknown music of Girolamo Frescobaldi' (Rome) ...	659	Gregorian Association, The. 52nd Anniversary ...	572
		Garstang, Walter. 'Songs of the Birds' (Review) ...	639	Gregory, George Herbert. Memorial ...	799
				Greir, R. Arnold. Appointment ...	511
				Grenadier Guards at Queen's Hall ...	568
				Gresham College Music Lectures ...	174, 421, 868
				Greville, Ursula. Recitals ...	43, 500, 877
				Tour ...	327
				Grew, Sydney. Some Aspects of William Byrd ...	698
				The Art of the Player-Piano' (Review) ...	214
				Grove's History of Music, American Supplement (Review) ...	244

	Page		Page		Page
Guernsey, Music at	273	Home, Ethel. Improvising: A Simple Method, &c. (Review)...	245	Kidson, Frank. 'The Beggar's Opéra' (Review)...	855
Guildhall School. Storace's comic opera, 'The Haunted Tower'...	501	Honegger, Arthur. Works by (Review)...	340	— The Nurseries of English Song (Correspondence, 724)...	394, 620
Gurney, Ivor. Song, 'The Bonnie Earl of Murray' (Review)...	114	Horn, Studies on the. By W. F. H. Blandford...	544, 622	Kilburn, Dr. (Middlesbrough). Presentation...	274
— Song, 'The County Mayo' (Review)...	114	Howard-Jones, E. Recitals (see 177) 44, 260, 498		King, Charles J. (Northampton). Presentation...	420
Haba, Alois. String Quartet on the Quarter Tone System...	102	Howells, Herbert. 'Procession,' at the Promenades...	728	King's College, Strand. Church Music Lectures...	197
Hailing, R. G. Organ, 'Covenanters' March' (Review)...	188	— Rhapsodie Quintet (Review)...	186	— Colles, H. C. Lecture: 'Quality in Hymn Tunes'...	348
Haley, Olga. Recital...	44	Huber, Hans (Obituary)...	126	Kirkcaldy, Music at...	358
Halifax, Music at...	273, 877	Huddersfield, Music at...	58, 129, 273, 805	Kitson, C. H. Three Voluntaries (Review)...	248
Hall, Jessie. Recital...	346	Hughes, Herbert. Song, 'If I had a-knew' (Review)...	332	Klein, Herman. British Singers and Players: Carrie Tubbs...	387
Hall, Marie. Recital...	191	— Parodies (Books 1 and 2): 'Nursery Rhymes' reset for Voice and Pianoforte (Review)...	247	— Our lost Operatic Lead...	20
Hambourg, Mark. 'How to become a Pianist' (Review)...	554	— Song, 'My father has some very fine sheep' (Review)...	856	— Saint-Saëns as I knew him (see 54)...	90
Hamilton, Janet. Song, 'The music that love made' (Review)...	114	Hulbert, H. H. 'Eurhythm' (Review)...	106	Kochlin, Charles. By M.-D. Calvocoressi (see Paris, 132)...	18
Hampshire Association of Organists...	424	Hull, Music at...	273, 877	— Sonata for Flute and Pianoforte (Review)...	408
Hand Development for the Performer (Correspondence)...	51, 353, 427, 725	Humperdinck's Opera, 'Gaudefamus'...	612	Koenen, Tilly. Recital...	191
Handel Festival at Halle: May 25-28. By E. van der Straeten (see 375)...	487	Hungarian Quartet...	457	Korngold, Strauss, and Others: 'Subjective' criticism. By Paul Bechert...	547
Handel's 'Water-Music.' By W. Barclay Squire (Correspondence)...	865	Hunter, Riddell. Recital...	346	Kreisler. Cyril Scott's 'Lotus Land' arrangement for Violin (Review)...	783
Hanley, Music at...	433	Hymn Singing (Correspondence)...	124	— Recitals...	44, 873
— Victoria Hall. New Organ...	424	Iarecki, Tadeusz. String Quartet. (Review)...	857	Krusse String Quartet...	44, 116, 346
Harlech, Music at...	583	Ilfracombe, Music at...	273	Kusnezsky Concerts...	497
Harmony Glee Singers...	361	Importance of Correct Placing of the Voice, The (Correspondence) (see 176)...	50, 124, 353
Harrison, Beatrice. Recital...	44	Incorporated Society of Musicians...	116, 134
Harrogate, Music at...	358, 433, 512, 584, 654, 734, 805	— Holst, Gustav. Lecture on Purcell...	354
Harty, Hamilton. Speech at the Manchester Luncheon Club...	774	— Military Music at the Albert Hall...	559
Harvard, Sue. Recital...	560	Inge, Dean, on a Cathedral Service in Sweden...	850
Hastings, Music at...	58	Instrumentation: Some strange survivals. By Ulric Daubeny...	482
Havant Choral Society...	133	— (Correspondence) (see 652)...	577
Haverfordwest Choral Society...	865	Interesting Model, An (Correspondence)...	267
Hay, Edward Norman. String Quartet (Review) (see 426)...	331	Interesting Specification, An (Correspondence) (see 39, 199)...	125
Hayes, Roland. Recitals...	346, 876	International Society for New Music...	625
Hayward, Gerald (Obituary)...	126	Ireland, John. Album of Six Songs (Review)...	781
Heath, John. Song, 'The Enchanted Hour' (Review)...	332	— Pianoforte, 'On a birthday morning' (Review)...	761
Heather, Belinda. Début at the Promenades...	729	— Pianoforte, 'Soliloquy' (Review)...	781
Hector, Chastey. Mus. Doc. Degree...	503	— Song, 'Vagabond' (Review)...	640
Hellmer, Edmund. Monograph on Hugo Wolf (Review)...	30	Ireland, Music in...	276, 435, 512, 584, 655, 735, 08, 879
Hempel, Frieda...	498, 794	— The Vatican Choir	512
Henry, Leigh. 'Music: What it means and how to understand it' (Review)...	778	Isaacson, Charles D. 'Face to Face with Great Musicians' (Review)...	104
Henschel, Sir George and Lady. Concert at Aviemore...	660	Islington Choral Society, The...	656
Hertford, Music in...	433	Italian Music Congress, An...	360
Hervey, Arthur (Obituary)...	277	Italian View on British Music, An...	324
— Saint-Saëns (Review) (see 54)...	112	Jacobson, Maurice. Song, 'Boys' (Review)...	856
Heseltine, Philip. A Note on the Mind's Ear...	88	— Song, 'Last Hours' (Review)...	856
— Delius's 'Dance Rhapsody,' Pianoforte Duet Arrangement (Review)...	782	Jacques-Dalcroze, M. 'Huit Chansons' (Review)...	247
— Delius's 'Four North Country Sketches,' Pianoforte Duet Arrangement (Review)...	408	— Method of Eurhythmics: Rhythmic Movement (Novello)...	184
— Modern Hungarian Composers On Editing Elizabethan Songs...	164, 477	— Song, 'Summer Holidays' (Review)...	247
Hess, Myra. Recital...	116	Jean-Aubry, G. 'La Musique et les Nations' (Review)...	777
Hickey, Vivian. Four Songs (Review)...	856	Jenkins, Cyril. Song, 'Song of Indian Women' (Review)...	782
Higginbotham Choral Society...	346	— 'Jerusalem my happy home' (Correspondence)...	201
Higley, William. Recitals...	347, 500	Johannesburg Town Hall, The Organ in...	422
Hill, Lady Arthur. 'Songlets for Children' (Review)...	856	— Jones, E. Lancaster, Musical Association paper: 'Sound Rangling'...	276
Hislop, Joseph. Recital...	418	Jongen, Joseph. 'Tableaux Pittoresques' for Small Orchestra (Review)...	332
Hodge, Herbert. Organ Recitals (see 486)...	47, 769	Judd, Percy. Song, 'Indian Serenade' (Review)...	856
Hodgson, James. Presentation...	503	— Song, 'When daisies pied' (Review)...	640
Hollbrooke, Josef. 'A Lake and a Fairy Boat' (Review)...	114	Kalisch, Alfred, on Arthur Nikisch...	172
— At Munich...	53	— Stravinsky Day by Day...	27
— Five Songs (Review)...	782	— The 'Twelve Best Melodies'...	399
— Prelude to 'Bronwen,' at the Promenades...	728	Karg-Elert, Sigfrid. New Work, 'Fifty-four Studies in Variation Form on a Ground-Bass of Handel'...	863
— Songs, 'Salutation' and 'The Garret' (Review)...	856	Kassel, Brahms Festival at...	513
Hollins, Alfred. Organ Concert-Overture in F (Review)...	409	Keay, A. Who wrote Gounod's 'Faust'?	846
— Mus. Doc. (Edin.) Degree...	573, 625	Keighley, Music at...	58, 358
Hollins, Bertram. Recitals...	722	Kelso, Music at...	273
Holloway, Winifred. Recital...	499	Kendal, Music at...	58
Holst, Gustav. Ballet, 'The Perfect Fool' (see 720)...	41	Kendall, Doreen. Recital...	876
— 'Country Song' and 'Marching Song.' Full Scores (Review)...	641	Kendall String Quartet, The...	803
— Lecture: 'Purcell'...	354	Kettering, St Mary's, Hymn Festival...	575
— 'Ode to Death' (Review)...	689	Kidderminster, Music at...	58, 433
— Purcell's 'The Gordian Knot Unfied.' Full Score (Review) (see 783)...	642
— The Hymn of Jesus (see Royal Choral Society)...	251
— 'The Planets.' Miniature Full Score (Review)...	783

	Page		Page		Page
Lindo, Algernon H. 'Pedalling in Piano- forte Music' (Review) ...	703	Massi-Hardman. Songs, 'Near the Rill,' 'To the Nightingale,' and 'The Beloved's Voice' (Review) ...	332	Music Society, The... ..	793
Littlehampton Parish Church. New Organ ...	502	— Song, 'The Vow' (Review) ...	355	Music under Bolshevism. By C. D. Graham ...	324
Liverpool Church Choir Association ...	799	Matthay, Tobias. Reception in celebra- tion of Jubilee at the R.A.M. ...	656	Musical America and its London Corre- spondent (see 200, 400) ...	176
— Music at ... 58, 129, 206, 273, 358, 434, 734, 805, 878		Matthews, John The Silbermann Organs at Dresden ...	643	— on Music in London ...	28, 176
— St. Luke's Church, Walton. ...		Maurel, Barbara. Recital ...	560	Musical Appreciation (Correspondence) ...	52
New Organ ...	503	May, Alan, at St. Mary Aldermary. Lectures, 'Elizabethan Motets' ...	122, 799	Musical Association 54, 127, 276, 355, 429, 553, 870
— St. Margaret's, Anfield, Organ specification ...	503	'Mayfair Classics.' Murdoch (Review) ...	187	— Allen, Sir Hugh: 'Music in the Universities' ...	429
— St. Peter's, Aintree. New Organ ...	350	Mayfair Dramatic Society... ..	501, 740	— Jones, E. Lancaster: 'Sound Ranking' ...	276
— Settlement, A (Corre- spondence)... ..	577	Meale, Arthur. Central Hall Recitals (see 863) ...	723	— Lejeune, Caroline: 'Ballad Opera: Its place in the 18th Century' — Pearce, Charles W. 'English Sacred Folk-Song' ...	870 5
Livery Club of the Worshipful Com- pany of Musicians. The. Reception ...	487	— Organ, 'Fountain Melody' (Review) ...	248	— Proceedings of the 47th Session of the (Review) ...	553
Llandudno, Music at ...	434, 806	Medtner. By Alfred J. Swan ...	616	— Pulver, Jeffrey. 'The Music of Ancient Egypt' ...	127
Lloyd, Charles Harford, Memorial to	196	Melba Concert at the Albert Hall Melbourne. The Mewton Choir ...	875 57	— Webb, F. Gilbert: Duplex- Coupler Pianoforte ...	335
Lloyd Memorial Window in Gloucester Cathedral ...	864	Memorial Concerts and the choice of Music ...	850	Musical Directory, The (Review) ...	186
Lohr, Frederic N. Part-song, 'A Slumber Song' (Review) ...	640	Mendelssohn's Second Violoncello Sonata arranged for Viola (Review) ...	642	Musical Exhibition at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford ...	266
London Chamber Concert Society ...	44	Menges, Isolda. Recital ...	193	Musical Press, The (Correspondence) ...	53
London Chamber Orchestra. Anthony Bernard and the ...	344	Meredyl Pianoforte Quartet ...	116	Musical Public and Orchestral Concerts 'Musics' of the Daily Telegraph on M. Dupré's programmes (see 578) ...	691 401
London Choral Society ...	42, 190, 345	Merikanto, Oscar. Pianoforte, 'Finnish Folk-Song' (Review) ...	781	My Singing Lessons ...	582
London Hippodrome. 'Round In 50' London Society of Organists ...	262 122, 350, 562	Metcalf-Casals, Susan. Recital ...	498
— Battersea and Clapham Branch London String Quartet. The (see British Players and Singers) (see 624)	799	Metzler. Trio Series (Review) ...	187
London Sunday School Choir Festival London Symphony Orchestra ...	512 41, 190, 343, 410, 745, 873	Middlebrough, Music at Middleton Parish Church. New Organ Midland Chorus-Master, A. Joseph Lewis Migot, Georges. 'Le Paravent de Laque aux Cinq Images,' at the 'Promenades' ...	274 266 172 728	National Elstedford, The... ..	625
London String Quartet (see British Players and Singers). — Concert ...	793	Milhaud, Darius. 'Suite Symphonique,' at the 'Promenades' ...	728	National Organization of Girls' Clubs, The. Concert (see 851) ...	441
London Trio ...	44	Miller, Webster. Recital ...	412	National Provident and Union Bank Musical Society, The ...	441
London, University of. Lectures at the, by Sir Frederick Bridge ...	872	Miller, Rosalie. Recital ...	499	National Union of Organists' Associa- tion. Congress ...	573, 727
Long Eaton, Music at ...	274	Mills, Watkin. Appointment ...	503	Naylor, Dr. E. W. 'The Angelus' (Opera in London) ...	44
— 'Looker-on, The,' in the Evening Standard ...	718	Milner, Augustus. Recital ...	560	Negative in Music, The. By Alexander Brent-Smith ...	839
Lorenz, Robert. The Curse of the Concert Programme ...	98	Miniature Essays, J. & W. Chester (Review) ...	106, 855	Negro Songs. By Ian Cameron ...	431
Lothbury Male-Voice Choir, The ...	441	Misdirection in Oratorio Singing. By George Gardner (see 176) ...	25	Nenagh Church, Tipperary. Recital ...	122
Loughon Choral Society and Orchestra Low, C. Egerton. 'Beethoven's Sonatas' (Review) ...	261 31	Mitchell, Edward. Recital ...	199	Nenhaldensleben, Town Council of, and the Ex-Kaiser ...	722
Lowther, Brabazon. Recitals ...	499, 876	— The Stravinsky Theories ...	192	New College Chapel. Special Musical Service ...	865
Lowther, Toupie. Song, 'Hazel Eyes' (Review) ...	856	Moberley, Edward Hugh (Obituary) Modern developments in Music, Eugène Goossens on ...	434 269	New Fiddles for Old (see 732) ...	27
Lure of Foreign Names, The. By Alexander Brent-Smith ...	237	Modern Hungarian Composers. By Philip Helmine ...	164	— (Correspondence) ...	578
Lyon, James. Pianoforte, 'The Water Mirror' (Review) ...	555	Modern Music ... and a way out. By Rutland Boughton ...	231	New Light on Early Tudor Composers. By W. H. Grattan Flood: ...
		Modern Scales and Acoustics (Corre- spondence)... ..	52	— XXIII. John Lloyd ...	24
		Modern Theme-Transformation. By Herbert Antcliffe ...	169	— XXIV. Thomas Appleby ...	97
Maaskoff, Anton. Recitals ...	875	Möser, Gladys. Recital ...	876	— XXV. John Dyson ...	320
MacCullagh Quartet ...	346	'(Monsieur) Croche,' Claude Debussy (Review) ...	178	— XXVI. Sir William Hawte ...	845
MacDowell. Pianoforte Duet (Review) ...	782	Monteverde. 'Sonata sopra Santa Maria,' at the 'Promenades' ...	628	New Music: A Portfolio of Music Ancient and Modern (Review) ...	407
— Three Sets of Pieces (Review) ...	112	Montgomery, Music at ...	512, 584	New Violin Music: Universal Edition of Vienna (Review) ...	407
McEwen, John B. 'A Winter Poem,' at the 'Promenades' ...	728	Morgan, Francis J. Sonata for Piano- forte and Violin (Review) ...	556	New York, Music at 61, 131, 279, 361, 437, 513, 658, 809, 881
— and the 'Rising' Young Composer (Correspondence) (see 651)	726	Morgan, Ralph. Appointment ...	122	— Bach Recital ...	250
— Symphony, 'Solway,' at Bournemouth ...	798	Morgan, R. O. Song, 'A Chinese Night' (Review) ...	555	— Music at 59, 129, 207, 274, 359, 434, 584, 654, 806, 879
Maclean, Alick. 'The Annunciation' Madrigalists and Lutenists. By Sylvia Townsend Warner ...	204 160, 234	Morley, J. George (Obituary) ...	54	Newcomb, Ethel. 'Leschetizky as I knew him' (Review) ...	105
Mahler, Gustav (Vienna) ...	587	Morley (Yorks.). Music at ...	59, 274	Newman, Ernest, and Modern Organ Playing ...	176
Maidstone, Music at ...	434	Mosby, House School. Carrillon of thirty-one Bells ...	503	— in the Sunday Times on 'The Twelve Best Melodies' ...	400
Maine, Basil. Stravinsky and Pure Music ...	93	Moszkowski. Pianoforte Duet (Review) Moulton, Dorothy. Recital ...	782 44	— on 'Protection for Critics' (see 552) ...	310
Malipiero. 'À Claude Debussy' (Review) (Review) ...	340 340	Mouré, Frederick. Mus. Doc. Degree Mousselle, Music at ...	503 207	— The Appreciation of Music' (Review) ...	632
— Songs, 'Maria nostra Donna,' 'L'Eco,' and 'Ballata' (Review) ...	783	Mulet, Henri. Organ, 'Esquisses 'Byzantines' (Review) ...	38	— The Emmanuel Moor Piano- forte ...	85
— String Quartet (Review) ...	339	Murdoch, William. Recital ...	260	— The Truth about Beethoven ...	11
— The Orchestra' (Review) ...	555	Murray, Stella. Recital ...	43	Newman, Robert. Benefit Concert ...	41
Malvern, Music at ...	89, 129	Murray-Aynsley, Elsa. Recital ...	560	Newmarch, Mrs. Rosa. Lecture: Czecho-Slovak Music ...	870
— Priory Church. 'St. Matthew' Passion at ...	350	Music and Communism. By C. D. Graham ...	481	Newport (Mon.), Music at ...	129, 207
Manchester, Forthcoming Season at ...	730	Music and Letters ... 127, 242, 550, 781		News from the Provinces: The M. T. Method of collecting and presenting... Newton, Ernest. Pianoforte, 'Romany Life' (Review) ...	716 249
Mann, A. H. Elected Fellow of King's College ...	47	Snowden ...	370	Newton, John. 'Sixty-five Dont's for Church Organists' (Review) ...	32
Marchant, A. W. (Obituary) ...	54	Music and Sport ...	559	Newtown, Music at ...	512
Margate Musical Festival ...	806	Music and the Army ...		Nicholls, Frederick. Song, 'The Quest' (Review) ...	856
Marks, F. Helena. 'The Sonata: Its Form and Meaning as exemplified in the Pianoforte Sonatas of Mozart' (Review) ...	183	Music at the Oberammergau Passion Play ...	619	Niemann, Walter ...	131
Marshall, M. E. Pianoforte, 'A Child's Garden of Music' (Review) ...	341	Music by Wireless. By Jeffrey Pulver Music Club, The ...	697 39	Nietzsche-Wagner Correspondence, The (Review) ...	852
Martin, Lady (Obituary) (see 645)	512	— Dinner to Sir Landon Ronald Reception to Rachmaninov ...	347 421	Nikisch, Arthur. By Alfred Kalisch ...	172
Mase, Owen. Song, 'There is no more to say' (Review) ...	856	Music in the Dominion: A Talk with Dr. Vogt ...	613	Nikisch, Mitja. Début at the 'Prom- enades' ...	729
Mason, D. G. 'Music as a Humanity, and other Essays' (Review) ...	186	Musical and Materialism. By Keighley Snowden ...	770	Nikisch, Recital ...	873
		Music and Sport ...	391	Nikisch, Christine (Obituary) ...	260
		Music and the Army ...	559	Nilsen, Noble, Tertius. Visit to England ...	531

	Page		Page		Page
Nonconformist Choir Union. Annual Meeting	863	Parlow, Edmund. Graded Studies and Sonatina Albums (Review)	249	Quality in Hymn Tunes (Correspondence) (see 265, 348)	427
North London Philharmonic Society	660	Parlow, Kathleen, on English Music	29	Queen's Hall Symphony Orchestra Concerts	41, 115, 189, 251, 411, 552, 740, 793, 873
Northampton, Music at	806	Parry Memorial Fund (Correspondence)	576	— and Madame Suggia	552
— Musical Society: Presentation to Mr. C. J. King	420	Parry's Symphonic Fantasia. Miniature Full Score (Review)	783	Queen's Hall Promenade Concerts (see 690, 773)	551, 628, 728, 792
Norwich Diocesan Church Choral Association	502	Patron's Fund, Royal College of Music (see 240)	270	— Aubert, Louis. 'Habanera'	628
— Handel Society. Pageant of 'Alceste'	584	Payling, Lily. Vocal Recital	44	— Bax, Arnold. Symphonic Variations	792
— Music at	207, 434	Pearce, Charles W. Musical Association paper, 'English Sacred Folk-Song'	54	— Gibbs, Armstrong. 'Betrothal'	728
Note on 'Best-Sellers,' A (see Correspondence, 268, 426)	174	— Two Pieces in Contrasted Styles (Review)	340	— Greenbaum, H. 'Parfum de la Nuit'	792
Note on the Mind's Ear, A. By Philip Heseltine	88	Pearsall's Letters. By W. Barclay Squire	318	— Howells, Herbert. 'Procession'	728
Nottingham, High Pavement Chapel	350, 573	Pedro, José M. Organ Recital	122	— McEwen, John B. 'A Winter Poem'	728
— Music at	59, 207, 275	Penrith, Music at	275	— Migot, Georges. 'Le Paravent de Laque aux Cinq Images'	728
— Old Basford United Methodist Church. Memorial Organ	865	People's Palace. Adrian C. Boult's Sunday Concerts	41, 115, 190, 252, 792	— Milhaud, Darius. Suite Symphonique	728
Novello, Twenty Short and Easy Pieces for the Organ: Set IV. (Review)	38	— Choral Society. 'The Dream of Gerontius'	190	— Monteverde. 'Sonata Sopra Santa Maria'	628
Novello Choir, The (see 603)	41, 345, 418, 729, 149	Performing Rights Society's Journal, the 'P.R. Gazette'	551	— Pierné. 'Trois Paysages Franciscains'	728
Nürnberg, New Musical Life at	437	Perosi: A Correction (Correspondence (see 439))	570	— Roussel. 'For a Spring Festival'	792
Nurses of English Song. The. By Frank Kidson (see Correspondence, 724)	394, 620	Peterborough, Music at	434	— Scarborough, Ethel. Fantasy 'Promise'	792
Nuttall, Lucy. Recital	568	Petri, M. Egon, and Beethoven's Op. 106	261	— Wall, Alfred. 'Thanet'	792
— (Correspondence)	352	— (Correspondence)	352	Quilter, Roger. 'Where the Rainbow Ends,' arr. for organ by Leslie Woodgate (Review)	409
'Ode to Death.' Gustav Holst (Review)	689	Pfitzner, Hans	736, 809	Rachmaninov, C sharp minor Prelude: arranged as Duet by Hatherly Wentworth (Review)	782
Old Hall School (Wellington, Salop). New Organ at	865	Philharmonic Choir, The	202, 342, 410	— Reception	421
'Old Vic.' The	45, 262, 346, 410, 795	Philharmonic Quartet, The	44, 116	— Recital	418
— (Correspondence)	578	— at Chelsea	345	Radford, Robert (see British Players and Singers)
— Gatty, Nicholas. The Tempest	410	Philharmonic Society (see Royal Philharmonic Society)		— (see 650).	427, 578, 724, 803
— 'Peer Gynt' music	262	Phillips, J. W. 'Carols: Their Origin, Music, and Connection with Mystery Plays' (Review)	32	Random Notes on a Recent European Tour. By C. à Becket Williams	319
— Smyth, Dr. Ethel. 'The Boatswain's Mate'	346, 795	Pianoforte Pedal Notation (Correspondence)	866	Rathbone, George. 'Weep you no more, sad fountains' (Review)	640
Boatswain's Mate	346, 795	Pienné. 'Trois Paysages Franciscains,' at the 'Promenades'	728	Raunds, Music at	59
Oldroyd, George. Song, 'Soliloquy' (Review)	247	Pirani, Max. Recital	117	Ravanello, Oreste. Pianoforte Pieces (Review)	340
On Editing Elizabethan Songs. By Philip Heseltine	477	Pirker, Max. 'Round about the "Magic Flute"' (Review)	31	— Study on Imitation' (Review)	331
Ontario, The Oratorio Society of Brantford	441	Pitcher, R. J. Lecture	127	— Three Short Compositions (Review)	187
Opera in London	44, 117, 191, 262, 346, 410, 500, 568	— Short Treatise on Hand Development (Review)	780	Ravel. 'La Valse.' Miniature Score (Review)	246
Orchestral Concert at St. John's College, Hurstpierpoint (Correspondence)	353	Pizzetti Violin Sonata and Percy Scholes (see 29, 509)	100	— Pavane pour une Infante Défunte. Arrangement for Organ (Review)	248
Orchestral Concerts and the Musical Public	692	Pizzetti and Beethoven (Correspondence (see 100))	426, 509	— Sonata for Violin and Violoncello (Review)	556
Orchestral Scores	246, 641	Plainson, Accompaniment of. By Godfrey Seates	854	Read, Ernest. 'First Steps in Melody-Making' (Review)	245
Organ in the Church of St. Lawrence Jewry, The. By Sidney J. Ambler	264	Player-Piano Projects. By J. D. M. Rorke	315	Read, H. V. Jervis. 'Caprice' (Review)	247
Organ News from Spain	122	— (Correspondence)	577	— Limehouse Wharf' (Review)	247
Organ-playing, Mr. Newman on Modern Organ Recitals (see Recitals).	176	Plymouth, Music at	275, 359, 512, 654, 806	— Little Preludes' (Review)	249
Organ, The. Musical Quarterly	127, 350, 572, 798	— Sherwell Congregational Church Organ	424	— Two Songs for Children (Review)	247
Organ Works of Bach, The. By Harvey Grace (see 685).		Poldini. Pianoforte Duet (Review)	782	Rebel Romantics. By Mrs. Frank Liebhich	392
Organist, A Word on the (Correspondence)	865	— Six Divertissements (Review)	556	Recitals, Organ	47, 122, 197, 266, 350, 425, 503, 573, 646, 722, 800, 865
Organists' Benevolent League	265, 425, 503	Pollitt, Dr. Arthur W. Lectures	811	— Mid-day	424
— Sir Frederick Bridge's Appeal	425, 503	Poole, Fanny Kemble (Obituary)	277	Redland Park Church, Bristol. Hymn of Praise' at	47
Organists' Continental Tour (Correspondence)	509	Popley, Herbert A. 'The Music of India' (Review)	184	Reger, Max	436, 657
Organs in Genoa Cathedral, The (Correspondence)	351	Port Talbot, Music at	275	Reimers, Paul. Concerts	568, 795
Organs of Lambeth Parish Church, The. By Andrew Freeman (see 196)	119	Porte, J. F. 'Edward MacDowell: His Life and Music' (Review)	632	Remains of a Famous Old Organ. By C. F. Abdy Williams	720
Oriana Madrigal Society, The (see 416, 250, 559)		Portsmouth, Music at	59, 207, 275, 434, 654, 806, 879	Remarkable Handel Collection, A: Christopher Smith's Transcripts of Handel's Works. By E. van der Straeten	322
Origin of 'Samson and Delilah,' The. By Camille Saint-Saëns	23	Power, John F. (Obituary)	806	Remarkable Public School Programme, A (Correspondence)	353
Origin of the Baton (Correspondence)	578	Prague, Music at	134	Restive under Criticism (Correspondence (see 331))	426
Ormskirk RUDECANAL Choir Union, Revival of	502	Precursor of the Saxophone, A. By Tom S. Wotton	846	Rhonda, Music at	584
Orton, Albert. Appointment to St. Anne's, Soho	863	Preservation of Musical Works from vandalism	101	— 'Rhythm' By George Sampson (Review)	855
O'Shea, Alfred. Recital	560	Press Notices. Artists' misleading quotations from (see 310)	552	Richards, Dr. H. W. 'Church Choir Training' (Review)	185
Ossett Orchestral Society	806	Professional Classes Aid Council	393	Richardson, Dr. A. Madeley. 'Extempore Playing' (Review)	705
Oundle School. A novel performance of 'The Messiah' (see 29)	55	Prokofiev. Pianoforte Concerto No. 3, in C. Performance at L.S.O. Concert Promenade Concerts (see Queen's Hall)	410	Richmond, Mrs. Herbert, and Lady Bell. 'The Cat and Fiddle Book' (Review)	780
— and the B minor Mass	625	Protection for Critics. By Ernest Newman	310	Ridink, Henry. Presentation	47
Our Decadence. By Rutland Boughton (see Correspondence, 575, 649)	474	Provincial Choral Society Programmes	729	Ripon, Music at	59, 129
Our lost Operatic Lead. By Herman Klein	20	Provincial News in the Musical Times (Correspondence (see 716))	51	Robert, Gustave. Minuet, Little Waltz, Rondo (Review)	429
Oxford, Music at	59, 207, 275, 359, 512, 584, 654, 879	Pullein, John. Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in E flat (Review)	339	Robins, Albert. Appointment	349
— Musical Festival	241, 402	Pulver, Jeffrey. Music by Wireless	697	Robson, Dorothy. Recital	568
Paderewski. Polish Dances and Songs (Review)	408	— Musical Association paper, 'The Music of Ancient Egypt'	127
Paignton, Music at	207	— The Fancy	390
Painted Music. By Alexander Brent-Smith (see 867)	777	Purcell for Small Orchestras (Correspondence (see 717))	802
— (Correspondence)	867	Pyne, J. Kendrick. M.A. Degree	503
Parbury, Florence. Vocal Recital	117	Pyne, Zolt. Kendrick. Giovanni Pierluigi da Palestrina: His Life and Times' (Review)	704
Paris, Appleby Matthews's Concert	872
— Music at	60, 132, 279, 438, 514, 658, 882
Parker, George. Vocal Recitals	189, 191, 260

	Page		Page		Page
Robson, Dr. R. Walker. Lectures	425	St. Helens Glee Club	806	Sharp, Cecil J. * Country Dance
Rochester Diocesan Choir Festival	646	St. James's Roman Catholic Church,		Tunes: Sets X. and XI. (Review)	781
Rochester, Music at	59, 207, 359, 654	Spanish Place. New Organ	646	— The Country Dance Book
Rogers, Francis (New York). On Music		St. John's, St. Leonards-on-Sea. Parry's		(Review)	778
in London (see 200)	28	Job's at	129	Sharps and Flats	53, 125, 203, 268, 354, 428, 510, 579, 653, 800, 869
Rogers, Winthrop L. (Obituary)	126	St. John's College, Hurstpierpoint. A		Shaw, Geoffrey. 'A Medley' (Review)	249
Rolland, Romain. 'A Musical Tour		remarkable programme (Corre-		Shaw, Martin. 'Annabel Lee' (Review)	187 through the Land of the Past' (Review)	403	spondence)	353	— and Percy Dearmer. 'The
Roloff, Alex. 'On Shadowy Waters'		St. Leonards, Music at	878	Canson Book' (Review)	37
(Review)	556	St. Martin's (Charing Cross) Pageant	261	Sheffield, Music at	129, 207, 359, 654, 879
Rome. Important discovery of unpub-		St. Mary Aldermay. Lectures at	799	Shirehampton, Music at	879
lished music of Girolamo Frescobaldi	659	St. Mary's, Primrose Hill. Recital	197	Shore, S. Royle. Lectures	572
— Music at (see 510),	60, 132, 280,	St. Michael's, Cornhill (see 266)	197, 759, 863	Shrewsbury, Music at	59, 275
361, 439, 659,	810	St. Paul's Church, Colwyn Bay.		Significant Chords. By Alexander
Ronald, Sir Landon. Dinner to	347	Brahms's 'Requiem' at...	361	Brent-Smith	615
— Knighthood	100	St. Peters Church, Aintree, Liverpool.		Silbermann Organs at Dresden, The.
— Songs. 'At Morning': 'Let all		New Organ...	350	By John Matthews	643
the Strains of Joy' (Review)	856	St. Saviour's, Paddington. Gounod's		Silburn, Muriel. Early Charters of
Rondel Quartet, The	480	'Redemption' at...	350	Incorporation Granted to Musicians	205, 283, 356
Rootham, Daniel Wilberforce (Obituary)	369	St. Stephen's Walbrook. 'Hymn of		— Some Contemporary Criticisms
Rootham, Dr. Cyril. New Opera, 'The		Praise' at...	864	of Beethoven	732
Two Sisters'	84, 192	Saint-Saëns as I knew him. By Herman		Silk, Dorothy (see British Players and Rorke, J. D. M. 'A Musical Pilgrim's		Klein (see 54, 114)...	90	Singers).
Progress' (Review)	103	Saint-Saëns, Authorised Translations		— Ancient Concerts	252
— Player-Piano Projects (see 577)	315	from, by Fred Rotherwell:		— Concert of 'Old Music'	344
Rosenbloom, Sydney. 'Ginger-(k)Nuts'		'Charles Gounod on Mozart's		— Recital	43
(Review)	112	'Don Juan'...	238	Siloli. Recital	44
Rosenfeld, Paul. 'Musical Portraits:		'Chopin'...	321	Simplicity versus Insignificance (Corre-
Interpretations of twenty modern		'Outspoken Essays on Music'		spondence)	201
Composers' (Review)	330	(Review)	704	Sims, Henry T. Silver Wedding
Rosing, Vladimir. Recital	876	— 'Cinq Poèmes de Ronsard'		Presentation	357
Rossini. 'La Boutique Fantasque,'		(Review)	247	Singing Classes, Municipal, for Servants	771
arranged for any combination of		— 'Feuille d'Album' (Review)	38	Singing Lesson, My	582 instruments (Review)	857	— Sonatas for Wood-Wind		Sittingbourne, Music at	207
Rost, Greta, and Foster Why. Concert		(Review)	37	Six-Stop Organ: Unique Specification
Rotherham, Music at	129	— Subscribers to 'Complete		(Correspondence) (see 125)	199
Rothery, W. G., M.V.O.	261	Edition of Bach	114	Sixty Years Ago	54, 125, 203, 269, 354, 428, 510, 579, 653, 727, 869
Rothwell, Fred (see Saint-Saëns).		— the Origin of 'Samson and		Slater, Gordon A. Organ Recitals	646
Roussel, Albert. 'For a Spring Festival,'		Delilah' (Obituary)	23	Slater, James Frederick (Obituary)	434
at the 'Promenades'	792	Salisbury, Music at	59	'Small Hymn Book, The' (Review)	32
(Review)	38	Salmon, M. Recital	44	Smart, Henry. 'The day is gently
Rowley, Alec. 'Heroic Suite' (Review)	188	Salzburg Festival By Edwin Evans		sinking' (Review)...	555
— Lectures: On 'Music Teach-		(see 241, 441, 625)...	628	Smekel, Richard. 'Ferdinand ing for Children'...	57	Sammons, Albert (see British Players		Raemund' (Review)	31
— Rhapsody (Review)	188	and Singers).		— 'Old Viennese Theatre Song'
— Six Improvisations (Review)	112	Sampson, George. 'Rhythm: Its		(Review)	31
— 'The Child Heart' (Review)	556	Power and its Neglect' (Review)	855	Smith, Alexander Brent. (see Brent-
Royal Academy of Music	56, 204, 270,	Samuel, Harold (see British Players		Smith).
— Awards	357, 428, 511, 803, 871	and Singers).		Smith, Breville. 'The Emigrant'
— Centenary Celebrations (see 400,	486, 549, 624, 651, 656)	Sanley, Sir Charles, 1834-1932		(Review)	332
— 469, 579, 803		(Obituary)	784, 806	Smith, Charles T. 'The School of Life'
Royal Amateur Orchestral Society	345	Sargent, Dr. Malcolm. 'Nocturne and		(Review)	134
Royal Choral Society	42, 116, 190, 251,	Scherzo, at the 'Promenades'		Smith, D. S. String Quartet (Review)	857
— 345, 346, 729		Sauret, Emile. Wieniawski's 'Faust		Smyth, Dame Ethel. 'The Boatswain's
— Balfour, H. L. Appointed		Fantaisie' (Review)	557	'Mate' at the 'Old Vic'...	346, 795
General Conductor	346	Scales and Tonality (Correspondence)	52	— The Music of (Correspondence)	200
— 'Elijah,' conducted by Sir		Scarborough, Ethel. 'Promise,' at the		Snow String Quartet	116
Landon Ronald	877	'Promenades'...	792	Snowden, Keighley. Music and — Greir, R. Arnold. Appointed		Scarborough, Music at	359	Materialism	391
Organist	511	Seats, Godfrey. 'Missa Fidelium'		Some Aspects of William Byrd. By
— Holst's 'The Hymn of Jesus'	251	(Review)	335	Sydney Grew	698
— Resignation of Sir Frederick		— Recital and Lecture on the		Some Contemporary Criticisms of Bridge	346	Accompaniment of Plainsong	122	Beethoven. By Muriel Silburn	732
— Presentation to Sir Frederick		— The Liturgical Use of the		Some Innovations in Criticism	99
Bridge	568	Organ' (Review)	854	Some Thoughts on Unaccompanied
Royal College of Music	56, 126, 270,	Schering, Arnold. New Play, 'Der		Song. By Gerrard Williams	773
— Awards	429, 511, 654, 872	Thomaskantor' (Berlin)	59	Somerville, Colonel. Competition for
— Julian Clifford Scholarship	361	Schmid, Anton. Organ Recitals	864	British Composers	346
— Patron's Fund (see 240)	270	Schmitt, Florent. 'Antony and Cleo-		Somerville, Reginald. 'David Garrick,'
— War Memorial	872	patra' (Review)	38	at the Queen's Theatre	262
Royal College of Organists	47, 118, 193,	— Second Book of the Great		Songs, and their Words: Miss Lucia
— 502, 569, 644, 721		Musicians' (Review)	778	Young's English versions of German
— Blind Organists' success	646, 722	— The Beginner's Guide to		Lieder	495
— Distribution of Diplomas		Harmony' (Review)	407	Sorabji, Kaikhosru. Reply to 'Musical
	163, 502, 569	— and the Pizzetti Violin Sonata		America	28
Royal Philharmonic Society	41, 188, 251, 342	(see 29, 201)...	100	— Songs, 'Trois Poèmes'
— Delius's 'Requiem' at...	342	Schönberg, Arnold. Society for Private		(Review)	782
Rudolfstadt and Donaueschingen Musik-		Musical Performances	883	— Two Pianoforte Pieces (Review)	640
fest	585	Schreker, Franz, at Essen (see 880)	513	South London Choral Association	729
Ruffo, Titta	418, 794	Schubert Festival at Neuss	513	South London Philharmonic Society	208, 261, 729
Rummel, Walter. Recitals (see 125)	44	Schweitzer, Dr. Albert. Organ Recitals	265	South West Choral Society	261, 729
Russian Ballet at Covent Garden	349	Scott, Cyril, at Vienna	271	South Yarra (Victoria), Christ Church
		— Inclination à la Danse'		Organ Recitals	197
Saarbrücken Musical Festival	736	(Review)	112	Southampton, Music at	275, 434
St. Annes (Kennington) Choral Society	515	— Three 'Moods' (Review)	408	Southend-on-Sea, Music at	235
St. Alban's, Music at	434	— Villanelle of Firelight'		Southsea, Christ Church. Rossini's
— Cathedral, Brahms's 'Requiem'		(Review)	332	'Stabat Mater' at	425
at, by St. Alban's Bach Choir	350	Scott, Edward. 'Dancing for Strength		— Music at	735
— Fayfax's 'Albanus'		and Beauty' (Review)	104	Southwark Cathedral	769, 863
Mass at	425	Scott, Francis George. 'Scottish		Spanner, H. V. Organ Recital (see 486)	425, 865
St. Andrews, Music at	434	Lyrics' (Review)	857	Spencer Dyke Party, The...	116, 275
St. Anne's, Soho. Bach Jubilee Festival	197, 345	Scott-Baker, H. Dance of the		Spohr and his Influence. By C. A
	207	Dominoes' (Review)	249	Becket Williams (see 736)	49
St. Austell, Music at		Scriabin's Music and the Three Choirs		Squire, W. Barclay. Handel's 'Water-
St. Columba's Church of Scotland.		Festival (Correspondence)	124	Musical (Correspondence)	865
Specification of New Organ	121	Seattle, The Amphion Choir	41	— Pearsall's Letters	318
		Seidel, Toscha, at Queen's Hall	115
		Selby, Music at	359, 584
		Servants, Municipal Singing Classes for	771
		Settle. 'Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast' at	359
		Sevenoaks Musical Society	729

	Page		Page		Page
Stanford C. Villiers. 'Interludes, Records, and Impressions' (Review) (see 327) ...	329	Translation and Transcription. By Alexander Brent-Smith ...	169	Westminster Abbey. John Blow Commemorative Service (see 484, 554) ...	572
Stedid, Max. New Opera, 'Walpurgisnacht' ...	247	Tregaron, Music at ...	129	Westminster Cathedral Organ ...	573, 799, 865
Stephenson, Edwin (Obituary) ...	807	Trevor, Claude. Berlioz in Italy ...	655	Westminster Choral Society, at Queen's Hall ...	345
Stewart, D. M. Song, 'Denny's Daughter' (Review) ...	332	Trevor, Mignon. Vocal Recital ...	117	Westminster Orchestral Society, at Kensington Town Hall ...	345
— Songs, 'Shells' and 'The Great Orme' (Review) ...	555	Trinity College of Music ...	57, 127, 271, 357, 389, 729, 804	What is 'Modern' Music? By M.-D. Calvocoressi ...	765
Stewart, Hylton (Obituary) ...	360	— Awards ...	57, 127, 204, 357, 729	Which Language? (Correspondence) (see 577) ...	652
Still in the Van (Correspondence) ...	267	— Examinations in India (Correspondence) ...	508, 574	Whitaker, George. Songs, 'From the Arabic' (Review) ...	187
Stockport, Music at ...	129	— Jubilee ...	389, 581	White, Felix. Songs (Review) : 'Cradle Song, A' ...	856
Store, Stephen. Comic-Opera, 'The Haunted Tower' ...	501	Trocadero, Paris. Saint-Saëns's 'La Terre Promise' at the ...	237	— 'Leap into a Dance' ...	856
'Strange Omission, A.' Algernon Ashton on (Correspondence) ...	352	Truth about Beethoven, The. By Ernest Newman ...	11	— 'Little Brother, The' ...	856
Stratford-on-Avon, Music at ...	434	Tubb, Carrie (see British Players and Singers) ...		— 'Love of the Archer Prince, The' ...	856
Strauss, Richard. Albert Hall Concert ...	115	Tudor Church Music (Review) ...	339	— 'Minion Wife, The' ...	856
Stravinsky and Pure Music. By Basil Maine ...	93	Tudor Singers, The ...	42	— 'Neophyte, The' ...	856
— Day by Day. By Alfred Kalisch ...	27	Turnbull, Robert (Obituary) ...	54	— 'Northern Star, The' ...	856
— 'Les Cinq Douits' (Review) ...	782	Turner, W. J. 'Music and Life' (Review) ...	30	Whitehaven Ruridecanal Choir Festival ...	573
— Theories, The. By Edward Mitchell ...	162	Turton, H. Matthias. Lecture-Recital ...	799	Whittaker, W. G. Quintet, 'Among the Northumbrian Hills' (Review) ...	640
Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestral Society ...	117, 345, 735	— On Modern Organ Music ...	46	Who wrote Gounod's 'Faust'? By A. Keay ...	846
Studies on the Horn. By W. F. H. Blandford : I. The French Horn in England ...	544	— Vierne's four Symphonies ...	424	Why, Foster, and Greta Rost. Concert ...	795
— II. Wagner and the Horn Parts of 'Lohengrin' ...	622, 693	'Twelve Best Melodies, The' ...	399	Why Use Words? (Correspondence) ...	52
Suggia, Madame. Recitals ...	364, 558	Union of Graduates in Music at Cambridge, The. By Arthur T. Froggatt ...	581	Widor's fifth Organ Symphony. Orchestral version at the 'Promenades' ...	729
Sunderland, Music at ...	275	Unknown Works of Thomas Tomkins (Correspondence) ...	124	Wieniawski. 'Faust Fantaisie' (Review) ...	557
Sutton Congregational Church, Harvest Festival ...	799	Van der Straeten, E. A Remarkable Handel collection : Christopher Smith's Transcripts of Handel's Works ...	322	Wilks, Norman. Recital ...	190
Swainson, Willan. Organ Recital ...	864	— The Handel Festival at Halle, May 25-28 ...	487	Wilkesden Green and Cricklewood Choral Society. Presentation to Conductor ...	516
Swan, Alfred J. Medtner ...	616	Van Dresser, Marcia. Recital ...	568	Williams, Ben. Recital ...	795
Swanage, Music at ...	806	Vatican Choir at the Albert Hall, The (see 401) ...	419	Williams, C. à Becket. Random Notes on a Recent European Tour ...	319
Swansea, Music at ...	207	— in Ireland ...	512	— Spohr and His Influence (see 736) ...	49
Swinstead, Felix. Five Caprices (Review) ...	249	Viadana. 'Did Viadana Use Figures?' (Correspondence) ...	505, 648	Williams, C. F. Abdy. Remains of a Famous Old Organ ...	720
Switzerland, Music at the Zurich Festival ...	515	Vienna. International Novelties ...	586, 648	Williams, Gerrard. Concert ...	344
Sydney Conservatorium Hall ...	129	— Music at 132, 281, 440, 515, 586, 739, 810, 882		— Part-Song, 'Her Hair the Net of Golden Wire' (Review) ...	640
Tailleferre, Germaine. Pianoforte duet, 'Image' (Review) ...	113	Violin-Maker, A London (William Robinson) ...	133	— Pianoforte, 'Moods' (Review) (see 200) ...	112
Talley, Thomas W. 'Negro Folk-Rhymes, Wise and Otherwise' (Review) ...	855	— (Alfred Vincent) ...	850	— Quartet No. 2 (Review) ...	783
Tansman, Alexandre. Second Violin Sonata : Pianoforte Preludes (Review) ...	340	Violin Music, New Universal Edition of Vienna (Review) ...	407	— Some Thoughts on Unaccompanied Song ...	773
Tchaikovsky. Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor (Review) ...	640	Violins, Old and New : Prejudice versus Facts (see 27, 850) ...	732	— Song, 'The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington' (Review) ...	332
— Trio, 'A la Mémoire d'un Grand Artiste' (Review) ...	113	Vivaldi. 'Sonata da Camera' (Review) ...	557	— Song, 'The Golden Age' (Review) ...	856
Tenbury, St. Michael's College. Dedication Feast, Music at the ...	799	Vocal Therapy Society, The ...	325	— Song, 'Time' (Review) ...	332
Terry, Sanford, Mus. Doc. (Edin.) Degree ...	625	Vogt, Dr. A. S. (see 'Music in the Dominion') ...		— The Art of the Ballad ...	55
Terry, Richard Runciman. Knight-hood ...	849	Voluntaries in Paris Churches ...	47	Williams, R. Vaughan. Pastoral Symphony ...	188
Tertis, Lionel. By Edwin Evans (see British Players and Singers) ...		Vreuls, Victor. Song, 'Pour Toi' (Review) ...	187	— Pianoforte Suite of Six Short Pieces (Review) ...	781
Tetrazzini, Madame ...	794, 876	Wakefield, Music at ...	879	— Phantasy Quintet (Review) ...	556
Thayer, Alexander Wheelock. The Life of Ludwig van Beethoven (see 'The Truth about Beethoven') ...		Wales, Prince of, at Tokyo ...	730	— Visit to United States ...	241
'Theater und Kultur.' Edited by Richard Smekel, Hermann Bahr, and Hugo Hofmannsthal (Review) ...	30	Walker, James J. (Obituary) (see 722) ...	807	Wilson, Christopher. 'Shakespeare and Music' (Review) (see 867) ...	776
There and Here : A Retrospect and Comparisons. By M.-D. Calvocoressi ...	94	Wall, Alfred. 'Thanet,' at the 'Promenades' ...	792	Winchester, Music at ...	207
Thibaud, M. Recital ...	117	Wall, Harry. Presentation ...	573	Winchmore Hill Congregational Church, Easter Festival ...	350
Thomas, C. Edgar : Thomas Britton : The Musical Small-Coal Man ...	429	Walther, Richard H. Miniature Sonata (Review) ...	555	Woes of a Music Master (Correspondence) ...	652
Thomas, John Charles. Recital ...	560	— Song, 'Our Lady's Children' (Review) ...	555	Woking, Music at ...	129, 434
Thompson, Herbert. Gloucester Musical Festival (see 435) ...	705	Wandsworth Male-Voice Choir ...	261, 864	Wolverhampton, Music at ...	359
— Leeds Musical Festival ...	796	Wanted, Compositions for Wind Instruments (Correspondence) ...	651, 725, 801	Women Composers, Society of ...	874
Thompson, M. César. Recital ...	346	Warlock, Peter. Three Songs (Review) ...	640	Women Musicians, Society of ...	134
Three Choirs Festival ...	573	Warner, H. Waldo. New Quartet Suite, at Æolian Hall ...	793	Wood, Rev. Joseph. 'Nonconformist Church Music' (Review) ...	245
— (Correspondence) ...	576	Warner, Sylvia Townsend. Madrigalists and Lutenists ...	160, 234	Wood, Sir Henry. 'A Busman's Holiday' (Correspondence) ...	772
Thursfield, Anne. Recitals ...	116, 498	Warning to Vocalists, Instrumentalists, &c. (Correspondence) ...	802	— and Additions to the 'Casse-Noisette' (Correspondence) ...	725
Tiltman, Henry. Song, 'Music, when soft voices die' (Review) ...	555	Warrilow, H. C. Recital and Address ...	350	— Symphony Concerts at Queen's Hall ...	115
Timaru, N. Z. Orpheus Choir ...	62	Warwick Pageant. Gluck's 'Orpheus' ...	569	Wood-Smith Quartet, The ...	346
Tokyo, Prince of Wales's sojourn at ...	730	Waters, C. F. Organ, 'Choral Melody' (Review) ...	409	Woodgate, Leslie. Arrangements, for Organ, from Quilter's 'Where the Rainbow Ends' (Review) ...	409
Tonis, John R. 'A Great Musician' (Correspondence) ...	351	Webb, F. Gilbert. The Emmanuel Moor Duplex-Coupler Pianoforte explained at the Musical Association ...	355	Woodhouse, Mrs. Gordon (Recital) ...	344
Toronto, Music at ...	61, 281, 439, 810, 882	Wednesbury, Music at ...	275	Woodward, Rev. G. R. Lecture, 'Carols,' at St. Mary Aldermary ...	799
Torquay, Music at ...	275, 735	Weisbord, Master. Recital ...	411	Worcester, Music at ...	207, 275, 359, 434
Torri, Luigi, on the Violin and Violin Makers (Review) ...	331	Welbeck Abbey Oratorio Choir, the 'Hymn of Praise' ...	503
Torrington, Music at ...	275	Wellisz, Egon. Song, 'Aurora' (Review) ...	782
Tovey, Prof. D. F. 'Beethoven's Ninth Symphony : an Essay in Musical Analysis' (Review) ...	404	Wellington, Shropshire. Old Hall School, New Organ at the ...	865
— Recital and Lecture on Duplex-Coupler Pianoforte ...	117	Wesley's 'Behold, how good and joyful' (Review) ...	339
'Training in Music,' Pitman (Review) ...	246	— Samuel Sebastian, Tomb. By H. T. Gilberthorpe ...	262
Training in Operatic Art (Correspondence) ...	51	West Middlesex Musical Society ...	441, 654, 784

	Page
Word on the Organist, A (Correspondence)...	725, 801
Wortham, H. E. Festival Week at Oxford (see 241) ...	402
Wotton, Tom. A Precursor of the Saxophone...	846
——— 'La Favorita' or 'La Favorite' (Correspondence) (see 577)	652
Wrexham, Music at ...	434
Wrigley, Alfred. Pianoforte, Rondo alla Tarantella (Review) ...	640
Wronski, Thaddeus. 'The Singer and His Art' (Review) ...	405
Wyatt, E. G. P. (see 'Easy Plain-song Settings of the Holy Communion')
Wyatt-Smith, Mrs. F. (Obituary) ...	126
Wynn-Reeves String Quartet ...	116
Yeats, W. B. Mr. Peter Warlock on the censor of settings of the poet's works (Correspondence) ...	123
Young, Miss Lucia. Recitals ...	191, 495
York, Music at 129, 207, 275, 359, 806, 879
——— Minster. Hymn Service ...	646
Zifado, Miss. Recital ...	874
Zoltán Kodály. By Cecil Gray ...	312
——— Second String Quartet (Review) ...	187
Zurich (Switzerland) Festival, The ...	515

OBITUARY

(Abstract from General Index)

	Page		Page
Baines, William, 1899-1922 ...	872	Laudy, Joseph, 1862-1921 ...	45
Baker, Ralph H. ...	207	Liebich, Franz ...	126
Banks, Harry Collingwood, 1861-1922 ...	872	McClure, Sir John D. ...	271
Beringer, Oscar, 1844-1922... ..	276	Marchant, Dr. A. W., 1850-1921 ...	54
Betjemann, Gilbert Henry, 1840-1921 ...	54	Martin, Lady Margaret Neilson, 1854-1922	512, 645
Boccadati-Carignani, Virginia, 1823-1922	810	Moberley, Edward Hugh, 1850-1922	434
Brandreth, H. B., 1869-1921 ...	54	Morley, J. George, 1847-1921 ...	54
Caryll, Ivan, 1861-1921 ...	54	Nikisch, Arthur, 1855-1922 ...	172
Child, Annie M. ...	871	Nilsson, Christine, 1843-1921 ...	54
Clifford, Julian, 1877-1921 ...	126	Poole, Fanny Kemble ...	277
Cooper, Sir Edward Ernest, 1848-1922 ...	167	Power, John F., 1839-1922 ...	806
Croager, Edward George, 1861-1922 ...	584	Rogers, Winthrop L. ...	126
Daubeny, Ulric E. ...	512	Rootham, Daniel Wilberforce, 1837-1922	360
Denza, Chevalier Luigi, 1846-1922 ...	207	Saint-Saëns, Camille, 1835-1921 ...	54, 90
Donajowski, E., 1845-1922... ..	360	Santley, Sir Charles, 1834-1922 ...	784, 806
Edmonds, Henry R., 1901-1922 ...	277	Slater, James Frederick, 1856-1922 ...	434
Etlinger, Florence ...	126	Spada, Giacinto, 1899-1922... ..	810
Goddard, Arabella, 1836-1922 ...	655	Stephenson, Edwin... ..	807
Gower, John Henry, 1855-1922 ...	654	Stewart, Hylton, 1850-1922 ...	360
Green, William Edward, 1843-1922 ...	584	Turnbull, Robert, 1866-1921 ...	54
Hayward, Gerald, 1854-1922 ...	126	Walker, James John, 1846-1922 ...	722, 807
Hervey, Arthur, 1855-1922... ..	277	Wyatt-Smith, Mrs. F. ...	126
Huber, Hans, 1852-1921 ...	126

Photograph by Hatley Bacon, 41, New Bond Street, W-1.

HAROLD SAMUEL

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

JANUARY 1 1922

THE TRUTH ABOUT BEETHOVEN*

BY ERNEST NEWMAN

It may come as a surprise to the ordinary reader of musical history and biography to be told that more than any other composer Beethoven stands in need of an authentic Life. If there is any composer whose movements, whose correspondence, even whose conversation can be tracked month by month, almost day by day, it is Beethoven. In some ways our information about him is even more copious than our information about Wagner, for in the case of the latter we have none of the Conversation Books that fix for us some of the actual talks between Beethoven and his friends as definitely as if these had been recorded for the gramophone. There are many Lives of Beethoven, many volumes of reminiscences of him, many editions of or selections from his letters, many reconstructions of him by more or less imaginative literary portrait painters. And yet it is safe to say that hardly one music-lover in a million knows Beethoven as he really was, or can separate the truth from the fiction in the scores of romantic stories that are current concerning him. Everyone knows the ordinary sentimentalised bust or portrait of Beethoven—a Beethoven visibly conscious of the necessity for living up, so far as appearances go, to the general conception of him as a Titan staggering under the too vast orb of his fate. The literary portraits we have of him are, almost without exception, equally sentimentalised. It is time that the man Beethoven was drawn from the life, not evolved out of the inner consciousness of each successive biographer.

We all know the Beethoven of the poetical legend—a sick eagle fretted by crows and sparrows, a Prometheus and a Faust in one, a man picked out from the beginning as a target for the Evil One, poor, misunderstood, neglected, injured by false friends, and finally broken by the base ingratitude of the nephew to whom he had given himself with a devotion and a self-sacrifice unparalleled either in real life or in fiction. This figure touched the sensibilities and the sympathies of men as that of no other composer has done—how, indeed, could anyone refuse sympathy to the tragic spectacle of one of the greatest of composers deprived of his hearing? And, anxious to have full justification for its expenditure of emotion, mankind was willing to go to any length of credulity where a Beethoven anecdote was concerned, so long only as it touched the source of tears. Let a simple example suffice.

One of the best-known legends is that after his return from Gnixendorf to Vienna in the early days of December, 1826, with the violent cold that was the beginning of his fatal illness, he lay ill for some days before he could get medical attention, and then received it only by an accident. According to Schindler, the wicked nephew Karl, instead of summoning a doctor, either deliberately neglected or forgot to do so. He went about his usual sinful pleasures, of which billiard-playing was one; and in the course of a game he happened, some days after, to remember his uncle's commission. He casually mentioned it to the marker, asking him to send a doctor. The marker, being unwell, neglected to do so for some time; but finding himself in a hospital he mentioned the matter to the doctor in charge—one Wawruch, who thereupon repaired to Beethoven. This story, according to Schindler, was told him by Dr. Wawruch himself. But there is not a word of truth in it: Thayer's language is not too strong when he calls it a 'shameless fabrication.' It is disproved by the account of Beethoven's illness (written by Wawruch less than two months after the composer's death and published in 1842), and by the Conversation Book. 'I was not called in until the third day,' says Wawruch, and Karl's entries in the Conversation Book confirm this. The doctor first visited the patient on December 5. Beethoven had arrived at his lodgings on December 2. In an undated letter to Carl Holz, which was no doubt written on either December 4 or 5 (for he speaks of having arrived 'a few days ago,' and of a previous letter, also written after his arrival, having been mislaid), he refers to his illness in a way that shows he did not regard it as serious,* and says he would be delighted if Holz would come and see him. Karl must have delivered this letter without delay; and Holz must have called on Beethoven at once, sent to Wawruch at once, and secured the immediate attendance of the latter at the Schwarzspanierhaus. Karl's entries relating to the physician's visit end on December 14; and the evidence of the Conversation Book is conclusive that Schindler did not see Beethoven till some time after that date.

A hundred similar cases of error or perversion of the truth could be cited. What is the explanation of them? In part, the errors are honest; events are only dimly remembered after the lapse of many years, and in any case the narrator of an event necessarily saw only one aspect of it. But a good deal of the confusion has come from the pardonable desire of each of the great man's friends to pose as the friend. Schindler's jealousy of the others, and particularly of Holz, is notorious. Now the peculiar relation of Schindler to Beethoven gave him exceptional opportunities for legend-floating. It was known that he had been a sort of secretary to the composer for some years, that he was with him in the last days, and that the famous Conversation Books* had come into his keeping after Beethoven's death. His biography of the composer, therefore (first edition, 1840; second edition, 1845; third edition, 1860), seemed to have every title to be considered authoritative. In the course of time, doubts were cast on many of his statements; but few people realised the full extent of his untrustworthiness. Grove, in his article on him in the Dictionary, says that 'Schindler has been the object of much obloquy and mistrust, but it is satisfactory to know, on the authority of A. W. Thayer, that this is unfounded, and that his honesty and intelligence are both to be trusted.' Nothing could well be more misleading. Thayer's considered opinion of him was this:

* The Life of Ludwig van Beethoven, by Alexander Wheelock Thayer. Edited, revised, and amended from the original English manuscript and the German editions of Hermann Deiters and Hugo Riemann, concluded, and all the documents newly translated, by Henry Edward Krehbiel. New York, the Beethoven Association: London, Novello. 3 vols., £5 5s. net.

* 'Immediately after my arrival, which took place a few days ago, I wrote to you, but my letter was mislaid; thereupon I became unwell, so that I thought it better to stay in bed.'

'Nothing is more common than to find circumstances accepted as undoubted facts on Schindler's authority. The present writer discussed at length Schindler's character as a biographer with Otto Jahn, both of us having known him personally. Our opinions coincided perfectly. We held him to be honest and sincere in his statements, but afflicted with a treacherous memory and a proneness to accept impressions and later-formed convictions as facts of former personal knowledge, and to publish them as such without carefully verifying them.'

Moreover, he revised his book and wrote various articles about Beethoven after the Conversation Books, which would have served to correct many of his unconscious fictions, had passed out of his keeping. But even this opinion of Thayer's, expressed in the second of the present volumes, is modified later to the disadvantage of Schindler. He plainly was not over-scrupulous where his own vanity was concerned. The true story has just been told of the early stages of Beethoven's illness. It is as clear as anything can be that Schindler did not see him till at least a fortnight after the composer's return to Vienna on December 2, whereas Holz was with him on December 4 or 5. Schindler knew that the Conversation Book was decisive on this point; and he has actually 'folded and re-numbered' the pages in such a way that 'the page on which this entry [i.e., Karl's entry recording all Wawruch's visits from December 5 to 14] appears, is made to look as if it preceded others which are filled with evidences of Holz's helpfulness.' After that, we must modify our opinion that Schindler was a bit of a fool, but an honest fool.

The truth is that he was jealous of Karl Holz, the bright and amiable young man who became Beethoven's factotum about 1825, henceforth occupying the place in his affections formerly held by Schindler. The latter consoled himself by spreading false reports about Holz—for instance, that he took Beethoven to taverns where the composer drank more than was good for him. In August, 1826, Beethoven gave Holz a document certifying that he considered him 'competent to write my eventual biography, should such a thing be desired,' and adding, 'I repose in him the fullest confidence that he will give to the world without distortion all that I have communicated to him for this purpose.' Schindler attempts to make out that this permission was 'the result of a surprise sprung upon Beethoven,' and that on his death-bed he requested Breuning and Schindler to collect his papers and hand them to Rochlitz for the purposes of a biography—a task which Rochlitz declined. But it is certain that Schindler was quietly edged out of Beethoven's life in the last year or two. It was in the spring of 1825 that Beethoven became noticeably fond of Holz. From March, 1825, to August, 1826, Beethoven and Schindler rarely met. On September 28, the composer went to stay with his brother Johann at Gneixendorf, whence he returned, on December 2, to what proved to be his death-bed.

Let me give one more instance of the uncritical way in which biographers have condemned this or that personage in the Beethoven entourage on the strength of the mere word of another member of it. Grove (art. 'Beethoven' in the Dictionary, says that Dr. Wawruch 'appears to have been a poor practitioner and a pompous pedant,' who did not know how to treat the malady from which Beethoven was suffering. Grove gives as his authority for this the reminiscences of Stephan von Breuning. But Breuning was obviously prejudiced against Wawruch, no doubt because Beethoven—one of those irascible invalids who are quite 'impossible' from the point of view of the doctor and the nurse—himself conceived an antipathy against him when he found himself getting no better. Medical opinion of to-day justifies Wawruch in his diagnosis, and he seems to have treated the case—which was evidently hopeless from the first—as scientifically as any physician could have done in those days. Yet, as Thayer says, 'the criticisms of Breuning and others have pursued him through all the books devoted to Beethoven's life.'

The truth about Beethoven could only be arrived at by some investigator who would patiently sift the true from the false or the mistakes in the records of his friends, and—which is still more important—check every statement made by Beethoven about others. It has been too hastily assumed that because he was a great composer and a man of essential goodness of character he was always right and others always wrong in any matter of dispute between them. The fact is that Beethoven was more prone than most men to be unjust to those with whom he came in conflict, precisely because of his sense of the higher morality of his own motives, to say nothing of a character unusually headstrong, obstinate, and suspicious. With all his great gifts, he was not—let us say it frankly—particularly intelligent apart from his music. He seems to have admired Goethe; but there is nothing in the whole of his letters to show that his taste in literature and art was particularly good, or his knowledge of them at all extensive. To the end of his days he had difficulty with the simplest sum in addition. One of the most pathetic pictures we have of him is that of his nephew trying to teach him, on his death-bed, the rudiments of multiplication. He was prolific in moral sentiments of the most unimpeachable order; but that sort of excellence can, and often does, go along with something approaching stupidity in intellectual matters. His humour was primitive, his language, for the most part, uncouth and sometimes almost incoherent. He was purely and simply a magnificent musical instrument. It is a priori unlikely that a man who could not regulate sensibly the commonest details of his own daily mundane life, who was notoriously suspicious, self-centred, and quick to take offence, should have had all the wisdom on his side in his dealings with those who disagreed with him. It is the habit of biographers, to take a typical case, to assume that Beethoven was the most innocent actor and the greatest sufferer in the affair of the nephew. An impartial study of all the evidence hardly lends countenance to that assumption.

* There were originally about four hundred of these. Schindler destroyed many of them. The remainder (a hundred and eighty-three) are now in the National Library at Berlin.

A full and judicial statement of all the facts relating to Beethoven's life is to be found nowhere but in the biography by Thayer that is now for the first time made accessible in English. Alexander Wheelock Thayer was born in Massachusetts in 1817, and died in 1897. In his early thirties he conceived the ambition of writing an authentic Beethoven biography on the basis of the reminiscences of Schindler, Wegeler, Ries, and others. With this purpose in view he went to Europe in 1849, and spent two years making researches in different towns. After a visit to America he returned to Europe in 1854. A study of the Beethoven documents in the Berlin Royal Library convinced him that it was useless to rely implicitly on the published reminiscences of anyone. There was nothing for it but a first-hand examination of all the existing evidence, and the discovery of as much new evidence as possible. The remainder of his long life was devoted to this task. To support himself he had to take the post of American Consul at Trieste, the duties of which office interfered materially with his main work.

He went about his work with the most exemplary thoroughness. He interviewed 'every person of importance then living who had been in any way associated with Beethoven, or had personal recollections of him'—Schindler, Hüttenbrenner (in whose arms the composer died), Neate, Potter, the widow of the nephew Karl, Moscheles, Gerhard von Breuning (son of Beethoven's old friend, Stephan von Breuning), and many others. The Berlin Royal Library sent the Conversations Books to Trieste for him to study at his leisure. He examined every possible document, followed up every possible clue. In 1865 he had ready the manuscript of his first volume, carrying the record of Beethoven's life down to 1796. This was translated into German by Dr. Hermann Deiters, of Bonn, and published in that language in 1866.

The second volume followed in 1872, and the third in 1879, both translated by Deiters; the record was now complete as far as 1816. Then the strain became too much for Thayer: his health worsened, and he never afterwards felt equal to the continuance of a task that had become more and more difficult as it neared the end—although he still had energy for other literary work. A suggestion made by Mr. H. E. Krehbiel that Thayer should complete the biography with the aid of an intelligent secretary fell through.

When Thayer died, in 1897, his papers were sent to his niece, Mrs. Jabez Fox, of Cambridge, Mass. Deiters was willing to revise the three published volumes for a second edition, and to write the fourth. For the latter purpose the papers were gone through by Mr. Krehbiel, and the necessary ones sent to Deiters, who had brought out a new edition of the first volume in 1891. Deiters then decided that before revising the second and third volumes he would complete the biography. This ran to two more volumes. The proofs of the fourth were hardly in his hands when he died, in 1907. The two final volumes were brought out in 1908 under the supervision of Dr. Hugo Riemann, who also produced the revised versions of vol. ii. and vol. iii., in 1910-11.

Then Mr. Krehbiel, at Mrs. Fox's request, took in hand the preparation of an English edition. He condensed the five German volumes, omitting the musical analyses and dissertations of Deiters, abolishing certain appendices and foot-notes, incorporating the substance of many letters in the text, and so on, using as much as possible of Thayer's original manuscript, and adhering to Thayer's purpose as expressed in a letter to Sir George Grove of 1895:

'Being as free as the German editors [he says] in respect of the portion of the biography which did not come directly from the pen of Thayer, the editor of this English edition [i.e., Mr. Krehbiel himself] chose his own method of presentation touching the story of the last decade of Beethoven's life, keeping in view the greater clearness and rapidity of narrative which, he believed, would result from a grouping of material different from that followed by the German editors in their adherence to the strict chronological method established by Thayer.'

Where the German editors differ from Thayer, as a rule Mr. Krehbiel lets the latter speak for himself, the differences being set forth in foot-notes. The material for this English edition was ready in July, 1914. The war delayed publication of it. In 1920 the Beethoven Association of New York, acting on the suggestion of Mr. O. G. Sonneck and Mr. Harold Bauer, devoted the proceeds of its concerts of the previous season to promoting the issue of these handsome and tasteful volumes.

Thayer's patient investigation of facts and unimpassioned statement of them help us to see Beethoven more nearly as he must have been than even the reminiscences of his friends can do. These volumes should give the quietus to many of the legends so dear to the sentimental biographer. It is commonly supposed that Beethoven as a composer had to fight all his life for recognition against an ignorant Press and an indifferent public. The facts are that his genius was recognised from the beginning, that contemporary criticism in general was very laudatory, that from an early stage of his career his name was linked with those of Mozart and Haydn, and that his name was a 'draw' for the Viennese concert-going public. There were dissentient voices, of course, but on the whole Beethoven met with not less but more recognition during his lifetime than falls to the lot of most men of genius. To try to make out that Vienna had no ears for any music but that of the Rossini type is to show a lamentable ignorance of the facts.

Thayer's handling of the affair of the nephew Karl, again, shows it in a different light from the usual one. Almost without exception, the biographers have held that all the virtue was on Beethoven's side in this affair, and all the vice on the side of Karl and his mother. No one can read the full record without feeling that the merits and demerits of each side about balance each other: if there is anybody who deserves our special sympathy it is Karl. The ordinary biographer seems to have found it impossible to place himself at the boy's point of view, still less at that of the mother. Beethoven's prejudice against the latter is well-known. He not only called her the Queen of Night; he made reckless statements about her that in these days would have subjected him to an action for slander, and possibly heavy damages. She was certainly no better than she should have been; but even a bad woman may have a sincere affection for her son, and resent her deceased husband's brother's attempt to assume the sole guardianship of him. It is significant that the Courts of the time, although they knew of her occasional moral lapses, were balanced between her and Beethoven in the matter. As for the nephew, is there not every reason to think that it was precisely Beethoven who unwittingly helped to drive him into evil courses? What sort of a companion was a gloomy, choleric, ill-mannered composer of middle age—and deaf into the bargain—for a high-spirited boy? Could anything be more pathetic than the evidence in Court of this little fellow of twelve at the inquiry into his running away from his uncle? 'Had his uncle maltreated him?' he was asked. He replied, 'He had punished him, but only when he deserved it; he had been maltreated only once, and that after his return, when his uncle threatened to throttle him.' To the question 'Where would he rather live—at his mother's or his uncle's?' he answered, 'He would like to live at his uncle's if he but had a companion, as his uncle was hard of hearing and he could not talk with him.' What boy would not have revolted against so gloomy a life, and conceived a dislike for the man who forced him to endure it? The conventional sentimental biographer will have it that all the guilt was on Karl's side: Romain Rolland, for instance, thinks it 'a sad phenomenon' that 'the moral grandeur of his uncle, instead of doing him good, made him worse.' So might Mr. Pecksniff have talked. A boy of tender years could not be expected to endure constraint and misery merely because the man who inflicted them on him was the composer of some immortal works; and he would be much less likely to be impressed by the 'moral grandeur' of his uncle than by his moodiness, his frequent ill-temper, and his well-known violence of language when crossed. M. Rolland sees, again, evidence of nothing but Karl's turpitude in what he calls 'those terrible words, where his miserable soul appears so plainly,' uttered at the time of the boy's attempt at suicide: 'I grew worse because my uncle wanted me to be better.' Terrible words they are indeed; but surely, to the normal unprejudiced man, they carry as much censure for Beethoven as for Karl? Beethoven's intentions were of the best: but a good deal of suffering has been caused in this world by the good intentions of 'moral' people who thought themselves better than their fellows.

Can we resist the conclusion that Beethoven plumed himself a little too much on his 'moral grandeur' (his letters are rather too full of references to it), and on the strength of it was unduly given to interfering in the private affairs of other people? His brother Johann was no more fortunate in his matrimonial relations than the brother who was the father of Karl. Johann had had a liaison with a certain Therese Obermeyer, a girl of attractive appearance and, apparently, likeable character. As Thayer puts it, Johann 'became acquainted with her,* liked her, and made her his housekeeper and—something more.' Beethoven's 'moral grandeur' was instantly up in arms. His brother was then a man of thirty-five, shrewd, sensible, and in every way capable of looking after himself. Beethoven, though, as Thayer says, he 'had no more right to meddle in his private affairs than any stranger,' went to Linz expressly 'with this purpose in view.'

'To come hither for this express object, and employ force to accomplish it, was an indefensible assumption of authority. Such, at all events, was Johann's opinion, and he refused to submit to his brother's dictation. Excited by opposition, Ludwig resorted to any and every means to accomplish his purpose. He saw the Bishop about it. He applied to the Civil authorities. He pushed the affair so earnestly as at last to obtain an order to the police to remove the girl to Vienna if, on a certain day, she should still be found in Linz. The disgrace to the poor girl; the strong liking which Johann had for her; his natural mortification at not being allowed to be master in his own house ; these and other similar causes wrought him up almost to desperation.'

* She was the sister-in-law of the physician who occupied part of the large house owned by Johann at Linz.

There was a quarrel between the brothers ; the scene, says Thayer, 'was more disgraceful to Ludwig than Johann.' The apothecary did precisely what might have been expected: he married Therese. When the marriage turned out unhappily, Beethoven had only himself to thank for having given Johann the power 'to reproach him as the author of his misfortune. Indeed, when the unhappy future came, Johann always declared that Ludwig had driven him into this marriage.' The composer's resentment against his brother endured to the end. Only on that assumption can we account for the misleading account of their final relations that we find in the dutiful pages of Schindler and Breuning—an account which Thayer shows from the Conversation Books to be untrue. 'Moral grandeur' without a ballast of good sense, good temper, and ordinary human tolerance, can be a curse both to its possessor and to all who come in contact with him.

Mr. Krehbiel notes—and proves—that Beethoven was guilty of ... a number of lapses from high ideals of candour and justice in his treatment of his friends, and of a nice sense of honour and honesty in his dealings with his publishers ; but at no time have these blemishes been so numerous or so patent as they are in his negotiations for the publication of the Missa Solemnis—a circumstance which is thrown into a particularly strong light by the frequency and vehemence of his protestations of moral rectitude in the letters which have risen like ghosts to accuse him, and by the strange paradox that the period is one in which his artistic thoughts and imagination dwelt in the highest regions to which they ever soared.'

Mr. Krehbiel's summary of the matter must be quoted in full:

'He was never louder in his protestations of business morality than when he was promising the Mass to four or more publishers practically at the same time, and giving it to none of them; never more apparently frank than when he was making ignoble use of a gentleman, whom he himself described as one of the best friends on earth, as an intermediary between himself and another friend to whom he was bound by business ties and childhood associations which challenged confidence; never more obsequious (for even this word must now be used in describing his attitude towards Franz Brentano) than after he had secured a loan from that friend in the nature of an advance on a contract which he never carried out; never more apparently sincere than when he told one publisher (after he had promised the Mass to another) that he should be particularly sorry if he were unable to give the Mass into his hands; never more forcefully and indignantly honest in appearance than when he informed still another publisher that the second had importuned him for the Mass ('bombarded' was the word), but that he had never even deigned to answer his letters. But even this is far from compassing the indictment: the counts are not even complete when it is added that in a letter he states that the publisher whom he had told it would have been a source of sorrow not to favour had never even been contemplated amongst those who might receive the Mass; that he permitted the friend to whom he first promised the score to tie up some of his capital for a year and more so that 'good Beethoven' should not have to wait a day for his money; that after promising the Mass to the third publisher he sought to create the impression that it was not the Missa Solemnis that had been bargained for, but one of two Masses which he had in hand.

It is abundantly evident that Beethoven was not the plaster saint the romantic biographers have made of him. No one will think much the worse of him for having been a man of mixed clay like the rest of us; indeed, his 'moral delinquencies,' like those of Wagner, make him a more interesting study to the psychologist. In any case, the whole truth is better than a number of half lies; and students not only of Beethoven but of human nature will be grateful to Thayer and Mr. Krehbiel for having brought the composer and the man into the one focus.

BRITISH PLAYERS AND SINGERS:

I.—HAROLD SAMUEL

THE MAN AND HIS VIEWS

When Harold Samuel plays Bach he has a way of happily focussing the predilections of a dozen different sorts of music-lovers. The lions and the lambs, the simple and the supercilious, meet harmoniously on this ground. Various notions of music find for once a common denominator. The genial pianist has such a way with him that all the disparate types in the group at once amiably compose themselves. 'Now, smile a little, look pleasant!' the photographers say; but this clever focusser gets us, without a word, into the right attitude.

Where did Bach 'come in' before Mr. Samuel's day in the London pianoforte recital? In transcriptions mostly. Liszt's transcriptions of the Organ Fugues almost alone were not beneath the notice of the virtuosos. Then the Chromatic Fantasia and the Italian Concerto had concert properties which brought them the attention refused to the humble suites, partitas, and clavi-chord fugues. But it was 'the thing' to transcribe; we had the Goldberg Variations transcribed, toccatas, the Chromatic Fantasia, and even the Forty-Eight transcribed. Came Mr. Samuel, with a horror of 'octavising' Bach, also with no disdain for the least of mere two-part inventions. He rashly declined to make the music any more difficult, he even made no fuss about any difficulties at all. There the music was on paper. All to be done was simply to put it down on the pianoforte! One had merely to sit there (such was the illusion, at least) and let the music speak for itself. Wasn't the music good enough? It was so good that we all smiled and looked pleasant; but, so far from the figure of the photographer and his ordeal holding good, everybody liked the focussing, went again and again (six days in succession to Wigmore Hall last summer), and will henceforth, whenever the chance comes.

THE INFANT SAMUEL, PIANIST

The illusion that one has only to think less of himself than the music and that then his Bach will sound like Mr. Samuel's goes, of course, the way of illusions. The illusion gone, people were even left saying, 'I feel I can never again, after that, potter about with the Forty-Eight myself.' The aspirant conceived the possibility of following step by step the way by which Mr. Samuel had gone to reach the consummation of playing the best of all keyboard music with the air of, not an interpreter, but the mouthpiece of the music itself. He affronts and questions, then, the man himself, only to find that the beginnings of Mr. Samuel's art reach back beyond the beginnings of Mr. Samuel's memory.

'Fond relations [he tells the inquirer] have informed me that I began at the pianoforte at the age of eighteen months. At two and a half years I was, I am told, playing the pianoforte, standing on tip-toe. My first teacher was my sister, her lesson lasted an hour, in which time I learnt the names of the notes on the keyboard and on paper. At four I composed a love-song, dedicated to my mother.'

The family, Londoners and Jewish, were not markedly musical, save a great-uncle, Isaac Nathan (see Grove), friend of Byron, Hebrew scholar, opera-singer, and composer of Hebrew melodies, operas, and ballads, such as Why are you wandering here, I pray? He died at Sydney. Harold Samuel was born in London forty-two years ago.

'At seven I had a month of real lessons from Walter Fitton. At that time I knew much of Sullivan, operas like Faust, and Mendelssohn. If I went to a concert I played the programme through on the pianoforte afterwards, and was a disturber of family parties by exclaiming at wrong notes and singers who were out of tune. Raphael Roche, a grandson of Moscheles, taught me when I was nine. He took me through the Beethoven Sonatas and was the first to instil in me a love for Bach.

The "Little" C minor Prelude was my first introduction, and then the F minor Prelude from Book II. of the Forty-Eight—to-day still, for me, one of the lovely treasures of all art. But the real revelation was when I was ten, and in an old shop at Kilburn picked up three of the Partitas for 6d. I threw over Beethoven. I mastered the Partitas in a fortnight, and all my spare coppers (for the family circumstances were narrow) went in buying Bach at that second-hand shop. At twelve I had my first complete copy of the Forty-Eight.'

Isaac Albeniz, visiting London in 1893, gave some lessons to the fourteen year old Samuel, who played as a deputy for his master one night at a concert at the Grafton Galleries. ('The Evening News the next day announced that 'Señor Albeniz played with his customary skill and delicacy.') 'Albeniz,' says Mr. Samuel,

'... was a consummate musician; indolent; and the most sympathetic, the least intimidating of masters. His teaching was generally musical rather than technical. His own playing was marvellously delicate in Mozart, and he understood a perfectly satisfying rubato.'

The youth's progress was variously chequered. He failed three times to obtain a scholarship at the Royal College of Music. He had the queer and still profitable experience of playing nightly in a London tap-room, accompanying red-nosed comedians and any volunteering vocalist, all for five shillings a week. He conducted in a small Kilburn theatre, innocent of any special skill but helped out by a friendly contra-bassist who undertook to give him the cues. He was seventeen when he eventually entered the Royal College, studying composition with Stanford and pianoforte with Dannreuther.

'Dannreuther [he says] was one of the biggest personalities the College has ever known, a head chock-full of learning. In the days when Wagnerians and Brahmsians were in hostile camps he had enough vision to be both Brahmsian and Wagnerian. His teaching was rather in the sense of interpretation than technique. I myself was already a teacher when a College student—I had to teach perforce on account of my budget, and a teacher I have not ceased to be for twenty-five years.'

ON THE PLAYING OF BACH

The inquirer seeks to pin Mr. Samuel down to the question of playing Bach, to his playing of Bach. Can a function so easy-seeming, so natural, lend itself to the subject's conscious analysis? Well, it can be analysed up to a point, and Mr. Samuel amiably does his best. An American critic, an enthusiast for Poe, once wrote a study of The Raven, and in preparation read no author but Poe and no poem but The Raven for three years before. This is precisely not Mr. Samuel's method.

'To do justice in a concert devoted to one man, to Bach or Beethoven, one quite particularly must know well other men and other idioms of the art. He knows not Bach who knows Bach only. The executant can't know about too many sorts of music. I venture that to know about music-hall music and to know what constitutes the difference between a good and a bad music-hall song may be a sort of help to the grasping of some element in Beethoven or Bach. There is much more general humanity in their music than some austere folk would willingly believe. The more you cultivate one man's music in public the more you should in private, for your own enriching, cultivate others.'

And Mr. Samuel is led to aver that he probably knows more Beethoven by heart than Bach, though not primarily reckoned a Beethoven player; and also has unnumbered notes of Mozart and Schubert at his finger-tips.

As for defending the playing of harpsichord music on the pianoforte—the proof of the pudding,' &c. If, in the result, you like his playing, accept this paradox:

'While playing Bach on the pianoforte, remember ever the different instrument for which the music was written. Think of the clavichord as you strike the concert grand. And as you strike with this reserve in your mind, shun, too, any bringing of the music up-to-date.'

Not logical, no doubt; but a compromise that is justified in its fruits—a happy middle course between a pedantic restriction of Bach to the archaic instruments and the gulfs of vandalism waiting on modern transcribers.

And Mr. Samuel's very passion against transcribers is no idée fixe. (Any Frenchman reading will groan aloud at English realism and incapacity for general ideas.) There are cases, says Mr. Samuel—the D major Organ Fugue really sounds better, I think, on the pianoforte. And he has been known to transcribe certain choral preludes.

Again, in editing Bach, he is generally against additional directions and phrasing. He is anxious himself to set his hand to editing. 'I know, for instance, no satisfactory edition of the Partitas, and I should jump at a chance of publishing them, as I think they ought to be.' Now on actual points of execution:

'Above all, impeccable neatness—an evenness, a ripple. But not too much of a legato ripple. There is commonly too much legato in Bach playing. The right general touch is not pure legato and not actual staccato either—something between. I herewith declare my abomination: rallentandos and pauses in the course of a piece of Bach. It means a softening of the rhythm—softening in the worst sense, as you say, "softening of the brain." It means an expressiveness that belongs to a different kind of music and is outside of Bach's art. It is an enfeeblement, a letting of blood! I also ban it, in the suites, when you get an "alternative" gavotte, minuet, or musette, acting as the trio to a scherso. Don't stop at the end of the first gavotte—there is no cause to pause, nor is there when the first gavotte is taken up again.

'That reminds me that people talk of repetitions in Bach's suites and variations, and even of "endless repetitions." I deny that there is any such thing, any identical repetition. When at a double-bar you go back, the music the second time is not the same. The music is older with all the experience of the first statement. It cannot be the same again. Is your second ascent of a mountain, your second visit to Florence ever "the same" as your first? It is so different that the differences seem more to you than anything.

'Take the Allemande from the D major Partita. At the double-bar you have scaled the peak of the dominant, it is a date in time from which there is no going back. You "repeat," or I at least "repeat" (and shall, for all the words of the whole race of critics!). Is the second climbing of the mountain "the same"? Life, of course, never is the same twice over. I know there are mountains not worth climbing—but hardly in Bach. Does the theme return again late in the D minor Violin Chaconne or the Goldberg Variations? It returns with all a life's experience added to its visage. It said before, "Such-and-such a thing is," and now "Such a thing is, and now you know why it is."

'How is a fugue to be best played?'

'By bringing out the parts without labouring, I suggest. Do not write out the subject in red ink. Especially do not stress it when it is on the top. A little more tone sometimes when it is in an inner part, but it best stands out by the phrasing that is characteristic of it, not by volume of tone. The differing expression given to the subject is dictated by the significance of the particular harmonies prevailing.'

SAMUEL, THE COMPOSER

Mr. Samuel, whom an occasional word will lure into talking beguilingly about Bach till bed-time, is harder to draw on the subject of another composer, Harold Samuel. His songs, such as the dainty Diaphenia and My Sweetening, are his best-known works. He wrote song-settings for As you Like It at His Majesty's Theatre (1907) and for an unsuccessful play The Two Pins in the next year. A comic-opera, The Honourable Phil, ran for seventy nights, a career which, though respectable, did not rival The Mikado and so drew on it from W. S. Gilbert the witticism, 'The honourable evidently does not fill!'

The mention of the war-time song Jogging Along even brings the faintest of blushes to its composer's cheek. Very solemn people may think it incompatible with a true devotion to Bach! The history of Jogging Along is this: A friend heard Mr. Samuel strumming a tune that had come into his head. 'What a rattling good marching-song for soldiers! [It was early in the war.] Suppose I fit some words to it?' he said, and did. With happy results all round. Nothing to blush about.

The inquirer asks for news of his projects. 'A recital at Paris soon, perhaps,' he said. 'A tour in South Africa next summer—with examinations, recitals, and also a trip to the Victoria Falls. And another week of Bach in London next year sometime.' It will be a week of ascending mountain-tops, not necessarily those of last summer. For a week and for two weeks one could have Mr. Samuel playing Bach, and still leave undrawn-on a large hoard in the caverns of his memory.

C.

CHARLES KŒCHLIN

By M.-D. CALVOCORESSI

(Concluded from December number, page 831)

IV.

Genuinely original, live form (that is, form which is coherent and logical musically, not solely by virtue of mechanically-planned relationships or symbolic and other literary intentions) is always determined by the inherent properties of the primary components—the motives. In other words, original form is something evolved from within, not imposed from without.

The very constitution of a motive that is a live thing, and not a mere fabrication, predetermines certain lines of expansion and working-out as natural—even necessary—and precludes certain others as unsuitable.

These two points, which afford the key to the whole problem of appraising form from the artistic point of view and not merely in accordance with theory, are so often overlooked by those who write on form, that the temptation to harp upon them on every possible occasion is hard to resist. But the baldest statement will suffice so far as we have to deal with form in Kœchlin's works, which afford the widest variety of illustration of the above two-fold principle.

Nothing is more characteristic of Kœchlin than his fondness for long-sustained melodies which seem to continue endlessly, curve following curve and pulsation following pulsation: tunes never artificially protracted, but carried onward by the momentum of their own vitality.

Often in his shorter pieces the form lies solely in the expansion of one design pursuing its natural course of evolution without contrasting episodes or adjuncts. In Paysages et Marines two instances stand out which have already been mentioned for their rare beauty: Le Chant du Chevrier and Poème Virgilien. In the former the melodic arabesque proceeds unrelentingly, in broad phrases amply punctuated, until (at the third page) a repetition occurs, heralding the end of the tune, which gently merges into the ultimate vibrations of the harmonic setting. In the Poème Virgilien the composer dallies a while with each arabesque in turn, repeating it once or twice before proceeding further, leading up to a slow, regular, downward progression, and concluding with an ample and definite plagal cadence.

Other pieces in the same set consist merely of a few touches, a succession of simple patterns related by their tonal and rhythmic character and their expressive properties, with no attempt at development. Such is Sur la Falaise (which, if considered not in its expressive character but solely in its build and in certain of its aspects, will be found not unreminiscent of Schönberg in his Op. 19). Others are built in accordance with the rules of ternary form (La Chanson des Pommiers en Fleur), or in variation form (Chanson de Pêcheurs—with which compare the second movement of the fifth Sonatina); or, though representing no type of form included in the usual nomenclature, will consist of the close working-out of one motive or several, generally in pithy polyphonic style (Soir d'Été and various instances in the Sonatinas).

It is when we study the form of the Sonatinas that we see how very much at ease and how versatile the composer can be, resorting to classical modes of development or not, passing from symmetry to asymmetry, in accordance with the true spirit and potentialities of his themes. Here are a few notes which may serve to illustrate the point:

First Sonatina.—Allegro moderato, in simple ternary form. After the first theme has fully unfurled its convolution the second intervenes, affording a marked contrast; but the first soon reappears, and plays the chief part until the end. Then comes a brief Andante, a perfectly classical 'song without words,' followed by an equally brief Allegro moderato, monothematic, which is, in simpler and more symmetrical form, another instance of that play from arabesque to arabesque upon which the Poème Virgilien is founded. The Finale, technically speaking, is just an exposition, which leaves off at the very time when the real fun of working-out according to plan might be expected to begin. Yet it is perfectly rounded, balanced, and satisfactory.

The first movement is in C major, with the second motive in F major; the Andante is in E major, the Allegro moderato in G major, and the Finale in F, with whimsical modulations into the region of sharps. The closing notes, although the harmonies cannot be analysed otherwise than as in F major, unmistakably bring back the feeling of C major—so that honour is saved. The third Sonatina will show that Kœchlin does not always make a point of saving it in accordance with school rules, although the tonal character of his music is never equivocal or unsteady.

Second Sonatina.—I. First motive exposed in canonic form, followed by a second motive. Three repetitions of this first exposition bring the piece to its close. They vary slightly in length, but there is no working-out, only a few crisp and telling modulations. A study of the cadences to each of the eight statements will show how closely the traditional tone relationships are observed. II. A Sicilienne in pure ternary form. III. The Finale is the beautiful Andante whose theme was given in the December issue, p. 831, Ex. 1. It is really monothematic; but a fine, very simple, application, within a small compass, of the principle of amplificative variation introduces the following element of contrast:

Third Sonatina.—I. Prelude, Allegro moderato. II. Short monothematic Assez animé. III. Allegretto, in simple ternary form. IV. Finale, Allegro con Moto, whose elements are provided by the tune quoted on p. 831, Ex. 2, the last bar serving as a counter-subject which is played-off against, or in combination with, the opening motive.

The first movement is in B major, the second in G major, the third in E dorian, ending upon the A major triad. The last begins in C major, and, after the polytonal episode of which part is quoted on p. 833, Ex. 12, reverts to C major, but ends as follows:

Fourth Sonatina.—I. Minuet, C major. II. Andante con Moto, F major, ternary. III. Intermezzo, A minor, monothematic (except if we choose to consider as a fresh motive the inversion which makes a brief appearance). IV. Finale, Rondo form, regular, very simple, yet enhanced with bold, effective modulations.

Fifth Sonatina.—I. Allegro moderato, written in polyphonic style, and affording another instance of form conditioned by each arabesque in turn working its way naturally, with the additional point of technical interest that all intervening motives or counter-subjects are closely related to the main theme. II. Andante, colour variations with one brief contrasting element. III. Fugue, with Coda. IV. Finale, which is the longest thing in the Sonatinas and in the whole of Kœchlin's published pianoforte works, and one of the most beautiful. The strict logic and masterful simplicity of the working-out, the close affinities between the various elements, render it specially interesting for the analyst.

From the chief motive:

and from this variant of its second segment (B):

Kœchlin derives a wealth of terse, genuinely imaginative developments. Without going into details, we may note, for instance, that the inversion of the chief motive, far from smacking of perfunctoriness and scholasticism, introduces a fresh and valuable element of interest and buoyancy:

and that even an episode apparently so remote as has its pedigree plainly revealed by this appearance of (c) in slightly altered rhythm:

I have but lightly touched upon the attractiveness of those five Sonatinas, all instinct with humour and tenderness, crisp, exhilarating, glowing. Circumstances compel me to deal even more briefly with the several works which have appeared since the previous instalments of this article were written.

Of these the most important is the first String Quartet. So far as can be judged from a cursory survey of the parts (the score not being published) it shows Kœchlin's imaginativeness at its richest and best, working along lines that are in every respect in accordance with tradition.

L'Abbaye is a suite for chorus, orchestra, and organ, finished nearly twenty years ago—another instance of purely classical writing. What is published consists of an orchestral Prelude, an Ave Maria (for female voices and organ), a Kyrie and Requiem, an organ Prelude, an Ave Verum, an O Salutaris (soprano and tenor soli, chorus, orchestra, and organ), a Benedictus (female voices and orchestra), and a Sanctus. There exists a second part, longer, with an important Finale, which is not yet published.

A set of twelve easy little pieces for pianoforte (included, as is the String Quartet, in the first portfolio of La Musique de Chambre, of which a review is given in another part of this issue) has come to provide the possibility of music by Kœchlin being included in the repertory of the veriest beginners. They are written in the same imaginative, breezy, genial spirit as the Paysages et Marines, and contain a good deal that many besides children will enjoy. From the educational point of view they should be found most valuable, for they contain, among other things, all that is needed to develop the infant student's sense of phrasing and balance.

A few biographical notes will perhaps be found useful.

Charles Kœchlin was born of Alsatian parents at Paris, in 1867. After receiving the usual course of classical and scientific education he entered the École Polytechnique, where he found time to study harmony in private. In 1890, renouncing the higher mathematics, he entered the Paris Conservatoire, where his teachers of composition were Massenet and (afterwards) Fauré. He never entered the competition for the 'Prix de Rome,' and left the Conservatoire without award or diploma of any sort. Since that time he has been hard at work, as the list of his compositions shows. He is very retiring in disposition, and has never taken any steps to speed the performance and publication of his own works, some of which were engraved at his own expense.

Here is the list of his published music :

VOCAL.

Rondels (three books) (Rouart et Lerolle).
Songs (three books) (Rouart et Lerolle).
L'Abbaye (full score and vocal score) (Joanin).

INSTRUMENTAL.

First String Quartet (Sénart).
Twelve Easy Pieces for Pianoforte (Sénart).
Five Sonatinas (Mathot).
Paysages et Marines (two books) (Mathot).

His principal unpublished works were mentioned in the first instalment of this article (Musical Times, November 1921, p. 759).

OUR LOST OPERATIC LEAD

BY HERMAN KLEIN

Gone are the vaunted palmy days—and brilliant nights—of the 'Royal Italian Opera' that flourished at Covent Garden in the Victorian era. 'A good riddance, too,' quoth the youthful highbrow who knew them not (and has not, moreover, the smallest idea what they were like). Well, who shall say? Is it better to be wholly bereft of great singers, never to hear consummate vocal art in the theatre, than it would be to put up with 19th-century opera still in a measure clogged, though by no means hide-bound, with old-fashioned tradition? For my own part I have a strong opinion on the subject, and—precisely because I do know—it is entirely at variance with that expressed by the youthful personage above quoted. I have the further satisfaction of being aware that at the present moment some five or six of the larger cities of the United States are backing my opinion by giving opera 'on the grand scale' with the costliest and most eminent artists that Europe can furnish. If we are not doing the same thing here in London it is for a simple reason: we had already begun to 'lose the habit' long before the war; and now we have not only lost it, but we could not afford to indulge in the luxury of resuming it even if we wished.

The particular event which gave rise to these reflections was one which struck me so forcibly that I felt constrained to comment upon it in a letter which appeared over my signature in The Times of December 6. It was the announcement, in a cable message from the New York correspondent of that paper, of the débüt at the Metropolitan Opera House of a new prima donna of European fame who had never sung in England. It was not the first time, of course, that such a thing had happened. Opera-singers of renown have occasionally in the past been heard in America before being heard in London. Fourteen years ago Chaliapin sang at the Metropo'itan, whilst yet a stranger to this country; though that was only because the Grand Opera Syndicate did not choose to pay him the terms which he thought himself worth. The case of the Czechoslovakian soprano, Madame Marie Jeritza, who had such an enthusiastic reception at New York last month, stood upon a different footing. Here was a star, said to be of the first magnitude, whom we could not exploit at Covent Garden if we would; whose extraordinary talent had recently aroused fanatical applause in billion-mark and billion-kronen capitals like Berlin and Vienna; whose lovely face and beautiful voice had combined to make Puccini declare her the most magnificent Tosca he had ever seen, heard, or coached in the part; yet who, like Madame Galli-Curci (but with even greater certainty of success) could afford to skip London on her way across the Atlantic, without troubling to obtain the opinions of English critics, or even the approval of an Albert Hall audience!

Why I felt such a pang of resentment when I read of Madame Jeritza's New York triumph I can hardly tell, unless it was because I realised for the first time how completely we had fallen from our high estate where opera is concerned. No doubt I ought to have realised it before, for this was not the first time by many (during the past ten or twelve years, let us say) that New York had taken the lead in introducing to the world new singers, new composers, and new operas. But if we could not hold our own we have been at least in a position to compete; whereas now the best we can do is to look on and admire. And in the meantime we are gradually losing touch with the great singers. What do opera-goers in this country know of the wonderful voices and the splendid talent of the contemporary international artists to whom America is willing (and able) to pay millions of dollars every season from November until April? How many people on this side of the ocean know the names of these present-day stars, the majority of whom have never sung here at all?

A few of them are perhaps familiar—for instance, the tenor Martinelli; the even more distinguished baritone, Titta Ruffo; the now-famous American tenor, Orville Harrold; the great soprano leggero Madame Galli-Curci; that charming singer, Claire Dux; the inimitable Emmy Destinn; besides Frau Frieda Hempel, Miss Geraldine Farrar, Madame D'Alvarez, and the much-praised contralto, Madame Matzenauer. But there are some whose names are utterly unknown here. Who has heard, for example, of Signor Beniamino Gigli, of the Metropolitan Opera House, of whom it has been declared on high authority that 'there is no lyric tenor to-day with a voice more beautiful or a more thorough mastery of the art of the bel canto'? No less ignorant are we concerning the rare qualities of Joseph Schwarz, the Russian baritone, said to be 'the most remarkable Rigoletto that ever' &c.; the tenor Muratore, the Italian baritones, Giacomo Rimini and Riccardo Stracciari, the dramatic sopranos, Rosa Raisa and Rosa Ponsella, or the Spanish soprano, Lucrezia Bori. Enough that all these are said to be singers of the first rank, the like of whom we are no longer privileged to listen to at Covent Garden, or, indeed, anywhere else.

Hence it is that I deplore not merely the loss of our lead in operatic matters, which, after all, is only a sentimental question, but the danger of losing our operatic vocal standard, a much more serious thing. That we are unable now—and may not for several years be in a position—to pay the price for these expensive song-birds is obvious enough. Nor are we, happily, compelled to forego the pleasure of listening to opera on that account. We are not exactly pining for operatic stars—far from it. But we must, by hook or by crook, keep up the standard of our singers, and it behoves our native companies, old and new, to avail themselves of the very best talent that they can afford to engage.

This aspect of the question was pointedly dealt with in the admirable article by Mr. H. C. Colles, entitled 'Opera in England,' which appeared in The Times of December 10. He believes that we have enough native talent in the country to make the best operatic artists we can wish for, but that very little of it seems ever to arrive at its destination on the stage. 'There is a hitch somewhere,' and he wisely adds, 'only by removing this hitch, whatever it may be, and beginning to make intelligent and consistent use of the native talent available, will it be possible to face the accusation of "lost standards" without flinching.'

THE BACH-ELGAR FUGUE

BY HARVEY GRACE

Not often is an orchestral work so immediately and emphatically a popular success as Elgar's version of Bach's C minor Fugue has proved to be. So far it has been included in three^{*} programmes at Queen's Hall; on the first and third occasions it was repeated in answer to a vociferous encore, and on the second its reception was sufficiently enthusiastic to have justified a repetition had the conductor been that way inclined. Indeed, at the third concert one felt there was a little danger of an encore becoming a convention as it was for so long with the Jarnefelt Praeludium, the Dvorák Humoresque, and the Solemn Melody.

This warm reception of a Bach Fugue by two widely different types of audience—the first and third concerts were of the Goossens series, and the second a London Symphony concert—suggests a few reflections on the principle of transcription, and on the anomalous position in this country of some of the finest music Bach ever wrote. The latter point arises through the surprising fact that the Fugue was obviously unfamiliar to many of the audience.

First, however, something may be said in reply to the mere handful of critics who shook their heads and turned down their thumbs. So far as their adverse judgment was based on their dislike of the music itself, or on their objection to certain details of the scoring, we hear them with respect. No piece of music, and no method of orchestration is for every palate, and all one can do in such cases is to express sympathy with those whose fastidious taste rejects fare which practically all the other musicians present absorbed with gusto.

But when some of these critics condemn Elgar's version of the Fugue as 'vandalism' they are on ground where they may be challenged. They should make it clear whether the 'vandalism' lies in the details of the scoring or in the mere act of transcription. Probably most of the objections are on the former ground. We have heard the question 'What are the big drum and cymbals, the triangle and glockenspiel, and the harp and tambourine doing in a Bach fugue?' It would be as reasonable to ask what they are doing in the orchestra. Who is to say what compositions should be barred to them? The objection recalls the comment of a Paris Conservatoire professor when d'Indy asked him what he thought of Franck's Symphony: 'That a symphony?' (contemptuously); 'My dear sir, who ever heard of writing for the cor Anglais in a symphony? Just mention a single symphony by Haydn or Beethoven introducing the cor Anglais . . . Franck's music may be whatever you please, but it certainly will never be a symphony!'

If the purists object to the transcription as such, they have but a poor case, seeing that the principle has been sanctioned by time and by the practice of all the great composers. There is no need to labour the point that Bach himself was an old hand at transcription. It will suffice to remind ourselves that a fair portion of his activities in this way were in connection with the organ. In addition to the batch of vocal solos which he changed into chorale preludes (a group that includes the popular Sleepers, wake! piece), he made keyboard versions of his own Violin Fugue in G minor and of about twenty String Concertos by Vivaldi and others—making extensive alterations and repairs in some of the material, the old vandal! As an instance of a move in the opposite direction we have the Adagio of the third Trio-Sonata for organ (or pedal clavicembalo), which he afterwards arranged for flute, violin, and clavier. That his transcriptions were usually from concerted instruments to a solo instrument of the keyboard type was no doubt due to the practical reason that the latter guaranteed more frequent (and better) performance.

* A fourth performance has been given since this was written.

Nor are modern orchestral versions of Bach's organ works scarce. Sir Henry Wood's arrangements of some of the Trio-Sonata movements and of the Toccata in F have long been popular at Queen's Hall. Wetzler has arranged for full orchestra the whole of the Trio-Sonata in E flat. Two Germans, whose names I forget, have scored the Passacaglia and the Toccata in F. Even military bands have begun to play the organ works. I heard recently of a fine performance of the 'great' G minor Fugue by one of our crack bands at Queen's Hall at a Saturday evening concert, given (I think) by the Polytechnic. And a well-known North of England musician tells me that he has in hand some arrangements of the organ fugues for brass bands. So far from creating a dangerous precedent, then, Sir Edward is merely following a well-established custom. Yet who would think so, reading such a comment as this:

... that strange example of bad taste—the Elgar orchestrated version of Bach's Fugue in C minor, for organ. These megaphone devices may be, indeed are, clever; but after all Bach knew something about orchestral composition, and if he had felt his work orchestrally, he could have employed that medium for its expression. The thing is clever, but indecent.

Now this was written by a critic who has been attending London concerts for years. Over and over again he must have heard such things as Wood's orchestral versions of the Bach Toccata, the Trio-Sonata movements, Moussorgsky's Picture Gallery, Arcadelt's Ave Maria, Rachmaninov's C sharp minor Prelude, Raff's Cavatina, &c., &c., and transcriptions by various people of Weber's Invitation to the Valse, the Bee's Wedding and Spring Song, of Mendelssohn, Chopin's Funeral March, and others too numerous to mention. Most of these composers 'knew something about orchestral composition'—rather more than Bach, some of them, for obvious reasons; has this critic protested against any of these transcriptions as 'megaphone devices,' 'bad taste,' 'indecent'?

Apparently what has caused the outcry from a few purists is the freedom with which Elgar has treated the Fugue. His version bears much the same relation to an ordinary musical transcription as a free translation of a book bears to a literal one. Nobody pretends that the latter has any value beyond a scholastic or some other utilitarian purpose. The greater its literal fidelity to the original the less likely is it to be of any artistic importance. We should go too far if we asserted that the rule held good in musical transcription, but we may safely say that it applies far more than is generally realised. A transcription that sounds like a transcription is so far a failure. Had this Bach fugue been transcribed for orchestra on the ordinary 'safe' lines, it would still have been a fine piece of music, and therefore enjoyable, but we should not have been able to forget its origin. We should have been conscious all the time that we were listening to a work that had been haled from the dusk of the organ-loft into the fierce light of the concert-room. The flavour of the 'voluntary' might have been so pronounced as to set ecclesiastically minded laymen among the audience feeling for threepenny bits. The supreme merit of the Elgar version is that its idiom is that of the orchestra, and therefore one gets an impression of a work conceived for orchestra. Yet with all its sumptuous decoration, it contains no note that is not present or implied in the original. The strong harmonic basis and the sinewy counterpoint of Bach are never obscured, hence there is not the feeling of a misfit that results from (say) a folk-tune harmonized with outré chords. Thus, when for the original

Elgar gives us

the passage is essentially the same, plus a flash produced by the whip-up of the violins and wood-wind. And equally justifiable (if such good things ever need justification) is this brilliant bit of figuration a few bars later, where, against Bach's given out by the brass, we have this flourish by the strings and part of the wood-wind:

The score contains many such passages, but it should be noted that the sense of growth which is a feature of the fugal form is maintained by such decorative treatment being reserved until the movement is well under way, and even then its richest application is held back until the da capo.

One is tempted to touch on other purple patches, e.g., the amazing demisemiquaver passage for trumpets a few bars before the end (a passage which looks impossible and is no doubt difficult, but which has 'come off' brilliantly on each of the five times I have heard the work); the delicious scurry down the scale by the flutes and piccolo against a harp glissando in tenths just before the middle section; the dramatic treatment of the little chromatic counter-theme in this portion; the shakes for the brass and the use of the percussion just before the da capo, and (too small to be called a pitch, but a very impressive point) the first ominous boom of the big drum at the last entry of the subject before the middle section; and so on. In fact, the exposition once plainly delivered, something is always happening. And, knowing old Bach's fondness for experiments in registration and other means of obtaining colour, we may fairly assume that he would have enjoyed every bit of it. Not a hair would he turn at the triangle and tambourine which have so shocked the purists; and as for the glockenspiel, it would merely remind him pleasantly of that which was attached to his Weimar organ, and which he stipulated should be kept in order—and not for mere show, we may be certain!

Spitta says that the greatest of Bach's organ works are the only instrumental essays that are sufficiently grand in conception and perfect in form to be placed beside the symphonies of Beethoven, and, on the whole, the contention is sound. Nevertheless, how many musicians are really familiar with them? What should we think of the musical state of a country in which Beethoven's Symphonies were never heard in concert-halls save in the form of pianoforte solo arrangements? Yet that is the case with Bach's organ works.

When will London follow the example of Paris in this matter? There one may occasionally find an orchestral programme including an organ solo—say, a Bach or Franck work. At Queen's Hall we may hear a pianoforte, violin, 'cello, even a flute solo, but never one on the organ. Yet it is reasonable to suppose that a public which enjoys the '48, the Suites, the Partitas, and the Brandenburg Concertos would take no less delight in the organ works of the composer, seeing that the best of it shows him at his height. As it is, only the handful of concert-goers who happen also to be church-goers or attendants at organ recitals have a chance of hearing these splendid works on the instrument for which they were written. This is another way of saying that they never really hear them at all, for the pianoforte arrangements necessarily fail to reproduce the characteristics that make them so fine on the organ—the sustained tone in the long chains of suspensions, the unyielding pedal points, and the tonal weight the music calls for, specially in the bass. Only an instrument of such ample scale as a big modern organ can answer all these demands. The real greatness of the best of Bach's organ music will never be grasped by the public until it is frequently performed at concerts either as organ solos or transcribed for orchestra.

It is arguable, indeed, that the latter form is to be preferred in the case of a few of the biggest of these works. Even the most enthusiastic organist must feel at times that, fine as the instrument is, it cannot do full justice to such gigantic conceptions as the 'Wedge' Prelude and Fugue, the 'Great' G minor, the B minor, and a few others. An organ of the right ample resources is rare save in buildings so large and resonant that, if the music is played with the power and pace it so often demands, the details are lost. On the other hand, if we decide that the beauty of the polyphony must be shown we can do so only by the adoption of a steady tempo and quiet registration, in which case the impetus of the music is destroyed and its fire damped down. Pianoforte transcriptions do at least retain the animation of the original, though they lose almost everything else. No medium but the orchestra can show to the fullest advantage all the great qualities of these works—their brilliance, texture, growth, and climax. Only when one has heard the Elgar version of the C minor Fugue a few times does he fully realise that Bach's grandest organ music is immeasurably greater than its medium. It can carry the panoply of modern orchestration with ease, and gain in the process, whereas some modern works so treated are merely smothered, and shown to be essentially small, e.g., Weber's Invitation to the Valse, as orchestrated by Weingartner. If we feel this in the case of the C minor Fugue—which, be it remembered, is one of the shorter organ works—what a revelation would be some of the biggest, treated with similar skill! I have heard this Elgar transcription called 'a blazing indiscretion.' Well, we sit through so much music that merely smoulders, or at most gives out an occasional spark, that we may thank Heaven for some that blazes, even at the cost of head-shaking among the purists—indeed, the latter is an additional ground for thankfulness. Let us hope that Sir Edward has a few more 'indiscretions' of the same kind up his sleeve. Given music so vital and treatment so brilliant as in this case, we can do with lots of such 'vandalism.'

THE ORIGIN OF 'SAMSON AND DELILAH'

BY CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS
(Authorised translation by Fred Rothwell)

Some years ago an old melomaniac who was in the habit of visiting me called my attention to the subject of Samson, with a view to the production of an oratorio—a form of music which at the time was in considerable favour. Owing to modern progress, this is a form which can no longer be utilised. . . . Nowadays we have only orchestral concerts. An exception is made in the case of La Damnation de Faust because of its assured financial success.

I had recently made a charming acquaintance, Fernand Lemaire, an amateur poet, who was connected with my family by marriage. Some of his poems I had set to music, and I now suggested to him the writing of an oratorio. 'An oratorio!' he replied, 'no, let it be an opera.' And we decided for an opera. No sooner did the matter get abroad, however, than there was a general outcry of protest. A Biblical opera! All the same, though legendary opera was in fashion, I did not allow myself to become discouraged. My poet had written the first two Acts; I also had scribbled a few notes—legible to myself alone—of the first Act and the whole of the second. Nevertheless—almost incredible to relate—apart from the sketch of the Prelude, the opera existed only in my head, and wishing to give a few friends some idea of it at my home, I wrote down the music of the three rôles, without a note of the orchestral score.

I have forgotten the names of the three singers—whom, naturally, I accompanied from memory, seeing that, with the exception of the vocal parts, nothing whatever had been committed to writing.

The audience, small though specially chosen—among them being Anton Rubinstein—sat there in stony silence. The composer received not the faintest acknowledgment, even of mere politeness.

A little later the same two Acts were played at my house by Augusta Holmès, Henri Regnault—a very good singer possessed of a delightful tenor voice—and Romain Bussine. The result was a little more satisfactory, though so slightly encouraging that I finally decided to do nothing further with so chimerical a work.

Years passed . . .

One day, in Germany, where I had gone to take part in a series of musical festivals presided over by Liszt, just as I was on the point of returning to France and was bidding the great pianist farewell, the idea came into my head to mention the matter to him. 'Finish your opera,' he said to me (though he had heard not a single note of it), 'and I will produce it for you.' As everyone well knows, Liszt was omnipotent at Weimar.

About that time Madame Viardot was in splendid voice, and had given the most brilliant performances at Weimar. It was for her that the part of Delilah was created. At Croissy, on a society stage set up in a garden, she went through half the second Act, along with Nicot and Romain Bussine. The director of the Opéra and a few other Parisians were present: the result was nil. There was no orchestra: only myself accompanying on a grand pianoforte.

Finally the time came to produce the work at Weimar. The translation had been made . . . but the war of 1870 put a stop to everything. It was not till December, 1873, that Samson and Delilah saw the footlights; though, alas! without the collaboration of Madame Viardot. It was too late.

The success was great, though not sustained. At Berlin it was alleged that the Weimar success had no meaning or significance whatever. It was sung at Hamburg, and that was all.

Only after a period of ten years was the opera given in France, at Rouen. Paris would have nothing to do with it. M. Ritt had to hear it at the Eden before he would bring himself to produce it at the Opéra, during the year of the great eruption of Etna. And I had to travel from Paris to Etna and back to be present both at the eruption and at the first rehearsal of Samson!

For the storm in the second Act I had been promised the most wonderful mise en scène. Meanwhile, it had been decided to stage the Walküre immediately afterwards, and all the promises made to me were broken. I actually had to protest violently before I could obtain for the beginning of the second Act a dash of red to represent the twilight!

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY TUDOR COMPOSERS

BY W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

XXIII.—JOHN LLOYD

In the closing years of the 15th century, Welsh musicians began to give evidence of their Celtic inheritance, and at this date several of them were either in the service of the Chapel Royal or were attached to the Court as minstrels. Already we have treated of the career of Robert Jones, and now there is question of John Lloyd, a famous priest-composer; yet, save for the very brief notice of him by Sir John Hawkins, no biographical data can be gleaned in our usual books of reference. His name has been written 'Floyd,' 'Fluyd,' and 'Flude'—a not unusual form of the Welsh surname, Lloyd—and although Hawkins places him under Henry VIII., he had previously belonged to the Chapel of King Henry VII., as will be seen.

The first notice of John Lloyd is in the year 1504-05, when he appears as one of the priests of the Chapel Royal, from which circumstance it is fair to conclude that he was born circa 1480. Evidently he soon got into favour, inasmuch as there is an entry in the Patent Rolls dated September 18, 1506, recording his appointment to the parish church of Munslow, diocese of Hereford, void by resignation. (Calendar of Patent Rolls of Henry VII., vol. ii., page 499.)

Probably this appointment to Munslow resulted in Lloyd's leaving the Court for the diocese of Hereford in 1506; and this is the more likely, inasmuch as his name does not appear in the official list of the King's Chapel at the funeral of Henry VII. on May 11, 1509. Nor does he seem to have been recalled to the Chapel Royal on the accession of Henry VIII., for in the Calendar of Letters and Papers of Henry VIII., vol. i., second edition (1920), we do not find his name in the detailed list of the King's Chapel at the coronation on Sunday, June 24, 1509. However, about a year later he was appointed a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, and his name appears as such among those who received liveries for the funeral of Prince Henry on February 27, 1511. Some of his fellow singers on that sad occasion were Dr. Fairfax, Edward Jones, William Crane, William Cornish, Thomas Farthing, and David Burton, whose memoirs will be found in the present series of articles.

On November 12, 1511, there was a warrant issued to give John Lloyd, Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, a black chamlet gown (Calendar of Letters of Henry VIII., vol. i., page 478). It may be observed that William Crane, a month later, was given 'a tawny chamlet gown' from the Great Wardrobe. (Probably black chamlet was given to the priest-singers.) Another warrant issued from the Great Wardrobe on April 16, 1512, is proof that John Lloyd (whose surname stands in the Exchequer Roll as 'Floyd') was given 'a black velvet fur coat,' as were also Robert Penn and Thomas Farthing—both of the latter being Gentlemen of the Chapel Royal. These three also received 'gowns' on November 3.

Previous to this, on March 20, 1512, John Lloyd had been granted a 'corrody' in the monastery of St. Augustine's, Bristol, viz Edward Jones, deceased. A year later he joined the members of the Chapel Royal in attendance on King Henry VIII. on his expedition to Terroueume and Tournai, returning to London at the end of October, 1513.

On October 3, 1518, John Lloyd took part in the Grand Mumming which was held at Cardinal Wolsey's Palace at Durham House in the Strand. Two years later, in June, 1520, he was one of the Chapel Royal Choir at the historic Field of Cloth of Gold—a pageant that has been frequently described. About this time he resumed a grant of corrody in the monastery of Thetford.

Meantime several deaths had thinned the ranks of the Chapel Royal, and on December 12, 1520, Thomas Farthing passed away. The last pageants in which Lloyd took part were those held on June 4 and 5, at Greenwich, in honour of the Emperor Charles V. After these he made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem in fulfilment of a vow, and having visited the Holy Places, returned to England. On his arrival he found that William Cornish had retired from the Mastership of the Children of the Chapel Royal after twenty years' service, and had been replaced by William Crane, whose appointment was dated March 25, 1523. On the following day Dr. John Clarke, Dean of the Chapel Royal, was promoted to the Bishopric of Bath and Wells, being succeeded as Dean by Dr. Richard Sampson.

John Lloyd died on April 3, 1523, and his obituary is thus chronicled by Sir John Hawkins:

John Floyd, of Welsh extraction, Bachelor of Music, and a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal, temp. Henry VIII. He made a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, returned, and died in the King's Chapel, and was buried in the Savoy Church, with the inscription: 'Johannes Floyd, virtutis et religionis cultor. Obiit 3 April, 1523.'

Although Hawkins styles him 'Bachelor of Music,' I have failed to discover his name in the Oxford or Cambridge Registers. However, the statement may be correct, as we find Ambrose Payne, Parson of Lambeth, who died in 1528, described on his monument—formerly to be seen in the old church of St. Dunstan's-in-the-East—as 'a Bachelour of Music.'

Certain it is that John Lloyd was a very capable musician and composer. He is said to have written much sacred music, including Masses and Motets, but no doubt most of his MSS. disappeared after the death of Queen Mary. Fortunately, however, in Add. MSS. 31,922 of the British Museum—a fine vellum MS. of the reign of Henry VIII.—there are two pieces by him. This valuable MS. is of added interest inasmuch as the composer is described as having graduated in music: 'in armonia graduat,' plainly pointing to the fact of his having been a Bachelor of Music. No doubt it was examined by Sir John Hawkins, and hence his statement as recorded above. At ff. 256 and 316 will be found these two pieces, set for three voices or instruments, the name of the composer being given as 'John Flude' or Floyd (Lloyd). The MS. also contains compositions by Thomas Farthing, King Henry VIII., Robert Fayrfax, John Dunstable, Richard Pygot, Dr. Cooper, and William Cornish.

MISDIRECTION IN ORATORIO SINGING

BY GEORGE GARDNER

(Archdeacon of Cheltenham)

At the recent Festival held in Hereford Cathedral, a few thoughts on this subject seemed to crystallize in my mind. The process was helped on by some conversations that I had with friends, either professional or amateur musicians. But any criticisms which I shall now venture to offer are not in any way directed against what was heard this year at Hereford. The Festival work last September was carried out with well-directed enthusiasm and with most satisfactory results in every way.

Not seldom, human beings are apt to fall into a condition of stolid acquiescence as regards certain irritations and misfits that are found in life as in art. These anomalies come to be regarded as part of the settled order of things. They are treated in the manner of a 'vested nuisance'—say, like the ringing of a cracked church-bell for half-an-hour before each service. Often a kindly-worded remonstrance might do much to abate the infliction; yet it is no one's business to make any protest. All we do is to harden ourselves to our discomforts, much as eels are alleged to become accustomed to skinning. Possibly it may be easier for an outsider like myself to speak his mind freely about certain matters in connection with oratorio singing than it would be for a member of the musical profession. So with much diffidence I venture to make my grumble, though it might be far more effectively expressed by someone possessing a sound technical knowledge of the whole subject.

As regards solo work: how comes it that so many prominent vocalists at the present day are afflicted with a physical incapacity for hitting accurately the notes at which they aim? Is it from lack of proper training? Or is it due to the emotional tendencies of modern music? Such a wobbling style of song can pass unnoticed when applied to recent Italian operas, such as those of Puccini or Mascagni. These works often demand the kind of intonation suggested by whatever is the Italian equivalent for 'with a palpitating voice.' But these methods, together with the free use of slurring, are absolutely fatal when applied, say, to the music of Mozart. Some years ago I remember hearing distinguished singers give a performance of Don Giovanni at Covent Garden. Not one of the group seemed to me really competent to execute this polished music, save the Leporello—and that was Edouard de Reszke. Things are even worse when such uncertainty of vocalisation is applied to the older forms of oratorio. And we are in the lowest depths when a persistent tremolo (or 'vibrato,' to speak more politely) is displayed. Yet eminent performers about whom some of these accusations are undeniably true are loudly praised in the newspapers. Human beings can, I repeat, get hardened to anything.

Then there is a lack of simplicity in the rendering of much that we hear. The bringing into oratorio music a kind of emotionalism that may be justifiable in a feverishly impassioned work like La Tosca, is as incongruous as the insertion of modern architectural flummeries in an ancient church. Bach's solos, for instance, demand first of all complete mastery of the notes and the rhythm. When that has been attained and no sense is left as of a man feeling his way in the dark, a clean and straightforward delivery of the melody is all that is wanted. Bach himself puts the requisite feeling into his music. For the singer to labour after added emotion is, to use a vulgar expression, like putting butter upon bacon. Indeed we can often best realise the wonderful appeal of Bach's treble or contralto arias when they are delivered in the unimpassioned, silvery tones of a few thoroughly well-trained choir boys. Then we begin to understand how this wonderful master can speak to us in a voice 'pure as the naked heavens.' In more modern music—say, like the double quartet, He shall give His angels, in Elijah, or 'The scene by the wayside' in The Apostles—one cannot help feeling that if the great professionals concerned would condescend to listen to, and to take a lesson from, the performance of such items by a first-rate church choir, much would be gained. Somehow, the rendering of the double quartet is apt to smell of the opera-house. And in the excerpt from Elgar, the calm serenity of the whole picture is destroyed when each of the soloists feels it necessary, as he gets up, to declaim his contribution in the accents supposed to be appropriate for the part he is assuming. You cannot see the wood for the trees.

Simplicity of diction is needed in another way. Take, for instance, the Mendelssohnian form of recitative. It is intended to be ordinary speech delivered in a more or less rhythmical shape. We know too well what a fatal inclination there is to prolong certain words, not because of their verbal sense, but because they form a suitable point d'appui for displaying the qualities of a voice. How often we have suffered from this tendency in Ye people, rend your hearts, and in the Air by which it is followed! Of course the exhibition of what the vocal organ can do by the holding on of a long note in the higher registers, has a perfectly legitimate place in some kinds of music. Without referring to the high A's and B's that elicit such frantic applause in the older Italian operas, think how splendidly this means of exploiting noble tones is used in the Prize Song of Die Meistersinger. In the singing of that ravishing bit of declamation by a Jean de Reszke, one might well wonder as to which was the more beautiful, the music or the voice. But when the trick is dragged in everywhere, even to the confusing of innocent recitatives, and the breaking up of straightforward songs—"This is too rich," as the customer said to the young lady, when she handed him a pork-pie, with nothing but fat in it.

Much might also be urged about obscurity of diction. Too often we have to listen to a song when the meaning of what is being sung, well or badly, is wholly unintelligible. Sometimes, even, it might be hazardous to make a guess as to what language is being employed. No doubt the enunciation of English words in musical form presents real difficulties. But, with well-directed effort, the problem of how to do this, and at the same time to produce even and pure tones, can be mastered. Would that more of our singers resolutely set themselves to the sorely needed task! Whatever charm attaches itself to their work would thus be curiously enhanced. I remember the deep satisfaction with which I once listened to a performance of Verdi's Falstaff, when I realised that it was possible to make out every word in the fine singing of the man who took the title-rôle.

In conclusion—a brief attempt to shoot at bigger game. As regards the conductor's part in the rendering of oratorio, things occur occasionally which seem to some of us, perhaps quite mistakenly, to be uncalled for and unwise. I will only touch upon this matter: and here let me again disclaim any thought of reflecting upon the excellent methods employed, on the whole, at Hereford.

In a performance of Bach's B minor Mass which I heard some while ago, under the direction of a distinguished wielder of the baton, innovations were introduced, no doubt with the idea of giving freshness to the whole reading, but which in the results appeared to me quite deplorable. For instance, in the Kyrie, that wonderful picture of one voice solemnly rising after another in prayer to heaven, it was thought advisable to make each entry of the fugue subject go like this:

degree of quickening up, violins (like voices), can only produce tones that are thin and wanting in penetration. In this case, the rather awkwardly written semiquavers of Mendelssohn's accompaniments become absolutely inaudible, and the run down near the end, intended to be the climax of the storm, turns into a poor trickle, though it is marked ff. The more sustained notes of the brass chiefly dominate the whole show. And it is just the same with Bach's choruses. Treat an allegro movement as if it were marked presto, and not only is the dignity of the whole impaired, but the balance of the material employed will be upset.

Here has been given, as I hope, a temperate statement of the disgruntled feelings which afflict some of us at times during the performance of sacred music. Let me add that it may be better to ventilate than to repress a grievance.

NEW FIDDLES FOR OLD

It is a great pity that Mr. W. J. Farrell has considered it necessary to overstate the case for modern violins in his singularly stimulating volume, The Truc-tone Violin (Cassell). There is little to be gained by exaggeration in the best of causes; protesting too much must needs excite suspicion. If Mr. Farrell were content to tell us that some modern fiddles are infinitely better than some old fiddles, he would win the assent of all sensible people. But he is tilting at shadows when he generalises on 'old violin cranks.' After all, the best judge of a violin is the violinist, and all the greatest violinists have invariably shown a very marked preference for old fiddles. The fact that there is a good deal of misconception and downright deception going on as regards old violins does not alter the fact that not only Stradivari, but Amati, Guarneri, Stainer, Maggini, Guadagnini—to name only a few—produced instruments that experience has shown to be excellent. Nor can the public be blamed if it turn a deaf ear to the claims of certain modern makers, for hardly a modern maker exists who has not 'rediscovered' something of the so-called Cremona secret. The gist of the matter is that not all old violins are good, and not all new violins bad. That is what the public often fails to understand. Stradivari's own violins were new once, and also excellent. Age alone does not constitute a proof of merit. That is the golden rule that the buyer with the limited purse ignores to his cost.

The author has our full sympathy when he pleads for the modern maker, and we quite agree that something ought to be done to open the eyes of the public in respect to the craze for old violins, which has reached absurd proportions. Utterly worthless instruments are sometimes treasured by quite intelligent people in the belief that being in a dilapidated condition they must be old, and because old, therefore good, and worth a fortune. It is a common experience not only for dealers, but for violinists generally, to be shown some disreputable German fiddle labelled Stradivari, with a request to name its present price in the market. Bad violins are worth a few shillings when they are new; when they are old their value is the current price for firewood—not a farthing more. A good modern fiddle is worth any amount of old bad fiddles. But it does not follow that it is also equal to the best of the old fiddles. Mr. Farrell claims that his own instruments are best because constructed as Stradivari himself would construct them to-day. That claim can only be decided by actual test—and time. For if it is true that Stradivari's violins were excellent from the first, some modern fiddles which appeared excellent at first have lost much of their quality after a couple of years' use.

Failing the actual test, it must be said that in his book Mr. Farrell shows at least that he possesses all the qualities of a first-class luthier. Above all things he is not prejudiced by the countless experiments of scientists, which, as we all know, have led nowhere. Stradivari was not a scientist, but a workman endowed with an amount of commonsense and love of his profession that, combined, amounted to genius. Mr. Farrell is also gifted with penetration, commonsense, and genuine affection for the tools of his trade. He is said by those who know him to possess also rare discrimination in the choice of wood and varnish—a most important qualification. Years of experience have taught him that the modern maker obsessed by the fame of the old is apt to forget or misunderstand certain laws. Modern makers, he says, for instance, believe that the old masters 'worked on the principle of how much wood they dare take out,' whereas the principle, according to Mr. Farrell, was of 'how much wood they dare leave in,' for enough wood must be left if the instrument is to stand well the strain imposed upon it by the strings. It is, of course, impossible to follow here all the innovations indicated by the author. They sound logical and reasonable, but if the proof of the pudding is in the eating, the proof of the fiddle is certainly in the playing. If Mr. Farrell's violins confirm his theories and establish his claim, fame will come to him in his lifetime as it came not only to Stradivari, but to Vuillaume and to James Tubbs. F. B.

STRAVINSKY DAY BY DAY

BY ALFRED KALISCH

Certainly M. Stravinsky is something to be thankful for. The Fire-Bird and Petrushka are gifts of price; but he has done far more to increase the gaiety of nations since he took to explaining himself. Not only is each of his utterances startling on its own account, but the attempt to reconcile it with the preceding one is a fascinating intellectual exercise for agile wits. When we do agree with him, it is generally for reasons the very opposite of those he adduces. We are reminded of the story of Lord Justice C. who, after Lord Justice A. had delivered judgment in favour of allowing an appeal, and Lord Justice B. had said it ought to be dismissed, tersely said that he concurred with Lord Justice A., for the reasons so ably enunciated by Lord Justice B.

Let us briefly review his recent pronouncements. First he told us that he had discovered Tchaikovsky, and in praise of him said things which are, in effect, a scathing denunciation of his own music and that of his followers. Then he told us, through the medium of the Musical News and Herald, that the orchestra is dead, because previous composers—groping, poor things, in outer darkness—knew nothing of 'sonorities' and 'tonal values' and 'individualizing' the various instruments of the orchestra. We ask ourselves what on earth had they been after that they did not find it out sooner—in fact, what did they think they were doing? And then he said that music should be played without expression!

Now we read in Musical America the most important news of all. He told somebody in Spain that 'Beethoven created no music' and that 'music did not advance a single inch through Wagner.'

This requires careful examination, and the more we examine, the more we are bewildered. Stravinsky's argument is, roughly, this: Music has been trying to express moods and philosophies. It has become a means instead of an end in itself. Its true end is 'the participation of auditory impressions.' By neglecting it, music has been hampered for centuries. The Germans, he said, have never understood music; they are philosophers, and deal only in 'musicality,' which is not the same thing as music at all. M. Stravinsky does not deny that Beethoven was a genius, which, indeed, is vastly civil of him; and he admits—more civility—that Wagner 'lent the orchestra new elements,' but he was 'all that he should not have been. He was neither a philosopher nor a musician.' The reason was that he had learnt too much Greek, and therefore could not take a natural view of music. After this we learn with some surprise that Mozart and Schubert were real, simple musicians, because 'the ear delights in them.'

How much better than the way of such mere clumsy fumbling is that of Stravinsky, who follows the light, conveying to an eager world 'auditory impressions' which are quite his own and original. His harmony 'is something altogether unconventional and arbitrary' (we suspect a mistranslation here), 'bubbling forth every moment in a different manner.' He will not formulate it, for to do that would be only 'to add another academy to those already existing.' In conclusion 'he is sure that he has opened up new paths'—and he is seemingly amazed at his own indiscretion.

He is, furthermore, convinced that the wealth of folk-song is inexhaustible, and he proudly adds that he 'takes over folk-wise value as it stands.' This, of course, is the most tremendous, the most epoch-making innovation of all. Other composers may have used folk-songs, but has anyone 'taken over a folk-wise value'? Again there seems reason to suspect the translator. I cannot help thinking the German text of Dr. Istel said something about 'Volkweise,' which only means a 'folk-tune,' and possibly we ought to approach the whole translation with caution.

If M. Stravinsky had not written some really valuable music we should be inclined to dismiss the whole with a shrug of the shoulder; but he has earned the right to be considered seriously, and he deserves that we should make an honest effort to understand him.

M. Stravinsky's verdicts on Beethoven and Wagner are particularly worthy of study. As we have seen, he admits that the former was a 'genius,' but clearly not a musical genius, for he wrote no music. Then what kind of a genius was he? We are told he 'had a great soul and expressed it in notes which say nothing to the ear.' If notes say nothing to the ear, how can they express a great soul? we may ask. If they express a great soul, what meaning can there be in saying that 'Beethoven created no music'? If Beethoven's music says nothing to M. Stravinsky's ear, we are driven to the conclusion (which some of his latest music supports) that he is endowed with a set of auditory nerves so vastly different from those of the normally musical human being that it is hopeless to argue from him to any other listener. It is clear, too, that he uses the word 'music' in a sense so totally opposite to that which most people give to it that discussion becomes impossible. One has no need to believe that all Beethoven's works are necessarily deathless to say this much.

In the case of Wagner the inconsistency is still more obvious. If the elements he gave to the orchestra were new, surely they must have helped the advance of music. If they did not, what is the sense of saying that they were new? Here, too, M. Stravinsky obviously uses the word 'music' in a purely esoteric and personal, not to say Pickwickian, sense.

Perhaps he will explain still further, and, in particular, tell us how it comes that a race which never understood music could produce a Mozart and a Schubert? It is a mere quibble to reply that they were Austrians, not Germans; and, besides, he has deprived himself of the right to use the argument, by the way in which he has mentioned them. Stravinsky the composer commands more respect than Stravinsky the commentator and controversialist.

Occasional Notes

A recent issue of Musical America contained an article by Mr. Francis Rogers on music in London. It was so ludicrously inaccurate that we pigeon-holed it for reference, but have so far been unable to deal with it. Fortunately it met the eye of Mr. Kaikhosru Sorabji, who promptly replied to a letter to the Editor. Briefly, Mr. Rogers opined that there was 'nothing doing' in London so far as music was concerned, and he seems to have been led to that view by the fact that just now the operatic stars in their courses prefer America to England—which is not surprising, seeing that America is the only large country with loose dollars lying around. Mr. Sorabji begins by telling the Editor of M.A. that 'it is really staggering to see the impudence with which people who come to London from abroad proceed to wallow in wild generalisations about musical activity here.' He then pointed out that the past year had seen London visited by practically all the outstanding figures in contemporary music, and that we have had performances of new works from all but a very few of the leading composers, many of whom have actually taken part in or conducted such performances. Mr. Sorabji, now thoroughly warmed up, then goes on (with a slap at us poor writers in passing):

/ This activity in music—as distinct from mere exhibitions of technical funambulism in effete and hackneyed trivialities which pass for music with the worshippers of the fat-box-office-receipts, fiddling, or keyboard-dribbling 'star,' which have as much connection with the great world of music as the Grub street journalistic hacks who scribble what with preposterous flattery is called 'musical criticism' have with literature—has been remarkable, and in spite of terribly adverse conditions and crushing expense, which shows a disinterested reverence and love for the art very different from the purely commercial instincts of the purveyors of musical saltimbanquerie whose doings occupy such an inordinate amount of space—duly paid for, let us hope!—in the American musical press.

Mr. Rogers, by the way, backed up his contention that London was dead musically during 1921 by pointing out that 'even the Promenade concerts under Sir Henry Wood did not continue through July'—which is not surprising, as they never begin until the middle of August.

In regard to opera, Mr. Sorabji takes a view that we believe is being more and more held by musicians:

As for Covent Garden—no one among intelligent musicians to-day supposes that the lack of orgies of Puccini, Mascagni, Leoncavallo et hujus generis omnis coupled with similar-brained operatic singers is any loss to Music. Of all forms of music with the exception of musical comedy, opera is perhaps the lowest.

A first performance of a new work of Delius is more than consolation for the happy absence of Galli-Curci's, Tetrazzini's, and the rest of the laryngologymnasts.

Perhaps there was a little excuse for Mr. Rogers, who was merely on a flying visit here. There was none, however, for Miss Kathleen Parlow, who in the same journal a few weeks later delivered herself of some statements that were—well, let us choose a long and polite word and call them inexactitudes.

To Kathleen Parlow [begins the article] the healthy growth of English music seems threatened by two cankerous spots . . . 'To me [she said] the low standard of English musical criticism is becoming a truly serious matter. This summer I religiously read the English critics, and you would be astounded to see the collection I made of serious statements and unforgivable errors. An example of what I mean is the wholesale and consistent belabouring that English critics gave to American artists.'

Now, if Miss Parlow read our critics as religiously as she says, she could hardly have missed the favourable opinions they expressed concerning the best of the American group—Reginald Werrenrath, Cecil Fanning, Sophie Breslau, Arthur Shattuck, Roland Hayes, Marcia van Dresser, Ethel Frank, and others. Naturally all our visitors were not tip-top, and equally naturally they were told so. On the whole, however, the American visitors had a 'good press,' and it seems to have been left for one of ourselves, so to speak, to suggest otherwise. If Miss Parlow felt so warmly about it in November, 1921, she must have been boiling in the summer of 1920. Why did she not, in the intervals of making her scrap-book of English critics' 'unforgivable errors,' drop a line to one of our journals and ask for fair play for the visitors? Perhaps because such a course would have been unpopular here, whereas to an artist setting out on a tour through the States the kind of thing we have quoted is distinctly helpful.

Having made one misstatement, Miss Parlow proceeds to support it by others:

England during the war had little music, and the visits of great artists there since then have been comparatively few; therefore the criticisms to me seemed to be occasioned by distemper. The cause is partly political, and partly because the critics resented the advertising methods of the Americans. But it seems to me that criticism should be above this. Most of the critics in England are reporters who go to music instead of, say, to an athletic event.

There is something in this last sentence, though not quite what Miss Parlow means. We are sure that Mr. Newman, for instance, would infinitely prefer an evening at the National Sporting Club to an average one at the Ionian Hall, and there are others of us whose fancy on an early summer's afternoon lightly turns from Queen's Hall to Lord's or the Oval. But we should not go there professionally, though our editors might do worse than let some of us change places with the sporting reporter occasionally. E.N. on a boxing match would, we are sure, be no less stimulating than when dealing with concerts.

However, let English critics be thankful for Miss Parlow's next remark: 'I do not believe that English critics could be bought, as they can be in France.' To what extent English critics can be bought in France we know not, but we do know that they are not for sale on this side of the Channel—which is what Miss Parlow really means, of course. We leave her to settle with our French colleagues.

So much for Cankerous Spot No. 1. Miss Parlow is on safer ground when dealing with No. 2—the ballad concert. Still, she must not forget that England is not the only country with a fourth-rate song literature, and she will not be long in America before finding out that in the way of producing wishy-washy ballads America can give us a start and a beating. Perhaps when she has heard a few of the worst 'winners' she will tell Musical America about their cankerous spot. On the other hand, perhaps not.

But the best proof of Miss Parlow's want of accuracy is her remark on the English reception of Pizetti's Violin Sonata:

Last year Miss Parlow gave the first performance of Pizetti's new Sonata, which raised pandemonium among the critics. Speaking of this, Miss Parlow said, smiling: 'I suppose I'd better keep away from sonatas for a time. It is just as Sir Henry Wood put it to me, "the critics are constantly after you for something new, and then when you give it them, they are at you tooth and nail." As for the Pizetti work, despite the critics it is going to live.'

Now, as a matter of fact, of all the new works produced in London last year, few, if any, had a more favourable reception from the critics than this Sonata, so much so, that Mr. Scholes has during the past few days been moved to make an attempt to show that the laudatory critics and public were wrong. (He does this by quoting the motives, and calling attention to their poverty. But there are too many examples of fine works evolved from insignificant material to make this method other than risky. It is judging at the wrong end. The proof of the pudding lies in the eating thereof, not in a critical dissection and inspection of its ingredients.)

On the whole, it is not pleasant to reflect that a musician of Miss Parlow's standing will be touring the States for the next few months, shedding interviews such as the one we have quoted.

On page 55 appears an account of a remarkable performance of The Messiah at Oundle School. The idea of forming the audience into a kind of extra choir is one with great possibilities. It has been proved, we believe, that in the strongholds of choralism such familiar choruses as the 'Hallelujah' can be sung from memory by an average audience. Perhaps some enterprising conductor will experiment further on the Oundle lines, bringing in the audience at such phrases as 'And He shall reign,' 'Wonderful, Counsellor,' 'For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it,' &c. No doubt some of our composers will soon develop the possibilities of a broad theme sung by the audience against a faux-bourdon by the choir proper. After all it is only what many church choirs and congregations are now doing successfully with hymns. A start might be made by the use of material already well known, such as popular song refrains. We have received from Miss Carrie Tubb, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Norman Allin, and Mr. Edward Carwardine (of the L.S.O.) written impressions of the performance. All alike give glowing accounts of the thrilling results of the use of what may be called the cantus firmus choir, as well as of the choral singing as a whole. It may be of interest to give particulars of the time spent in preparation, so here they are: chorus, nine hours; orchestra, sixteen hours; chorus and orchestra combined, three hours; full school chorus, three hours, forty minutes; full school chorus and orchestra combined, four hours; trebles alone, six hours; altos alone, five hours; tenors and basses together, three hours; audience-choir, thirty minutes. One two-hour full rehearsal with soloists. Total, a little over fifty hours—a very modest amount of time for so fine a result. We congratulate Mr. Spurling and his players and singers, old and young—especially the latter.

The Musician's Bookshelf

Mr. W. J. Turner's Music and Life (Methuen, 7s. 6d.) has its somewhat dull title accentuated by a garish 'dazzle' wrapper that hits one in the eye. Let it be said at once that this coat of many colours is the true index to the contents. The title is so Smilesian in its ordinariness as to suggest that Mr. Turner, hard pressed as to the naming of his book, impatiently settled the matter with 'Title? Oh! any old tag you like. Call it Travels in Siluria, Critical Evolutions and Revolutions, Music and Life—stay! as the book contains a good deal about music, let's have the last.' And it was so. Really, of course, the volume is all about Mr. Turner and his relations and reactions to music and other arts. That is what makes it so well worth having. People who tell us that criticism is a purely personal matter, and therefore of no value, have grasped just half of the truth. Criticism is purely personal, and its interest lies in that very fact. To put it bluntly, the only critic who counts is the man with pronounced likes and dislikes, plus the literary gift that enables him to tell us all about them. If you think that this is an over-statement, ask yourself why we still enjoy reading what Johnson, Lamb, Hazlitt, and others wrote about Shakespeare. We probably don't agree with all their pronouncements—especially those of Johnson—nor do they add anything much to our knowledge of the poet or his works. But we shall go on reading their essays on Shakespeare even if we are never to see another performance of the plays, or even if we give up reading them. Nor does the interest—and therefore to a great extent the value—of criticism depend greatly on our interest in the subject. Take Johnson's Lives of the Poets, for example. The volumes are mainly concerned with writers who are as dead as mutton. Not three out of a dozen educated persons could give anything like a complete list of the writers concerned. Yet the Lives being on the whole the best critical work Johnson ever did, and full of the strong common-sense and felicity of expression that made his conversation what it was, are even to-day second in interest only to that conversation as retailed by Boswell. Mr. Turner has immensely strong likes and dislikes, coupled with the gift of being able to write about them in a way that interests us all the time and annoys us most of it. For Mr. Turner lays about him with no respect for reputations. He is one of those levelling fellows who, for two pins, will even speak disrespectfully of the Equator. And perhaps Mr. Turner does us most good when he annoys us most. At such moments we badly want to discuss things with him, and as that is impossible we usually proceed to discuss them with ourselves. This is another way of saying that his book stimulates thought, and when you come to think of it, that is an all-too-rare quality in a book on music. Books that tell us all manner of more or less unnecessary things concerning music are as plentiful as blackberries, whereas those that set us thinking about it are a far more rare and refreshing fruit.

The chapters in Music and Life are touched-up articles, most of which have appeared in the New Statesman. As is usually the case in such reprints, a few papers come through the ordeal none too well. This is natural enough, for the qualities that go to the successful making of a magazine article are often the very ones that are undesirable in a book. However, as most readers will not agree as to which essays should have been omitted, Mr. Turner is perhaps justified in having put them all in, just as the compiler of an anthology proves his selection to have been right by the fact that all his readers grouse about it, but no two grouse for the same reason.

Right here, as they say across the water, the reviewer's difficulty comes along. I had turned down pages on which were passages to be quoted or discussed, but there are so many of them that the thing can't be done without taking up a great deal more space than is available. I can only advise you to get hold of this annoying and rattling good book. If you don't find its two-hundred-odd pages the most engrossing you have read for many a long day your experience will be different from mine. Just now it rains books on 'musical appreciation,' and the defenceless reader is hard put to it if he wishes to avoid being told how to distinguish the cor Anglais from the bassoon, or how to make sure that the entry of the second subject doesn't escape him. Mr. Turner's book has little to do with such trivial and hindering facts as these. It deals with music, and as the author is a musician and a poet who can also write live and direct prose, shot with humour, it is calculated to do more to help a reader to enjoy and appreciate music than any of the avowed signposts, or even all of them put together. H. G.

SOME BOOKS FROM VIENNA

A batch of booklets reaches us from the Wiener Literaris du Anstalt, which forms part of a series entitled, Theater und Kultur, edited jointly by Richard Smekel, Hermann Bahr, and Hugo Hofmannsthal (it will be noticed that he has, democratically, dropped the 'Von'). In these the musical interest is secondary, but the parcel also includes a monograph on Hugo Wolf, by Edmund Hellmer, and a volume of Reminiscences by the well-known singer, Anna Bahr-Mildenburg.

Frau Mildenburg is a dutiful wife, and copies the somewhat pleonastic and, what used to be called orchidaceous style of her husband. But she is an interesting personality, and her reminiscences of her life on the stage make good reading. She made her first appearances under Mahler, at Hamburg, and went with him from there to Vienna; she throws a good deal of light on him. Far the most interesting pages of the book are those which are devoted to recollections of her stay in London, when she was here to give her well-remembered performances of Klytemnestra in Elektra. Her sketch of Dr. Ethel Smyth is life-like, and her judgment of the British public is worth reproducing. She said to Mr. Sargent when he was sketching her:

'You will not easily find a public so fond of music, with such an insatiable appetite for music, as the British. They crowd everywhere where music is to be heard, they form the largest section of the public at any musical festival on the Continent, and the need for music penetrates to every class of society. . . . But their judgments on music are mostly undifferentiated. It is, so to say, music in general for which they long, yet this longing for music but rarely leads in a definite personal direction, and ready as they are to yield themselves to music as a whole, so little are they inclined to concern themselves with detail or to trouble themselves about fine shades, by which after all the degree of merit of a performance is ultimately fixed. . . . that the artist who makes a strong impression on them never owes this to any one detail in his work, but it is always the total impression on which they rely. And they have a very sure intuition of the sincerity of an artistic achievement. . . . they obviously think themselves to be not judges of art, but enjoyers of art.'

With this attitude she contrasts that of the Vienna public, which is critical first and last. A large part of the book is devoted to Frau Mildenburg's work in nursing the Austrian wounded.

Herr Hellmer speaks of Hugo Wolf with unbounded enthusiasm, but is not blind to his faults as a man. The book gives many details, believed to be hitherto unpublished, as to the origin of his madness. Hellmer saw the composer on the day before he had to be removed to an asylum, when he was under the delusion that he had been appointed Director of the Vienna Opera. There is an interesting account of Wolf's only interview with Wagner, when he was a mere boy. Wagner said he could give no opinion of the boy's music, adding, 'I am really no musician.' 'Oh, you are too modest,' replied Wolf. M. Stravinsky, by the way, has recently said, too, that Wagner was no musician. There is an interesting selection from Wolf's table-talk and candid remarks, from which I will select only one piquant remark about Brahms. He was defending him against a violent attack, and said he must not be condemned wholesale, but there was one quality that he lacked which was the mark of the truest greatness 'he could have no joy in his art—never and nowhere. He could lament loud enough, but exult never.' The German word jubiliren is practically untranslatable. The book will be welcome to the large number of Wolf lovers.

The other books may for the reason given be dismissed briefly. In his Round about the Magic Flute (Rund um die Zauberflöte) Max Pirker deals chiefly with the libretto, and with vast erudition traces its connection with the Vienna popular theatre, the aristocratic 'Barok Theatre,' philosophy and masonry, and shows how its influence has persisted even down to the librettos of Hofmannsthal. It must be confessed that so weak a butterfly hardly needs breaking on so large a wheel. It is difficult to believe that Schickeneder's play can really be a milestone in the road of civilization.

Richard Smekel's little book on Ferdinand Raemund, and Hermann Bahr's monograph on the Burg Theatre of Vienna, are of purely local interest, and deal solely with drama.

There is a good deal of general interest in Erwin Rieger's book on Offenbach and his Viennese imitators, and the writer's explanation of the way in which Offenbach, the German, became the very embodiment of the Paris of the Second Empire, is instructive. Still, it was rather Meilhac and Halévy, his librettists, who were responsible. There is not much musical criticism in the book, but some good remarks on the music of Millöcker, Suppé, Strauss (Johann, not Richard), and even Lehar.

Smekel's collection of Old Viennese Theatre Song, taken from the most popular operettas, makes diverting reading. The book is somewhat flattering to our national vanity. There is nothing in it even remotely comparable to W. S. Gilbert, and even Adrian Ross need fear no comparisons with some of these Viennese writers, who, somehow or other, have achieved a cosmopolitan reputation. A. K.

TWO BOOKS FOR PIANISTS

To the many writings on the Pianoforte Sonatas of Beethoven Mr. C. Egerton Lowe adds a book Beethoven's Sonatas, No. 95 of Novello's Music Primers, 5s.)—a book primarily analytical and pedagogic, 'with hints on rendering, form, &c.' It is the strange fate of the thirty-two Sonatas to have become matter for pedagogy; a perverse fate, considering that of all keyboard music in the world this of Beethoven is least apt so to be subjugated, considering that of all music Beethoven's—and of Beethoven's the pianoforte works above all—can chime in only with the grown mind, the adult imagination.

Beethoven the imperfect and sublime, Prometheus in torment, deaf and frustrated, a boor and god-like—Beethoven is not a book to be put in the hands of young girls. Why, when Busoni is away we have hardly a pianist left who can actualise the music of the Sonatas. Who doubts but that, with a few obvious exceptions, the Sonatas will be less and less played? Naturally they will be strummed privately by those who do not read; for of course one must have them in one's head. There the Sonatas will live for ever, in men's heads rather than their ears. When you have the Adagio of Op. 106 well in your head do you ever crave to hear it? You hear it at your peril, and the divine music in your mind recovers only as the effect of the hearing fades.

It cannot be doubted that Mr. Egerton Lowe has them in his head, all the quiring thirty-two. He sets out to be sternly analytical: not so much to write a book as to collect useful information, which is here in quantity. But there is in him a lyrical vein, which as the catalogue proceeds comes frequently to light. The author is a single-hearted lover of the Sonatas, and as we glean informative hints on comfortable fingerings for this or that crabbed passage, we are also well infected with the author's enthusiastic wonder, as one fresh beauty eclipses another in the august procession; with his sense of triumph before the Sonatas of the middle period, with his awe before the 'last five.' So far is Mr. Egerton Lowe's analysis from suggesting one of the missing books of Euclid. He is a much-known and long-successful teacher, so one must bow, with however little respect, before the practical value of one singular proceeding he recommends. It is the association of a line or two of verse with a theme, and this 'is often of wonderful assistance in gaining the true rhythmical and metrical accents.' Here is an example from the C sharp minor Sonata, Op. 27:

Ex. 1.

Why drag in the Queen of the May? Here, alas, is a consequence of Beethoven's fate destining him to be a 'subject' in young ladies' boarding schools. And why drag in Joan of Arc? What had Joan to do with Beethoven or music of any sort? Mr. Egerton Lowe suavely recommends us to think of Joan of Arc in prison during the Adagio of Op. 110. But Joan, if she had music in prison, probably had Organum all in consecutive fifths, and we cannot imagine Beethoven going to that length, though (as this book does not fail to point out) Beethoven did not always shun that relation, vide the Andante of the Sonata Appassionata.

These are lapses, and Mr. Egerton Lowe honourably supplies a corrective by quoting what Beethoven himself replied to a foolish friend who wanted the 'meaning' of some movement. 'I have written the notes, it is for you to discover their meaning.' The notes of course are the meaning. It was not Beethoven but Schiller and Tennyson whose 'line' it was to write about Joan of Arc and the Queen of the May.

CHOPIN'S ORNAMENTATION

The second book is on Chopin's Ornamentation, by John Petrie Dunn (Novello's Music Primers, No. 96, 3s.). The author's chosen plot is smallish but judiciously tended. His excellent pages so well prove taste, thoroughness, and a devotion to Chopin that the reader asks that they be part of a general study of Chopin playing, on which there remains much to be said. Meanwhile Chopin's Ornaments—'pearls from diamonds dropped,' like Cordelia's tears—are significant in their least minutiae; of Chopin's essence, and yet commonly mishandled. Mikuli himself, Chopin's pupil and editor, said, 'Shakes he generally began with the auxiliary note,' and on this Mr. Dunn points out, first, that simple shakes are rare in Chopin; secondly, that, with a few almost self-evident exceptions, they must begin with the principal, not the auxiliary, note, else tautology or ugliness will result. 'So much for the trustworthiness of such traditions as we possess.' Mr. Dunn, then, deduces principles from internal evidence. His main principle is against anticipation; that is, transient shake (pralltriller), acciaccatura, appoggiatura, and the rest must nearly always 'come on the beat,' borrowing their time from the note ahead, not that behind.

This softening of the blows of the principal notes makes Chopin's melody pianoforte melody. The statement of the notes of a melody, however beautiful, does not necessarily make pianoforte melody, and we listen to the opening of the divine Adagio of Beethoven's Op. 10, No. 3, trying always to imagine it coming from an instrument that could truly rise to such a demand. The softening of the pianoforte's dull blows in Chopin's ornamentation takes us to the core of art—to the appropriateness of the material to the form, which is one solid principle at least amid the dubieties of æsthetics. Chopin knew his material—a knowledge that is a life-giving property to his work. His music was not like a house which is designed irrespective of whether it is to be carried out in wood or stone: there are such bad houses and bad music.

In the chapter on the Arpeggio Mr. Dunn judiciously recommends slight anticipation of an arpeggio for the left hand. On Appoggiaturas: 'When the note following an appoggiatura is identical with the latter, the appoggiatura is anticipated.' The transient shake (pralltriller) may occasionally be anticipated when it stands over the first note of a phrase. Examples are given, thus the opening phrase of the A flat Impromptu. Illustrations in music-type are most generously scattered over the book. C.

MISCELLANEOUS

Received too late for notice last month, but still not quite out of season, is Dr. J. W. Phillips's Carols: Their Origin, Music, and Connection with Mystery Plays (Routledge, 6s.). The book is the outcome of a series of lectures given by Dr. Phillips at various times. The subject—always an attractive one—is dealt with in a human and popular way, with many musical and textual examples. Sir Frederick Bridge adds a Preface, and there are some pleasant black and white drawings.—The issue for 1922 of that useful annual, A Calendar of Hymns Ancient and Modern and The English Hymnal, is now obtainable (Humphrey Milford; and Mowbray 6d.).—The Yattendon Hymnal has long since made a high place for itself among hymn books that are also literature. Here is its text, under the title of The Small Hymn Book, edited by Robert Bridges (Humphrey Milford, 2s. 6d.). It contains just a hundred hymns, most of them being from ancient sources. In the case of some translations from the Latin the original is also given.—John Newton's Sixty-five Don'ts for Church Organists (Cambridge: Hefter & Sons, 1s.) suffers from several disabilities. Its title is ugly, and moreover makes us ask 'Why only sixty-five? and Why only "Don'ts," since there are so many "Do's" that still seem to be in need of a little propaganda?' A further flaw is the casual method of punctuation, and the general air of 'it doesn't matter how you say a thing so long as the thing itself is sound.' Of course it matters very much indeed. Sometimes it makes all the difference between intelligibility and the reverse. For example:

DON'T play every verse, cease playing at least once in every psalm and hymn, and not once only throughout the whole Psalter, for the 17th verse of Psalm 115 I think it is; it certainly is not verse 13 of Psalm 18!

Mr. Newton is given to the use of commas when semicolons are required—a trick he has perhaps caught from parish magazines. (These little journals are a law unto themselves in punctuation and English generally—a fact worth noting, as they are usually written or edited by Masters or Bachelors of Arts.) Mr. Newton's precepts are useful and sound as a whole. We part company with him here and there, however. For example, when he says 'DON'T sing the Gloria Patri full, but treat it as an ordinary verse,' he may be right from a rubrical point of view, but he is wrong from a musical one—which after all is important. The Gloria Patri is not a part of the psalm, but a pendant. Common-sense suggests that we should look on it as a kind of chorus. This aspect of it, as well as the need for an effect of finality at the close of a psalm, seems to call for full rather than antiphonal treatment. Moreover, in places where plainsong is used and the psalms are chanted antiphonally by cantor and choir, the treatment of the Gloria Patri as an ordinary verse will often lead to its second half being sung as a solo—a miserable

(Continued on page 37.)

The Night Wind.

January 1, 1922

PART-SONG FOR FOUR VOICES.

Words by LAURENCE BIKVON.*

Music by GEORGE RATHBONE.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED; NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

Slow and sustained.

Soprano. p The night wind o - ver the great downs . . . Streams . . .

Alto. The night wind o - ver the Tenor. p The night wind o - ver the great downs . . . Streams . . .

Bass. p The night wind o - ver the Slow and sustained.

Accomp. p (For practice only.)

. . a - long, streams a-long the sky, a - long the sky ;

streams a - long,

great downs Streams a-long the sky ; . . In the sol-i-tude . . of the

. . a - long, streams a-long the sky ; In the sol-i-tude . . of the great downs Streams a-long the sky ; In the sol-i-tude . . of the Copyright, 1921, by Novello and Company, Limited.

* By permission, from "The Secret," (Elkin Matthews).

tenderly.

There is on-ly you and I, there is on-ly you and I. you . . and I.
 hill . . side . . There is on-ly you and I. . . . on-ly you and I.
 hill . . side . . There is on-ly you and I. . . . you and I.
 hill . . side . . There is on-ly you and I. . . . you . . and I.

Più mosso. f cres. Slower. p

The night wind leaps and rush-es. Black in the trees, that cry As
 The night wind leaps in the trees, that cry As
 The night wind leaps and rush-es. Black in the trees. the trees, that cry As
 The night wind leaps and rush-es. Black in the trees, that cry, in the trees, that cry

Più mosso. f cres. Slower. p

Molto cres. e poco accel.

if their tra - vail ech - oed . . . The world's e - ter - nal "Why?"

if their tra - vail ech - oed The world's e - ter - nal "Why?"

if . . . their tra - vail ech - oed, ech - oed The world's e - ter - nal "Why?"

As if their

As if their tra - vail ech - oed The world's e - ter - nal "Why?"

Molto cres. e poco accel.

Slow and sustained.

pp

Clouds have bu-ried the old moon, The moon. The sunk light

Clouds have bu-ried the old moon, The

Clouds have bu-ried the old moon, The

Clouds have bu-ried the old moon, The Slow and sustained.

pp

Clouds have bu-ried the old moon, The sunk light cow - ers shy ;

sunk night cow - ers shy, the light covers shy ;

sunk light cow - ers shy ; . . . In a world of stumbling and dark - ness . . . There is sunk light cow - ers shy ; . . . In a world of stumbling and dark - ness . . . There is sunk light cow - ers shy ; . . . In a world of stumbling and dark - ness . . . There is tenderly.

I, . . . there is on - ly you and I, you and I.

on - ly you and I, . . . on - ly you and I.

on - ly you and I, . . . you . . . and I.

on - ly you and I, . . . you . . . and I.

ppp

ppp

ppp

ppp

(Continued from page 32.)

anticlimax, especially in the not infrequent combination of a jubilant psalm and a cantor who has seen his best days! In this and a few other matters we add a sixty-sixth 'Don't' to Mr. Newton's sixty-five: "DON'T be pedantic."—The Canon Book by Percy Dearmer and Martin Shaw (S.P.C.K., 6d.) is a collection of seventeen hymns and songs suitable for use at meetings and services of a non-liturgical nature. The melody is given in each case, and the vigour and quality of the music may be gauged from the fact that the tunes are drawn chiefly from the English Hymnal, the Public School Hymn Book, and the Motherland Song Book. The words are mainly such as may be conscientiously sung by a Communistic sceptic whose relations towards Christianity continue to be friendly.—A useful addition to the growing list of practical handbooks issued by Musical Opinion is The Pneumatic Player: the Regulation and Repair of some Modern Types, by Harry Drake (2s. 6d.). Mr. Drake discusses in detail the best-known types of player-pianos, ending with a chapter dealing with various defects and their remedy. H. G.

New Music

DR. SAINT-SAËNS'S NEW WORKS: SONATAS FOR WOOD-WIND

In his eighty-seventh year Dr. Saint-Saëns's neat and nimble pen flows on as blithely as it has done at any time since about 1850—senectus non impedit—and this interesting activity gives us a group of newly-published Sonatas, Opp. 166-168, for reed instruments and pianoforte (Durand, Paris). A gift of charming generosity in a direction rarely so blest. The venerated composer may be fancied as having cast his eye back over seventy years, inquiring whether there were not yet some modest section of our community left unenriched by his lifetime's largess. He long ago wrote solo pieces for the horn, and more recently for the tenor trombone. There was a trumpet part in one celebrated chamber work (Op. 65). But oboe and clarinet had been neglected, save for a Caprice on Danish and Russian Airs (with flute and pianoforte), and the bassoon had been neglected altogether. Each of the three instruments was accordingly endowed with a sonata.

Understand sonata in the least pompous sense. The clarinet's is the most extended of the three, and even so it disclaims any sort of relationship with the Clarinet Sonatas of Brahms's Op. 120. The French master indeed has not sought, because he was writing a 'sonata,' to put on the lips of the honoured instrument the soaring and discursive eloquence appropriate to the strings and pianoforte. Such a confusion of means may render the wood-wind a sad visitation in chamber music; but Dr. Saint-Saëns's sense of style leads him into no risks. The instrument here pipes its brief, appropriate strain, and ceases too soon to weary us with the inhuman simpleness and sameness of tone which still naively bespeaks the first woodwindmen—fauns and dryads of old Arcadia. With a handlight and sure the composer fits the rôle of each to its character, so a pastoral improvisation for the oboe (opening of second movement), a wooing appeal for the clarinet, opening and closing the second Sonata, and for the bassoon—the voice surely of Pan himself—two movements of honest dignity separated by a 6-8 Allegro Scherzando of bassoonish fun. 'Cellists will seize on this last Sonata (Sonatina might have been the word), which only once or twice goes below the 'cello's C string.

C.

A PORTFOLIO OF MUSIC ANCIENT AND MODERN

Messrs. Sénart (Paris) have just issued the first portfolio of La Musique de Chambre, a half-yearly publication, which promises to constitute a first-rate library for the practising musician. This first issue consists of five sets:

Pianoforte music.—(a) Modern: the twelve easy pieces by Kœchlin, mentioned on another page of this number; works by Mompou, Déré, Bazelaire, Fourdrain, M. Maurice-Lévy, and Opol Ygouw. (b) Ancient: pieces by Ph. E. Bach, Le Bégue, A. L. Couperin, and E.-J. de la Guerre.

Songs.—Modern songs by Max d'Ollone, Déré, Pillois, Trémois, and others; arias by Dalayrac and Philidor.

Instrumental music.—Violin Sonatas by Le Guillard and Honegger, Violoncello Sonatas by M. Emmanuel and A. Ceillier, Kœchlin's first String Quartet and Jean Huré's second, Migot's Mouvements d'Eau for String Quartet, F. Bousquet's Poème for Pianoforte Quintet, a Pianoforte Trio by R. Gerhard, and various works by Vivaldi, Geminiani, San Martino, Dalayrac, and Baillot.

As regards the works for bowed instruments, the reviewer's task is complicated by the fact that they are issued in parts only. Kœchlin's Quartet is referred to on a previous page. Migot's Mouvements d'Eau looks very attractive, straightforward, and poetic. Huré's second Quartet is not a work which can be judged at a cursory glance; he is a fine musician but extraordinarily uneven, whose works call for particularly careful study. Honegger's Sonata is an impressive and thoughtful work, which will be reviewed shortly, together with the arrangement for pianoforte duet of his Pastorale d'Été, issued by the same publishers. Among the other examples of chamber music the Trio by Roberto Gehard, a pupil of Pedrell, calls for special notice. Earnest and scholarly, founded on fine themes reminiscent of Church music and folk-song, and carefully worked out, it is altogether classical in spirit and free from conventional tricks. Straightforward enough, though less original, is Laurent Ceillier's Violoncello Sonata, a pleasing instance of sound workmanship and balance.

To review a collection of this kind in a body is perhaps not the best way to be fair to all the works which it comprises—works which call for very different standards of appraisal.

The collection is planned so as to contain music which will appeal to various tastes and to various classes of singers and players; it is conceived and carried out in a spirit similar to that which directs the organizers of our Promenade Concerts. Some of the lesser items included may be quite good of their kind, and likely to do more than a little towards popularising the collection as it stands; yet one can hardly speak of them and of Kœchlin's or Honegger's contributions in the same breath. Let it be emphasised, however, that the portfolio contains a considerable proportion of really interesting things of various kinds, small or big. It is tastefully and carefully got up. The ancient works are edited by adepts such as Henri Expert, L. de la Laurencie, E. Bosquet, and others. M.-D. C.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

The arrangements for two pianofortes of Albert Roussel's Pour une Fête de Printemps (Durand) will be very welcome to all those who have read accounts of that work's performance at Paris, in its original orchestral form. Roussel's music, which is always well constructed and substantial, reads very well in the arrangement, which should help to popularise that thoughtful and poetic work pending the time when it will be produced at one of our symphony concerts.

Florent Schmitt's two suites, Antony and Cleopatra, in pianoforte duet arrangement (Durand), are hard nuts to crack, but seasoned players should derive a good deal of fun from them, especially from the Orgie et Danses in the second. Other numbers like the beautiful Le Tombeau de Cléopâtre are easier to tackle. The music is instinct with a fine dramatic and poetic sense throughout, and is very characteristic of Schmitt. It is to be expected, therefore, like the composer's previous works, it will delight many, but exasperate more.

We may feel confident that with Saint-Saëns's Feuillet d'Album, Op. 169 (Durand), we are on safe ground, and that all will share that peaceful enjoyment which the piece invites.

If we want a little more excitement we shall easily derive it from Manuel de Falla's charming Danse de la Meunière, an excerpt from The Three-Cornered Hat (Chester). And should we incline towards a more introspective mood, a mood of tenderness and reverie, we shall turn with good purpose to Maurice Delage's Schumann (Durand), in which the pupil of Ravel—already known to us by his four delightful Poèmes Hindous—skilfully and fervidly attunes his fancy to that of the master to whom he is paying honour. M.-D. C.

ORGAN MUSIC

The taking of the various parts of a great cathedral as a basis for a set of organ pieces seems so obvious a thing to do that one is surprised it has not long since been done. Perhaps it has, but at the moment I can think of nothing in that line but Silas's excellent Meditation in a Cathedral, which, of course, is a good way off the idea. Here, however, is Henri Mulet with a set of ten pieces entitled Esquisses Byzantines (Paris: Leduc), bearing the inscription: 'En mémoire de la Basilique du Sacré-Cœur de Montmartre, 1914-1919.' The sketches are concerned with the Campanile, Nef, Chapelle des Morts, a Chant Funèbre, Noël, In Paradisum, &c., the result being a set somewhat above the average of the Leduc albums that we know so well. The idiom is not that of the Dubois or Guilmant schools, Mulet being rather a disciple of Franck, though he succeeds in capturing the chromaticism rather than the loftiness of the composer. (The Chant Funèbre recalls Franck startlingly, not only in its harmony, but in its main theme, which is practically identical with that of the slow movement of the Symphony.) There is some really original writing at times, and the conventional organ style receives yet another blow, especially in the delightful Rosace and the brilliant Procession. The piece descriptive of the nave has the right sense of impressive space, though it is short and on the quiet side, and the belfry piece gives us the swaying suggestion of bells instead of the more obvious imitations of chimes that are now getting rather well worn. The pieces vary considerably in difficulty. The most exacting call for a fine organ and player, and all demand taste and fancy.

The collections of Twenty Short and Easy Pieces issued by Messrs. Novello during the past few years have been so popular, that there is no need to do much more than mention the appearance of a new volume—Set IV. As usual, the compilers have cast their net wide, drawing on W. H. Bell, Sterndale Bennett, Cui, Dubois, Elgar (a delightful little string Elegy arranged by John E. West), Gade, Gounod (Judex), Alan Gray, Hailing, Mackenzie, Mendelssohn (an arrangement of one of the best of the later Songs without Words), Rheinberger (a Trio), Luard-Selby, Smart, S. S. Wesley, John E. West (two of the best of his short pieces), and W. G. Wood. As there is something for practically every taste and for most stages of technical skill, the book, like its predecessors, is useful alike for study, voluntary, and recital purposes. H. G.

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

Apropos of the madrigal records discussed in last month's notes, I am glad to hear that the Gramophone Company has just issued a booklet entitled Elizabethan Madrigals and English Folk-Dances (No. 6 of the Education Series). It contains an article on the Madrigal by Dr. E. H. Fellowes, and the text of the examples so far recorded, together with brief biographical and other notes concerning the composers and the works. There is also a note from Mr. Cecil Sharp on English Country Dances, followed by particulars of the folk-dance records. This excellent pamphlet should be obtained by all those who are using the gramophone as a means of keeping in touch with the present great revival of this delightful old music. I understand that copies may be had free.

From a batch of new H.M.V. records I mention first the two 12-in. d.s. of the Enigma Variations. D578 gives us the Theme and Variations 1-5; D582, Variations 6-10. Presumably the remaining movements are on the way. I find the second of these two records far clearer than the first. However, the more I have to do with the gramophone the less dogmatic I am disposed to be. Records vary, and perhaps your D578 may be clearer than mine. Anyhow, the movements so far available have given me keen pleasure. The wonderful No. 7 (Troyte) retains an astonishing amount of the exciting quality that makes it one of the most stimulating things heard in the concert-room. The delicate Dorabella is also very successful. I should add that the performances are conducted by Sir Edward himself.

Saint-Saëns's popular G minor Concerto, played by Arthur de Greef and the Albert Hall Orchestra under Landon Ronald, is very successfully recorded on a couple of 12-in. d.s. No. D583 contains the first movement, and 584 the Scherzo and Finale. These two movements are amongst the best records of the brilliant type that I have come across.

Some composers 'record' well, just as do some singers. I have yet to hear an Edward German record that leaves much to be desired in the way of clearness. There is a reason for this, of course. German's music is not complex, and the scoring is of the right type for gramophone purposes—not too heavy and with plenty of telling passages for wood-wind. Well up to the standard is D 579, which bears on its two sides the Harvest Dance from The Seasons and the Valse Gracieuse from the Leeds Suite, with German conducting.

Chamber music is represented by D 502 and o8099. The former is a d.s. of the Largo from Haydn's D major Quartet (Op. 76, No. 3), and the Minuet and Trio from Beethoven's A major (Op. 18, No. 5), played by the Catterall Quartet. The latter is a single-sided record of the Minuet from Mozart's Quartet in E flat, the performers being the Elman Quartet. All these movements come out well. So far as musical interest is concerned, however, the truly delightful Mozart is easily first.

Those in want of good violin records will find them in D581 (Isolde Menges playing Rimsky-Korsakov's Hymn to the Sun and Tod Boyd's Serenade): 3-07947 (Heifetz at his best in Sarasate's Gipsy Airs): and 3-07941 (the same player excelling again in the Canzonetta from Tchaikovsky's Concerto).

Why does the gramophone apparently jib at contraltos? I have heard records of our finest voices of this type, but in every case the result has been more or less of a caricature. There is evidently something in the timbre of a contralto voice that adversely affects recording, just as the quality of some instruments is at present an obstacle to perfect results. This is very hard on contraltos, from the point of view of gramophone royalties. Galli-Curci may thank her lucky stars she is a soprano. The contrast between the recording of the soprano and contralto voices could not be better shown than by 04393, a record of I waited for the Lord, sung by Alma Gluck and Louise Homer. The soprano comes out beautifully, both as to tone and words, but the contralto is strident and indistinct. It is, as I suggested above, a matter of timbre rather than of compass, for the disparity is no less marked when the two voices are singing the same notes.

After all, it is not unnatural that as the flute is perhaps the best of all instruments for recording, the voice that most nearly approaches it in character should also be successful. Hence the success of clear sopranos. Appropriately, the next record I take up is one of Galli-Curci singing Io son Titania from Mignon, with orchestral accompaniment. It is a typical Galli-Curci success, and among its most delightful moments are those in which the flute is also prominent, especially a brief passage towards the end where singer and flautist do a little back-chat, so to speak. The passage is worth noting because both voice and instrument are using middle and low notes—further evidence that on the gramophone timbre counts far more than pitch.

Last, but a long way from least, is a record of Caruso in Rachel! quand du Seigneur la grâce tutélaire, from La Juive. Fine, but far too powerful for a small room. You will want a soft needle, and perhaps a cotton-wool buffer as well.

The Music Club is faced with financial difficulties owing to deficient membership, which has not yet recovered from the effect of war-time. The present membership of two hundred and fifty must be doubled if the Club's activities are to continue. No other organization can so fittingly perform the Music Club's task of giving social entertainment—representative of our musical world—to distinguished musicians from abroad or at home. The subscription is only two guineas for ordinary members and one guinea for professionals, and the hon. secretary is Mr. R. K. Farebrother, 10, Berners Street, W. 1.

Music in the Foreign Press

VIOLINS OLD AND NEW

Le Monde Musical (November) publishes an account of the competition which takes place every year at Paris in order to compare modern violins with well-known specimens by old masters:

Seven modern violins, selected by ballot out of twenty-three submitted, were pitted against one by Stradivarius, one by Amati, one by Guarnerius del Gesù, two by Guadagnini, and one by Maggini. The same piece was played twice on all by M. Alfred Brun, professor of violin at the Paris Conservatoire, under conditions which made it impossible for both performer and audience to identify the instruments. A select jury of thirteen violinists, among whom was M. Brun, awarded the first place to the Stradivarius with 66 points, the second to a modern violin by Le Lyonnois with 61 points, the third to a Guadagnini with 46 points, and the fourth to another modern violin by Joseph Aubry with 38 points. But the ballot in which the whole audience took part gave first place to Joseph Aubry's violin with 1,090 points, the second to Le Lyonnois's with 1,040, the third to the Stradivarius with 1,000 points, the fourth and fifth to the Guadagninis with 822 and 790 points respectively.

The result of the competition confirms what the previous competitions had shown. After making full allowance for possible irregularity in the playing and for other accidental factors, it would seem that even for expert violinists the difference between old instruments and new is comparatively small. Le Monde Musical recalls that at Berlin, in 1907, Jacques Thibaud and Kreisler were unable to tell the tone of their own violins (a Stradivarius and a Guarnerius) from that of a modern instrument. In the present case the jury comprised, besides M. Brun, M.M. Maurice Kayot, Joseph Debroux, and Caremboit Senior, the violin-maker. All four placed modern instruments above the old ones or on a par with them.

GREGORIAN SONG IN FRANCE

In Le Ménestrel (November 25) Louis Laloy comments upon the Pastoral Letter from Cardinal Dubois enjoining that no other Gradual and Antiphony be used in the diocese of Paris than those published by the Benedictines of the Isle of Wight (formerly of Solesmes):

In the course of the Middle Ages plainsong came into contact with polyphonic music and gradually deteriorated. The soli were curtailed, the vocalises reduced or suppressed, the rhythms reduced to symmetry, and the modes disfigured by the introduction of sharps or flats with a view to facilitate accompaniment by the organ. Those errors, embodied in the so-called Medicean edition of 1614, were propagated throughout the 17th and 18th centuries, until a climax was reached with the Ratisbonne (or Regensburg) edition in the 19th. It is to Dom Guéranger, Dom Pothier, and Dom Mocquereau that the return to genuine tradition is due. Cardinal Dubois's Pastoral Letter, enforcing the application of the principles promulgated by Pius X. in his Motu proprio of 1903, comes as a further recognition of the invaluable service rendered to Church music by the monks of Solesmes.

AN OLD ORGAN

Le Monde Musical (November) contains the description of an organ, supposed to have belonged to Rheims Cathedral, or, at least, to be quite similar to one which stood in the choir of that Cathedral until 1837. It is a chest of sculptured wood, 3-ft. high, 3½-ft. broad, and 5-ft. 4-in. long. The chest contains three hundred and forty-three pipes, divided into six stops.

LEFT

Coppel	...	8-ft. drone (wooden).
Flöte	...	4-ft. open (wooden).
Prinzipal	...	4-ft. diapason, first octave open (wooden), the remainder of metal.

RIGHT

Octave	...	2-ft. flute, open.
Quint	...	A Nazard, a fifth above the foregoing.
Mixtur	...	A double mixture stop, giving the ground-tone and fifth.

(Although the names are given in German, the instrument is not supposed to be of German manufacture.)

The keyboard comprises four octaves, from C to C. The pitch is normal, and the tone excellent.

MORE ABOUT THE FRENCH 'SIX'

In Musica d'Oggi (November) Henri Prunières writes:

The designation the 'Six' corresponds to nothing more than a label, a trade-mark for propaganda and advertisement purposes. Cocteau's manifesto, Le Coq et l'Arlequin, which is sometimes alleged to express the group's art theories, is at best a statement of Auric and Poulenc's views, coupled with Cocteau's own. Neither Milhaud, nor Honegger, nor Durey, nor Germaine Taillefer write music in conformity with Cocteau's tenets. Durey has withdrawn from the group, and the ideals of the remainder are so dissimilar, that one cannot help wondering whether others will not follow suit. On the other hand, composers such as Andrée Vaurabourg and Robert Casadesus are asserting tendencies similar to Honegger's and Milhaud's, so that the 'Six' can hardly be said to represent the whole of revolutionary tendencies in France. The group comprises at least one musician of uncommon merit—Honegger. Milhaud's music is a medley of excellent stuff and deplorably bad stuff. Poulenc is a born musician, as yet very immature. It is a pity that while such a fuss is being made around these 'Six,' other interesting musicians should remain ignored. For instance, Georges Migot, Roland Manuel, and, first and foremost, Charles Kœchlin.

HOW CONTEMPORARY MUSIC IS DIFFUSED

In the Zeitschrift für Musik (second November issue) Dr. Georg Göhler writes:

So far as contemporary music is concerned, even the educated musicians and music-lovers stand in need of expert professional guidance. What is it that plays the greatest part in bringing good new music to the buyers' notice? The composers generally believe that it is public performance. This may be true, to a degree, with regard to dramatic and symphonic works, but certainly not with regard to pianoforte pieces or songs. The best propaganda is that of the teacher who introduces modern works in his pupils' curriculum. The teacher may play an all-important part, and bears a heavy responsibility. It is a pity that among the best-known and most fashionable teachers, so many do not realise what their duty is in this respect, or lack the capacity to fulfil it. Many rely upon the old stock, and never think of teaching their pupils anything modern. The lack of enterprise and the ignorance of many retailers also does much harm. There should be in every big German town at least one retailing firm whose thoroughly competent staff would be able, not only to supply all information desired by customers, but eventually to direct their attention to the best in contemporary output.

These remarks may be found useful outside Germany.

AN OLD-TIME ORGANIST

In Il Pianoforte (November) Dino Sincero describes the life and activities of Francesco Landini (1325-97), the first of Italian organists.

ADOLF SCHREIBER

In Der Merker (November 15) L. Andro devotes a short article to ten songs by Adolf Schreiber recently published at Berlin:

Schreiber, we are told in a pamphlet by Max Brod, was born at Prague, and committed suicide at Berlin last year. His songs are described as instinct with delicate tenderness, proceeding from Brahms, but showing traces of more modern influences, and well worthy of attention. They are difficult, and call for the co-operation of a soulful singer and a responsive, poetically-gifted pianist. Many other songs by Schreiber remain unpublished, and he has left a number of bigger works, none of which has been published or performed.

M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

London Concerts

THE GOOSSENS CONCERTS

The third concert (November 23) opened with the Bach-Elgar Fugue, played twice, and much better the second time than the first. Quasi-novelties were Holbrook's The Wild Sea-Fowl and Cyril Scott's Aubade, the former showing Holbrooke at his best, the latter so uniformly grey as to suggest anything but the right kind of morning feeling. Manuel de Falla's three Dances from the Ballet El Amor Brujo were heard for the first time here, and proved to be as spicy and brilliant in rhythm as we expected. Debussy's Rondes de Printemps and Rimsky-Korsakov's Antar Symphony completed a fine programme, brilliantly played.

Bach opened the ball again on December 12 with the delightful Suite arranged by Sir Henry Wood from the organ works. John Ireland has so little orchestral work to his credit that more than ordinary interest attached to the first performance of his Symphonic Rhapsody. It has fine rhythmical energy, and is full of the bracing roughness that marks his works generally. The middle section left us doubtful. Was the writing for the brass too consistently chordal and heavy, or did the playing make it seem so? The composer had a hearty reception. The interest in Malipiero's Oriente Imaginario, three studies for small orchestra, lay in the manner rather than in the matter. Stravinsky's Symphony for wind instruments, in memory of Debussy, and Le Sacre du Printemps, were the other items. The former gave us one more acute reason for regretting the French composer's death. It was received with rapture by the left wing of the audience. The right as a whole refrained from unseemly demonstration during its performance, only a few members coughing richly from time to time. The centre party found the work dry and monotonous—the unforgivable sin in music. We can, and do, endure and even enjoy the extremest of dissonance: the Wind Instrument Symphony will be a failure not because it is discordant but because it is dull to a degree attainable only by one of the despised classical composers on his offest of off-days. H. G.

LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

At the concert on November 28 interest was centred in Elgar's Falstaff. Mr. Coates gave a performance that made the most of the purple patches at the expense of the work as a whole. Its success with the audience, however, was unmistakable, and composer and conductor were called and recalled. Falstaff seems at last likely to take the place so long denied it. The rest of the programme consisted of Leonora No. 3, Rachmaninov's C minor Concerto (M. Pouishnov), and Scriabin's Divine Poem.

On December 5 a choral concert drew a crowded house. The Brahms Requiem and the Grail Scene from Parsifal at a sitting proved somewhat heavy fare. A group of small unaccompanied items would have provided the necessary relief, and would have enabled us to estimate the quality of the choir in a way that no work with orchestra can do—especially when the scoring is so persistent and aggressive as that of the Requiem. The classical composers and the worst type of organist join hands in their refusal to drop the accompaniment at times and give the voices a chance. These Philharmonic singers have decidedly 'come on.' They are alert, prompt in attack, and excellent in tone. The soloists were Miss Dorothy Silk, Mr. Herbert Heyner, and Mr. Norman Allin.

C. W.

Photo by)

GUSTAV HOLST

(Sydney J. Loch

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY

Mr. Gustav Holst lives and works hard in the heart of London, and yet manages to be a recluse. Outside his special haunts—Hammersmith, the R.C.M., and Waterloo Road—he is personally unknown, and he is the last man in the world to court Press notoriety. It speaks then remarkably for his music, that—even when quite new, like his ballet music The Perfect Fool (Philharmonic Society, December 11)—it 'goes home' not only with the knowing few but also with the bulk of an audience who mostly need some personal clue to the bearings of a new composer. Anyhow, The Perfect Fool brought Mr. Holst pretty well as much recognition as came to the hero of the evening's Concerto (the hero, the admirable Pablo Casals; the Concerto, Schumann's Op. 129). The ballet comes from an opera, we hear, a comic opera—but more we are left interestedly guessing. But with a number in it like this—quite on the bravest, soaring Russian scale—it must be a sort of its own. The brass first utters an unaccompanied Invocation, an utterance that runs through the three dances of Spirits of Earth, Water, and Fire. These are Holst in his full maturity of power, vitality, and invention. The mastery of it showed up crudities and 'holes' in the scoring of Victor de Sabato's symphonic poem Juventus, which indeed was palpably young. It was worth having, as earnest of the new Italians' brave intentions, though it did not outshine a good many of the doings at our Patron's Fund Rehearsals. Mr. Albert Coates conducted.

OTHER ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

The Queen's Hall Orchestra gave a symphony concert under Sir Henry Wood on November 19, with Heldenleben and Casals in a Haydn Concerto as matters of greatest importance. At the Robert Newman benefit concert of December 3 there was great violin playing by M. Toscha Seidel.

Mr. Edward Clark has opened a series of orchestral programmes at the Lyric Theatre, Hammersmith, which, to judge from the empty seats, are rather too 'classy' for the neighbourhood.

Mr. Adrian C. Boult's Sunday afternoon concerts at the People's Palace have run their excellent course, although the necessary rule of crowded houses has not been observed. On November 27 the symphony was Schubert's C major and the British work Holst's Beni-Mora. Strauss's Don Quixote was given on December 11, with Bliss's Mêlée Fantastique and a work by Frederick Laurence.

W. MCN.

THE NOVELLO CHOIR

The concert given by the above choir, on December 13, provided an object-lesson of what can be accomplished by any choir which has the good fortune to be directed by a conductor of knowledge, enthusiasm, and taste. The choir itself consists obviously of average elements, yet from it were drawn effects that would have done credit to a body of far longer standing and greater pretensions. It is true that the acoustics of Bishopsgate Institute, where the concert was held, are specially good—perhaps better than those of any other hall in London—and this may have covered defects that would have been apparent elsewhere; but, as I heard it, I thoroughly enjoyed the performance of Mr. Harold Brooke and his singers.

The programme, one of quite rare distinction, included Sweetinck's Hodie, Madrigals by Weelkes and Wilbye, a Ballet of Morley (sung with engaging lightness), folk-song arrangements by Vaughan Williams (in one of these, Just as the tide was flowing, the rhythm was badly held up by over-expression of the words—almost the only instance of misjudgment that I observed), a cantata, God so loved, of Bach, and the Choral Fantasy on old carols, Christmas Day, by Holst.

Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Joseph Farrington lent valuable assistance as soloists. Miss Marguerite Swale was an excellent accompanist, and at the organ Mr. Harvey Grace provided occasional support and played solos. C. K. S.

THE BACH CHOIR

The opening concert of the forty-sixth season (December 14) found Dr. Vaughan Williams in charge for the first time. Three of the Church cantatas, Jesus took unto Him the Twelve, Stay with us, and The Sages of Sheba—formed the bulk of the programme, and showed us a side of Bach that is still too little known. There were no thunders or hammer strokes, but much quiet beauty. The choir after a rather tame start gave some excellent soft and mezzo-forte singing, and the longer the concert went on the better they sang. The instrumental side consisted of the genial fifth Brandenburg Concerto (Harold Samuel, W. H. Reed, and Daniel Wood), the E major French Suite (Harold Samuel), and an Organ Prelude (Harold Darke). The vocal soloists were Miss Lilian Berger, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. Clive Carey. H. G.

ORIANA CHRISTMAS CONCERT

The Oriana Madrigal Society, at its Christmas concert (Æolian Hall, December 15) seemed to have more than recovered from the general choral set-back of the dark years. The singing and the music that was sung were a pure refreshment to ears that, anticipating respite after three crowded months of concerts, might perhaps have been excused a certain jadedness towards any music whatsoever. Such music—Byrd's from the past, Holst's from the present—offered (with so much else) a reminder of one sure dwelling-place of the spirit of the art, which often, it must be allowed, appears to have fled from the main machinery of instrumental performances. The programme, the order of which again bore evidence of Mr. Kennedy Scott's fine taste, was sung through entirely by heart. The great Byrd was on the first page with three motets, Cast off all doubtful care, the Lullaby which is coming to be quite often sung, and then the grandly affirmative and exultant This Day Christ was born (six parts, from the 1611 book). Holst's Ave Maria (women's voices, eight parts) was one of the composer's first strong proofs of genius, and one can bear testimony that its manifold beauties have overcome the ordeal of a score of hearings at a competitive festival. The Oriana women's voices gave it the tone both rich and clear of a Tuscan altar-piece. Holst's Four Songs from a Mediæval Anthology, for voice and violin, were sung with rare truth by Miss Norah Scott Turner, only the violin line in Jesu sweet should have been firmer.

There were arrangements of old carols, both devout and jolly, by Vaughan Williams, Geoffrey Shaw, Kennedy Scott, and W. G. Whittaker, belonging to that body of new English part-songs which are not unworthy of the land that produced the madrigalists of 1600. Corpus Christi carol was by Peter Warlock, a newcomer, we fancy, in this field. His ancient text is sung by contralto and tenor solos, accompanied wordlessly by the chorus. Imagination was felt to be in the work, and also musical cunning. The mysterious text in itself approaches music, so evocative is it with the vaguest of verbal information; and the actual music with its latter-day methods managed to enhance its 'Gothic' mysteriousness. C.

OTHER CHORAL CONCERTS

In The Music-makers and The Golden Legend on November 26, the Royal Choral Society seemed determined to give of its best for the sake of Mr. H. L. Balfour, who was conducting in the place of Sir Frederick Bridge. There was some sensitive singing in Elgar's work, and the choir's volume of tone did good service in Sullivan's. The solo parts were taken by Miss Doris Vane, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Walter Hyde, and Mr. Charles Tree.

Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society, under Mr. Allen Gill, did excellent work in Judith at the Northern Polytechnic on November 26. The choral singers seemed thoroughly familiar with the music, some of which is by no means easy.

Ealing Philharmonic Society (Mr. E. Victor Williams) opened its season with two performances of Elijah, on November 28.

The London Choral Society (Mr. Arthur Fagge) did strenuous work at Queen's Hall on November 30. The singers vociferated Burns for a hundred pages, in Mr. J. St. A. Johnson's setting of Tam o' Shanter. The task was hopeless. No choir or composer can do anything with such words. King Olaf followed.

The Crystal Palace Choral and Orchestral Society (Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock) has given Tom Jones and a miscellaneous programme. The latter—on December 10—included Wilbye's Sweet Honey-sucking Bees and Bach's Sleepers, wake.

M.

TO THE GLORY OF WILLIAM BYRD

When Dr. Fellowes put forth the three volumes of Byrd last year in his English Madrigal School (Stainer & Bell), we sanguinely hoped to see the fame of the old master—'never without reverence to be named of the musicians'—spread about like wild-fire. It has not happened quite so quickly, but the good work is on the way. The sextet of English Singers (Æolian Hall, November 30), chose motets and madrigals from the 1588 and 1611 collections, singing as they sat round a table, one voice to a part; absolute music! There would be much to say of details in the execution (good, and now and again touching on perfect felicity), but an urgent point is that this sort of thing be done more and more widely, even though with less accomplishment. This way music lies! It means the refinement of ear and brain, of the senses and the sensibility; it is the music of the sacred grove, which will give us the measure of the battering music of the circus.

Pure polyphony on this evening was relieved by dainty accompanied duets gathered from Purcell's garden, and by some of those modern English arrangements of folk-songs as unaccompanied part-songs—the happiest form, no doubt, into which our folk-songs can be cast, a form in which men like Holst, Vaughan Williams, and Whittaker, have done the jolliest, most cunning, and engaging things, like music of no other time or clime. C.

THE TUDOR SINGERS

A new group of performers, who are to be thanked for steering clear of the average recital rut. As an ensemble they are not uniformly good, and confirm the view that it's better to have one exclusively composed of category D singers than one which ranges over the alphabet.

Space demands a concise boiling-down of impressions: the over-weighting of the strings in the Byrd carol (what a lovely 'Amen' this work has!); the feeling that an immense amount of spade-work will have to be done before the madrigal makes its right appeal to a modern audience—and that far less conventional methods will have to be employed; that Mr. Gerald Cooper has found his true vocation as a harpsichord player; the unfairness of inserting Eine kleine Nachtmusik in the middle of things; Holst's lovely arrangement of a folk-song (I sowed the seeds of love), and the bottomless stupidity of another (Bobby Shaftoe's gone to Sea), which, of course, had to be repeated.

A separate and concluding paragraph for the Bach Chorale, Awake us, Lord, we pray Thee, from Cantata No. 22. Mr. Anthony Bernard, whose string orchestra accompanied, set much too fast a pace for my liking. Perhaps he felt it that way. This is one of those perfect creations where tempo markings avail nothing. Five interpreters might interpret in five different ways and all be right. The spirit endureth.

R. L.

MR. JOHN COATES

Even our enemies—perhaps, indeed, they more particularly—have recognised a fundamental national attribute of ours which, for want of a better word, we term 'humour.' Nothing, it appears, can uproot the British propensity to make play with the events of life—at a pinch, with death itself. Our fine frenzies are finest when they contain an element which, if it does not appear as comedy, at least bears witness to a keen sense of proportion. The existence of this trait is not a convenient theory, but a fact within the cognisance of all in everyday life as we live it. We are intolerant of the 'solemn ass.'

Some such reflections emerge on a leisurely consideration of both the matter and the manner of Mr. John Coates's English song recitals at Chelsea Town Hall. At the earlier ones, devoted to contemporary products, one could not always smother a sneaking suspicion that it was the gift of comedy, or proportion, or what you will, in the singer alone which lifted some numbers out of the ruck of asinine solemnity. Deficiencies of proportion, let alone humour, one felt, might have been conspicuous on dispassionate analysis of the material. They lacked flesh and blood. It was far otherwise when he came to deal, on December 1, with the period 'Purcell to Parry.' The very absence of the suspicion confirmed its previous substantiality, though, in instituting comparisons, allowances must be made for the fact that the twenty songs heard on this occasion were the cream of two and a half centuries. The peculiar facility which this singer possesses of placing his mind on intimate terms with those of his hearers was given full rein, and a degree of entertainment succeeded for which profound is not an extravagant term. One felt that one was listening to the very voice of Britain. What more typical and succinct expressions of the national views on sentiment could be found than Henry Purcell's Knottling Song ('Phyllis, without a frown or smile, sat and knotted all the while') in one manner; John Blow's setting of Edmund Waller's The Self-Banished in another; the immortal Drink to me only with thine eyes; Linley's Autolycus' Song from Shakespeare's Winter's Tale, or Parry's Take, oh take those lips away? But these are all love songs. True. The fact is that Mr. John Coates is adept in every shade of the philosophy of love, and beguiles us into thinking that he is illustrating for us in a comprehensive fashion every phase of life. And who shall say that he is not justified? Is it not our own proverb that says 'It's love that makes the world go round'? Mr. Berkeley Mason's accompaniments were, as ever, masterly in their aptitude and flexibility.

H. F.

MISS STELLA MURRAY

Miss Stella Murray (Æolian Hall, December 3), a contralto from New Zealand, lately a pupil of Mr. Plunket Greene, gave peculiar joy to the listener who in these days pretty well abandons hope at a singer's 'first appearance.' Here was a voice, not prodigious but certainly full enough, truly even, and above all animated, flexible—not always lolling back in the usual contralto divan. Here, too, was a vivacious understanding, giving an intelligible picture to each song. Monteverdi, Dvorák, and some German songs were sung in English, English that really was acceptable as such. Mr. Harold Craxton left his accustomed place as accompanist for a few moments, and played some solos—Purcell and Arne. The playing was exquisite, matching the music. This is a field—old English harpsichord music—which Mr. Craxton is clearly called to cultivate further. He has it almost to himself, and he proves himself the right man.

C.

MISS DOROTHY SILK

Miss Dorothy Silk (soprano) has given 'concerts of old music' at Steinway Hall (November 19 and December 10), and more are to come—'old' music in one sense, no doubt, but the inherent youth of much of it, of Dowland, of Purcell's Expostulation of the Blessed Virgin, of Bach, really overrode the pedantic facts of date. Pepusch, of Beggar's Opera fame, of whom Mr. John Goss sang a solo cantata, is, on the other hand, old, and probably always was; a vieille perruque. Miss Silk's singing commands the regard of the musical—fine, dainty singing, the silvery utterance of a rare instrument. We applaud Mr. Goss's intelligence, and wish his technique matched hers. Mrs. Gordon Woodhouse's consummate playing of Bach (B flat Partita) on the harpsichord made an exquisite interlude at the second concert.

C.

MISS URSULA GREVILLE'S CONCERT

Miss Greville sung with notable skill and taste at Queen's Hall (December 16) in an exacting programme that included the Queen of the Night air, from the Magic Flute, Bliss's Rhapsody for soprano, tenor (Mr. John Coates), and orchestra, and airs from Le Coq d'Or and Stravinsky's Rossignol. Her voice and style, however, are better suited by smaller and more intimate surroundings; Queen's Hall and an orchestra were occasionally too much for her. Ansermet gave us some of the most vivid and finished orchestral playing heard in London for many a long day. A new work by Honegger, Horace Victorieux, was heard—probably outside as well as inside the hall, so noisy was it. But it had at least one merit lacking in post-Sacre Stravinsky—it was very much alive, even though it showed the fact by the primitive process of kicking.

H. G.

OTHER VOCALISTS

Among the other vocalists one remembers, first and foremost, Mr. Plunket Greene in Dichterliebe and songs of Stanford, and Miss Olga Haley in Lieder and new English songs. Mr. George Baker takes high rank with his two recitals, and Mr. Gale Gardner showed gifts as a refined singer of English song. He introduced some new songs, with violin accompaniment, by Miss Phyllis Norman-Parker. One of these, A Sussex baby-song, is a gem. Madame Lily Payling had the advantage of accompaniment by Mr. Landon Ronald and his orchestra at the Royal Albert Hall on December 3. Others who have made good are Miss Una Bates and Miss Dorothy Moulton.

CHAMBER CONCERTS

The Catterall Quartet played Novacek, Howells, and Beethoven for the London Chamber Concert Society on November 22. A week later the Allied String Quartet gave Quartets of Ravel and d'Indy. At this concert M. Louis Aubert accompanied Mlle. Radiana Pazmoy in his rather superficial Six Poèmes Arabes.

The Classical Concert Society brought M. Siloti, Madame Adila Fachiri, and Mr. Felix Salmond together in two Trios at Wigmore Hall on November 29. All individualists, they made an excellent ensemble. The London Trio has played Ravel and Schumann in D minor. The Philharmonic Society Quartet continues to make Chelsea its centre.

The new Kruse String Quartet opened a series at Wigmore Hall on December 10. Prof. Kruse, a colleague of Joachim, will be remembered by some as one of London's musical leaders for many years.

VIOLINISTS

Close upon Mr. Sammons's interpretation of the Elgar Concerto came Kreisler's, on December 6. If one had not heard the first, he might never have felt a lack of warmth in the second. Kreisler gave superb violin playing and a beautiful exterior to the music. The Englishman was more intimate. A word of praise is due to Mr. Landon Ronald for his sensitive accompaniment to Kreisler's interpretation. Kreisler was at the Royal Albert Hall on December 11, and added a recital at Queen's Hall on December 16.

Among the violinists—apart from Kreisler—Mlle. Jelly d'Aranyi and her sister, Madame Fachiri, take precedence. Both gave recitals at Wigmore Hall, and showed that all-round faculty that will bring out all that a mercurial modern work contains and the next moment play pure Bach.

PIANISTS

Cortôt's playing of the Chopin Etudes at Wigmore Hall on November 26 was illuminating. It showed that these works could be greatly admired for half a life-time and still be incompletely understood. No other pianist from abroad has made such an impression as this during the month, although the closing recitals of Rosenthal's series fall within the period. Siloti gave an improvised pianoforte recital at Wigmore Hall on December 7 while the audience was waiting for a belated Casals to appear. When the violoncellist did arrive (an hour late) he played superbly. The afternoon was good value for money. Three recitals by Mr. Walter Rummel have shown his waywardness—a clever pianist, apt to reduce music to noise. Mr. Ralph Lawton, at two recitals, proved that he has far greater claims on the public than it acknowledges.

Of our own pianists Howard-Jones has been the most conspicuous, for he gave a notable performance of John Ireland's Sonata (the one which Lamond first produced) at Wigmore Hall on December 1.

There has been the delight of a recital by Harold Samuel—Beethoven, Schubert and Bach; Mr. Edward Mitchell has been steadily working through Scriabin at Central Hall, Westminster; Mr. Lamond introduced some typical Reger to a fairly small audience at Queen's Hall, in the form of Variations and Fugue on a theme of Bach, Op. 81.

Ireland's For Remembrance and Amberley will brooks, and J. B. McEwen's Vignettes pleased everybody as played by Miss Joyce Ansell on December 1. Miss Freda Cahill, on the same day, showed her liking for modern pianoforte music, English and foreign.

VARIOUS

For violoncello music we have been dependent upon, chiefly, Casals, M. Salmon, with his revived old music, and Miss Beatrice Harrison with a new Sonata by York Bowen (in F major). Almost a new-comer, Miss Marie Dare showed promise high above the average at Æolian Hall on December 6. She was completely at ease in Elgar's Concerto.

M.

Opera in London

BY FRANCIS E. BARRETT

CARL ROSA EXPERIMENTS: GILBERT AND SULLIVAN REVIVAL

On December 10 the Carl Rosa Company brought to a close what Mr. Alfred van Noorden in a valedictory speech described as 'the longest and most ambitious season of opera in English ever given at Covent Garden.' I fear, nevertheless, that no new ground has been broken. The season has shown that the public are quite ready to support opera in English, and by the public I mean those who come from the great majority and fill the upper circle and gallery night after night. This is the section of the public it is necessary to reach, and the Company may claim to have reached them, save when the bill was completely filled by an unfamiliar work, when the paying factor was not well represented. Still, as things are, we cannot expect miracles.

The features of the eight weeks' season have been the special performances of Wagnerian operas, including the major portion of the Ring and some not very well-guided endeavours to augment the répertoire. Three such examples have been seen. One was The Angelus, by Dr. E. W. Naylor, which gained the Ricordi prize twelve years ago, and was produced at Covent Garden; another was a short affair, Thais and Talmaa, composed by Mr. Colin M. Campbell, and the third, La Chant Fatal, by M. Georges D'Orlay. In turn they represent the cantata, the extended duet, and the illustrated, orchestral tone-poem; not one of them is an opera. Indeed, it is difficult to see how the British composer can learn what operatic style is since he hears so little opera, so it is not fair to blame him exclusively. Had Dr. Naylor's music, for example, been set to illustrate an English country-side story it might have passed muster, but as an illustration of a theme dealing with monks, magic herbs, visions, and mysteries, the whole tinged with the atmosphere of a religion that is not now the common religion of the English people, it misses its point. Mr. Campbell's work shows ability somewhat misdirected if he imagines that a prolonged duet in semi-darkness constitutes an opera. The effort of M. D'Orlay had been heard before in concert form. It does not improve by being transferred to the stage, for though he can make his music boil in a way that might make it operatic, he can command no intermediary stages. He either gives us the coldest of cold water in the shape of commonplace tune that sounds like a Viennese waltz played too slowly, or he rants and roars in the manner of Strauss made familiar in his tone-poems. I am convinced that an English opera to succeed must deal with an English subject.

A NEW DON GIOVANNI

Actually the most satisfactory piece of work in the direction of grand opera during the month has come from the Old Vic., in the form of a new English version of Mozart's Don Giovanni. It has been made by Mr. E. J. Dent, and the new form his enthusiasm for Mozart opera takes is particularly helpful. He has given a version of Da Ponte's book that can be understood by all. The effect is to make all the characters very much more like human beings, and to lead to an understanding of the story and therefore an appreciation of the music. As part of this new and helpful version the original Finale after the death of the Don is restored. Its effect is to remove the element of tragedy from what is in reality a comic opera. With the assistance of Mr. Clive Carey as producer and as the Don, Miss Vallings, Miss Winifred Kennard, Miss Muriel Gough, Mr. Sumner Austin, Mr. Arnold Beauvais, and Mr. S. Harrison, the production was received with delight by the audience, and their enjoyment, I felt, arose from the fact that for once they really understood what the opera was 'all about.'

SULLIVAN'S FIRST OPERA

A feature of the much-appreciated performance of the Gilbert and Sullivan operas at the Princes Theatre was the revival, on November 28, of Sullivan's first opera, Cox and Box, written to Burnand's version of the famous farce. It was vastly appreciated, and everything was done by the exponents to win that approval. Mr. Sydney Granville as Cox, Mr. Leo Darnott as Box, and Mr. Darrell Fancourt as Bouncer, played the piece in the right spirit. It is interesting to note in the music the promise of the individuality that was afterwards to expand to such a wonderful vein. All there is of the later Sullivan is an occasional rhythm that was individual and the use of the chord of 6-4-2, which was in later years to become a hall-mark. In all else there is nothing to show that it is the work of the composer of The Mikado. The style freely parodies that of Italian opera of the day with which, as we know, Sullivan had a very intimate acquaintance, since he once held the position of organist at the Royal Italian opera. The audience took to the piece most kindly, and I do not blame them, since melody is becoming a more precious thing every day. The Sorcerer followed, so that there was an evening of early Sullivan, and one greatly appreciated. The following week The Yeomen of the Guard was put on, to the delight of a succession of crowded audiences, and at Christmas came The Mikado. In connection with these works I should like to mention—although really it is out of my province—the issue of an excellent little work, Gilbert and Sullivan Opera: A History and a Comment, by H. M. Walbrook. It was just what was wanted at this time, when there are so many new adherents to the Savoy colours, and it has just the intimate touch that gives a new complexion to an old story. A Foreword, by Sir Henry Wood, hits the nail on the head, and I hope that some of the fingers of some of our 'moderns' may be imposed between that nail and Sir Henry's hammer. It will do them good.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players. We shall be glad if those making use of the scheme will let us know when their announcements have borne fruit. Failing such notice, advertisements will be inserted three times.

Accompanist (lady) would like to practise with singer or violinist. London, S.W. district preferred.—M. G. H., c/o Musical Times.

Gentleman pianist wishes to meet three or four stringed instrumentalists with view to mutual practice of advanced chamber music.—L. R. A. M., c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist and viola players are invited to join a musical party (voices and strings). Rehearsal, Thursdays, 7-9. Central London.—Apply, 'ENTRE NOUS,' 43, Great Russell Street, W.C.1.

Soprano and tenor required for small party on quartet basis, with own orchestra. Practice room, New Oxford Street, Thursday evenings.—Write secretary, 12, Sandmere Road, S.W.4.

Lady pianist would like to meet 'cellist and violinist for practice.—L. B. B., 24, Acol Road, West Hampstead, N.W.6.

Pianist desires to meet violinist in Beaconsfield or Gerrard's Cross district for practice of violin sonatas, &c., classical and modern.—'DIGIT,' c/o Musical Times.

Young enthusiast would be glad to meet instrumentalists with a view to forming small orchestra. Rehearsals could be held at Slough or Windsor.—'DATCHET,' c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist. Good amateur wanted to join violinist and pianist for the practice of trios, classical and modern.—G. F. H., 224, Reddings Lane, Hall Green, Birmingham.

Amateur orchestra would welcome string and wood instruments at a South London Parish Church. Practice and one service weekly.—S. C. C., 59, Waleran Buildings, Old Kent Road, S.E.1.

Gentleman, baritone, would be glad to meet a capable pianist (gentleman) for mutual practice in Manchester or Hightown districts.—S. CARLTON, 57, Peter Street, Hightown, Manchester.

Violinist, violist, and harpist would give services. Church, orchestral, or chamber music.—Address, S. B. S., 6, Hauberk Road, London, S.W.11.

Lady pianist would be glad to meet capable violinist and 'cellist for chamber music practice.—Miss RITZ, L.R.A.M., 266, Elgin Avenue, W.9.

B. W. A. (North Finchley) is fond of playing pianoforte accompaniments, and would be glad to meet a singer (amateur or professional) for the purpose.—B. W. A., c/o Musical Times.

Amateur Orchestral Society in North London (Stoke Newington and Clapton) has vacancies for good instrumentalists. Second season commenced Monday, October 24.—Write for particulars to A. W. ROBINSON, 113, Brooke Road, N.16.

Orchestra (Brixton Brotherhood). There are vacancies for all stringed instruments, and cornet, flute, clarinet, and oboe. Rehearsals on Thursday evenings at 8 o'clock, St. Matthew's Church Schools, Church Road, Brixton, commenced October 27.—Apply, E. G. MEDLEY, Free Press Office, Brixton Road, S.W.

Amateur solo violinists and amateur orchestras required to co-operate in musical recitals at St. John's, Clapham Rise, on the second Sunday evening in each month and on the last Monday evening of each winter month.—WALLACE G. BREACH, organist and choirmaster, 42, Honeybrook Road, S.W. 12.

Pianist, Leeds district, desires to meet violinist for practice of classical sonatas, &c., or vocalist for practice of classical songs, Wolf, Schubert, &c.—A. F., c/o Musical Times.

Ladies and gentlemen, all instruments, with good orchestral experience, are invited to attend the symphony rehearsals held every Tuesday, at 7.30 p.m., at the Philological College, 248, Marylebone Road, N.W. (near Great Central Station).—EDWIN C. WHITE, Principal.

Claremont Orchestra. — Required immediately, leading violin, 'cello, double-bass, brass, and wood-wind.—Write, V. B., 34, Frances Street, Battersea, S.W. 11.

Soprano singer, having recently studied in Italy, would be glad to meet accompanist for mutual study. Manchester or Altrincham district.—B. H., c/o Musical Times.

Mezzo-soprano, with some professional experience, would like to meet accompanist for practice. Crystal Palace district.—F. C. W., c/o Musical Times.

A string orchestra is being formed at the Working Men's College, Crowndale Road, Camden Town (near Mornington Crescent tube station, Hampstead Railway). Players of all string instruments are required; rehearsals will commence in the middle of January on Thursday evenings, 7.30-10.—Mr. WALTER YEOMANS, Director of Music Studies, Working Men's College, Crowndale Road, N.W.

Young tenor wishes to meet a good pianist, lady or gentleman, for mutual practice. S.W. district preferred.—H. M. W., c/o Musical Times.

Violinist wanted to form trio or quartet to play chamber music. S.E. London district.—C. B., c/o Musical Times.

Wanted for Sunday evenings during the musical service, good amateur musicians (two violins, viola, and violoncello) to form a string quartet for Whitefield's Church, Tottenham Court Road, W. 1.—Apply, SPENCER SHAW, 690, Barking Road, Plaistow, E. 13.

South Hampstead and St. John's Wood, N.W. There are vacancies for good amateur instrumentalists in the Amateur Orchestral Society. Meetings on Thursday evenings in the Lecture Hall of the New College Chapel, Adelaide Road entrance. Low fees. Music provided.—Apply, WATSON HARDING, 6A, Upper Park Road, N.W. 3.

Church and Organ Music

MODERN ORGAN MUSIC

The Yorkshire Post of December 8 contained a long letter from Mr. H. Mathias Turton on the above subject. Mr. Turton says a good many things that need saying, so we quote the following passages :

Probably one of the strongest reasons why organ recitals are not very popular is that, whilst the audience at a concert is able to see the actual performance of a pianist or violinist, it is a rare thing to find the console of an organ sufficiently visible to allow any considerable view of the operations of the performer. There are probably scores of musical people at Leeds who have not the slightest idea that an organist has a keyboard on the floor of his instrument, on which he plays with his feet. The modern concert organist has, as a regular thing, to play highly elaborate and extremely rapid pedal passages which would tax a moderately good pianist to play with his left hand.

This ignorance of the public as to the technical demands of organ playing seems incredible, but it is true. When Mr. Pattman and his organ made their first appearance at the Coliseum a few years ago, the writer heard amazed comments all round, such as : 'Oh, look ! he's playing with his feet,' 'He plays on two or three keyboards at the same time,' and so on. And probably most organists have taken uninitiated musical friends to their console, and have been amused at the surprise with which the uninitiated beheld rapid pedalling and stop-control.

The reasons for the lack of understanding and appreciation of the organ, compared with that of other solo instruments, are well put by Mr. Turton :

A century ago, the violin, as an instrument, was exactly what we see it to-day ; the pianoforte (thanks to such artist-manufacturers as our English Broadwood) was quickly approaching the instrument so familiar to all of us as the 'household orchestra' ; but the organ (from a mechanical point of view) was an unwieldy, clumsy, and hopelessly inartistic thing. On the Continent, especially in Germany, the art of organ-building had already reached considerable heights, and it is to this fact that we owe that amazing series of preludes and fugues, choral preludes, &c., which the mighty genius of J. S. Bach (1685-1750) gave to the world of music. We English people are so deliciously and absurdly conservative in our opinions that we often still think of the organ as a sort of religious machine, which patiently draws out Psalms and hymns on Sundays, not realising (as the Americans and the French have long since done) that it is really an instrument capable of affording an almost unlimited variety of tone and colour. It is safe to say that the art of the organist has simply leapt forward during the last three or four decades.

The repertory of the organ is often underrated merely because such composers as Beethoven and Wagner wrote nothing for the instrument. On this point, Mr. Turton says :

Some few years ago the well-known musical critic of the Yorkshire Post remarked, in one of his weekly articles, that 'very few composers of the highest class had written much organ music.' Possibly they were deterred by the inadequacy of the instrument as a means of expression (in performance). With the aforementioned improvements in mechanical construction we find to-day (especially amongst the French composers) a real desire to make up for lost time, and several musicians of the highest powers are writing organ works of a calibre not one whit inferior to the best work of composers for any other instrument, or combination of instruments. As an instance, the four Organ Symphonies of Louis Vierne show a command and knowledge of the resources of tonal art which place him at once amongst the great composers of our time. Incidentally they make tremendous demands on the executant, but their remarkable difficulty is quickly forgotten in the superlative beauty of the music itself. The music is not for the people whose idea of an organ performance is bounded by the excitement of 'Storms at Sea' (and elsewhere), with hymns for safe deliverance from same (usually tootled out on the vox humana stop), patrols, Russian, Turkish, and other varieties, things which artistically are on a par with the Maiden's Prayer and the Battle of Prague. No, the fact is that we have not discovered as yet that the organ (given, of course, a good instrument) is a solo instrument par excellence, and that there is a wealth of organ music of the highest class which ought to be heard, but is not.

As to players :

There are great concert organists (to mention off-hand such names as Lemare, Goss-Custard, Bonnet, Dupré, and Vierne) whose musical equipment is quite equal to that of great concert performers on other instruments.

This country is exceptionally rich in fine organ soloists at present. One need not think very hard to be able to add to the English names in Mr. Turton's group. There are Ley, Cunningham, Wolstenholme, Hollins, Ellingford, Darke, Walton, and others, who would take a place by pianists and fiddlers of high rank but for the fact that they do their splendid work out of sight, and on an instrument about which most people know very little.

There can be no doubt that the organ, its players, and its music, are more honoured in France than in England, despite the fact that fine organs and organists are far more plentiful on this side of the Channel. Mr. Turton, after speaking of the excellence of the French school, says :

It is sincerely to be hoped that no one will see in this letter any attempt to extol French composers or organists at the expense of the English or other schools. No one rejoices more than the writer to see the younger school of English composers giving some attention to the organ. . . . We cannot, however, ignore the fact that France is leading the way at present in organ composition, and it would simply be absurd willfully to close our eyes to the immense importance of the organ music that is coming to us from France.

An excellent letter concludes with a word which we hope critics will take to heart :

One cannot see why there should be any greater sign of genius or musical culture in a new quartet or piano-forte work than in a new work for the organ ; but until English writers on matters musical are ready to estimate the musical value of new organ compositions in precisely the same degree, and with the warmly appreciative attitude they display towards the work of a new composer in any other branch of the art, so long will the great musical public remain unaware of what is being accomplished in the world of organ composition and organ playing.

VOLUNTARIES IN PARIS CHURCHES

Our readers may be interested in the following list of voluntaries played by the Paris organists on two recent Sundays (November 2 and December 4) :

La Trinité (Charles Quef)—Two Chorale Preludes, Bach.

St. Pierre de Montrouge (M. Blazy)—Choral No. 2, Frank ; Prelude in G, Bach ; Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach.

St. Elizabeth (M. R. Blin)—Toccata in D minor, Blin.

St. Charles de Monceau (M. E. Lacroix)—Prelude, Fugue, and Variation, Frank ; Prelude, Samazeuilh ; Prelude, Boëllmann ; Pièce, Palestrina ; Pièce, Laparra ; Communion, Gigout ; Sortie, Saint-Saëns.

St. Steverin (M. Lambert-Monchagne)—Prelude, Clérambault ; Pastorale, Frank ; Imploration (from ten new pieces), Dubois ; Finale from fourth Sonata, de la Tombelle ; Benediction Nuptiale, Dubois ; ' Sur un thème Breton,' Ropartz ; Elévation et Marche Religieuse, Saint-Saëns.

St. Ferdinand des Ternes (M. Georges Jacob)—Toccata, Mérule ; Concerto in D minor, Handel ; Invocation, Menuetto, and Finale from first Symphony, Guilmant.

This list confirms an impression we have long had—that French organists draw very little on the music of other countries. Bach seems to be the only German organ composer for whom they have any use. One could hardly expect Reger to appeal to them, but the pick of Rheinberger and Karg-Elert is surely worth their attention. And it will have been observed that Bonnet and Dupré, when touring in this country, play no English organ music save a few short pieces by such old composers as Byrd or Purcell—works which, strictly speaking, are not real organ music, being written indifferently for any keyboard instrument.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

The distribution of diplomas by the president, Dr. Charles Macpherson, to the successful candidates for Fellowship and Associateship will take place on Saturday, January 21, at 11 o'clock. Members and friends are cordially invited to attend. No tickets are required.

A Festival service under the auspices of the Canterbury Diocesan Choral Union was held at All Saints' Church, Maidstone, on November 12, two hundred and sixty choristers taking part. The responses were sung in the original version of Thomas Tallis in five parts ; the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis were Charles Macpherson's in D ; and the anthem was Luard-Selby's New every morning.

At Brighton Parish Church on November 22, on the occasion of the seventieth 'anthem and organ recital,' an Elgar programme was performed, consisting of The Spirit of England, the Prelude to Gerontius, and the Imperial March. Mr. Chastey Hector was at the organ. The recital was so much appreciated that it was repeated by general request on December 11.

An excellent performance of Brahms's Requiem was given at the Parish Church, Faversham, on December 14, by the church choir, augmented. Miss D. Nunn and Mr. F. Noakes (Canterbury Cathedral) sang the solos. The accompaniments were provided by two pianofortes and timpani. Mr. W. J. Keech conducted.

Mr. Henry Riding, who has completed forty-one years' work as organist of Chigwell Church, has been presented with an illuminated address, a cheque for £450, and a beautiful old picture of Chigwell Church and Dickens's 'Maypole.'

The Hymn of Praise was sung at Redland Park Church, Bristol, on November 25, by the combined choirs of Redland Park and Trinity Presbyterian Churches, totalling seventy, and a small orchestra. Mr. C. W. Casley conducted.

Parts 1, 2, and 3 of the Christmas Oratorio were announced to be sung at Albion Church, Ashton-under-Lyne, on December 18, with Dr. T. Keithley at the organ.

Dr. A. H. Mann, who has been organist at King's College, Cambridge, since 1876, and University organist since 1897, has been elected a Fellow of King's College.

Mendelssohn's Lauda Sion and Hear my Prayer were sung at St. Stephen's, Bournemouth, on November 24, Dr. Holloway accompanied.

Mr. Herbert Hodge is giving a Bach recital at St. Stephen's, Walbrook, at mid-day on the third Thursday in each month.

ORGAN RECITALS

Mr. Paul Rochard, St. John's, Hammersmith—Concerto in G, Bach ; Pastorale, Recitative, et Corale, Karg-Elert ; Passacaglia, Cyril Scott. Kendal Parish Church (two recitals)—Sonata No. 1, Guilmant ; Prelude and Fugue in B minor and Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach.

Mr. Wallace G. Breach, St. John the Evangelist, Clapham Rise—Legend and Final Symphonique, Guilmant ; 'Starlight,' MacDowell.

Mr. H. Timothy, St. Vedast Foster, E.C. (four recitals)—'Wachet auf,' Bach ; Suite No. 1, Borovsky ; Cantilène, Quef ; Fugue in G minor, Arébs ; 'Holsworthy Church Bells,' S. S. Wesley ; Andantino, Frank. St.

• Augustine's, Highgate—Prelude and Fugue in D minor, Bach ; Prelude and Finale (Sonata in F minor), Rheinberger ; Toccata, Dubois.

Mr. D. E. Roberts, St. Andrew's Cathedral, Inverness (two recitals)—Fugue in C, Bach ; 'Finlandia,' Toccata, Dubois ; Sonata No. 4, Mendelssohn ; Choral Prelude, 'St. Anne,' Charlton Palmer.

- Mr. R. Meyrick Roberts, St. Lawrence Jewry (two recitals)—Choral Prelude on Croft's 136th, Parry; Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Choral Song and Fugue, S. S. Wesley.
- Mr. Chastey Hector, Brighton Parish Church (three recitals)—Aubade, Bernard Johnson; Toccata, d'Ervey; Postlude on the 'Old Hundredth,' Harvey Grace; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Mendelssohn. St. John's, Hammersmith—Grand Cortège, Lemare; Fugue in E flat, Bach; Diation, Chastey Hector; Bridal March and Finale, Parry.
- Mr. James M. Preston, St. George's, Jesmond, Newcastle-on-Tyne (four recitals)—Rhapsody, Harvey Grace; 'Curfew,' Horsman; Prelude and Fugue in C, Bach; Fantasy-Prelude, Farrar; Finale (Symphony No. 1), Vierne; Carillon, Elgar.
- Mr. Albert Orton, St. Mark's, Southampton—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Sonata in F, Silas; 'Clair de Lune,' Karg-Elert. Claremont Central Mission, Pentonville—'Pomp and Circumstance' in D, Elgar.
- Mr. Fred Gostelow, Luton Parish Church—Fantasie-Symphonique, Gostelow; Sonata No. 2, Mendelssohn. Parish Church, Southend—Fugue in D, Bach; Funeral March and 'Hymn of Seraphs,' Guilmant. High Town Primitive Methodist Church, Luton—'Finlandia'; Toccata in D minor, Holloway.
- Mr. Andrew Dall, Dysart Parish Church—Fugue in G, Krebs; 'Curfew,' Horsman; Funeral March and 'Hymn of Seraphs,' Guilmant.
- Mr. A. E. Jones, Town Hall, Bolton—Finale (Sonata No. 2), Guilmant; March for a Church Festival, Best.
- Mr. Purcell J. Mansfield, Wellpark United Free Church, Dennistoun, Glasgow—Fugue in E flat, Bach; Concert Scherzo, Mansfield. Bar Congregational Church, Scarborough—Sonata No. 3, Guilmant; Cradle Song, Mansfield. Brixton Independent Church—Humoreske, 'L'Organo Primitivo,' Yon; Funeral March in A minor, Grieg. St. John's, Hammersmith—Sonata, Reubke; Coronation March, Tchaikovsky.
- Mr. Malcolm C. Boyle, St. Stephen's, Norbury—Toccata and Fugue, Bach; First movement (Sonata in E flat), Rheinberger; Sonata No. 6, Mendelssohn; Two Choral Preludes, Bach.
- Mr. J. Gray, Adam Smith Hall, Kirkcaldy—Suite in E minor, Borowski; 'Noel,' Wolstenholme; 'Pomp and Circumstance.'
- Mr. Bertram Hollins, Beckenham Congregational Church (two recitals)—Preludio (Sonata in E flat minor), Rheinberger; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Sonata No. 1, Mendelssohn; Evening Song, Baird; Pastoral Sonata, Rheinberger; Prelude on 'Old 104th,' Parry.
- Mr. Harold M. Dawber, St. George's, Stockport—Prelude, Clerambault; Psalm Prelude No. 3, Howells; Scherzo (Symphony No. 2), Vierne; 'Finlandia.'
- Mr. Henry Riding, St. Mary Abchurch, E.C. (four recitals)—'Sursum Corda,' Elgar; 'Farewell,' Stanford; Barcarolle, Wolstenholme; 'Gothic' March, Salome. St. Mary-the-Virgin, Aldermanbury (five recitals)—'In Memoriam,' P. J. Mansfield; 'Angel's Farewell' ('Dream of Gerontius'), Désespoir, Quef; Overture in C, P. J. Mansfield.
- Mr. Leitch Owen, Edge Hill Parish Church—Prelude and Fugue in G minor, Bach; Grand Chœur No. 2, Hollins; 'Pomp and Circumstance' No. 1.
- Mr. H. Goss Custard, Newcastle Cathedral—Étude Symphonique, Bossi; Pastorale, Franck; Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; First movement (Symphony No. 6), Widor.
- Mr. H. A. Bennett, Newcastle Cathedral—Toccata in F, Bach; Choral Preludes by Bach, Brahms, and Parry; Sonata, Elgar; Fantasia and Toccata in D minor, Stanford.
- Mr. Eric Brough, St. Lawrence Jewry—Choral No. 1, Franck; 'Chant de Mai,' Jongen; Passacaglia, Bach; Rhapsody No. 3, Howells. Jackson's Lane Wesleyan Church, Highgate—Introduction and Passacaglia, Rheinberger; Three Choral Preludes, Bach; Choral Fantasia, Darwall's 148th, Darke; Marche Pontificale, Widor.
- Miss Emmie Bowman, Parish Church, Barkway—Choral No. 3, Franck; Villanella, Ireland.
- Mr. C. H. Trevor, St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta (three recitals)—Prelude and Fugue in A minor and Fugue in B minor, Bach; Adagio (Sonata No. 1), Mendelssohn; 'In Memoriam,' Rheinberger; Fantasia on 'St. Michael,' West; Finale in E flat, Healey Willan.
- Mr. Thomas Grosch, Highgate Unitarian Church—Duetto, Rheinberger; Gavotte and Musette, Bach; Triumphant March, Faulkes.
- Mr. R. Buchanan Morton, House of Hope Presbyterian Church, St. Paul, Minn.—Introit, R. B. Morton; First movement, Sonata Celtica, Stanford; 'In dulci júbilo,' Karg-Elert; Grand Chœur, Franck.
- Mr. Frederick J. Tarris, Barking Parish Church—Sonata in C minor, Mendelssohn; Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Bach.
- Mr. Claude A. Forster, St. John's, Forfar—Introduction and Fugue, Mozart; Fugue in C, Best.
- Mr. H. G. Bishop, All Saints', Worcester—Madrigal, Lemare; Rondino, Wolstenholme.
- Mr. G. W. Harris Sellick, St. Margaret's, Whalley Range—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; 'Finlandia'; Prelude, Clerambault; 'Imperial March,' Elgar.
- Mr. George Pritchard, St. Mary's, Widnes (two recitals)—Overture in C minor, Hollins; Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; 'Finlandia.' Victoria Road Wesleyan Church, Widnes—Finale (Sonata No. 4), Mendelssohn; Fugue in D, Bach; 'Curfew,' Horsman.
- Mr. G. Thalben Ball, Temple Church—Short Prelude and Fugue in F, Bach; Toccata and Fugue, 'The Wanderer,' Parry; Canzone, Karg-Elert; Allegro Appassionata, Harwood.
- Mr. A. E. Howell, Parish Church, Trowbridge—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Allegretto Grazioso, Frank Bridge; Choral Fantasia, Darwall's 148th, Darke.
- Mr. H. A. Fricker, Canadian College of Organists' Annual Convention—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Theme and Variations, Bossi; Epilogue, Healey Willan.
- Mr. J. E. Adkins, Preston Parish Church—First movement Sonata in D minor, Rheinberger; Minuet in C, Smart.
- Mr. John Pullein, St. Mary's Cathedral, Glasgow—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Trumpet Tune and Air, Purcell; Psalm Prelude No. 2, Howells; Rhapsody in A minor, Saint-Saëns. Christ Church, Bala—Madrigal, Lemare; Gavotte, Pullein; Choral Preludes, 'Canterbury,' Pullein and 'Rockingham,' Parry.
- Mr. W. J. Lancaster, Bolton Parish Church—Ave Maria, d'Arcadelt; Caprice Héroïque, Bonnet; Nocturne, Baird.
- Mr. C. F. Waters, St. Saviour's, Croydon (two recitals)—Sonata No. 3, Guilmant; Andante Cantabile, Widor; Choral Melody, Waters; Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; Sonata in F sharp minor, Rheinberger; Choral Song and Fugue, S. S. Wesley. Immanuel Church, Streatham Common—Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Bach; Fantaisie in E flat, Saint-Saëns.
- Mr. Herbert A. Carruthers, Park Church, Glasgow (two recitals)—Prelude and Fugue in A minor and Toccata in F, Bach; Fantasy Prelude, Macpherson; Sonata in F sharp, Rheinberger. St. John's, Hammersmith—Sonata No. 4, Mendelssohn; Variations on an old English Melody, Stuart Archer.
- Miss Christina Chalmers, St. Lawrence Jewry—Sonata No. 1, Harwood; Fugue in G, Bach; Prelude, d'Indy; Postlude, 'Old Hundredth,' Harvey Grace.
- Mr. Arthur Clements, St. Andrew's, Cheddar—Sonata in C sharp minor, Harwood; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Overture to 'Occasional' Oratorio.
- Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson, High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham—Fugue in G (Pastoral Sonata), Rheinberger; Grand Chœur, Henniker.
- Mr. Herbert Hodge, St. Nicholas Cole Abbey (three recitals)—Fantasia in F minor, Mozart; Prelude and Fugue on BACH, Liszt; and a Bach programme.
- Mr. William Ellis, St. Cuthbert's, Darlington—First movement (Sonata No. 1), Mendelssohn; 'Sleepers, wake' and Fugue in G minor, Bach.
- Mr. Arthur Ilaydn Leary, St. Cuthbert's, Darlington—Triumphant March, Faulkes; 'Finlandia'; Barcarolle, Leary; Funeral March and 'Hymn of Seraphs,' Guilmant.

Dr. Arthur Kitson, St. Cuthbert's, Darlington—Song of Triumph, West; Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Bach; Carillon, Vierne: Three Choral Improvisations, Karg-Elert.

Mr. Herbert Walton, St. Cuthbert's, Darlington—Concerto No. 5, Handel; Fantasia Rustique, Wolstenholme; Symphony No. 2, Widor; Fugue in G minor, Bach.

Mr. G. Bernard Gilbert, Town Hall, Stratford—Allegro Maestoso ('Water-music'), Handel; Allegretto, Lemmens; Festive March, Bossi.

Dr. H. C. L. Stocks, Holy Trinity, Leamington Spa—Fugue in G minor and 'Sleepers, wake,' Bach; Andante, S. S. Wesley; Evening Song, Bairdow.

Mr. Allan Brown, Wesleyan Church, Dartford—Mélodie in E, Rachmaninov; Fantasia on 'O Sanctissima, Lux; Finale (Sonata in F minor), Rheinberger; Finale, Wolstenholme. Jerusalem Chapel, Ton—Canon in B minor, Schumann; 'Finlandia'; Fugue, Reubke: Finale (Symphony in D minor), Guilmant.

Dr. R. Walker Robson, Christ Church, Crouch End (two recitals)—'Sleepers, wake,' Karg-Elert; 'Une Larme,' Moussorgsky; Prelude in B, Scriabin; Fugue in E minor, Bach; Basso Ostinato, Arensky; 'In Modo Dorico,' Stanford.

Mr. Cyril Pearce, St. Mary's Baptist Church, Norwich (three recitals)—Improvisation, Rheinberger; Scherzo (Symphony No. 2), Vierne; Sonata No. 5, Mendelssohn; Prelude in G flat, Scriabin; Finale in B flat, Frank; Allegro Maestoso (Sonata), Elgar; Three Preludes on Welsh Hymn tunes, Vaughan Williams; Rhapsody No. 1, Howells; Fantasy, after Rheinberger, Harvey Grace; and a Bach programme.

Mr. Arthur Sharp, St. Margaret's, Whalley Range—First movement (Sonata No. 6), Guilmant; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Gavotte (Sonata No. 12), Martini.

Mr. Harry S. Greenwood, St. Agnes', Birch—Overture in C minor, Hollins; Allegro Cantabile, Widor; Grand Chœur in A, Salome.

Mr. H. C. J. Churchill, Central Hall, Westminster—Andante in B flat (Sonata No. 1), Peace; Gavotte in D, Peace.

Dr. Louis A. Hamand, Malvern Priory Church—'Elegiac Romance,' Ireland; Allegro Marziale, Frank Bridge.

APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Martin Kingslake, organist and choirmaster, St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard Street.

Mr. Albert Orton, organist and choirmaster, St. Saviour's, Paddington.

SPOHR AND HIS INFLUENCE

By C. À BECKET WILLIAMS

If there is any thing in the history of music of which one becomes more convinced as time goes on it is the immense influence which Spohr wielded in the last century. I am sure due recognition has not been paid to this, and perhaps I may be permitted in a few lines to call attention to certain aspects of the work of this composer which have quite probably escaped the reader.

Spohr was born at Brunswick in 1784, and was the son of a well-to-do physician. Like his friend and contemporary Mendelssohn, he thus had the doubtful advantage of affluent circumstances, and enjoyed a career more successful than that of most composers. His life was full of interest, but as I do not wish this to be a biography, I will merely finish him off, so to speak, by saying that he died in 1859, through a skating accident. The cause of his death is, I think, significant. He was always an energetic and vital man, traits hardly appearing in his music, which is apt to suggest the pale and the romantic.

I have already called attention to one likeness between him and Mendelssohn. They were very similar in other ways. For instance, they both wrote autobiographies. I have not read that of Spohr, but it is said to be very amusing. They are both coupled in the public mind as pre-eminently writers of oratorios; both are considered by musicians to be essentially writers of 'sugary' music. The fact that both were great technicians and contrapuntists too often escapes notice. It is pretty generally believed that Mendelssohn had more influence than anyone on the later 19th century composers. But it is not generally acknowledged that Spohr must have had the greatest influence on Mendelssohn, who was born twenty-five years later, and came under Spohr's influence when the latter was at the height of his powers.

But undoubtedly the greatness of Spohr consists in his originality. He was most decidedly an innovator, and stands out as such in an age of conventionalists. Let us consider him briefly from this point of view.

Whether to his credit or not is beside the question, he practically 'invented' the luscious, sugary style which is so characteristic of him. He had a mania for chromatics and enharmonic changes, and these mannerisms are apparent in all his work. Think of his influence on our Stainers, Barnbys, Monks, and Dykes! What would the A. & M. Hymn Book have been without him? Perhaps stronger and less sentimental, but it takes all sorts to make a world, and I am not one of those super-spirits who scoff at all sentimentalism.

Spohr freely introduced the romantic element into oratorio. I refer particularly to the 'Last Judgment,' which is undoubtedly the greatest of his sacred compositions. Sobriety of style has always been regarded as an indispensable characteristic of sacred music of the highest order, and the introduction of this element of romance without detriment to the result is surely a remarkable tribute to the genius of the composer. May I suggest that 'Parsifal' and 'The Dream of Gerontius' owe not a little of their existence to this innovation?

Again, it must be remembered that 'programme music,' so-called, though not invented by him received a considerable contribution to its waning health by the production of his symphony, 'Die Weihe der Töne.' Also his opera 'Jessonda' shares with Weber's 'Euryanthe' the honour of introducing for the first time accompanied recitative throughout, in place of spoken dialogue.

He also invented various forms of composition, e.g., the double string quartet, the quartet concerto, the symphony for two orchestras, &c. He wrote a famous Method for the violin, and was himself a virtuoso on the instrument. And last, but not least, he was the first to direct an orchestra with a baton.

Is it not astonishing that a man who possessed the diverse genius of Spohr should cut such a small—I might say execrated—figure in modern musical criticism? Why is it? In his time he enjoyed a Continental reputation, and even musicians like Mendelssohn, Wagner, and that other neglected composer, S. S. Wesley, professed the highest admiration for him.

Probably his mannerisms upset people. Too many cakes make one dyspeptic, and Spohr was even a more sickly confectioner than Mendelssohn in this respect. Nevertheless, justice is not done him nowadays. There are many who say that they see in ultra-modern music the romantic element carried to its logical conclusion. If so, Spohr was the spiritual grandfather of Stravinsky. What an arresting thought!

Letters to the Editor

THE IMPORTANCE OF CORRECT PLACING OF THE VOICE

SIR,—In your issues for August and September last I read with interest the letters of Messrs. Tree and Keay on methods of so-called 'voice placing.' Since I retired from my literary and editorial work in London ten years ago, I have devoted most of my leisure to an investigation of Italian, French, German, Austrian, and Polish vocal methods, both theoretical and practical. I was already fairly familiar with English and American systems, not only as an author, but also as a public lecturer of thirty years' standing, using vocal and instrumental illustrations. I can therefore speak as one who has had considerable experience, and has sought in vain until quite lately for a vocal system which completely covers the ground and solves the problems which have hitherto baffled both students and teachers. I confess I was astounded at what Mr. Tree rightly terms the 'chaos' existing among the text-books and teachers; and I both saw and experienced some of the tragic results of this chaos in time, money, and the best years of one's vocal life wasted, not to mention the all too-frequent irreparable damage done in thousands of cases. I myself spent hundreds of pounds during nine years of futile search and effort, narrowly escaping complete ruin of what voice I had left at the hands of so-called maestri in Paris and Italy. I owe it to Siegfried Wagner's wise advice that I did not try Berlin in 1913. About eighteen months ago I saw in an American magazine an advertisement of a vocal academy in one of the principal cities, teaching a new method by correspondence. I quite expected it might prove to be one of the many quack systems existing in that country, but a little investigation dispelled that idea. The academy was opened in 1916, and is already working on a large scale. The principal has spent some twenty years in teaching and research in Europe, covering all the ground I had been over and much more besides. He has embodied his discoveries in a series of thirty lessons, making a book of six hundred and forty pages, and these are sent out at the rate of about one every fortnight, according to the student's progress, for a moderate inclusive fee. I began the course after I came to India, and completed it within a year, my previous experience enabling me, of course, to go fast and omit certain details. It solved all problems, and enabled me to locate and correct errors. For the first time in the history of vocal science the whole thing is placed upon a firm basis of unimpeachable scientific fact, and nothing but ordinary intelligence, a correct ear, and hard and patient work are necessary to attain the desired results.

One discovery of vital importance this authority has undoubtedly made, and that is that the really great voices are due to unusual strength in a certain muscle whose function in voice was not even suspected by previous writers and teachers, although it occupies a commanding central position in the vocal mechanism. Both the old Italian maestro Mancini and the eminent laryngologist Morell Mackenzie record their observation of certain exceptional voices which were entirely free from the usual breaks and registers. In these rare cases they said the singer was able to carry the full calibre of the middle tones (Mancini calls it 'chest-tone') to the top of the range. Morell Mackenzie says that this exceptional capacity seems to be a 'special gift of nature,' and does not attempt to explain how it is done. But a knowledge of the function of the muscle I have referred to effectually disposes of the 'gift of nature' theory, and reduces the problem to nothing more occult than the development of the right muscle by a simple exercise against a suitable resistance. Hitherto it has been taken for granted that the small muscles inside the larynx are the only ones that can stretch the vocal cords; but these are quite inadequate for the powerful stretching required in the production of big upper tones. For these a more powerful action outside the larynx is necessary, and this is performed by the muscle I have mentioned.

Every student knows that the most troublesome 'break' in the voice occurs at about upper F, above which it is difficult to carry the full body of tone without great strain and tension. It is usual to avoid this by having recourse to the so-called 'head' register, in which, as Browne and Behnke correctly state, only 'the thin inner edges' of the cords are used, and the tone is consequently lighter and thinner. The explanation is that the aforesaid external muscle is not sufficiently developed to stretch the entire mass of the cords (which include three reinforcing ligaments) to the extent necessary for higher notes, and so recourse is had to the weaker muscles which can stretch only the thin edges. Caruso's laryngologist recently stated that he could deliver a high C sharp 'from the chest.' This was an example of exceptional strength in the external muscle which enabled him to stretch the whole mass of his cords up to the top of his range. He and other great singers were born with that strength; but now it can be acquired by anyone.

I spent years trying to develop the 'head' tone, but although I got the action correctly and reached high C, no amount of practice produced any real power or body. It was not until I learnt about the external cord-stretching muscle that I understood the reason for this. This muscle can be isolated, controlled, and developed by the will, like the fingers of a pianist, but the ligaments inside the larynx cannot, for their action is involuntary and subsidiary. There are, however, several sets of muscles, notably the powerful chewing muscles, which can, and usually do, interfere with the action of the right one. These have to be known and their action carefully eliminated.

Thus correct production is entirely divested of all mystery and uncertainty, and the development of a homogeneous tone to its fullest possibilities becomes a matter of simple calisthenics, given a normal musical equipment. And let me add from long and bitter experience that the usual scales and exercises are worse than useless if the wrong muscles are being used, for they serve only to fix bad habits. It is safer to base production on the speaking voice, as Mr. Tree does, than to try and 'place' the sung tone without exact knowledge of the vocal mechanism. The system I have briefly outlined in fact does this, and demonstrates that the speaking and singing tone must be produced in the same way, by the same muscles, or else one or the other is wrong. I have not named this all-important muscle because I consider it is my latest teacher's discovery, and I have paid for my own use of it. Let those who think it worth while do likewise. For them I have given the Editor the address of the institution.—Yours, &c., Lahore, India.

November 23, 1921.

BASIL CRUMP.

[In order to escape an avalanche of inquiries we give the name of the institution referred to by Mr. Crump, 'The Perfect Voice Institute, Chicago.'—ED., M.T.]

SIR,—Mr. Keay still does not publicly disclose his identity and still refuses to show publicly this 'classical method of voice production' he talks about. He has publicly attacked that simplicity I am advocating, which is merely the ease of obtaining the bel canto. I now therefore make Mr. Keay a sporting offer—I will engage a hall in London, give my lecture-recital in the usual way, and allow him forty minutes in which to show the public where I am wrong and where he is right. But he must sing half a dozen or so songs to prove that his own voice is, as he says, 'as fresh as in the late 'eighties.' He being the challenger must surely accept any reasonable conditions of the challenged, and I contend that having brought the matter up publicly he must in all fairness 'face the music' publicly. If Mr. Keay will send me dates from which to choose, I will immediately book the hall.—Yours, &c.,

14, Courtfield Gardens, Kensington.

CHARLES TREE.

[The correspondence on this subject had been closed, and we reopen it to include the letter from our reader in India, and to allow Mr. Tree to issue his challenge.—ED., M.T.]

HAND DEVELOPMENT FOR THE PERFORMER

SIR,—That a comparatively new invention should provoke inquisitiveness and even incredulity, one can understand, but that a person should go to the length of forming an opinion and even delivering himself of the same in a musical journal without having had an opportunity for testing that which he is at pains to condemn, is surely, to put it mildly, not playing the game. The paper which has caused Mr. Head so much perturbation was read at Messrs. Novello's rooms in Warlour Street, at one of the meetings of the Musical Association, and not at the Royal Academy.

The 'Technique' stands on its own merits with or without the approbation of any musical institute. It is not a machine, and is not 'designed for the mastery of agility touches.' Its use is not confined to pianoforte students, but it aims to flex and develop the hands of all instrumental players. The statement that 'not one hand in five hundred is formed by nature for playing an instrument' is a quotation taken from no less a person than Von Bülow, but it is also my own opinion, based on experience. Mr. Head is surely confusing two positions of the hand—normal and extended—with 'forty-two easily classified (sic) touches.' Touch, and normal or extended hand positions, are hardly synonymous. Our contention is that ten minutes at the 'Technique' are worth two hours' finger exercises at the instrument—the desired result being that of full muscular development and control. I leave it to your readers to decide which method would be the more likely to produce an 'automata-like' player. Keyboard drudgery is actually detrimental to the æsthetic side of music, and the 'Technique' surely justifies its existence if it can be proved to be a valuable substitute for this drudgery. Schumann never used any actual apparatus, and the late Mr. Franklin Taylor told the writer that he fully believed that had Schumann used a 'Technique' he would have accomplished his object without injury to his hand. The distance at which Mr. Head lives does not preclude his becoming acquainted with the 'Technique,' for a great many 'Techniques' have gone to Australia, and we have a factory for their manufacture in New Zealand and an agent who is actively in touch with Australia.

Its merits do not rest on any claims I make for it personally. The opinions of such authorities as Lamond, Poussinov, Fryer, Spencer-Dyke, Reddie, Beringer, Walenn, and a host of others are so convincing, that even Mr. Head would do well to pause and experiment with it himself before offering his criticisms.—Yours, &c.,

December 7, 1921.

R. J. PITCHER.

PROVINCIAL NEWS IN THE MUSICAL TIMES

SIR,—In your December number you outline certain changes of policy regarding the records of provincial concerts in your columns. As a reader of your paper for fully half a century, I trust you will allow me to make one or two suggestions on this point. Under present conditions it is a wearisome task to attempt to read many of the contributions headed, 'Music in the Provinces.' Half-a-dozen or more will record the doings of a touring concert party whose only claim to notice is that a certain prima donna—the most useless member of the profession—has done her best to ruin local concert enterprise by raiding the big towns, taking away all the money available, and devoting in return a quarter or half an hour in poisoning the well-springs of the art, thus working incalculable harm to music itself and to genuine music-lovers. In this nefarious scheme you play an unsatisfactory part through devoting an appreciable portion of your available space to eulogizing her performances in the towns A, B, C, and succeeding letters of the alphabet. What have such concerts to do with music? Other events of real value to music are allocated only two or three lines. The promoters are thereby discouraged, and readers in other districts are misled as to the importance of the event. Would it not be better to ignore the speculative concerts (where money-making is the main object) altogether, and devote the space thus obtained to fuller records of real concerts? The readers of daily papers get full details of the money-making concerts: is it conceivable that any reader of the Musical Times at Bradford wants to read anything about the appearance of Madame Midas at, say, Birmingham or Bristol?

But there are musical institutions up and down the country which are doing notable work, and whose activities are followed with keen interest by music-lovers all over the kingdom. Record in fairly full measure such societies, and you are doing good work and will gradually increase your circle of readers and subscribers, while most certainly increasing your influence for good. Why devote more than a few lines to performances of familiar works anywhere? A performance of The Messiah or Elijah, Carmen or Faust, whether in London or Liverpool, should surely not receive more than a couple of lines in any serious music journal. The local daily press deals adequately with such every-day matters, and space thus gained would be really valuable if devoted to more enterprising efforts. Besides, all such performances are purely local in their influence and interest.—Yours, &c.,

S. MIDGLEY.

12, Oak Avenue, Bradford.

December 10, 1921.

TRAINING IN OPERATIC ART

SIR,—I was surprised to read in your December number that the excellent work of the Carl Rosa Opera Company had been achieved 'by people to whom the whole thing, as an art, is totally strange.' Further, to find it asserted that 'all this has been done "off their own bat," so to speak, because operatic art in this country is a branch our schools of music do not teach. The would-be operatic singer has to be thrown on the stage to sink or swim, supported only by such gifts as the gods may have endowed him with. He has no technique acquired in school to rely on . . . ' and so forth.

Your contributor may, of course, be using the expression 'as an art,' in some unfamiliar rhetorical sense, but if his statements are meant to be taken literally I must emphatically traverse every one of them. Operatic art a branch that the schools do not teach? This is indeed new hearing. I was under the impression that our schools of music all expended more time, skill, and money over serious opera than the limited demand justified. Certainly, of the two principal London musical institutions, one has taught it for ninety years, with an imposing list of brilliant students to its credit, and the other, during about a third of that period, has produced even more gratifying results in the way of semi-public performances of unfamiliar works. In the early 'thirties of the last century the Royal Academy placed before the world, fully trained, the two Seguin and their brides; during recent times there has never been a light or serious opera company without some members in it who have been trained, not merely as singers, but as operatic artists, within its walls. I refrain from giving names, for I should not know where to stop, but the D'Oyly Carte companies at least will not forget for how many brilliant artists they are indebted to the R.A.M., nor the Thomas Beecham Company (now being managed by an R.A.M. boy who has long made his mark), and the company which has made the 'Beggars' Opera' such a permanent success was at first almost entirely recruited from the same institution. To the Royal College, London owes some performances of Cornelius's Barber of Bagdad, Schumann's Genoveva, and other interesting operas, which challenge comparison with anything hitherto performed by the late Covent Garden Syndicate. Both schools, and also the Guildhall School of Music, have expended much money over the preparation of special stage accommodation in view of an expected 'boom' in opera, which thus far has not materialised. Meanwhile, it should be common knowledge that there is a sufficient, if not abundant, supply of adequately-trained operatic aspirants ready to step from the schools straight on to the public boards. Adequately trained, I say; the schools can, and do, give them proper technical training. An artist is made only by the experience which time, and time alone, supplies. Teaching institutions don't profess to stock geniuses.

I am not concerned to advertise anything or anybody, but I would ask Mr. Barrett to reconsider his words, and to do bare justice to the schools of music to which England is more heavily indebted than she is ever willing to admit.—Yours, &c.,

YOUR OLDEST CONTRIBUTOR.

13, Allion Road, South Hampstead, N.W.

December 3, 1921.

MUSICAL APPRECIATION

SIR,—I believe that the chief obstacle in the way of musical appreciation, so far as the average provincial concert-goer is concerned, is not so much lack of education or apathy as lack of acquaintance. We have heard a great deal about 'beastly tunes' and so on in the last few months, but I doubt whether the real reason for their popularity has yet been found. What appears to be the only satisfactory explanation is that these tunes, being simple and easily grasped, are at once apprehended and appreciated by the average 'unmusical' person, while more advanced works are rejected as 'too difficult.'

One of the most interesting and instructive occasions for the man who wishes to ascertain the real musical tastes of the masses is to mix among the enormous crowds that assemble at any of our great inland or seaside provincial towns, to 'hear the band' on Saturday afternoons or evenings. We all know the symptoms of rapturous enjoyment which pervade the crowd when the strains of 'The Lost Chord,' Mendelssohn's 'Spring Song,' Dvorák's 'Humoresque,' or even 'Un Peu d'Amour' are wafted on the breeze; the tapping toes that accompany the 'Sylvia' Pizzicato (usually played with fearful agility by a perspiring solo cornet); the murmuring voices that sing in undertones to the airs of 'The Gondoliers.' The superior critic may find it unworthy of his notice, but it is really of profound interest because the enjoyment is so obvious and so patently sincere. They are not trying to ape their more educated brethren; they are in their own element and completely free from affectation. And why do they like these works? Partly, no doubt, because they are tuneful, but chiefly, I am certain, because they know them as old and intimate friends.

And it is the same with concerts in a hall. We deplore the greater popularity of ballad concerts than that of more serious affairs. But the attraction of a ballad concert for the average man is the secure knowledge that the programme will contain at least one or two items that he knows, and that all the others will be so easy to grasp that he will always be able to recognise them after one or two hearings.

The only real remedy is repetition. The other day I attended a Beethoven concert at Edinburgh given by Lamond. The large audience was composed almost entirely of people who were evidently music-lovers rather than advanced musical experts. At the end of each of the three Sonatas, one heard such comments as 'Isn't that beautiful! I should like to hear it again.' There are many people who would willingly pay to hear great music repeated within a reasonable space of time from their first hearing. Is it too much to hope that one day a great artist—pianist, violinist, conductor, or organist—will announce a series of three or four subscription concerts of great music, the programme at each concert being exactly the same? It is only thus that the average musical amateur will really come to know and love the great masterpieces of music so that there shall be a popular demand for them. For the busy amateur who has no time to give long and detailed study to the scores of classical works, frequent hearing is the only method of becoming really familiar with such works. I believe, moreover, that the decrease in the size of an audience at such repeated concerts, caused by the absence of the dilettanti, the lukewarm, and the superior, would be more than compensated by the increase of real musical ardour and keenness, coupled with the sense of having achieved a real educational object.—Yours, &c.,

J. W. HUNTER BLAIR.

Faglescarrie, Haddington, Scotland.

November 14, 1921.

SCALES AND TONALITY

SIR,—Mr. Ainslie Hight, on pages 850-60 of the December issue, animadverts against Equal Temperament whilst adopting, for Just Temperament, 'the simpler ratio of the minor seventh (7/4)'—instead of its actual ratio 16/9. Apparently the fact was overlooked that this minute difference, 63:64 (which Helmholtz and Prout consider negligible), is nevertheless rather wider than the greatest difference between E. T. and J. T., viz., 1.666:1.681 at the major sixth = 111:112. The ratio 7/4 is virtually an augmented sixth, 224/128 (225) where the minor seventh = 228.230/128. For your correspondent this surely is a very serious matter, for, if the ear is still to be more vitiated by J. T. than by E. T., wherewithal shall we be saved?

Something would appear also to have gone wrong with that part of the instruction where we are invited 'to feel the fourth (4/3) as the minor third of the supertonic (27/20).' Can Mr. Ainslie Hight have meant 32/27? There are obviously pitfalls in this field of knowledge.—Yours, &c., Chesham Bois.

GEORGE E. PRINCE.

December 8, 1921.

MODERN SCALES AND ACOUSTICS

SIR,—My attention has been drawn to the letter from Mr. J. E. Sainsbury in your December issue, in which he states that Prof. Rankine is 'at present experimenting at the Northern Polytechnic with apparatus by which he will be able to register the quality of a musical sound.' I must ask your courtesy kindly to correct this statement, as Prof. Rankine is on the staff of the Imperial College at South Kensington and has never carried out any experiments at the Northern Polytechnic. The confusion probably arose from the fact that he and I both read papers on the same day at the Convention of the Federation of British Music Industries held in 1920 at Scarborough.—Yours, &c.,

R. S. CLAY

(Principal, Northern Polytechnic Institute Holloway, London, N.7.)

December 2, 1921.

WHY USE WORDS?

SIR,—The article by 'G. M. C.' contains many truths, but is yet not quite convincing. The writer says that he does not need to know German in order to enjoy a Brahms lied. No one does. The point is that such enjoyment is that of abstract music—not of a song per se. But it is the literary content of the song that supplies the composer's creative impulse, and this is handed on to the hearer, he the words banal or even 'Greek' to him. A song-writer has not laboriously to search for suitable words to set to his music, as 'G. M. C.' postulates. That is the method of the uninspired writer of pot-boiling stuff. Certainly neither Brahms, nor Schubert, nor Schumann, ever composed songs that way. 'G. M. C.'s' analogy of the picture and the frame is also a little unhappy. Artists do, in fact, paint to fit frames; but it is not the frame that inspires them: it is the phenomenon of nature to which their beauty-sense responds.

A song without words is therefore not a song proper. It is instrumental music—the voice being regarded as an instrument: and that is right and proper enough. Some years ago—in the days of your predecessor, Sir, I think—I submitted an article to the Musical Times on 'Wordless Opera.' But I was before my time; the 'difficulty of vocables' put the idea out of court. 'G. M. C.' disposes of that difficulty easily enough, and he also points out that in opera the eye co-operates with the ear, and thus apprehends the dramatic element. This was my point in the suggestion of wordless opera: words are substituted by pictures. Except by a fortunate accident, words are not much heard in opera; but the action is obvious to all, and by action I mean not only movement, but passion and emotion. Thus the necessary 'programme' for the music is secured. Opera is appreciated in no other way. The words are negligible except in the brilliant case of Gilbert and Sullivan—where, however, the objective is not upon the high plane of grand opera of the Wagner type.

That music and action can run in double harness without mutual disqualification is beyond dispute. Music need not be the handmaid, as in the cinema: it can be the mistress, as in the ballet. Let the thing be tried. If any composer would care to look at a scenario for wordless opera which I prepared when writing the aforesaid article, I should be flattered in acceding to his request. But I maintain that wordless songs are anomalous.—Yours, &c.,

Walden, Cheam, Surrey.

F. C. TILNEY.

GRAMOPHONE RECORDS

SIR,—It may interest you to know that now records of the old English Madrigals are procurable I was able recently to give a modest little gramophone recital of old English music to a few guests, much to their delectation. With the exception of Nos. 1, 4, and 6, it was possible to follow the music from printed copies, and with the help of Dr. Walker's book, Mr. Davey's book, and a copy of old Thomas Morley's book, we spent an enjoyable evening. We barred scratching of matches and the entrance of refreshments at importunate times, and I dislocated the wires of the night-bell—to my great content. I give you the programme of the music:

Solo Harpsichord	(1) 'Nobody's Giggle'
	(2) Three English Folk-Dances	Mrs. GORDON WOODHOUSE.
Song	'Have you seen but a whyte lillie?'	MISS ALMA GLUCK.
Madrigals	(1) 'Lullabye'	Byrd
	(2) 'Silver Swan'	Gibbons
	THE ENGLISH SINGERS.
Solo Harpsichord	Gavotte	Purcell
	Mrs. GORDON WOODHOUSE.
Song	'Arise, ye subterranean winds'	Purcell
	MR. ROBERT RADFORD.
Solo Violoncello	Sonata in G minor	Eccles
	MR. W. H. SQUIRE.
Song	'The lass with the delicate air'	Michael Arne
	MISS ALMA GLUCK.
Part-songs	(1) 'When for the world's repose'	Mornington
	(2) 'By Celia's arbour'	Horsley
	THE GRESHAM SINGERS.
Song	'Tom Bowling'	Dibdin
	MR. HARRISON.
Part-Songs	(1) 'Hail, smiling morn'	Spofforth
	(2) 'Come, let us join the roundelay'	Beale
	THE SHEFFIELD CHOIR.

The gramophone was an old horn-type, but with a 'top-hole' sound-box. You will naturally say, 'Ah, yes! A programme of old favourites.' Yes, I grant it; but it is a beginning, and it is not going to be the end.—Yours, &c.,
Seascale, Cumberland. R. T. RICHMOND
November 23, 1921. (Country Doctor).

THE MUSICAL PRESS

SIR,—You have intimated that my complete reply to your remarks of last month is too long, and has reached you too late, for inclusion in the present issue. Rather than hold over that full reply until your next issue I suggest that you insert this briefer one now. Personal friends as we are, it is, I think, distasteful to both of us to have a public discussion long continued—especially one on a point of ethics.

I am still quite opposed to 'dealing discreetly' with the reviews of goods advertised, 'making concessions however slight,' 'passing over the feeble ones,' and so forth. Pass over all feeble music if you like (as the Music Student does, or tries to do), but treat advertisers and non-advertisers exactly alike. This is a British way, and, I personally feel, the only honest way.

You make the point that any expression of this sort on my part is 'mere rhetoric' because (you say) the Music Student does not review music. But it does review books, and many authors and publishers could witness that it does so very bluntly and with no distinctions as to advertisers or non-advertisers. In reply to your suggestion I send you privately the name of a firm whose advertisements we completely lost by our policy of straightforwardness; but it is fair to say that this is, so far as I know, the only case, publishers as a body being quite sportsmanlike enough to appreciate the value of impartial reviewing.

Your strictures upon 'The Month's Best Music' are fully answered in the letter for which you have no room. Here I wish only to say that this feature is entirely in the hands of a very well-known musician, whose name is given at its head, in whom we have always had the greatest confidence, and whose reputation can take care of itself. The omissions of certain information mentioned by you are, as you know, unusual—probably due to a slip on the part of printer or proof reader. The lists do not vary in standard, according to the quality of the month's output, as you suggest (this would be absurd), but they do vary in length according to that quality—all the way from a third of a page to a full page.—Yours, &c., PERCY A. SCHOLLES.

[We are at one with Mr. Scholes in a desire to end this 'much ado about nothing.' Meanwhile, we are not a bit ashamed of our slight and benevolent bias in favour of our clients. It is as British as the Scholesian ideal; it need be no less honest; and it is a good deal more human. We need hardly say that our 'strictures upon "The Month's Best Music"' were concerned with the system, not with the compiler of the list. In fairness to the Music Student we add that Mr. Scholes has convinced us that this system was not adopted with a view to evasion of any kind. We continue, however, to doubt its utility, for the reasons given in our December issue.—ED., M. T.]

Sharps and Flats

Mr. Algernon Ashton's prophecy of the future remembrance of those 'three of the most sterling musicians that have ever lived,' Hummel, Clementi, and Czerny, would have had more appearance of vraisemblance had he added that they will be remembered by people like Mr. Ashton.—Kaikhosru Sorabji.

She is touching every human motion in her song. At times she seems to sing away care; then, gently wooing an elusive strain that is almost fairylike, crescendoes into tragedy, going into a crashing climax that diminishes into an ending—searching, yearning, and wistfully sad. . . . What a sensation she would make in America with a little advertising!—Charles Chaplin.

I am convinced that we stand at the threshold of an overwhelming reaction in favour of German music in this country. It will go too far. It will do a lot of harm. But the reaction itself is not altogether unreasonable.—Francis Töte.

Heldenleben was preceded by the Bach-Elgar Fugue and followed by Holst's The Planets. It was a sandwich with the meat outside.—Edwin Evans.

The Bach-Elgar Fugue in C minor is a typical example of vandalism and bad taste, theatrical, pretentious, and pompous, recalling other public demonstrations of the instrumentator.—Leigh Henry.

I think we must admit that there is hardly any really great singing, and little enough good singing to be heard. . . . We have, of course, a few great singers, but they are passed or passing, and there do not seem to be any to take their places.—N. B. S. in Musical News.

Does 'N. B. S.' live in the backwoods of Mayfair that he dares to say that there is no good singing to-day? I am a little surprised that in a paper so sound as yours you should print such remarks as 'We have, of course, a few,' &c.—Ursula Greville in a letter to the Editor of Musical News.

Sabatini's Youth is the sort of work that makes you wonder why some people take to music when there is such a scarcity of good clerks and commercial travellers. . . . How many of these poor souls the critic meets with in a year's work. . . . Rarely does he show. . . . what he feels. . . . though I confess that one alleged singer a little while ago made me say, when I was asked my opinion of her, that I thought she would have made an excellent wife for Landru.—Ernest Newman.

Mr. Josef Holbrooke won considerable success at Munich with his orchestral concert of his own compositions on November 24. He conducted his Bronwen Overture and Fantasia Wild-Fowl, and was pianist in the Gwynn-ap-Nudd Concerto. The programme included Goossens's Tam o' Shanter.

Barclay's Bank Musical Society gave a choral and orchestral concert at Queen's Hall on December 15. Mr. H. W. Pierce conducted the choir in part-songs and madrigals, and Mr. H. J. Rouse conducted the orchestra in Wormser's L'Enfant Prodigue Suite, MacCunn's Land of the Mountain and the Flood, and Coleridge-Taylor's Bamboula.

G. E. R. Musical Society and Miss Dorothy Clark gave Brahms's Alto Rhapsody at Hamilton Hall on November 30. Dr. Stanley Marchant's setting of Arthur Locker's Ode by a Christmas Pudding at Sea was given for the first time.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of January, 1862 :

GIFT-BOOK, NEW.—Songs and Tunes for Education, edited by JOHN CURWEN. The Harmonies by JAMES TULLIE, Esq., Organist of Westminster Abbey. The Pianoforte edition in handsome cloth binding, with gilt title, price 2s. 6d. This work is the fruit of the Editor's residence in Germany. He collected books of music for young people in every town he visited. With the aid of Mr. James S. Stallybrass, the whole of this collection was analysed, and the choicest translated or adapted for English use. The Editor, however, never preferred a German piece when an English one would do as well. He aims to educate the feelings and sympathies of childhood by the habit of singing good songs. This he considers the proper office of music in schools. He takes care that the three school ages (childhood, boy- and girl-hood, and youth) are suited with songs on the following subjects: Country Scenes, the Seasons, Fancy and Humour, Kindness to Animals, Home Sympathies, Patriotism, Industry, Integrity, Religion, &c. There are two hundred and sixty-seven songs. This work will doubtless supersede the Editor's widely-known 'School Music' and 'School Songs.'

ORGAN PLAYING.—It is much to be regretted that in this great Metropolis—so rich in many things, so poor in more—there can be maintained no organ of the first-class in a locality more suitable than a factory, and more accessible than a church, which might on certain days of the week be exhibited by the best players as a settled attraction of London. This, it may be recollected, the 'Apollonicon' was for many years.—Athenæum.

WANTED, an ORGAN for a congregation of a thousand. Apply, giving dimensions, &c., to Ezra Miller, Grocer, Sunderland.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

A. W. MARCHANT, Mus. Doc., Oxon., at Stirling, on November 23, aged seventy-one. His book of Five Hundred Fugue Subjects and Answers was typical of the energy and thoroughness that for many years he put into valuable editing and compiling for the benefit of students. His text-books, too, were of great worth. His career as a church organist took him to Mansfield, London, Denver (Colorado), Sevenoaks, Huntingdon, Dumfries and Stirling. He composed music for church choirs and male-voice choirs, a number of two-part and three-part vocal pieces, and voluntaries.

CHRISTINE NILSSON (Dowager Countess de Casa Miranda), at Stockholm, on November 22, aged seventy-eight. As Madame Nilsson retired from public singing before her fiftieth year, it is only the older generation that will remember her great impersonations of Violetta, Marguerite, Ophelia (in Thomas's Hamlet), and Elsa. Her singing especially appealed by its charm and intensity combined with perfect coloratura.

GILBERT H. BETJEMANN, at the age of eighty-one. Violinist (in the Covent Garden orchestra of 1856) and teacher, he was a man of many friendships and had many memories of notable people of the last century. For some years, in his later life, he conducted the Highbury Philharmonic Society.

H. B. BRANDRETH, on December 3, at the age of fifty-two. As general manager of Carl Rosa Opera he did valuable work in developing and co-ordinating the work of the Company, and he endeared himself to all who came in contact with him.

JOSEPH LAUDY, founder and proprietor of Laudy & Co., music publishers. He was born at Sittard (Holland) in 1802, and came to London in 1886. He was for some years in charge of the foreign music department at Messrs. Novello's, at that time in Berners Street.

J. GEORGE MORLEV, on November 22, at the age of seventy-four. A maker of harps, he was moreover an enthusiast and an artist, and he had a wide circle of friends in the profession.

IVAN CARYLL, born at Liège in 1861, the composer of Little Christopher Columbus, The Duchess of Dantzic, and many successful Gaity pieces, often in collaboration with Mr. Lionel Monckton.

ROBERT TURNBULL, music critic of the Glasgow Herald, on November 17, aged fifty-five. His all-round knowledge, his breadth and penetration, and his clear, happy style, infused his writing with much literary charm.

CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS died at Algiers on December 16, at the age of eighty-six. An article dealing with his career will appear in our next issue.

ENGLISH SACRED FOLK-SONG

The new session of the Musical Association opened auspiciously on November 1 at 160, Wardour Street, with a paper by Dr. Charles W. Pearce, Director of Studies at Trinity College of Music, whose subject was 'English Sacred Folk-song of the West Gallery Period (circa 1695-1820).' After alluding to folk-song in general, the lecturer defined sacred folk-song as melodic settings of 'psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs,' which, having been continually on the lips of the people, became treasured in their minds and stored in their memories. Its origin took us back a long way. Dr. Pearce was inclined to believe that some phrases of ecclesiastical song may have become sufficiently popular in various ways to have been sung or hummed by the people. Ritual song was succeeded by the stately metrical tune of the Day and Ravenscroft period. A generation or two later a fresh type came into existence, in which the tunes were more free in rhythm, more florid in their melodic outline, and brighter and more cheerful in their general tonal atmosphere. This particular school of English sacred folk-song flourished during the century and a quarter from the death of Purcell to the death of George III.

The Wessex novels of Thomas Hardy contained many references to the Church music of that period. In 'The Loudicean' one of the characters recognises that an old tune, 'New Sabbath,' appertained to '... the old west gallery period of Church music anterior to the great choral reformation and the rule of Monk—that old time when the repetition of a word, or half-line of a verse was not considered a disgrace to an ecclesiastical choir.'

The allusion here was to the late Dr. W. H. Monk, the first musical editor of 'Hymns Ancient and Modern.' His so-called rule—although largely anticipated by Turle, Goss, and Hopkins—was that which he persistently carried out of reducing the music to one dead level of rigidly uniform rhythm. Several tunes originally written in triple time were ruthlessly cut down to duple. All word-repetition and part-imitation were abolished; the square-cut four-part harmony was unrelieved by a rest for any voice. The 'great choral reformation' was the abolition of the west gallery choir of mixed-voices and unskilled orchestra, and the introduction of a more or less inefficient choir of men and boys in the chancel, accompanied by a harmonium or small pipe-organ.

The lecturer said he wanted to suggest that some of these old tunes were possible or even suitable settings of the mediæval office hymns translated by Neale. Sung to their proper plainsong melodies, many of which were extremely florid in character, these ancient hymns failed somehow to secure congregational participation. Sung to standard tunes—such as 'Melcombe'—the unfamiliar words challenged unfair comparison with popular hymns which by traditional usage had a prior claim to association with the well-known music.

Very often these old florid tunes had their orchestral preludes and interludes, and many of them finished with a vociferous Doxology. Such a tune was 'Falcon Street,' by Isaac Smith (1740 (?)-1800). Obviously the orchestras would vary considerably in the number and character of the instruments used from time to time. The return of some bandsman invalided from the wars might have temporarily brought a trumpet into the west gallery for a Sunday or two. At any rate, in many of the old tune-books published during this period we found melodies distinctly founded on the familiar trumpet-harmonic series, as for example in 'Portsmouth New,' though, like many tunes of the present day, it really suited only the first verse of the hymn.

Let us take, say, ten tunes of the period, such as 'St. Bride's,' 'Bedford,' 'Rockingham,' 'St. Magnus,' 'St. James,' 'Melcombe,' 'St. Stephen's,' 'Abridge,' and 'Wareham,' which are constantly sung somewhere or other. They represented a home-made art-form as essentially English in its individuality as the glee and the anthem, and there was no need for us to worship the German chorale, which after all owed so much of its present popularity to the glamour of a great name like that of J. S. Bach. We had no name of that magnitude to back up our traditional sacred folk-song of the west gallery period; and indeed it was only within the last few years that prominent musicians—like the late Sir Hubert Parry—had recognised the fitness of so many of these grand old tunes of ours for choral prelude and other treatment for the organ after the manner of Bach. If we placed by the side of the above ten English tunes, ten German chorales selected from the 'English Hymnal,' we should be compelled to admit that the smooth, graceful elasticity of our native productions completely put into the shade the Teutonic stiffness and angularity of the square-cut melodies made in Germany.

After alluding in considerable detail to many tunes and tune collections, Dr. Pearce went on to animadvert severely on the present fashion of employing secular folk-song—especially that of Welsh origin—in the place of hymn tunes written as such. The 'English Hymnal' was full of secular importations. This practice conjured up most undesirable associations. Would it not be in every way better to make a more liberal use of sacred west-gallery melodies?

Illustrations to the paper were contributed by a small choir of ladies from Trinity College of Music, and there was a discussion in which the Rev. W. J. Foxell (chairman), Dr. Spooner Lillingston, Mr. Theodore Walrond, Dr. Froggatt, Mr. Herbert Westerby, and the lecturer took part.

A NOVEL PERFORMANCE OF THE MESSIAH

It is not often that a public school undertakes the production of a big oratorio, and if it does so, it is probably with the aid of a select choir, a very small orchestra or the organ alone providing the accompaniment. The idea of giving every boy in the School a part in the production is, to say the least of it, uncommon, if not hitherto unknown; and twenty years ago such an idea would have been laughed at. Yet this is what has actually been done at Oundle School, on Sunday, December 11, with a performance of The Messiah, in which every single boy in the School—some five hundred and thirty strong—had his part to play: surely a sign of the more important position accorded nowadays to music in the life of a big school.

A performance of The Messiah was first suggested by Miss Carrie Tubb (Mrs. Oliveira), whose son is in the School: and she not only promised herself to assist, but also undertook to bring other soloists. The performance having been decided on, Mr. C. M. Spurling, the director of music, hit upon and developed the idea of giving the audience a part in the singing.

At first the idea was almost staggering, but the apparently impossible was undertaken, with an amazingly good result. Both choir and orchestra threw themselves with spirit into their work, and soon began to get a real grip of it. What presented a somewhat bigger problem was the training of the 'non-choir,' i.e., all boys not in the choir or orchestra. Certain passages in some of the choruses had been chosen, in which they were to join as well as the regular choir—passages like: 'Wonderful, Counsellor . . . ' in 'For unto us a Child is born,' and 'King of Kings and Lord of Lords' in the 'Hallelujah' chorus. But the 'non-choir' responded nobly, and soon knew its parts well. Of the actual performance a short account will perhaps suffice.

The first chorus, 'And the glory of the Lord shall be revealed,' was sung with a good grip and swing, the 'non-choir' coming in with considerable effect in such passages as 'For the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it' and 'All flesh shall see it together.' Of the solos it will not be necessary to speak in detail—they were given by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Norman Allin, and were immensely appreciated by the audience. The orchestral accompaniment was good throughout, but exceptionally so in Miss Carrie Tubb's solo, 'Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion.' The audience was greatly delighted by Mr. Norman Allin's reading of 'Why do the nations?' and 'The trumpet shall sound,' in which Mr. John Solomon played the trumpet solo. The other choruses sung were 'Oh, thou that tellest,' 'For unto us,' 'Glory to God,' 'Surely He hath borne our griefs,' 'And with His stripes,' and the 'Hallelujah.' The 'non-choir' took part in all of these, except 'Oh, thou that tellest' and 'Surely He hath borne our griefs.' The interpretation of the choruses was extremely good on the whole. They were a little spoilt by a tendency of certain parts to hurry—notably the tenors in 'And with His stripes'—and the reverse in a small section of the 'Hallelujah' chorus; but apart from these slight faults the choral singing deserves high praise. The entry of the 'non-choir' in the 'Hallelujah' chorus at 'King of Kings and Lord of Lords' produced a remarkably telling effect.

At the close of the performance the headmaster, Mr. F. W. Sanderson, addressed the audience. He expressed great gratification at the result produced, and complimented all those who had taken part. In recalling Miss Carrie Tubb's suggestion to him that the School should undertake The Messiah, he warmly thanked her and all those present for their help, and went on to express his gratitude to the conductor, Mr. C. M. Spurling, without whose indefatigable energy and direction the wonderful result could never have been secured. He also thanked the organist, Mr. G. W. Brewster (senior mathematical master), for the help he had given both in the performance and at the practices. Mr. Sanderson thought those present would be interested to know that the total time devoted to practices had been only about fifty hours. He also mentioned the fact that the performance had been transmitted to any stations within range by wireless telephony. A concert of gramophone music given in the Hall that afternoon had been heard at The Hague, two hundred and twenty miles away, and he hoped the evening's performance had likewise been heard. He named in this connection the boy who had worked untiringly at the wireless apparatus, H. L. Fletcher. Bouquets were then presented to Miss Carrie Tubb and Miss Margaret Balfour, and cheers were given in turn for the other principals. Miss Carrie Tubb addressed a few words to the audience, saying how extremely pleased she was with the result achieved. Mr. Ben Davies, speaking on behalf of the other soloists 'owing to his extreme youth,' told the School how pleased he was to be there helping in the production of this great work. He said he was sure they would always find pleasure in recalling the fact that they had sung in The Messiah, and he added, 'you will never forget this wonderful, majestic music.' Finally he congratulated every one upon the amazing result secured by so short a time of practice.

A. S. MACPHERSON.

THE ART OF THE BALLAD

By GERRARD WILLIAMS

Did you know that it is a very difficult thing to write a sentimental ballad? Until very recently I had imagined, from the profusion of the genus and from other symptoms, that to turn out best-sellers was far from being anything of an artistic achievement, and I dare guess that such has been your opinion also. Now, however, I have been converted, and the instrument of my conversion has been the perusal of an article on the subject in an esteemed contemporary. I find that it is necessary for the ballad writer not only to possess the art of the every-day poet or composer, but also, through many tribulations, to be able to place his finger accurately on the pulse—sorry! I mean pulse—of the great public; and I am astounded at the realisation of the vast number of super-artists who have achieved this dual goal. But perhaps—this in your ear—there is a big conspiracy afloat to prove that we really are a musical nation, and the never ending stream of these popular songs is actually the output of a small handful of the elect writing under many different names?

The article in question deals mainly with the writing of the lyrics, but there are a few general observations provocative of deep thought. First, the would-be ballad writer must 'study the style of the popular ballads of recent times'; he will then discover that 'while there is much diversity of style and individuality in the different pieces, they are one and all imbued with simplicity and natural charm.' When he has passed through this difficult and laborious apprenticeship he is up against a burning problem, to be solved only by further travail, as to whether the words or the music should be written first. Our author is of opinion that only a 'talented minority' have the 'dual gift of poetry and music,' and that in any event most composers prefer to take the lyric as the first step. He then definitely confines himself to consideration of the difficulties in writing or selecting the lyric. In this matter there is not the blessed and easy-going freedom permitted in the case of ordinary songs; the ballad lyric is hedged round with all kinds of restrictions and essentials. There should not be more than three verses and a chorus; corresponding lines must be of equal length, as any irregularity of metre disturbs the rhythm of the music; a refrain should be sought for having a different metre from that of the verses. Clearly no small talent is needed to surmount such obstacles—any but the finest artists would be floored every time. Even the subject is arrived at by strictly defined laws; it must have a definite message (not too original, though), and contain 'a strong love interest, a human touch all through, and perhaps a note of pathos.' The lyric is of great importance, for 'no vocalist of any standing would condescend to sing a ballad the words of which were of a poor standard, no matter how beautiful the music might be.' Sic transit another common delusion—that such questions were a matter largely, if not entirely, of £ s. d.

It might have been thought that the difficulties already enumerated were sufficient, but our author goes on to remark that the demands of the music are even more exacting than those of the lyric. After a few generalities (referring to the various approved methods of composing—on paper, at the pianoforte, on the violin, &c., with a 'singer to try over the air before you go any further'), he leaves us with the promise of a subsequent article and expresses the hope that what he has already written may be of some value.

It is; so much so that I have succumbed to the temptation to try and anticipate some of the points in his next article. I may probably be wrong (I have not served the necessary apprenticeship), but I should like to try.

First, select a simple key in which to write, and from the collection of ballads which you have made during your study of the popular style choose a quantity in this key. This will give you an ample diversity of chords and progressions which you will be safe in using. If these ballads happen also to be in the same rhythm as the lyric you are setting, your task will be somewhat easier. But try not to let this last question bother you too much; you must remember that if necessary triple time can always be converted into quadruple by (for instance) repeating a crotchet in each bar or changing it into a minim. You will find there are two methods of working, dependent on whether you prefer to compose at the pianoforte (or on the violin, &c.) or on paper. In the former case you will have carefully to memorise all your chosen examples so that you can start playing at any given point; then take from them various fragments, fitting these together mosaic-wise to suit your lyric; and finally transfer the result to paper bit by bit. In the latter case you can dispense with the memorising and copy your assorted fragments straight on to the paper. This last is not so simple as it appears, for you will probably find, when you come to play what you have written, that it will not fit together as well as you could wish and will need considerable re-shuffling of its component parts. It must be remembered that the air must be sufficient unto itself without any artificial aid from the accompaniment, and that you are restricted in the accompaniment to a definitely limited number of progressions (as exemplified in your models) to which the fitting together of your fragments must conform. As regards the air, there are also certain principles to be observed, chief of which perhaps is the necessity for a long-held high note at the end; and it has been found from experience that this is most effective on some such word as 'and,' 'of,' or 'the.' This is a hall-mark of success, and is one of the greatest factors in finding for the ballad its 'way into every home in England, from the lordly manor to the humble cottage.' The publisher looks at it lovingly, whether the ballad be otherwise good or bad, and it is often the touchstone in deciding whether he shall accept or reject a manuscript.

When you have surmounted all these difficulties, and the many others which our contemporary will shortly disclose, send a fair copy of the result to Charing Cross Road, or some other quarter where 'winners' are turned out, and then sit down and gather in your royalties till the time is ripe for another effort.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

An orchestral concert was given at Queen's Hall on Wednesday afternoon, December 7, the Principal conducting. The concert opened with Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Concerto in B flat minor, the first movement of which was played with brilliancy and vigour by Miss Olga Thomas, while in the remaining two movements Miss Dorothy Rivett showed that she was the possessor of much musicianly feeling as well as an excellent technique. An interesting performance was that of the first movement of a MS. Violin Concerto in D, by Paul Beard—the composer playing the solo part. The work is one of considerable promise, the solo instrument being written for with both knowledge and skill. The vocal items included a Recit. and Air by Handel (Miss Dorothy Collins), Hiawatha's Vision, by Coleridge-Taylor (Mr. Roy Henderson), and L'Adieu from Tchaikovsky's Joan of Arc, sung with much dramatic power by Miss Hilda Neale. The other instrumental pieces were Elgar's Cockaigne Overture, of which the orchestra gave an admirable reading, and a lively Rhapsody on Ukrainian Themes for the pianoforte by Liapounow, brilliantly played by Miss Anita Harrison.

The Lent term opens on Monday, January 9. A course of four lectures upon the history of music during the middle of the 19th century will be given by Dr. H. W. Richards. The first lecture will be on Wednesday, January 25, in the Duke's Hall.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The following new subjects have been added to the Associateship examination for 1922: (1) Pianoforte accompaniment, (2) elocution and declamation, (3) the teaching of aural training, sight reading, and musical appreciation.

An excellent spirit pervades the work done by the operatic class. It is so arranged that different casts appear at different performances of the same opera; most of the operatic students thus get to know the work in its entirety. The third Act of Carmen has been given in the Parry Theatre in this way, the members of the two casts providing their own dresses and make-up. In the use of this latter they have been instructed by Mr. Cairns James. Mr. Adrian C. Boulton conducted the orchestra, which consisted of College students, and the opera was produced by Mr. Clive Carey.

The following have been awarded Exhibitions: Joan E. Spink, Lily E. Parker, Edna M. Garrard, Nora B. Townend (pianoforte), Henry S. Taylor (composition), and Lillie W. Morrison (violin). The London Musical Society's prize for singing has been obtained by Ursula J. Gale, and the Edmund Grove Exhibitions by Helen T. Young (organ) and G. M. Corry Smith (pianoforte). M. J.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

A most useful course of lectures by Mr. Alec Rowley on 'Music Teaching for Children' including 'Musical Appreciation,' have during the term covered the ground indicated by the following headings: General principles of teaching; Teachers' difficulties; Pupils' faults; Use of pedals in pianoforte playing; Expression; Graded pieces, &c. Teachers attending this course were given facilities for the practical application of their note-book and memory knowledge by means of the classes conducted by Dr. Warriner on Saturday mornings, the syllabus of which included lessons to children (instrumental and vocal) under supervision. Identical opportunities will recur from term to term, as it is proposed to continue both lectures and classes.

The first fortnight of December was a particularly busy one. In addition to the preparation for the usual fortnightly concerts at the College, students who were members of the chamber music class, the choir, and the dramatic class, worked hard for what proved a much appreciated combined concert at Steinway Hall; and it was quite delightful to watch the earnest interest taken by the members of the orchestral class (with the student soloists) in the finishing bi-weekly rehearsals for their Queen's Hall concert which took place on December 8.

On December 7 a pianoforte recital was given by Mr. C. Budden-Morris, a professor of the College.

The following awards have been made: Grosvenor Gooch Prizes, Alfred Gibbs and Gilbert V. Sutton; Messrs. Chappell & Co.'s Prize to May Gough; Talent medal to Lilian Mann; Nasmith medal to Frank Idris Bilbe; and the Dando medal to Francis J. Britton. This last medal results from a gift by the parents in memory of their daughter, a former scholar of the College. These prizes and medals will be presented on the occasion of the inaugural address to be given by Dr. C. W. Pearce, on January 11, who has chosen for his subject 'A Jubilee retrospect of the Foundation and Growth of Trinity College of Music, 1872-1922.' As may be gathered from this title, the College is now about to celebrate the fiftieth year of a successful career as a teaching and examining body.

The evidence of success in the matter of its scheme of Local (pupils') and Higher (teachers') examinations is accumulative, for we find that at centres both at home and abroad the number of candidates presenting themselves has increased from year to year. For instance, at the recent distribution of certificates which took place at Brighton, under the presidency of Councillor F. Mott Harrison, it was stated that at the March examinations a record for the centre had been made, and that far from this being in any way attributable to the lowering of musical knowledge standards or slackening of examiners' methods, the exact opposite was the fact. It was the high standard of musical training and the consequent value of the awards that had earned for the College examinations the esteem in which they were held by teachers and students of music. In this connection an interesting and far-reaching innovation may be cited. It consists of the practice of sending a selected few of the College scholarship holders to such functions as that mentioned above, with the special purpose of performing examination syllabus music. This was done recently at the Portsmouth centre, where Dr. C. W. Pearce gave a short introductory address.

Other centres at which influential meetings for the distribution of certificates have been held, were Birmingham (where Dr. E. F. Horner attended on behalf of the College), Glasgow, Southport, and Golders Green, London (where Sir John McClure, chairman of the College Corporation and headmaster of Mill Hill School, presided).

It is with pleasure that we record Mr. Alfred Mistowski's success in obtaining the D. Mus., Oxford, degree, for his early training was gained as a scholar at Trinity College.

The Mewton Choir, Melbourne, gave an excellent programme of unaccompanied music, under Mr. W. A. Laver, on November 9. The composers represented were Morales, Dowland, Morley, Wilbye, Atterbury, Purcell, Bach, Coleridge-Taylor, Bantock, and Elgar.

Music in the Provinces

BELFAST.—It is generally believed here that the Philharmonic Society's performance of the Choral Symphony, on November 25, was the first in Ireland. In any case, the performance was a good one, which reflected great credit on Mr. Geoffrey Brown, the conductor. On December 10, after a performance of The Messiah by the Philharmonic Society, Mr. Brown was presented with a clock and a sum of money in appreciation of his work.

BIRMINGHAM.—The Choral Union sang Parry's Blest Pair of Sirens and Elgar's The Spirit of England on November 19, with Miss Emily Breare as soloist. The Orchestra played the Kosamunde Overture and Ravel's Pavane for a Dead Infanta. Mr. C. W. Perkins gave an organ solo—a Fantasia by an almost forgotten composer, C. E. Stephens. Mr. Richard Wassell conducted.—The City Orchestra's programme on November 27 included Gluck's Overture to Iphigenia in Aulis, Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto (Mr. Paul Beard), extracts from Sullivan's Tempest, and Charpentier's Impressions of Italy. Mr. Appleby Matthews conducted.—Mr. Rutland Boughton's Bethlehem was given its first concert performance by the City of Birmingham Choir on November 28. Mr. Appleby Matthews conducted, and the soloists included Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Mary Foster, and Miss Dorothy D'Orsay.—On December 3, the Choral Association, under its conductor, Mr. Joseph H. Adams, gave Boito's Mephistopheles, with Mr. James Howell, Mr. Walter Otley, Mr. Ronald Brooke, Madame Parkes-Darby, and Miss Mary Macqueen as soloists.—On the same evening the City Orchestra included in its scheme a couple of works by Arthur Bliss—Rout (Miss Grace Crawford) and the Storm Music written for The Tempest, conducted by the composer.

BOURNEMOUTH.—At the Symphony concerts during the past few weeks Mr. Dan Godfrey has given, in addition to more or less familiar works, Francesco Picciati's Pianoforte Concerto, Poema Gregoriano (with the composer at the keyboard), a new Pianoforte Concerto by Arthur Hinton (Miss Katherine Goodson), Malipiero's three Studies for small orchestra, Grieg's In Autumn, Sullivan's Masque from The Merchant of Venice, Svendsen's Norwegian Carnival, and the Intermezzo from The Boatwain's Mate, Dr. Ethel Smyth receiving a warm welcome on coming forward to conduct the last-named. Among the soloists who have been heard are Miss Marie Hall, Mlle. Juliet Folville, Siloti, Arnold Trowell, Albert Cazabon, and Lamond. Miss Vera Horton and Mr. Franck Mullings sang in a concert devoted to works by Granville Bantock.

BRADFORD.—Mr. William Baines gave a recital of his own compositions on November 24, at the Mechanics' Institute, the event being under the auspices of the British Music Society.—A young local pianist of promise, Mr. Geoffrey Tankard, played to a large audience on December 1 in an exacting programme, including Bach's Chromatic Fantasia and Fugue, Chopin's Funeral March Sonata, and a couple of Paganini-Liszt Studies.—At the Subscription Concert on December 9 Mr. Hamilton Harty obtained fine performances of the Götterdämmerung Finale (with Miss Agnes Nicholls singing the part of Brunnhilde), Strauss's Don Juan, Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade, and Elgar's Introduction and Allegro for strings.

BRISTOL.—Verdi's Requiem and Rossini's Stabat Mater were sung by the Choral Society at its second concert on November 19, with Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Robert Radford as soloists. The orchestral work was the Unfinished Symphony. Mr. George Riseley conducted.—The New Philharmonic Society (Mr. Arnold Barter) drew a large audience to Colston Hall on December 3, when, as usual, the programme was off the beaten track: Bach and Saint-Saëns pianoforte duets by Misses Irene Scharrer and Myra Hess, some Boughton songs by Miss Dorothy Silk, and a couple of choral works, Walford Davies's The Five Sayings of Jesus, and Handel's St. Cecilia's Day. Miss Silk and Mr. Steuart Wilson were the soloists. To mark the twenty-first birthday of the Society, and to show appreciation of Mr. Barter's work on behalf of modern music, the members have presented him with a grand pianoforte.

BROMLEY.—The Choral Society was in good form at its concert on November 29, when it was heard in an Elgar programme—King Olaf, and a couple of choral songs from the Bavarian Highlands. The soloists were Miss Sophie Rowlands, Mr. Walter Glynn, and Mr. Joseph Farrington. Mr. Frederic Fertel conducted.

CARLISLE.—On November 17 the Choral Society, with a band and chorus of two hundred and fifty, gave a successful concert in the Drill Hall, Dr. F. W. Wadely conducting. Miss Agnes Nicholls was the soloist in Schubert's Song of Miriam and Mendelssohn's Hear my Prayer. The main choral item was Elgar's The Black Knight. The orchestra played the Eroica.

CROSSHILLS.—The Choral Union sang A Tale of Old Japan and Stanford's Songs of the Fleet on November 26. Soloists: Miss Flora Woodman, Miss Emilie Chapman, Mr. William Laycock, and Mr. Frederick Taylor. Mr. Clement Waddington conducted a very successful concert.

DUBLIN.—Bach provided the bulk of the programme of a concert given on December 8 in aid of St. Ultan's Hospital—the B minor Violin Sonata (Captain Watson, violin, and Mrs. Ellen Duncan, pianoforte), the Concerto in E, and 'Slumber, Beloved' from the Christmas Oratorio, sung by Miss Baird, who also gave a group of songs by Mallison.

EDINBURGH.—The Dunfermline Choir (Mr. James A. Moodie) gave a finished performance of madrigals and part-songs in Usher Hall on November 19, the programme including Wilbye's Thus saith my Chloris bright and Walmisley's Sweete Flowers. Among the solo items was a Bach Prelude and Fugue for organ, played by Mr. H. T. Collinson. —The Paterson Orchestral Concerts opened their season on November 14, when the Scottish Orchestra under Mr. Landon Ronald gave a Beethoven programme, with Mr. Rosenthal as soloist in the Emperor Concerto. The second concert was devoted to Brahms and Wagner, and the third presented a more varied scheme—Beethoven's eighth Symphony, Rubinstein's D minor Concerto (Mr. Josef Hofmann), Ravel's Mother Goose, and works by Schubert, Turina, &c. The following week was again a blend of classical and romantic—a Mozart Symphony and Violin Concerto (Miss Jelly d'Aranyi), Berlioz's Carnaval Romain, Holst's Beni Mora, &c. Mr. Julius Harrison conducted the third and fourth concerts. —The Amateur Orchestral Society entered on its fiftieth year's work on December 6 with a concert at Usher Hall, Mr. Paul Della Torre conducting good performances of the Magic Flute Overture, Weber's Jubilee Overture, Grieg's Pianoforte Concerto (Mr. J. J. Imlay), and a work of his own, The Death of Hercules, the latter making a very favourable impression. —On the same evening the Edinburgh Trio (Mr. John Petrie Dunn, Mr. W. Watt Jupp, and Mr. Bernard Beers) gave a Beethoven concert, playing to an appreciative audience Trios in G major, E flat, and B flat. —The Bach Society had a crowded room on December 10 for its second concert of the season. The programme consisted of the Organ Toccata and Fugue in D minor, the Overture in D, and a couple of Church cantatas. Mr. Douglas Dickson conducted.

GLASGOW.—The Choral and Orchestral Union gave its fourth popular concert on December 3, at St. Andrew's Hall, a crowded audience showing keen enjoyment of fare that included Mozart's Symphony in C, the Magic Flute Overture, Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (Miss Jelly d'Aranyi), and Holst's Beni Mora. Mr. Julius Harrison conducted.

HASTINGS.—Purcell's Dido and Æneas was sung with great success on December 7 and 8 by the girls of St. Mary's Convent School, Baldslow.

HUDDERSFIELD.—The Holme Valley Male-Voice Choir gave its annual concert at the Town Hall on November 19, singing splendidly in Jenkins's The Assyrian came down, Walford Davies's Storm Joy, Boughton's Little Billie, German's O Peaceful Night, Hegar's Phantom Host, &c. The soloists were Miss Megan Foster and Mr. Allen Fransella. Encores came thick and fast. Mr. Irving Silverwood conducted.

KEIGHLEY.—The Keighley and District Orchestral Society opened its season with a successful concert, playing Berlioz's Marche Hongroise, the Egmont Overture, Eric Coates's Summer Days Suite, a selection from Iolanthe, &c. Mr. Arthur Lloyd conducted, in the absence (through illness) of Mr. J. B. Summerscales.

KENDAL.—A successful recital was given in the Town Hall on December 1 by Mr. Osmond Davis, tenor, and Mr. Gerrard Williams, assisted by Miss Sybil Cropper. The programme consisted of five groups of songs and a group of Gerrard Williams's pianoforte works. Encores were frequent, so much so that Mr. Williams by request played a second group of solos.

KIDDERMINSTER.—The Choral Society deserves credit for getting off the beaten track and choosing such a work as Hamilton Harty's Mystic Trumpeter for its concert on December 1. Mr. James Coleman sang the solo. The orchestra played the Hebrides Overture, the Entr'actes from Rosamunde, and (with Mr. A. Chatfield at the keyboard) Guilmant's Organ Concerto. Mr. J. Irving Glover conducted.

LEEDS.—The Choral Union gave a splendid performance of Hiawatha on November 16, conducted by Dr. Coward. The soloists were Miss Caroline Hatchard, Mr. Sydney Coltham, and Mr. Arthur Cranmer, and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra rose to the occasion with the chorus. —Mr. Eugène Goossens was in charge of the Leeds Saturday Orchestral concert on November 19. The orchestra was heard to great advantage in the Egmont and Prince Igor Overtures, the Peer Gynt Suite, and Mozart's G minor Symphony. Mr. John Dunn gave a fine performance of the Elgar Violin Concerto, and some solos.

LINCOLN.—At the Lincoln Musical Society's annual concert on November 23, Carmen was very successfully performed under the direction of Dr. G. J. Bennett. The band and choir numbered two hundred and fifty. There was an overflowing and enthusiastic audience. At the final rehearsal of the chorus, Dr. Bennett was presented with a cheque for £50, in recognition of his twenty-five years' devoted service as conductor.

LIVERPOOL.—At the Philharmonic Society's concert on November 29, Mr. Eugène Goossens conducted a comprehensive programme ranging from Bach and Cherubini to Manuel de Falla (Three-Cornered Hat Suite) and Ravel (La Valse). M. Siloti joined the orchestra in the fifth Brandenburg, and also played the Schubert-Liszt Wanderer Fantasia. Mr. Mullings sang a group of Bantock songs. —The Post Office Choral Society did good work at its concert on December 7, singing especially well in Bantock's Cruiskeen Lawn and Elgar's Weary Wind of the West. The singers drew on Handel for the first half of their programme—a string of extracts from The Messiah. Mr. Arthur Davies conducted. —At the Crane Hall recital on the same evening Miss Monica Scott sang songs by Frank Bridge, Martin Shaw, Herbert Hughes, and other native song-writers. Miss Ethel Atwood accompanied, and played solos. —Humour in choralism is sufficiently rare to make the concert of the Wallasey Musical Society, on December 10, something of an innovation. Having sung the kind of music one expects such societies to sing, it proceeded to unbend with a chorus called The Pump (C. T. West), in which is satirised a parish council debate, with interruptions said and sung. Further amusement was caused by a performance of Roddie's Jamie Shaw, in which the words 'Jamie Shaw, lend me your saw,' are treated alla oratorio. Mr. Wilfred Shaw conducted. —The Rodewald Society's concert on December 12 was provided by the Catterall Quartet, which gave excellent performances of Quartets by Hadyn (G major), Franck, and Howells (Lady Audrey Suite).

MALVERN.—Mr. F. H. Shera conducted the opening concert of the Orchestral Society on December 1, capital performances being given of works by Mozart, Schumann, Howells, Vaughan Williams, and Quilter.

MANCHESTER.—Casals was evidently the main attraction at the Hallé concert on November 17. He played the Schumann Concerto and a Sonata by Sammartini-Salmon, with the inevitable Bach extra. The orchestral items were the Barber of Seville Overture, Casella's Le Couvent sur l'Eau, and Beethoven's fourth Symphony. Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted. The C. W. S. Choir concert on November 24 was notable for fine choral singing in Bantock's Villon Ballade and Balfour Gardiner's Cargoes. Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Harold Williams sang solos, and the Catterall Quartet played some Beethoven and Tchaikovsky. At the Hallé Concert on November 24 the Symphony was Tchaikovsky's No. 4. Mr. Josef Hofmann was the soloist in Rubinstein's D minor Concerto, also playing a group of pieces by Rachmaninov, Chopin, and Liszt. At the Brand Lane Concert on November 27 Sir Henry Wood conducted a programme that included the Overture and Venusberg music from Tannhäuser, the Meistersinger Overture, Till Eulenspiegel, the Emperor Concerto (M. Moritz Rosenthal), the Peer Gynt Suite, &c. Mr. Baguley Walters conducted the New Mills Subscription Concert on November 30, the programme including Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, and solos by Miss Olga Haley and Mr. Archie Camden (bassoon). Mr. Granville Bantock conducted his Omar Khayyam (Part I) at the Hallé concert on December 1. The soloists were Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Frank Mullings (who owing to illness was unable to sing more than a small part of his rôle), and Mr. George Parker. Mr. Hamilton Harty was at the pianoforte, and also conducted the performance of Beethoven's C minor Symphony that completed the programme.

MORLEY.—The Choral Society, assisted by a contingent of the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, sang effectively in Samson, on November 30, with an adequate group of soloists, and conducted by the Society's trainer, Mr. John Groves.

NEWCASTLE.—The V.M.C.A. Choral Society, two hundred strong, gave a good performance of Elijah on November 23. Mr. James M. Preston skillfully supplied the accompaniments on the organ, and Mr. Arthur W. Lambert conducted. The Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union opened its thirty-fourth season on November 30, singing three movements of Bantock's Vanity of Vanities, Bach's Come, Jesu, come, and some Handel choruses. Miss Margaret Fairless—a native of Newcastle—played the Franck Sonata (with Miss Annie Eckford), and a group of solos. Mr. James Preston played organ pieces, and Mr. W. G. Whittaker conducted. The McConnell Wood Northumbrian Select Choir gave its second subscription concert on December 6, being heard to great advantage in part-songs by Elgar and Coleridge-Taylor. Mr. W. McConnell Wood conducted. The Glee and Madrigal Society gave its last concert of the year on December 8, before a crowded audience. It was a happy thought to mark the centenary of Callcott by singing a group of his glees. Mr. R. W. Clarke conducted. The Philharmonic Orchestra, at its concert on December 11, delighted a large audience with a varied scheme that included Vaughan Williams's Wasps Overture, the Unfinished Symphony, and Beethoven's G major Pianoforte Concerto (Miss Annie Eckford). Mr. Edgar L. Bainton conducted.

NOTTINGHAM.—Admirable choral singing was heard at the Albert Hall on December 3, when the two choirs trained and conducted by Mr. William Turner—the choir of the Philharmonic Society and the Ladies' Choir—joined forces at his annual concert.

OXFORD.—The Sheldonian Theatre was filled on December 4 when the Bach Choir, under Sir Hugh Allen, gave excellent performances of Bach's Come, Jesu, come, and Mozart's Requiem. Mr. Maurice Besley took charge during a spirited performance of Handel's G minor Organ Concerto, with Dr. W. H. Harris at the keyboard.

PORTSMOUTH.—The Philharmonic Society flew at high game on December 8, when it was heard in Vaughan Williams's Sea Symphony, but the excellence of the performance showed that the singers had not been unduly ambitious. The programme included also Stanford's Songs of the Fleet. The soloists were Miss Grace Crawford and Mr. Clive Carey. Mr. Hugh Burry conducted a fine evening's work by all concerned.

RAUNDS.—The Wesleyan Choral Society (conductor, Mr. W. W. Hall) successfully presented Elijah on November 17. The soloists were Miss Florence Mellors, Miss Edith Furnedge, Mr. Leonard Lovesey, and Capt. Horace Stevens.

RIPON.—The evergreen Maritana, eked out by miscellaneous items, received an excellent concert performance by the Choral Society on December 9. The principals were Madame Mabel Tomlinson, Miss Emily Fieldhouse, Mr. John Perry, Mr. Reginald Shackleton, and Mr. E. Woodhouse. Mr. R. Pfaff conducted. The hall was packed, and many people were turned away.

ROCHESTER.—Beethoven's Choral Symphony was introduced to this part of Kent on November 23, when the Choral Society gave an admirable performance under the baton of Mr. Hylton Stewart. Mr. W. H. Reed was the leader of the orchestra, which included a contingent from the L. S. O. The soloists were Miss Florence Mellors, Miss Elsie Chambers, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Samuel Mann. The programme was completed by Leonora No. 3 and Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast.

SALISBURY.—A Choral Society of about a hundred and fifty voices has recently come into being. It gave its first performance at the Cathedral on December 7 to an audience of three thousand, Dr. Alcock conducting a fine performance of The Hymn of Praise. The new choir, which has the backing of the Orchestral Society, has started its career in most auspicious style. Something of what is due to Dr. Alcock was expressed at the final rehearsal when he was presented with a cheque from the members of both societies.

SHREWSBURY.—The Philharmonic Society opened its third season on December 8 with The Golden Legend, Mr. F. G. Rowland conducting. The solos were sung by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Elsie Chambers, Mr. John Terry, and Mr. Harold Williams. The band was drawn chiefly from the Birmingham Symphony Orchestra.

Musical Notes from Abroad

BERLIN

The eighth Fortbildungskursus für Schulgesang in the old Meistersinger town of Nuremberg was visited by teachers, organists, choirmasters, and chorus-masters, along with academic and practical musicians from all parts of Germany, as well as from Sweden and Finland, who sought and obtained instruction and suggestions. He who came not as a fanatic adherent to any method but as an inquirer, returned satisfied and the richer by what he had seen and learned. The director of the course was Oberlehrer Joseph Schubert, singing-master at the Girls' High School at Nuremberg.

The Protestant Church Music Society for the province of Saxe has held a large Church music Festival at Halle. The chief attraction was the performance of a new play, Der Thomaskantor, by Arnold Schering. The author chooses Bach's fifty-third birthday for the time of the action. This permits the introduction of the Cantor's wife, his children—especially Friedemann and Philipp Emanuel—his friends, pupils, and enemies. Intense historical study was demanded in the writing of the play, and the Leipzig life and atmosphere of 1737 have been reproduced. The musical portions are all chosen from Bach. The work was presented by professors and students of the University of Halle.

Musical culture at Darmstadt has progressed for three years under Herr Balling, and concerts are now well attended and economically run. At his last concert Herr Balling produced two novelties. An Orchestral Suite from Richard Strauss's Bürger als Edelmann was sometimes easy to follow and sometimes puzzling. Its dramatic basis seemed to spoil it as concert music. A Violin Concerto in G minor, by Arnold Mendelssohn, proved a valuable addition to the repertoire. It has sincerity, melody, and life. Herr Drumm (leader of the orchestra) played it magnificently.

A Life of Brahms, by Walter Niemann (Berlin: Schuster & Löffler), is new in so far as the author has written a fearless critical study. The book contains an arresting biography and a valuable analysis of Brahms's works.

In performing Ariane et Barbe-bleu of Maeterlinck and Dukas the Aachen town theatre did not so much desire to build bridges as to show characteristic specimens of Western art. This work is interesting, but it does not warm. The German does not love gentle contours; he longs for dramatic life.

A novel experiment was made at the last concert of the Berlin Philharmonic Society, by providing all string players from the first violin to the contra-bassist with instruments that had been improved according to the Ohlhaver Veredlungsverfahren. The inventor, who does not divulge the process, claims that he can give to any ordinary fiddle the tone-quality of the old Italian violins. He has on several occasions submitted his invention to professional players, with, in almost every instance, astonishing results. At the above concert it had to be acknowledged that the string tone was, at any rate, not less powerful than when the members of the Society played on their accustomed instruments.

Bayreuth is in danger of being a thing of the past. The festival plays that before the war had achieved a high degree of perfection, cannot be carried on unless funds are forthcoming to lighten the responsibility of Wagner's descendants. The sum of three million marks is urgently needed if the performances are to be renewed in the summer of 1923. Those who purchase 'Patronatscheine' from the Richard Wagner Verein, Leipzig, will enjoy special advantages.

Another appeal comes from Eisenach, where the house in which Johann Sebastian Bach was born is in urgent need of restoration. It is feared that it may be necessary to pull it down unless money is immediately subscribed for repairs. The house, built in the 17th century, contains the Bach museum, with its many priceless treasures. Contributions towards a restoration fund should be sent to Prof. Straube, organist, Leipzig.

F. ERCKMANN.

PARIS

Despite the deplorable conditions prevailing—which are accurately described in the quotations from Louis Laloy and L. C. Battaille in last month's Musical Times (page 838)—concerts of all kinds are taking place in ever-increasing numbers. The wealth and variety of modern works performed speak volumes for the faith and industry of concert-givers.

At the Concerts Colonne the principal modern works have been: Le Conciliabule des Fleurs, a short tone-picture by D. V. Fumet; Fanelli's Impressions Pastorales; Pierné's Paysages Franciscains; and Le Chant de Schéhérazade, by Mario Versepuy. The excitement caused a few years ago by the 'discovery' of Fanelli, who was living unknown and poor in a suburb of Paris, and the subsequent performance of excerpts from one of the numerous symphonic works he had written, will perhaps be remembered. Whether he is interesting as a precursor only, or whether his works will survive, is difficult to decide from the five pieces now performed. Pierné's Paysages Franciscains proved very delightful.

At the Concerts Lamoureux were played on December 10 three fine Chorals by Kœchlin, and on December 4 a Suite by Nivard. Among other examples of contemporary French music recently performed have been Ravel's Tombeau de Couperin in orchestral form and d'Indy's Trilogy Wallenstein (Paxeloup), and Louis Aubert's Habanera (Conservatoire).

Koussevitzky's concerts at the Opéra have provided a good deal that is attractive: among other things Honegger's Horace Victorieux (its reception in the Press was very mixed), a fine choral work written in memory of the heroes of the great war by Kastalsky, and Moussorgsky's Rout of Sennacherib.

It is when turning to recitals and chamber concerts that one finds it difficult to omit no event of importance. The Parent Quartet at the Salon d'Automne, the Œuvre Inédite at the Salle Touche, the Revue Musicale at the Vieux-Colombier, the Heure Musicale at the Salle Gaveau, the Société Musicale Indépendante (S.M.I.) at the Salle Pleyel, the Samedis Musicaux at the Salle Albert I., along with countless soloists or groups in every concert hall large and small, are doing excellent work, and it is impossible to acquire the remotest idea of the true musical life of Paris unless one follows all these events pretty closely.

To show how difficult and how important it is to do so, a few of the contemporary works, French and foreign, performed recently, may be named: Grassi, Pianoforte Suite, Les Aquinoxes (Œuvre Inédite); Milhaud, Violin Sonata (Parent) and Poèmes Juifs (Bertha Albert); Roussel, songs, pianoforte pieces, and chamber works (Parent); Poulenc, La Hestiaire (Revue Musicale) and Le Gendarme Incompris (Wiener concerts); Migot, Mouvements d'Eau, for string quartet, and Blair Fairchild, Persian Songs (S.M.I.); Marcel Bernheim, Poèmes Arabes (Heure Musicale); A. Kulmann, Violin Sonata (Samedis Musicaux); Bartók, Pianoforte Suite, Op. 14 (Wiener concerts); Schönberg, Pierrot Lunaire (Wiener concerts—the method rendered famous by Bülow's duplicate performance of a Brahms Symphony was, not unwisely, resorted to); and, on various occasions, works by new-comers such as L. Bousserrez, G. Bas, A. Tansman, Marguerite Canal, &c.

As regards British music, the list is not particularly rich. Let us record, however, a performance at the Salle Pleyel of Ireland's Pianoforte Sonata, by Lawton.

Excellent concerts have been given by Blanche Selva (pianoforte works by Bord-s, de Séverac, and Albeniz); Vera Janac-pulos (French and Russian songs, Koussevitzky's Concerto for double-bass, played by the composer); the Chanteurs de Saint-Gervais (choral music and part-songs, ancient and modern); Jane Küllerath (contemporary French songs); Yvonne Péan (contemporary French songs and chamber music). Considerable interest attached to the concert given in order to introduce new bowed instruments constructed by a French luthier, Léo Sir. These are intended to take place above and between the usual five, and comprise a 'super-soprano' whose pitch is higher by one-fourth than that of the violin, a mezzo-soprano, a contralto, a tenor, and a baritone (both playing one octave lower than the viola), and a bass playing two octaves below the violin. The new timbres thus provided have induced composers such as Milhaud, Mariotte, Honegger, and others to write works where those instruments are used together with violin, viola, and violoncello. More cannot be said within the compass of this column.

A. BOLD.

ROME

The Augusteum (the city's chief temple of art, as Romans love to style it) fell on evil days when it was lent to the Fascists for their third congress at the beginning of November. These earnest politicians had a grand time in the theatre. They built fires on the stage, and fed them with the gilded seats of the orchestra stalls, shattered electric lamps in the dome with revolver shots, and explored the inner mysteries of the organ. The total damage has been estimated at about two hundred thousand Italian lire, and naturally, the opening of the winter concert season has been delayed. Nevertheless, it was hoped to begin on December 13; and the cartellone has been published, with announcements of promised visits from Nikisch, Albert Coates, Walter Bruno, Vaclav Talich (the Bohemian), Kurtwangler, Carl Flesch and Albert Spalding (violinists), Rosenthal and Casella amongst the pianists, and Bossi and Nadia Boulanger amongst the organists. Mr. Coates's visit promises to be interesting, seeing that he is to conduct works of Purcell, Delius, and Holst. And apropos of Purcell, the organist of the Lateran confided to me recently that he is preparing a programme of organ music of English composers of the 16th and 17th centuries. A good sign of widening views—may good fortune wait upon his venture.

The programme of the Costanzi also promises many good things. The novelties announced for the season are Romeo and Juliet of Zandonai, La Grazia, of Michetti, Isabella Orsini, by the Florentine maestro, Renato Brogi, and Emiral, by Bruno Barilli, the well-known critic of the Tempo. The Italian operas represented will be Tosca, Falstaff, Rigoletto, and Puccini's Trittico, Andrea Chénier, Barbière, and Hallo in Maschera, along with Mascagni's Marat. Foreign opera will include Die Meistersinger and Tannhäuser, Rosenkavalier, and Boris Goudonov. Amongst the conductors to visit the Costanzi are Fritz Renier, of the Dresden Opera, Mascagni, Zandonai, and two new Italian maestri, Vincent Belleria and Gabriel Sanfina.

LEONARD PEYTON.

TORONTO

The season here is now safely under way, musician, music-lover, and the general public having had ample opportunity during the past two months to satisfy variable or precise taste, as the case may be. From a novelty point of view, the Scotti Grand Opera Company's production of Leonini's L'Oracolo (first performed at Covent Garden in 1905) and Massenet's La Navarraise attracted a good deal of interest. The intensity of characterisation displayed by Antonio Scotti himself in the part of Chim Fang will not easily be forgotten. The other operas given were La Tosca, La Bohème, and The Barber of Seville. Alice Gentle, Joseph Hyslop (Chicago Opera Company), Stracciari, Martino, Mario Laurenti, Queena Mario, Anna Rosella, Italo Picchi, and Angeles Ottein were worthy of particular notice.

Chamber music has been specially favoured by the first appearance in this city of the Letz String Quartet (in conjunction with the new Chamber Music Society) and the second of the London String Quartet, which is on tour in America. Most interesting was the difference in programme and style of the two bodies—the one delicate, artistic, and dainty, yet giving a sound reading of the works, the other bold, manly, yet refined, with a masterful interpretation as remarkable as it was perfect. The English critics need have no fear that this Quartet is deteriorating. In its present condition it will always satisfy an appreciative audience.

The first two of Mr. Campbell McInnes's Nine O'clock recitals were particularly well attended and appreciated. The series of four comprise 'The Art Song from the 15th to the 18th century,' 'Folk-Song (Traditional Ballads, Songs, and Melodies of the British Isles),' 'The Polyphonic Period (Bach),' and 'Schubert's song-cycle, The Winter's Journey.' Both as an education and as a lesson in interpretation this series is creating a deep impression.

Concert recitals have been given by Madame Louise Homer and Miss Cora Chase, Madame Galli-Curci, Henri Czaplinski (of the Hamburg Conservatory), Ferdinand and Madame Fillion (of the Toronto Conservatory), Paul Kochanski, Arthur Friedheim (of the Canadian Academy), Madame Helen Stanley and Edmund Burke, Madame Lazzari and Bauer.

A concert under Mr. Damrosch on November 9 provided Rachmaninov's second Symphony, Le Rouet d'Omphale, Tannhäuser, and the Andante from the String Quartet in A (Op. 8, No. 5) of Beethoven. Miss Bertha Crawford, a promising young Toronto coloratura, showed a distinct and unusually refined style in the hackneyed 'Caro Nome' from Rigoletto.

In conclusion a few words about the new Chamber Music Society would perhaps be of interest. At the end of last season the organization was formed under the presidency of Mr. Vincent Massey, and the direction of the leading musicians of the city, both professional and amateur. Local artists are to be heard in all except two concerts each season. This year the Letz and the Flonzaley Quartets are the visitors. It is a rule at each general concert that a work of a modern British composer be heard. Last year Frank Bridge and Dr. Healey Willan were the favoured. A practice room and library are in course of preparation.

Rehearsals of the following organizations are now in full swing: The Mendelssohn Choir (Mr. H. A. Fricker), the National Chorus (Dr. Albert Ham), and the Oratorio Society (Dr. Edward Broome).

NEW YORK

While certain minds are exercised with the question 'Who will take Caruso's place?' it would seem that his share of popularity has fallen upon the soprano, Amelita Galli-Curci, whose first appearance at the Metropolitan made a sensation.

The more critical music crowd waited for the premiere of Korngold's Dead City, presented at the first matinée. This opera was first heard at Vienna about two years ago, and since then it has been given a number of times in smaller cities on the European continent and has met with partial but not overwhelming success. The same verdict has been pronounced at New York. For a boy of twenty it is certainly a remarkable composition, but its remarkable qualities are principally disclosed by his knowledge of how to do it and not by what he has done. His erudition is boundless. He shows an intimate acquaintance with the great masters of composition who have preceded him, but originality on his part is not the result. A master of orchestration, he has twined and intertwined phrases and ideas of one composer after another in a marvellous way, with no clear and definite idea of Korngold himself left on one's mind. The vocal part of the score is tremendously difficult. The rôle of Marietta was so well sung and acted by Mlle. Marie Jeritza (who created the part at Vienna) that one must acknowledge the success of the new singer to be far greater than that of the opera itself. The rôle of Paul (the lover who sees in Marietta a reincarnation of his dead wife) was entrusted to Mr. Orville Harrold, who did wonderfully well considering his various handicaps, not the least of which was his being unaccustomed to sing in the German language.

The Dead City was the first opera to be given in German at the Metropolitan since that tongue was barred in 1917, and it was quickly followed by a performance of Tristan und Isolde, given also in German. Its fine performance last year in English will be remembered. The cast of last season reappeared—Matzenauer, Gordon, Semlach, and Whitehill, two Americans and two Germans, and Miss Gordon had to re-learn her part, having never sung Brangäne except in English. To those who, like the writer, believe that every opera should be given in the language of the country where it is performed (as is done in Germany and in Italy), it seems a great pity to put Tristan back into German again. Perhaps it was done to satisfy the clamour of the German element among music-lovers; but Germans who make their home here should first and foremost be Americans, and make no demands and ask no favours of that kind.

In the concert halls the two pianists who have attracted the most attention are not newcomers, but old favourites reappearing after long absences. William Bachaus last played here eight years ago, and although he then received almost unstinted praise from his most critical listeners, yet he has climbed still higher on the ladder of fame. His sincerity and modesty remain unchanged, and are even more remarkable in the face of almost insurmountable technical difficulties which he conquers with absolute ease as if the word 'difficult' was unknown to him.

Ernest Schelling returns to us after an absence of four years of war duty, but neither the roaring of guns nor life in the trenches has dulled his brain nor stiffened his fingers. He was an artist of the first rank before he left us, and his forced retirement from his pianoforte has but served to increase his artistic ability. In his able playing of compositions by Bach, Schubert, and Chopin he also showed that he possesses a rare sympathy with and understanding of Spanish music. He was heard in compositions by Enrique Granados.

A Caruso Memorial Concert was given at the Metropolitan Opera House on the afternoon of Sunday, November 27. The house was sold out at opera prices, and the receipts—about 12,000.00 dollars—were given to the Verdi Home for Aged Musicians at Milan. A bronze bust of Caruso was unveiled and presented to the Metropolitan, on behalf of Mrs. Caruso. (It is sad to have to confess that the bust bears no resemblance to the great tenor.) M. H. F.

Miscellaneous

At Timaru, N.Z., on October 13, the Orpheus Choir, under Mr. A. W. V. Vine, sang Elgar's After many a dusty mile, Lee Williams's Song of the Pedlar, and many other part-songs.

The Index of Volume lxii. (January to December, 1921) of the Musical Times is now ready, and can be had, post free, by subscribers, on application to the publishers.

H.R.H. Princess Beatrice has been pleased to accept a copy of Madame Agnes Larkcom's book, The Singer's Art.

CONTENTS

	Page
The Truth about Beethoven. By Ernest Newman...	11
British Players and Singers I.—Harold Samuel (with Special Portrait)...	15
Charles Kœchlin. By M.-D. Calvocoressi (concluded)...	19
Our Lost Operatic Lead. By Herman Klein...	23
The Bach-Elgar Fugue. By Harvey Grace...	21
The Origin of Samson and Delilah . By Camille Saint-Saëns...	23
New Light on Early Tudor Composers. XXIII.—John Lloyd. By W. H. Grattan Flood...	24
Misdirection in Oratorio Singing. By George Gardner...	25
New Fiddles for Old...	27
Stravinsky Day by Day. By Alfred Kalisch...	27
Occasional Notes...	28
The Musician's Bookshelf. By 'Feste'...	30
New Music...	37
Gramophone Notes. By 'Discus'...	38
Music in the Foreign Press. By M.-D. Calvocoressi...	39
London Concerts (with Portrait)...	42
Opera in London. By Francis E. Barrett...	44
Chamber Music for Amateurs...	45
Church and Organ Music...	46
Sporr and his Influence. By C. à Becket Williams...	49
Letters to the Editor...	50
Sharps and Flats...	53
Sixty Years Ago...	54
Obituary...	54
English Sacred Folk-Song...	55
A Novel Performance of The Messiah . By A. S. Macpherson...	55
The Art of the Ballad. By Gerrard Williams...	55
Royal Academy of Music...	56
Royal College of Music...	56
Trinity College of Music...	57
Music in the Provinces...	57
Musical Notes from Abroad...	59

Music:

The Night Wind . Part-song for Four Voices. By GEORGE RATHBONE...	33
--	----

THREE EXTRA SUPPLEMENTS are given with this Number:

1. Portrait of Harold Samuel.
2. Serenade Choral Song for S.A.T.B. By Edward Elgar.
3. Competition Festival Record.

DURING THE LAST MONTH.

Published by NOVELLO & CO., LIMITED.

BACH, J. S.—"Iesu Dyrchafedig" ("Jesu, meine Freude"). Motet. Welsh adaptation by REV. GWILYM WILLIAMS. 2s.

BAXTER, F. N.—"Spirit of our God." Vesper Hymn. 1d.

BISSLEY, J. G.—"Cold the winter wind is blowing." Christmas Carol. 1½d.

BRIDGE, SIR F.—"The Old Cryes of London." With numerous illustrations and musical examples. 7s. net.

CHAMBERLAIN, N.—"Benedicite, omnia Opera," in D flat. 2d.

DALE, B. J.—"Before the paling of the stars." 1st Violin, 1s. 6d.; 2nd Violin, 1s. 6d.; Viola, 1s. 6d.; Violoncello, 2s. 3d.; Basso, 1s. 6d.

DURING THE LAST MONTH—(continued).

HAILING, R. G.—"Covenanters' March." (No. 86, Original Compositions for the Organ. New Series.) 1s. 6d.

HALWARD, EVAN.—"Lead, kindly Light." Sacred Song. Two Keys. 2s. each.

HAMILTON-GELL, F. A. W.—A Christmas Carol ("See amid the winter's snow"). 1d.

HULBERT, H. H.—Eurythm (Thought in Action). The Principles and Practice of Vocal and Physical Therap. 9s. net.

HULBERT, H. R.—"Rest." Part-Song for S.A.T.B. 6d.

JACQUES-DALCROZE, E.—Rhythmic Movement. Vol. II. 7s. 6d.

JENNINGTON-BICKFORD, W.—"Hush! hush! He sleeps" Christmas Carol. 1d. each, or 2s. 6d. per 50.

RATHBONE, G.—"The Night Wind." Part-Song for S.A.T.B. (No. 947, The Musical Times.) 2d.

REED, W. H.—"A reasonable woman." Part-Song for T.T.B.B. (No. 575, The Orpheus.) 4d.

SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW, No. 355.—"The Lullaby of Mary." Melody by D. CORNER (1649). With varied Accompaniment by W. MCNAUGHT. "Christmas comes but once a Year." Melody by R. L. DE PEARSALL. Arranged for S.S.A., unaccompanied. 2d.

TONIC SOL-FA PUBLICATIONS:
DALE, B. J.—"Before the paling of the stars." Christmas Hymn for Voices and Orchestra. 1s.

TONIC SOL-FA SERIES:
No. 2376. "O lovely voices of the sky." Carol. For Mixed Voices. C. HARRIS. 2d.

PUBLISHED FOR

THE H. W. GRAY CO., NEW YORK.

BILBRO, M.—Southern Negro Spirituals. No. 1. "Whisper in ma yeah." No. 2. "By the weeping willow." Each, 60 cents (2s. 6d.).

FORSYTH, C.—"Idyll." For Contralto Solo and Three-part Chorus of Women's Voices. 10 cents (4d.).

GAUL, H. B.—"I saw one star." Song. 60 cents (2s. 6d.).

HALL, W. H.—Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in F. 25 cents (1s.).

JAMES, P.—"By the waters of Babylon." Anthem. 15 cents (8d.).

KNUDSEN, C.—"Glory be to God on high" ("Gloria in excelsis"). 20 cents (10d.).

LEMARE, E. H.—"Christmas Bells." For Organ.

LESTER, W.—"In a Cloister Garden." (Idylle.) For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

SARMOLIN, A. L.—Canzone Pastorale. For Organ.

WERBE, W. Y.—"Ecstasy." For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

WHITMER, T. C.—March for a Festival. For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

ZIMMERMANN, W. P.—"An Evening Idyl." For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

— "A spring day." For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

— "On a rainy day." For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

— "Scherzo." For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

— "Song of Triumph." For Organ. 75 cents (3s.).

ESSAY. — A.R.C.O. — "THE RUDIMENTS OF CRITICISM." Four valuable models with hints. Enclose 3s. 6d. to "Essay." c/o Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.1.

EXPERIENCED ACCOMPANIST, disengaged, desires regular work with singer or orchestra. Terms moderate. "E. A." c/o Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour St., W.1.

MISS RITZ, L.R.A.M. (trained in Paris), has a few VACANCIES for the Easter Term. Pianoforte, Solfège, Theory, Harmony. Preparation for Examinations. Apply, 266, Elgin Avenue, W.9.

Reproduced from a Photograph by Lavano.

ALBERT SAMMONS

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

FEBRUARY 1 1922

BRITISH PLAYERS AND SINGERS:

II.—ALBERT SAMMONS

Perhaps the most interesting phenomenon about contemporary British music is the gradual breaking down of long-standing prejudices which impeded the way of the active musician and gave rise to those facetious legends about England—the country which supports the largest number of concerts and is the best customer of the musical publisher—being ‘not musical.’ The first prejudice to go concerned pianoforte playing. After Lamond, Fanny Davies, and Leonard Borwick it was no longer possible to suggest that English fingers could not perform nor English brains understand great classical conceptions. Then came the turn of composition, and the triumphs of Elgar amongst the dictators of musical taste in Germany at the beginning of the century set finally at rest another mischievous fallacy. The last prejudice to fall related to violin playing, and this achievement is undoubtedly due to Albert Sammons.

Albert Sammons comes of a family of musicians. He learnt to play the violin from his father and his brother. Apart from a few lessons from Ferdinand Weist Hill, and half-a-dozen lessons from John Saunders, he has never had advice or instruction from anybody. He owes his present eminence mainly to natural aptitude and to his unusual powers of observation, as his playing amply demonstrates, for he has none of the tricks of style which enable the listener to identify the particular school to which the player belongs. That is perhaps one of the reasons why, on the whole, recognition has come to him long after it was due. There is this to be said for Continental institutions: the machinery for ‘spotting’ talent or genius at an early age works more efficiently than it does with us. A single excellent performance of Goldmark’s Violin Concerto was enough to establish the young Rose high in the opinion of his countrymen. Nor was it long before Willy Hess or César Thomson, excellent though not supreme players, were honoured in their own country as they deserved to be. Albert Sammons instead began his career in the ranks of the orchestra. He was not long there—fortunately, for our credit’s sake. Sir Thomas Beecham, who had engaged him, had a quick eye and ear for a good player, and when he made his arrangements for the next season he offered Sammons the leadership, which was accepted.

SAMMONS AS ORCHESTRAL LEADER

Never before had a British orchestra had such a leader. It was not only that his great technical skill enabled him to play with exceptional charm of tone and finish the solos which fell to the lot of the ‘first fiddle.’ Sammons possesses all the other qualifications of a leader which are infinitely rarer than the ability to play a little solo effectively. A leader must, above all things, be a good musician, and understand not only his own instrument but the difficulties and problems of all his colleagues, for he is often asked to act as deputy for the conductor, and always acts as liaison officer between the conductor and the most important orchestral department—the strings. Sammons’s early and close connection with music and musicians must have given him special advantages in this respect. It is sometimes of distinct benefit to be un enfant de la balle. But still in another sense Sammons made an ideal leader. There are some violinists who appear to be playing to themselves; there is the second class of those who give an impression of playing merely for the sake of the audience; yet a third class exists—less numerous—of violinists whose playing affects first and directly their own colleagues. The best orchestral leaders are all drawn from the last category. Sammons has in an unusual degree the power of making his individuality felt in such a way as to inspire other players to do their best. This phenomenon may be noticed when he plays accompanied by the orchestra under a good conductor. It is evident when he leads a quartet. It was one of the features of his term of leadership of the Beecham Orchestra. Monteux, who conducted the first Russian Ballet, knew him at once for what he is, and engaged him to lead the Dieppe Symphony Orchestra in 1914. It was of course inevitable that so distinguished a soloist should, in time, abandon the leader’s desk and devote all his time to solo work; but our orchestral loss is irreparable.

While he was with the Beecham Orchestra Sammons had also one or two exceptional opportunities for proving his worth as soloist. When Ariadne auf Naxos was first given in London under Sir Thomas Beecham the important and difficult task assigned to the solo violin was performed by Sammons in a way that delighted all who knew what good playing is. Accepted as a leader of very exceptional skill, Sammons had yet to be acknowledged as a soloist. His gifts were known and appreciated by the few, and his performance of Saint-Saëns’s B minor Concerto at a Patron’s Fund concert at the Royal College of Music was so successful that he was asked to play it again in the presence of the composer at a concert which was patronised by the King and Queen. But some prejudice had still to be overcome before he could come into his own. The London String Quartet however—which Sammons led for nine years—showed for the first time that in this field, as in many others, British instrumental players were equal to the best that the Continent could produce.

THE LONDON STRING QUARTET

The London String Quartet was a challenge to public opinion. Quartet playing has long been regarded, and justly, as a field reserved for the aristocrats of the instrumental world. The dash and the tricks of style which count for so much on the platform when a meek accompanist or a humbled orchestra follow the soloist's dictates are as nothing when it comes to quartet playing. The leader is matched by performers of equal or very nearly equal skill. The repertory consists almost entirely of music which on account of its rarer beauty and depth must always appeal much more to the select few than to the many. Its performance demands, above all, finish of execution and perfection of detail, for there is no chance whatever of a flaw passing undetected. Thus when Messrs. Sammons, Petre, Warner, and Warwick-Evans first appeared before the public as a quartet they were claiming right of admission into the very citadel of the most exclusive classicism. And they were appealing to exacting judges. Seekers after sensationalism are never attracted by string quartets. The success was immediate and decisive. The exclusive judges frankly and liberally acknowledged the great merit of the four young English performers. Only as soloist Sammons yet had to wait for his opportunity. That opportunity came with the War.

SAMMONS IN THE GUARDS

The events of 1914 are so recent in the memory of all that there is no need to recall the parlous conditions of music after war was declared. Music, which later gave solace to so many weary warriors and restored health to a few—its possibilities as healer have only begun to be appreciated—was set aside for a while as a luxury, and the first concerts were tolerated rather than welcomed as a demonstration that business could be carried on as usual in spite of the worst the enemy could do. When later it became evident that music could still claim a share, however modest, in the life of the community at war, another difficulty sprang up—who could take the place of the performers Germany used to supply not gratis, indeed, but in such large quantities? It was then that Sammons came to the fore and revealed himself to the great public. Every appearance brought home more definitely the fact that he is not merely a good, but a master violinist. He played the Elgar Concerto ('the best violin music in existence,' said Sammons), which nobody had touched after Kreisler, in a way that enthralled the composer as well as the audience. He brought out the Delius Concerto, playing from memory and with ravishing ease a composition more difficult to memorise and, in some ways, more difficult to play, than any other work in existence. He himself believes that the concert at which the King and Queen were present marked an epoch in his career. But it is certain that the great public only realised his qualities after the memorable performance he gave of Elgar's Concerto, under the conductorship of the composer, at Queen's Hall. That event set the seal on his reputation.

When it became evident that victory was only possible if we had on our side not only right but also the big battalions, Sammons joined up, having the honour to be chosen for the Grenadier Guards. He passed well the medical test, but when training at Caterham Camp became intensive a marked tendency to rheumatism revealed itself. He was sent amongst the musicians, and given a clarinet to play upon. History does not say whether he excelled with this instrument as he does with the violin, or whether the sergeant-major offered him assistance in deciphering musical notation. Later he went with the band to Paris, and the Parisians had the pleasure of hearing one of the greatest violinists of his time play the clarinet.

COMPOSER AND TECHNICIAN

Comparatively few people who are not violinists or quartet players know Sammons the composer. Yet his Fantasy Quartet won the prize at a Cobbett competition, and has been very warmly received in the concert-room. Sammons, however, is modesty itself about his compositions. In showing the score he will himself point out the sections he considers least successful, and yet he undoubtedly possesses one qualification for writing great music—he knows when it is wise to stop. 'When I wrote it at first,' he will tell you, 'the Quartet lasted twenty minutes. In its final form it lasts just seven.' If all young composers adopted and practised this method of ruthless curtailment new music would excite less suspicion, and be more generally welcomed than it is. He has written besides some widely-known studies for the violin embodying the fruit of long observation and vast experience. These have the merit of giving in synthetical form all that the violinist needs. Owing nothing to tradition, and being thus, so to speak, a non-party man, Sammons is not blind to the error of most violinists who believe that only one path—their own—leads to victory, while all the others lead incidentally to disaster. 'Could Ysaye,' asks Sammons, 'be a greater violinist than he is if he held his fiddle as Prof. Auer says it must be held?' It is no use upholding dogmas with a man who has climbed and tested unaided every step of the ladder right up to the highest.

If it is true that every excellent performer is born to his art or his instrument, this is true of Albert Sammons in a special way. He is the born violinist par excellence, devoted to his instrument and everything connected with it, a generous appraiser of others' great qualities, but also a shrewd critic, whose remarks on Kreisler or any other master violinist are never inspired by bias but always by that most rare gift—common sense.

F. B.

An Opera by Dr. Cyril Rootham entitled The Two Sisters, will be performed at the New Theatre, Cambridge, on February 14. The cast will include Miss Gladys Moger, Miss Dorothy Giles, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. Clive Carey, and Mr. D. D. Arundell will conduct.

THE EMMANUEL MOOR PIANOFORTE

BY ERNEST NEWMAN

The present article was sketched out, but not actually written, for this month's number of the Musical Times, and was intended to help to prepare the way for the first public demonstration in London of the new Emmanuel Moor pianoforte by Prof. Donald Francis Tovey, which I had been given to understand was to be some time in February. The date was, however, changed to January 9, and before this article was written the January number of Music and Letters had appeared with an exhaustive article on the subject by Prof. Tovey himself. To that article I beg to refer the reader as the best possible statement of the nature and possibilities of the new instrument, so far as performance is concerned. Prof. Tovey has had more days alone with the new pianoforte than I have had hours; and though the rudiments of special technique necessary for it suggest themselves to you with surprising rapidity, and though you realise in the first ten minutes of your personal acquaintance with the instrument a number of the ways in which it is going to expand the resources of the player as well as remove some of his everyday difficulties, naturally the longer you experiment with the instrument the more you learn about it. Prof. Tovey's playing of a number of works at the Aeolian Hall demonstration showed that he had mastered a great deal of its special technique. The trouble is not in the nature of the two keyboards themselves, but in our having to do consciously at first what, in ordinary pianoforte playing, is done sub-consciously: we have to be fighting down, at every moment, the impulse to do things in the old way. But one soon learns to think in terms of the two manuals, and to adjust one's fingering accordingly; and children who begin their pianoforte practice on the new instrument will know none of the little troubles that the grown-up experiences with it at first.

My only object in this article is to draw the attention of a wider public to the Moor pianoforte, to send every one to Prof. Tovey's admirable article, to question or supplement one or two of his conclusions, and to consider, briefly, the possibilities of the instrument from the point of view of the composer. It is natural that at first it should be discussed mostly from the performer's point of view. But it is evident that an instrument that does so much for the player can do quite as much for the composer. No sensible person supposes that all we are going to do with it is to play ordinary pianoforte music on it with less trouble, or other sorts of already existing music that are either very difficult or quite impossible on the present pianoforte. Sooner or later composers will begin to write direct for the Moor instrument, which, it is no exaggeration to say, offers them a far greater expansion of present resources than the pianoforte of Chopin offered him in comparison with the harpsichord.

For the benefit of people who may still not have seen any accounts of the new instrument, let me briefly say what it is, and what one sees at the first glance it can do. It has two keyboards, one higher than the other, the upper one sounding note for note an octave higher than the lower, which latter, of course, by itself gives us just the usual pianoforte. A middle pedal couples the two mechanisms, so that, with this pedal, anything played on the lower keyboard is doubled at the octave higher. On the lower keyboard, each white note has, at the end furthest from the player, a little raised 'step,' about an inch long, and the same height as the black keys. By this means certain stretches across the two keyboards become easier than if the lower white note were struck in the usual place. (Incidentally I may remark, for the benefit of those who like firework effects, that this line of white steps makes a chromatic glissando the easiest thing in the world.) By a simple device, worked in less than a second, the instrument becomes, to most intents and purposes, a harpsichord. Its tone, of course, is not an absolute reproduction of that of the true harpsichord: Prof. Tovey's excellent description of it is 'a generalised harpsichord tone.' But it is quite near enough to the original to make it certain that no one with the right instinct for the older music will go on playing it on the pianoforte when it can be played so much in the character of the original on the Moor cembalo.

Anyone can see, merely from a description of the new instrument, that it can do a great deal that the present pianoforte cannot, but I have been surprised to find, in conversation with even musical people, that though they recognise this in the abstract, they cannot fully visualise it in the concrete. At the risk of labouring the elementary, therefore, let me give an example or two of things that become, with the two keyboards, as simple as a five-finger exercise; this, for instance:

Ex. 1.

or this, from Elgar's Quartet:

As Prof. Tovey not only pointed out but proved at his demonstration, a single pianist can now play most four-hand music: about one bar in ten pages, he said, is all that will escape him. Whole pages of string quartets become quite easy. This passage, from the Elgar Quartet, looks pretty fearsome to the present-day pianist:

but it is all as easy as wink on the Moor pianoforte, except for the right hand in bar 3. For completeness' sake I ought to add that the two A's in the bass clef in bar 2 are only possible by relinquishing the lower one on the lower keyboard before striking the higher one on the higher keyboard.* (The reader will remember, of course, that the higher A does not lie an octave distance away from the other, but is the note immediately above it on the higher manual. The instrument does the transposing.) As there is only one set of hammers and strings for the two keyboards, it is evident that a note cannot be sounded afresh in a higher octave so long as it is being held in a lower one. Before I had seen the Moor pianoforte—having only read of it—I was curious to know whether the action was double or single, for obviously, if it were double, some new problems of resonance would be set up for both performer and composer. It may be true, for instance, that this:

played with the pedal coupler on, will, so far as the mere notes are concerned, give us this:

whether the action is double or single. But in the former case the central C will obviously be louder than in the latter case, for it alone of the three notes will be struck twice—once by the finger, as the highest note of Ex. 4, and again by the coupling mechanism, as the octave of the lowest note of Ex. 4. This thickening of inner notes would have to be reckoned with by both composer and player; sometimes it would suit their purpose, sometimes it would not. So long as the mechanism remains as at present:

* Of course we can play both A's in the usual way on the lower keyboard if we like.

cannot be struck on the upper keyboard (on the key lying immediately over on the lower keyboard); so long as it is being produced from the latter by means of the coupler. But Mr. Moor tells me that for the instruments that the Æolian Company is about to make he has invented a double escapement that will permit of this sort of repetition.

It is not my purpose to discuss in any detail points of technique pure and simple, if only for the reason that I have not had time enough at the instrument to grasp much more than the rudiments of these. But we have only to experiment for an hour with it to realise that certain points of technique are not merely technical: they concern the composer quite as much as the player. Theoretically, you get the same result whether you play a passage in octaves in the old way or play it in single notes on the lower keyboard and turn on the coupler; but in practice the results are often by no means the same. A certain suggestion of difficulty, we may almost say, is inseparable from the proper effect of certain passages. Prof. Tovey has touched upon this in relation to Liszt's Campanella. On the Moor pianoforte this can be played with ease at three or four times its proper pace. But to do so is, in a sense, to give the listener something rather different from what Liszt meant him to hear, though the actual sounds may all be the same. Undoubtedly some of the charm of the Campanella comes from the sense of doing a difficult thing and doing it thoroughly well; just as the interest of a tight-rope performance comes from the fact that it is a tight-rope the lady is walking on, and that at a perilous height, and it would not be the same thing if the rope were an inch thicker and only a couple of inches off the ground. As Prof. Tovey puts it:

'... the true technique of the Campanella is a set of graceful and precise muscular movements... the impression conveyed by the music is undoubtedly that of wide, accurate, and rhythmic leaps. Consequently any method of performance which destroys the muscular action and touch suggestive of that impression destroys the whole point of the piece; nobody, for instance, has ever dreamed of so futile a thing as to arrange it for four hands.'

It may seem absurd that our way of playing a thing, our overcoming of certain difficulties in it, should have anything to do with the meaning of the music, but so it is in many cases. Let us take an example with which every student of the pianoforte will be familiar—this passage from the C minor Study of Cramer:

Make this easier, and you nullify it; its very effect depends on the element of adventure in the rapid ticking-off of some of the awkward intervals. This can be done only by means of certain flying pressures: and it is these pressures that give the awkward notes just the piquancy the composer has planned for. Even out all the notes by mechanism, and the charm of the passage has gone.

It seems to me that this often subtle association between the idea of a passage and the way the composer has calculated on it being played on the ordinary pianoforte will force itself more and more on the performer's attention as he becomes familiar with the Moor pianoforte. Perhaps even Prof. Tovey is inclined to make too light of it. I imagine he goes too far when he says that with the new instrument 'I do not think you will have much use for martellato octaves again'; and 'when you have heard the kind of octaves produced by Mr. Moor's coupler, you will realise that there is little or no æsthetic value in any kind which the coupler, or certain other resources of the new instrument, cannot produce.' It is quite true that much octave playing is unnecessarily ugly: but it by no means follows that every octave passage will sound just the same with the coupler as it did when played in the usual way. Some passages certainly sound better—infinately smoother and more musical. But with others the very meaning of the composer (as in the Cramer case just cited) is indissolubly bound up with the technical means he had in his mind. At his demonstration, Prof. Tovey played in the ordinary way an octave passage from one of the Chopin Polonaises (I forget at the moment which it was, but bars 26, &c., of the F sharp minor Polonaise will illustrate the point), and then showed how much more easily it was done in one part plus the coupler. But as he did so, the ejaculation came spontaneously from several people near me, as it did from myself, 'But it's not the same!'

It certainly was not, and I doubt whether it can ever be made the same. The fire and the pride of the passage depend in part on the special muscular tensions involved in octave playing, and on the octave fingering: substitute for these the fingering and the pressures of one-part playing, and it seems to me impossible to get the same effect

You may delude yourself that you are getting it more easily than you will your hearers.

Until composers begin writing specifically for the duplex coupler pianoforte, we shall of course have to play the existing music upon it: sometimes in order to simplify the normal difficulties of this music, sometimes in order to reproduce works that are beyond the scope of two hands on the ordinary pianoforte, sometimes to give our favourite music a scope that the present medium cannot give it—as when we 'score,' as it were, a Bach organ prelude or fugue for the Moor pianoforte. But it will be a very little time before both performers and composers discover that the expansion that the duplex coupler pianoforte can give to all music will not invariably suit the music. History shows that people have been always curiously slow to realise that a new instrument is a new instrument, not an old one in a new guise. The tendency is always to delight in the tone or the resources of the new instrument, but to play it and write for it at first in the manner of the old. It was not, for instance, until it was realised that the violoncello was not merely another sort of viola da gamba that players worked out its special technique and composers learned how to exploit its special possibilities of expression.

The Moor pianoforte is partly the old pianoforte, partly a quite new instrument. Like all instruments, it will do thoroughly well only what thoroughly suits it. It will be very accommodating when you ask reasonable things of it, and very stubborn when you become unreasonable. A very slight acquaintance with it will, I think, bring it home to the performer that the coupler pedal must be used with discretion. We cannot double harmonic notes as we like. So far as I can see, even Prof. Tovey has failed, in the first few days of his experience of the pianoforte, to recognise this fact. He quotes the theme of Chopin's A flat Polonaise:

which, with the coupler, would sound thus:

whereas Chopin, when he expands it to the octave, writes it thus:

'I believe' [says Prof. Tovey]. 'that after a little acquaintance with the instrument, the conviction will grow that if Chopin is going to turn in his grave at future performances of his works, it will be at performances which reject the coupler in a passage of this type, rather than at those which use it.'

I am afraid I cannot follow Prof. Tovey here. To me it seems that Chopin's way of expanding the resonance of Ex. 7 is right, and the coupler's way would be wrong. The lower notes of the lower thirds in Ex. 8 bring, for me, an alien element into the original idea. They draw a thick and rather clumsy line under the melody; they deprive it of that sort of clean-limbed motion that is in Ex. 9 no less certainly than in Ex. 8. I believe that even if Chopin had had a coupler pianoforte he would have deliberately refrained from writing the passage in its fortissimo form, as at Ex. 8. And numberless other instances could be cited of music becoming subtly changed by a too consistent doubling of inner notes.

Similar problems confront us when we begin to utilise the new possibilities of expanded harmony through the cross use of the two keyboards. In many cases the carrying of an outer part up into a higher octave or down into a lower one will not essentially alter the mental effect of the harmony: we merely feel that this is taking big strides instead of little steps, but that it is in essence the same. But there are cases in which this sort of expansion of the harmony gives rise to an interval that is theoretically the same as the original, but is instinctively felt to be æsthetically something slightly different. Here is a passage, for instance that can quite easily be played thus on the new pianoforte:

Ex. 10.

Ex. 11.

and, for the most part, it sounds delightful in this form; the thirds and sixths and diminished fifths in the right hand please the ear even more as tenths and thirteenth and twelfths. But these tell essentially the same tale as the thirds, &c. With the seconds of Ex. 10, however, the case is rather different. Their piquancy becomes something like harshness in the ninths of Ex. 11; their acid tang is charming in a small dose, but just a little grating in a large one. I am not contending for a moment, of course, that a composer will not be able to use these expanded dissonances. The point I am urging is that he must use them with a clear sense of the effect he wants to make—he must think in terms of them; whereas if they come upon him by accident in the course of an innocent and more or less automatic expansion of a narrower harmonic scheme they may say something rather different from what he intended. It is worth noting that the asperities of the ninths in Ex. 11 are much more pronounced on the pianoforte than on the harpsichord—a matter, evidently, of different overtones. A new sort of 'scoring' will be possible for the pianoforte in the new instrument, but the principles of it will have to be worked out in strict conformity with the unchangeable nature of pianoforte tone: analogies drawn from other instruments or from the orchestra will be misleading. But the composers will soon get to the root of this as of other matters when once they begin composing for the new pianoforte. They will first of all seize eagerly upon the most obvious advantage the instrument offers them—the opportunities for a more spacious polyphony. Bach's clavier counterpoint, as we have all discovered to our cost, is sometimes more effective for the eye than for the ear. It is not only that the parts sometimes run awkwardly for the fingers, as here and there in the E flat major fugue in the First Part of the Forty-eight. Occasionally there comes a passage in which the smooth flow of the parts can only with difficulty be made distinct to the listener, not merely on account of the fingering but because of the congestion of the harmonies—as in bar 15 of the third of the Three-Part Inventions. The Moor pianoforte will help both performers and composers in two ways in affairs of this sort. The added keyboard makes it unnecessary for the fingers of the two hands to get in each other's way, as they sometimes do on the single manual; and the ease with which big intervals can be spanned will make for a more spacious and more sonorous polyphony than has ever before been possible on the pianoforte.

A NOTE ON THE MIND'S EAR

BY PHILIP HESELTINE

I.

Of the mind's eye we hear, colloquially, often enough; the mind's ear, however, is a phrase less familiar to us, and upon the nature and workings of the mind's ear psychologists have as yet shed little light. But the mind's eye and the mind's ear are cognate instruments of imagination possessed to some extent by everyone. Visual and auditory memory are universal. In retrospection, the mind's eye and ear look backward into the past; but in creating and imagining, the same organs (if they may be so-called) are employed to look forward into the future, to span the gulf between the known and the unknown. The faculty of mental audition—that is to say, the ability to think in sounds as easily and as logically as most people think in visual images or in concepts—is still mysterious; and how music is composed is still a matter for inconclusive discussion. It is not primarily an æsthetic question. The real significance of a work of art is not affected by any knowledge we may possess of its composer's methods of work. Let the painter, if such be his pleasure, hold his brush between his toes, so long as traces of this idiosyncrasy be not apparent in the finished picture. But methods of work have a perennial fascination for the curious; and apart from that class of being for whom an artist's personality is more engagingly revealed in anecdotes about his habits than in his work, there is no doubt that the study of methods and the resultant attention paid to sketch-books and variorum readings may yield results of considerable educational and psychological value.

Many people are prone to forget, by reason of music's dependence on time for its realisation in sound, that the term 'composition' has exactly the same meaning when applied to music as it has in relation to a painting or a piece of sculpture. A musical composition is a rhythmic entity, and should, like a picture, be viewed æsthetically as a whole, though we can contemplate it as such only in retrospect. Rhythm, in its strict sense of the ordered co-relation and interdependence of parts in the fashioning of an harmonious and organic whole, is the all-important factor. But the very word rhythm has been so debased by musicians that this, its true and only vital signification, is now hardly understood by them. There are, however, a few notable exceptions, as, for example, Prof. Tovey, who in a recent lecture insisted that logical design in music was far more dependent on the sense of movement (by which is obviously meant not the mere physical movement, but the flowing lines that define the relationship of parts to the whole, and make the whole more than a mere agglomerate of parts) than on thematic development. He might have added that it is still less dependent upon—indeed, incompatible with—that rigid pre-conceived idea of 'form' which corresponds but too closely to that of the dramatist who exclaimed, 'And what is a plot good for except to bring in good things?' This of course applies equally to so-called abstract music poured like blancmange into rigid shapes, and to that kind of 'programme' music in which sequence of ideas takes precedence of their relation and imposes on them a no less rigid shape.

A musical composition, then, must be conceived as a rhythmic embodiment of a state of mind or of soul, conditioning its own form into which it will flow inevitably and spontaneously from start to finish as though it were improvised without a break. It should be seen whole (or rather overheard, if this word be not taken in too literal a sense) at the outset as clearly as a painter sees before him the vision to be embodied on his canvas. It cannot be asserted that this is what does happen in every case, but it is the ideal of the act of conception by a mind in which the creative musical faculty were developed to the fullest possible extent. But between the vision and its externalisation comes the problem of technique, the problem of methods, the problem of detailed execution, the vast and impossible-seeming problem of making every bar, every note relevant and necessary to the scheme of the whole. In some this process is largely unconscious, almost automatic; others must make immense efforts in its achievement. The mind works in a variety of ways in different individuals for the accomplishment of large aims not dissimilar in themselves. And, as has been said above, the result alone matters from the artistic point of view.

II.

There are some who maintain that the mind cannot conceive and hear with the inner ear combinations of sounds which the physical ear has not already heard—experimentally, at any rate (this applies as well to score-reading as to score-writing). Hence the very prevalent belief that every composer must rely to some extent upon the pianoforte, or some other experimental instrument, in the process of composition. This implies that although he may know the kind of sound he requires, he does not hear it accurately with the inner ear. The poet might make similar use of a dictionary. And in the process both might light upon something more than they were looking for—an inspiration of the kind celebrated in the legend of 'the lost chord.'

It is possible that some composers, like most students of text-book harmony, do not actually hear with the inner ear the sound-combinations which they write on paper, but arrange them in accordance with some logical but extra-musical plan. (Blancmange again, but this time with fortuitous ingredients.) The fugue form, for instance, might easily be abused in this way, and yet nobody but the composer himself could tell, when the work came to be performed, whether in actual sound it expressed his intentions or not. Many a young composer must have had the disquieting experience of listening to an entirely strange and unfamiliar work—written, however, by himself.

The general public clings to the notion that composition is impossible without the aid of the pianoforte, or some other keyboard instrument. This belief was recently fortified by a pronouncement from Dr. Vaughan Williams (whose methods of composition have, it is rumoured, led to complaints from his neighbours); and Mascagni has even made use of an ingenious instrument which notates automatically whatever is extemporized on the pianoforte to which it is affixed. The composer who cannot play any instrument, and the music-lover who claims the ability to read a score, are still generally regarded with a certain scepticism and incredulous contempt. When Berlioz was found wandering about the mountains, note-book in hand, sketching his Overture to King Lear he was arrested as a spy, and his protests that he was not making notes in a secret cipher were received with ridicule by the police.

It is well known,' they said, 'that music cannot be composed without a pianoforte.' Berlioz we know could not play the pianoforte. But his case provides no rule, and the fact remains that a great deal of music, especially at the present time, is either extemporized at the keyboard or else is built up of fragments discovered, more or less fortuitously, at the pianoforte and afterwards unskillfully glued together.* There are many musicians in whom thought and the means of expression are not at one—that is to say, in whom thought is unclear, imperfectly realised, for thought is not thought until it is embodied in some potential form of expression. Hence, as in a prophet's mantle, wrapped in the mood that surrounds the elusive thought, they experiment with sounds at the keyboard until they light upon a passage that seems by some subtle affinity to evoke what their minds have been unable to define. These extemporizing composers are, in extreme† cases, but little removed from the appreciators of the music of others—people who, on hearing a particular passage, will exclaim to themselves: 'Ah, that is what I have always felt, only I could never express it.' But the public cannot wholly rid itself of its romantic ideas about the faculty of improvisation. The musician delivering his message 'in profuse strains of unpremeditated art' is too fair an image to be effaced by facts. And indeed it does seem at first sight that improvisation is a more spontaneous outpouring of the emotions than the more deliberate and slow-footed process of composition on paper. The magical power of sound is amply attested in legendary lore—Orpheus himself, for example. And such words as enchantment and incantation themselves bear witness to the power of tonal formulæ if not to that of spontaneous song. We cannot figure to ourselves the nature of such music of legendary power, but we feel somehow that it could not have been written down without losing its peculiar potency: or perhaps that it could not have been written down at all—like music heard in dreams, convincing and overwhelming when it is heard, but vanishing without a trace on waking, or at most leaving but a banal and mocking memory of itself in the mind. To the non-musician spontaneity no doubt seems incompatible with conscious elaboration in form and structure. Mozart, however, has left it on record that his greatest joy in composition was to overhear a work in his mind complete in all its parts and details in a single moment of time—in much the same way as one might survey the moon, through a gigantic telescope, spread out as a map before one's eyes. To some this simple utterance of Mozart will seem incomprehensible; to others it will appear as a practical reconciliation of those seeming opposites—spontaneous unity of design and elaborate multiplicity of detail. Logical coherence in music is not wholly dependent upon such abnormal clarity of vision as was Mozart's; it is not impossible that without this faculty of instantaneous conception a great work may be executed, either ex improviso upon an instrument, or with travail and heavy labour upon ruled paper. But the ultimate quality of rhythmic logic can only be achieved by a mind that functions naturally in a logical and orderly manner; and it is this quality that distinguishes a fine organic work from disconnected fragments strung together in an inconsequent medley. Still, a glamour hovers over extemporization; and indeed the extemporization of a master may have qualities for which we might search his written compositions in vain. And when we read accounts of the improvisation of Beethoven or Liszt, we cannot help feeling, perhaps unreasonably, that for all their rich legacy of written works, we have yet missed something of their spirit that can never be recaptured.

SAINT-SAËNS AS I KNEW HIM

BY HERMAN KLEIN

'Why is it, Maitre,' I once asked him, 'that you love slipping away from your friends and lying perdu where no one can find you for weeks or even months at a time?'

'Because,' he answered, 'there are times when I feel that I must have solitude—to be alone and think and dream; above all, to work just when the humour takes me. I like good company, but I like hard work still better.'

'But what if some day you should slip away and never come back?'

'Oh! I am bound to come back.' Then, with a shrug of the shoulders, 'Only if I do not bring myself it won't be my fault!'

And precisely in this fashion it was to happen. Soon after witnessing the revival of his Ascanio at the Opéra at Paris towards the middle of November, he went off quietly to Algiers, his favourite spot for escaping the detested fogs and wintry cold. It was not to work this time, but to take a rest—a long rest. For he died there very peacefully on the morning of Friday, December 16, nine weeks after celebrating his eighty-sixth birthday. A week later they took him back to Paris, and on Christmas Eve, amid all the pomp and circumstance of a State funeral, buried him at the Montparnasse cemetery, after singing a Mass before a vast congregation at his old Church of the Madeleine, where he had officiated as organist for nineteen years (1858-77).

Charles Camille Saint-Saëns, membre de l'Institut, Grand' Croix de la Légion d'Honneur, Commander of the Victorian Order, Mus. Doc., honoris causa, of the University of Cambridge, &c., was born at Paris on October 9, 1835. A musical prodigy of the most amazing type, he could play early Mozart and Haydn well and compose capital waltzes and galops at the age of five. Six years later—for three of them a pupil of Stamaty—he made a brilliant débüt as a boy pianist at the Salle Pleyel. At the age of fourteen he entered the Conservatoire and studied the organ under Benoist, composition and orchestration under Halévy. In 1851 he carried off the premier prix for organ playing; two years afterwards, when eighteen years old, he was appointed organist of the Church of Saint-Merry. Meanwhile, he was beginning to earn a reputation as a pianist and composer. Ere long his fame grew world-wide, especially after his cantata, Les Noces de Prométhée, had won the first prize at the Paris Exposition of 1867; though, as an operatic composer, not until some years later, when his Timbre d'Argent was produced at the Théâtre-Lyrique and his Samson et Dalila, through the good offices of Liszt, at Weimar. The extraordinary story of the rise to popularity of the latter work is too familiar to need to be recounted here.

* Notable examples may be found in the work of Cyril Scott.

† At the other extreme we see Beethoven experimenting with thematic fragments on paper.

His other operas are little known outside France. They include La Princesse Jaune (Opéra-Comique, 1872), Etienne Marcel (Lyons, 1879), Henry VIII. (Paris Opéra, 1883), Proserpine (Opéra-Comique, 1887), Ascanio (Paris Opéra, 1890), Phryné (Opéra-Comique, 1893), L'Anctère (Monte Carlo, 1906), Déjanire (Monte Carlo and Paris Opéra, 1911), and the one-act opera, Hélène (Monte Carlo and Covent Garden, 1904). To their composer it was always a matter for wonder that the English public, who made so much fuss over him and his music whenever he visited us, did not insist upon having most of these operas produced in London, instead of giving nothing but Samson. Well, if Henry VIII. had succeeded better at Covent Garden in 1898, things might have been different. Ten years later another French school had come into vogue.

When Saint-Saëns began touring immediately after the Franco-Prussian War he was a delightful pianist—in fact, with Alfred Jaëll, quite at the 'top of the tree' among his compatriots. Both used to appear every season at the Musical Union, whose refined concerts (directed by the late John Ella) were held in the middle of the floor of St. James's Hall, the subscribers and their friends being grouped in a circle round the performers. Amid these intime surroundings—the most perfect ever devised for listening to chamber music—I heard Saint-Saëns play several of his early works, including the Pianoforte Quartet and the Trio in F, long before I had the privilege of being introduced to him at my parents' house by my old master, Manuel Garcia. His music at that period had about it a strange, exotic ring, a touch of newness that suggested Berlioz rather than the modern German school, yet not exactly reminiscent of either. In short, it sounded original.

Original, too, was the man himself. He could be the soul of politeness, yet he was often brusque and impatient to a degree, and never hesitated to deliver himself of an emphatic adverse opinion, uttered generally with a rapidity, a staccato jerkiness, that made him difficult even for a Frenchman to understand. He knew more English than he would admit, but my efforts to make him converse in or write it rarely succeeded. One of his jokes was to sign formally a long letter in French, 'Your obedient servant, C. S.-S.'

He was not much over forty when I first knew him (myself being little more than a youth), and I recollect noticing that he had never shaved. All through life, indeed, his dark, neatly-trimmed beard always looked shapely, even when it had turned grey; while his piercing eyes, which seemed to penetrate to one's very brain, never lost a vestige of their fire. His pen, like his tongue, could combine a charming ready wit with a pungent irony and spirit of satire which spared nothing and nobody that roused his ire. I often felt glad that he had quickly taken a liking for me, and later in life, when I saw how few people he really cared for, I was proud to be reckoned among his intimate friends. If genuinely fond of anyone it was surprising how affectionate he could be for so undemonstrative a man. His letters prove this, and I possess over a hundred of them.

His was the most versatile mind that I ever encountered in a musician. There seemed to be no great subject that he had not studied, no great question that he had not pondered deeply. Had he not been a famous composer and a distinguished artist, he might have been the Sainte-Beuve of music in his own epoch. His many clever writings show that he had a brilliant pen; they also prove that he rarely if ever allowed his prejudices, strong as they were, to override his commonsense. If he had a weakness it was for tremendous speed in everything. He talked, wrote, composed, read a thirty-line score, corrected his proofs, got through rehearsals, walked on and off a platform, all at the same consistent allegro, yet without undue haste or a trace of carelessness. He would travel by the fastest express, and he loved our London hansoms; but he drew the line at the Paris taxis because he knew they were not safe.

To realise the universality of his genius and his abnormal capacity for hard work, it is only necessary to glance at the long list of his compositions included in the recently-published biography of Saint-Saëns by my friend, Arthur Hervey. That he could write in any style we all know, but he had too much imagination, too much resource, too rare a wealth of melody to stoop to plagiarism. When in the early days he was accused (stupidly) of borrowing from Wagner, his answer was:

'I admire deeply the works of Richard Wagner in spite of their bizarre character. They are superior and powerful, and that is sufficient for me. But I am not, I have never been, and I shall never be of the Wagnerian religion.'

For many years Saint-Saëns stood in the van of French musical progress. Withal he respected and obeyed tradition, he hated sensationalism, he despised eccentricity and pose. For this reason—for no other that I can conceive—it has become a habit with certain writers in this country to disparage and belittle his talent. In France they know better. To prove this, let me quote some sentences from the eloquent oration pronounced over his grave by the gifted composer and critic, Alfred Bruneau :

‘The enormous, formidable, mighty life-work that he leaves behind brings him into direct relation with the great classics of whom he is the last descendant. Like them, he approached every kind of music with equal mastery—was he not the Mozart of his time, the boy-prodigy, and the prodigious man also?—and he trod all the paths of his art with the same sureness. Tradition attracted him more than innovation. To defend it when threatened he fought with a vivacity, a courage, a violence that was extraordinary. If he would not consent as a composer to alter the customs established by his predecessors, if he refused to overthrow the existing harmonic system, his creative rôle was marked no less by exceptional magnificence, his lion’s claws cut no less deeply, no less incomparably, in every score that he wrote. Samson et Dalila, Le Déluge, the Symphony in C minor—those three splendid peaks, with innumerable lesser heights—have won in universal estimation a place that they will hold so long as beauty lasts, so long as orchestras and choirs shall gather together to move and charm us.’

That is a very fine eulogy, and I think it is true. Certainly it is shared by the whole—or very nearly the whole—of musical France. Even his most extreme ‘futurist’ countrymen thought no less of him because he openly combated their views. They may have feared such a ‘born fighter’ (de tempérament batailleur), as M. Bruneau described him, but they also admired him as a splendid Frenchman.

He would often tell me how sincerely and deeply he was attached to this country :

‘I can never forget how I was received when I first came to London, a refugee from Paris during the siege of ’71. I was just starting my series of symphonic poems with Le Rouet d’Omphale. But it was to England that I naturally looked later on as the field for my choral works. I was happy when La Lyre et la Harpe was given at Birmingham, and my 18th Psalm at Norwich. One likes to be appreciated in the home, par excellence, of oratorio.’

He was to have his disappointment in this direction before he bade us his final farewell; but never, to my knowledge, did he retract the opinions expressed in his Portraits et Souvenirs, apropos his visit to Cambridge in 1893 to receive his doctor’s degree. Here they are :

‘Since I have been studying England I have always found it eager for music, patient in listening, reserved in its appreciation, interested in the art, and quite capable of welcoming with enthusiasm the works and artists that have been able to please it. The British public is polite to the point of applauding when it is bored; but what nuances there are in its applause, how easy to sift the truth when one is not too anxious to cherish illusions!’

And again :

‘These fêtes at Cambridge have left behind one of the happiest impressions of my artistic career. I have come back confirmed once more in the belief that the English love and understand music, and that the contrary opinion is a mere prejudice.’

On one point, perhaps, he formed a wrong idea. He thought because, as he said, English appreciation had been responsible for some of the masterpieces of Handel, Haydn, Weber, Mendelssohn, and Gounod (omitting, curiously, Beethoven’s ‘Choral’ Symphony), that it demanded, at least in oratorio, a partial adherence to certain stereotyped forms and methods of treatment adopted by those composers. When he took in hand, after many years of indecision, my biblical text of the oratorio, The Promised Land, which he wrote for and conducted at the Gloucester Festival of 1913, I distinctly suggested to him that this was not the case. He understood, but did not heed my warning. Whilst looking over the score with him at the Grosvenor Hotel, he saw me smiling at the Handelian passages where Moses brings forth water from the rock. His remark was characteristic :

‘Que voulez-vous ? To properly illustrate, must not music be realistic? Handel and Mendelssohn thought so. So did Gounod, with his descending chromatic scale, when Mephistopheles at the Kermesse brings wine out of the cask. This incident appeals to me in the same way.’

Obstinacy was one of the maitre’s failings, and he paid for it in this instance by setting some of the critics against a work that the world will one day estimate at a higher value. Nevertheless he did not mind that so much as he did the fact that one or two of them had printed their adverse criticisms before hearing the music. He mentioned this to Sir Hubert Parry when we met him in the street, just after the full rehearsal of The Promised Land in the Cathedral. Genial, lovable Sir Hubert thus made reply :

‘Don’t let it annoy you, cher docteur. You have put much beautiful music into your score, and I have thoroughly enjoyed listening to it. For a man of your years it is a marvel. Remember we cannot applaud in a Cathedral, but have no fear about the ultimate verdict.’

A night or two later he gave an exquisite performance of the Mozart Pianoforte Concerto in B flat—the same work that he played at the 'Saint-Saëns Jubilee Festival' which I had had the honour of organizing at Queen's Hall in June of the same year—and was recalled to the platform quite half-a-dozen times. The memory of that evening was the pleasantest reminiscence that he carried away from Gloucester. After all, applause is the very salt of the artist's existence.

Saint-Saëns was then seventy-eight, and still a wonderfully healthy, clear-headed man for his years. I found him looking remarkably well the following summer, when I assisted him to descend from the train at the busy station at Namur, in Belgium. I had gone there on purpose to meet him on my way to Switzerland with my wife and some friends. We had been spending the day at Dinant (poor Dinant!), and though none of us knew it, it was the actual eve of the Great War. As we drove together up the long hill leading to the Hôtel de la Citadelle (three weeks later a mass of blackened ruins) the maitre told me how he had just come from Brussels, where the King and Queen of the Belgians had promised him to arrive at Namur in time to hear him play at the 'joyeux festival' about to begin there.

Alas! the King and Queen were never to come; the Festival was never to be held; for next day the Belgian mobilization began. Yet, as we sat together after dinner in the palm garden of the doomed hotel, refusing to believe that if there were really to be war the Germans would dare to invade Belgium, I was to enjoy the most delightful chat (very nearly two hours of it) that I ever had with the venerable maitre. What marvellous form he was in! Too often inclined to be reticent in company, that night he unbent and held forth with eloquence upon every imaginable subject, musical and otherwise. His only offensive epithets were for 'ce chien de Kaiser,' whom he declared to be a charlatan et poseur of the first order. He admitted that he was Chauvinist to the core, and had gradually grown to hate the Germans, though there had been a period in his life when he liked them immensely.

Then his thoughts reverted to Bayreuth, and he described with rare gusto and humour the ceremonial manners of the Wagner family—Frau Cosima in particular—on the occasion of a reception at Wahnfried. His imitations were most amusing; they ranged from personages to instruments, and he brought out some extraordinary varieties of tonal effect when producing leitmotiven from the Nibelungen. Yes, he still had great admiration for Wagner as an orchestrator, but could never forgive him for the outrageous burdens that he imposed upon the human voice; he could have avoided them had he pleased. Finally, speaking of the younger school of French composers, the venerable musician declared that he saw great talent and originality in the works of Debussy, and referred with affection to Gabriel Fauré, Vincent d'Indy, Alfred Bruneau, and Gabriel Pierné. For the rest, he was only afraid lest eccentricity and extravagance should get the upper hand.

On the following morning Saint-Saëns left Namur for Aix-les-Bains, whilst I rather foolishly persisted in going on to Switzerland and Italy, with the result that I got back to England only with great difficulty three weeks after the outbreak of war. The last time I saw the dear maitre was at his apartment in the Rue de Courcelles in September, 1920. He was then growing rather feeble. Somehow I feel that I shall always miss him.

STRAVINSKY AND PURE MUSIC

BY BASIL MAINE

Suppose I am a painter. I paint, say, a portrait of a lady in toilette de bal, with her jewels. My portrait resembles the person painted. None the less, it is painted for the pleasure of painting, despite its subject. . . . The same thing applies to all my works. In The Rite of Spring, for instance, the pretext of the prehistoric birth of Spring has suggested to me the construction of the work that I have called The Rite of Spring. The 'pretext' I choose is but a pretext, like the painter's pretext for painting. . . . The 'Rite' exists as a piece of music first and last. . . .

And these words of Stravinsky as pretext have suggested to me various ideas which I find to be mostly differing from his own. The idea behind these statements is an old one, but it appears in a new and original guise. It is the old question of absolute and programme music over again, but it is presented in a new and striking way when music played as an accompaniment to a Ballet (or, as Stravinsky would have it, a Ballet danced as an accompaniment to a musical work) is classified as absolute music by its composer. If he would have us believe that The Rite of Spring is absolute music, why does he throw us entirely off the scent by performing it together with a Ballet, where we are naturally led to interpret the music in the light of what we see before our eyes as we hear it played? I must confess I felt a little injured when I read Stravinsky's words, especially as I had achieved some success (undoubtedly purely imaginary) in my small efforts at interpretation; in fact, I felt that the Ballet and the music were so wonderfully unified in spirit that I could not bear to think of them apart. (This, by the way, was exactly what I felt when I first saw and heard L'Oiseau de Feu.)

I cannot of that music rightly say
Whether I hear or touch or taste the tones.

And then to be told that this is pleasure obtained under false pretences, and that I must begin all over again! But, no! Let me try my weapons!

In the first place, we make a grave error when we attempt to divide all music into two such water-tight compartments as pure music and programme music: to the making of artificial groups and to the assigning of capital letters there is no end, and although we are persuaded that we are helping ourselves to think clearly by such methods, they tend to become a tyranny and a snare and delusion. Even such a small composition as a song or an organ fugue cannot be definitely placed in either one or the other of these groups. A song would appear at first sight to belong quite clearly to the programme music class: the influence of the words on the music must necessarily outline a programme to be followed more or less rigidly, but the very fact that no two composers would set a given poem in the same way proves that, even in a song, music must retain a certain element of absolutism; that is to say, an element of absolute independence of outside influences, so that even if the music were divorced from the words, it would still give pleasure as music, although not such a satisfying pleasure. As an instance of this, I am reminded of a pianist of my acquaintance who can derive the utmost pleasure from playing the pianoforte parts of Roger Quilter's songs without the voice-part sounding at all; in fact, he went so far as to prefer them thus—as sound-pieces for the pianoforte! Again, it is quite true that an organ fugue must stand or fall on its merits as music, so that its absolutism would seem to be as undisputed as that of William the Conqueror. This seeming truth would be complete, but for a very disturbing element which can never be eliminated from the human mind—the law of association. The curious workings of this law will always prevent any such thing as exact definition, especially in matters of art. The human craving for a 'programme,' for something tangible and mentally picturesque, is seen on every hand: even in the most absolute forms of music the irreverent foot of man will intrude, confident and clumsy, so that we get such anomalies as Moonlight Sonata, 'Giant' Fugue, &c. The desire for 'knowing what it's all about' is as strongly inherent in the human blood as party feeling, and this desire is so persistent that often enough, rather than remain ignorant, human mentality will prefer a fabricated knowledge, which is a worse state of mind than the first. Rather than wait for the light, we like to construct our own little magic lanterns which nearly always distort our vision; and this is true not only of theology and history, but of the arts as well. Some critic more enlightened than the mere rank and file will tell us that the counterpoint in the 'Wachet auf' Organ Prelude represents the gay, heedless world. Who cares? It may represent that picture to him, while to another it may conjure up the restless strivings of the soul: association is necessarily subjective. But this is a little beside the point. The point is that even in the case of the most absolute music, human weakness cannot resist wild attempts at interpretation, so that it is clear that the law of association upsets all our calculations about absolute music. Strictly speaking there is no such thing: the most definite thing that can be said is that some music is more absolute and some is less. The truth is that in all music the elements of absolutism and association are present together;

moreover it is just as impossible to compose absolute music without being disturbed by subtle associations as it is to hear it, so that whatever Stravinsky may say about The Rite of Spring existing 'as a piece of music first and last,' we can be quite certain that there were ideas—however subconscious—which called the music into living form, and if those ideas are different from the actual ballet, then it is Stravinsky's duty to point out the differences to the choreographer, so that there can be some degree of unity in the performance.

As it is, the audience is put in a very unfair position: after having interpreted the music in the light of what happens on the stage during the performance, it is told by no less a person than the composer himself that its interpretation is quite wrong—that the ballet is a mere 'pretext'—that the music's the thing—and that the only way to arrive at the composer's real intentions is to ring down the curtain and listen with oriental abstraction. Why then take us to the theatre to hear The Rite of Spring?

But we know that the audience is right and that Stravinsky is wrong: The Rite of Spring does not exist as 'a piece of music, first and last'; it will admit of as many interpretations as there are people to hear it.

THERE AND HERE: A RETROSPECT AND COMPARISONS

BY M.-D. CALVOCORESSI

To revert to music after a complete intermission of about seven years must be in any circumstances a curious experience. And to revert to it in surroundings different from those in which one had previously worked, missing many things which had become a matter of course, and encountering many which one had not been accustomed to take into account, makes the experience doubly strange and instructive.

Looking backwards at the close of the year 1921, I wonder whether I have derived from it all the benefit that was to be expected. I feel that consideration of the numerous and important points of comparison which it has provided ought to yield something useful and stimulating not to myself alone: and that, were it possible to disengage the teachings of the facts brought to notice, the result ought to be one from which as much might be learnt—though, of course, in a different direction—as from Mr. Rorke's welcome and delightful little book, A Musical Pilgrim's Progress. The method would be very much the same. It would consist, in Mr. Rorke's own words, in 'describing sincerely from the beginning one's successive impressions and adventures, and discussing, not in the abstract, but on the basis of an actual individual experience,' the differences noticed, their causes and their consequences.

Better, perhaps—because more independent of any personal bias or method of thought—simply to describe things as they struck me, and try to disengage only their broadest and most obvious moral.

* * * *

Various things had long since led me to believe that music, by repute the most international of arts, is in fact the least, and spreads far more slowly, far more fitfully, than any other. On that point my conviction is firmer than ever. From country to country (it would be more accurate to say from centre to centre) the differences not only in taste, but in outlook, in methods of approaching music and dealing with musical questions, theoretical and practical, in the results of musical culture, are truly surprising. A centre, or group of centres, often is the stronghold of knowledge, tenets, admirations, and dislikes, of which not the faintest trace may be found elsewhere. Paramount importance is ascribed in one place to things which in another are ignored, denied, or pooh-poohed. Obvious instances are, among many others, the fact that before the war Germany knew very little of contemporary French music, and was not particularly willing to consider earnestly what little she knew. France, on the other hand, ignored or rejected, among composers of other countries, precisely a number of those whose works were most popular elsewhere, and pinned her faith to a few others whom she was almost alone to believe in. Read a number of essays or books on musical questions by British writers, then a number by French writers, by German writers, and so on—I mean books by thinkers and not by mere compilers; compare methods and scope of criticism in various countries; you will soon realise how many, and how great, the differences are. It is only natural to infer that countries have far more to learn from one another than they are generally aware; and that a comparison between their respective musical ethics and politics will afford food for thought and lead to certain useful results.

Had I to establish a comparison between the British musical public and the French, I should begin by emphasising that both comprise an immense majority of concert-goers and other consumers of music whose attitude is essentially passive, who expect from music nothing but the shallower kinds of emotion, an easy pastime, something that will tickle, thrill, or lull them a while. Whether they find what they want in one kind of music here, and in another kind there, matters little; it is among the minority of keen music-lovers that the instructive differences should be sought. And the principle of those differences, I think, can be summed up in one sentence: The British music-lover has a wider range of interests, the French is remarkable for greater intensity. Whereas the music-lovers of this country have evinced a measure of interest for the greater number of composers brought to their notice, the French have concentrated upon a few, and deliberately ignored the rest—thus rendering themselves liable, perhaps, to an impeachment for narrowness. It is clear, for instance, that composers such as Brahms, Brückner, Mahler, Hugo Wolf, are little known and little liked in France. A careful investigation will show that the pre-war popularity at Paris of Richard Strauss rested mainly not with the public of French music-lovers, but with the foreign colonies which constituted a large fraction of the public which bought seats for concerts. Tchaikovsky has never been taken seriously in France, and I shall be greatly surprised if Scriabin ever is.

A survey of concert programmes will suggest that the Paris concert-goer is not only less catholic in taste than the concert-goer in this country, but more steadfastly determined to get what he wants and nothing but that. Programmes like those of the Promenade Concerts would be quite impossible in Paris. The prospect of having to listen to excerpts from Pagliacci or Mignon would keep away those to whom the names of Brahms or Strauss or Franck or Ravel might have been attractive; and such names in turn would be a deterrent to those who would have come to hear Leoncavallo or Ambroise Thomas. And I should feel safe in predicting an empty hall to ninety-nine out of a hundred recital-givers misguided enough to resort to the practice (in my opinion, altogether unaccountable) of advertising their recitals by means of leaflets embellished with their portraits, but vague or silent as to their programmes—as often happens here.

Granted that the French music-lovers are more definite as to their preferences, the question remains: Of the omnivorous appetite or the fastidious palate, which is it that betokens the more genuine keenness and holds up the better hope of improvement in taste and receptiveness? However much abstract reasoning may lead me to admit the claim of the former, I cannot help feeling that the reply would be wrong. It might be right, perhaps, under ideal conditions: but in practice, let us remember that there is a limit to the elasticity and power of assimilation of the human mind and sensitiveness. The boundary line is difficult to determine, and will be drawn differently by different people. But few, I think, will incline to deny that a liking for certain kinds of music is felt to be incompatible with a liking for certain other kinds; and that the co-existence of incompatible likings betokens not elasticity, but lack of discrimination. I for one should say that people who like both Wagner and Puccini, or Mozart and Ambroise Thomas, can hardly be worthy admirers of Wagner or Mozart. I should conceive them as indifferent to all the finer qualities of music, and out merely for the meretricious thrills, sentimental or melodramatic, which some people can derive even from the least meretricious music.

But even from a less summary point of view there is a good deal to be said in favour of concentration as a means of achieving the highest standard of understanding and penetration; the capacity to select may serve as good a purpose as the capacity to include. What the French may be thought to have sacrificed by ignoring certain aspects of musical art, they have perhaps made up by their steadfastness and thoroughness in other directions. For instance, they have learnt from assiduous intercourse with the music of innovators such as Liszt, Borodin, and Fauré, a good deal which has remained overlooked elsewhere. Of course I am not suggesting that they have never erred in the exercise of the right to select.

* * * *

With regard to interest in native music, and more especially in the contemporary output, the sole point that need concern us is the practical way in which that interest is shown. I have described elsewhere* the methods of dispensing official encouragement to musicians, and I hope that what I said suffices to show that in the policy pursued with regard to opera-production, we have a clear instance of what to avoid. The provision of free professional education for musicians of all kinds is in itself excellent; but there may be reasons (which I shall some day try to investigate) why the system, which works well in France, might do as much harm as good in countries where the regime of musical life is different. As to institutions such as the Société Nationale de Musique and the Société Musicale Indépendante, they are altogether excellent, and I am convinced that if something similar were organized here, the benefit to composers, music-lovers, and practising musicians would be enormous.

The object of these Societies is to ensure performance of new works by composers native and foreign. An annual subscription entitles members to tickets for all concerts given by the Societies, and gives them the right to submit works for consideration to a committee elected by themselves. The programmes include a considerable proportion of works by foreign composers who are not members, and interpreters are found whenever the composers do not provide them.

Naturally enough, no organization of that kind can achieve perfection. It might be said with reason, for instance, that despite the existence in France of two rival Societies for the diffusion of contemporary music, British music is far less known in France than French music here, where nothing of the kind exists; and that even with the existence of both the Société Nationale and (since 1911) the Société Indépendante, so great a French musician as Charles Kœchlin may have kept on working for thirty years without being known to more than a handful of music-lovers. Into the various causes of such shortcomings (greatly outweighed, I hasten to add, by many services rendered to musicians of all countries) I do not intend to go. With reference to the position as regards British music, I believe myself justified in saying that, so far as the Societies I am referring to are concerned, it is very unlikely that any British work submitted would have received less serious consideration than others; and if few were performed, it is probably because few were brought to the Committee's notice.

I am quite aware that although there is no systematic organization here for the production of contemporary music, we hear quite as much of it as in Paris. I have had, in fact, many occasions to admire the initiative of concert-givers in London. When I recommend the foundation of a Society working on lines similar to those of the Société Indépendante and the Société Nationale, I am thinking of the countless advantages which would accrue from the co-ordination of so great an amount of available energy and the creation of a centre, the lack of which makes itself felt in many ways.

Here the unknown composer, or the music-lover who has discovered the existence of a work which he deems worthy of performance, would certainly welcome the possibility of submitting music in the most impersonal, business-like way, to a committee which, after considering it, would be enabled speedily to ensure performance, instead of having to approach, perhaps, one performer or group of performers after another, or keeping the manuscripts unheeded for years.

In this country, where so many important music-centres exist outside London, and where concert tours are far easier to organize than in France, I can imagine a society of this kind extending its range of action by leaps and bounds, and rendering most signal services.

The concerts given by the Societies in question are not of the kind that appeal to the lazier or more passive fraction of the public. To follow them entails no small amount of hard work, and sometimes of boredom. But after considering the advantages of the scheme, no earnest music-lover, nobody who has the welfare of British music and the progress of musical education at heart, would grudge the labour and occasional effort.

The object of those concerts is, first and last, to introduce new music—nothing submitted being eliminated unless it falls short of a reasonable minimum in mere craftsmanship. For that reason, all works performed may receive a proper amount of attention, and there is no temptation (not infrequent among harassed or careless writers of concert notices) to dwell upon questions of execution and ignore the vital issue, i.e., consideration of the music.

* * * *

This remark brings me to the last point I have to consider: a sore point to one who, like myself, has followed with keen interest the musical life of France. It may be that on either side of the Channel people who write concert notices fail to devote their best attention to what has the first claim to it, viz., to new works performed. But in France, many of the music-critics of daily papers live in blissful ignorance of almost everything that takes place except what their editor expects them to notice, i.e., first performances of operas and other musical plays, and Sunday symphony concerts. The fault does not lie with them: for, were they conscientiously to write up recitals and concerts of new music, they would only be providing fodder for the editorial waste-paper basket. Indeed, were one to take up the files of any one of the big Paris dailies say from 1900 to 1914, it would be impossible to extract from them materials for the merest aperçu of the musical life of Paris during those years. Since the war, matters have improved somewhat, but there is room for further improvement; and those responsible for the destinies of the French Press might well take a leaf from the book of their British colleagues.

A comparison between the higher forms of criticism here and there would be fruitful only if carried down to the utmost details, and from the point of view of pure philosophy. On the whole, the man who loves a subject, and devotes long labour and loving care to its treatment, is very much the same in all countries. Books such as Grove's Beethoven, Ernest Newman's Hugo Wolf, Romain Rolland's Musiciens d'Aujourd'hui, Laloy's Claude Debussy, La Laurencie's Rameau, Carraud's Alfred Magnard, the Mozart by E. J. Dent or the Mozart by de Wyzewa and de Sainte-Foix, Hadow's Studies in Modern Music (to name but these few) appear now in one country, now in another. We can but wish that there were more of them, and that such as exist should everywhere receive the attention which they deserve.

In that respect, this country has so far done better than France. I know many translations into English of good French books on music, but no single French translation of an English book into French. Articles appearing in French musical periodicals receive more attention here than articles published in England do in France—a fact of which I was most forcibly and pleasantly made aware some ten or eleven years ago, when an essay which had cost me some pains appeared in a French periodical to remain unnoticed there (save, I think, by one critic, the late Gaston Carraud), whereas it was extensively discussed in the London journals—the Musical Times among others.

Insularity in criticism is probably all the more dangerous for being so difficult to detect. Admitting, for instance, that a good deal of the adverse criticism to which the works of a composer are submitted abroad is exactly similar to the adverse criticism available on the spot, there may be, besides, a certain number of points not yet considered and worthy of being tested. Quite recently I found mentioned, in articles by British writers on Debussy, points which may be right or wrong, but which seem to have occurred neither to Debussy's French admirers nor to his detractors. Among the younger composers of to-day at least one, Arthur Honegger, is taken very much in earnest by French critics of tested ability, while very casually dismissed by British critics of no lesser standing. I am not adducing the case as one of insularity at either end, but simply suggesting the audi alteram partem, even if it be more difficult for purely practical reasons.

On single points such as the above, or on more general matters, greater interpenetration is bound to do some good. That, I believe, is the sole moral of the various things I have been considering.

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY TUDOR COMPOSERS

BY W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

XXIV.—THOMAS APPLEBY

Considering that there are Masses, Magnificats, and Motets by Thomas Appleby—all of a good quality—it is surprising that his biography has hitherto proved so elusive. Even the new edition of Henry Davey's History of English Music (1921) dismisses his career in one sentence: 'Thomas Appleby also appears in the latter set of part-books; he was organist of Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1539.' It is almost needless to add that neither Burney nor Hawkins throws any light on this remarkable organist and composer. Fortunately, the publication of the valuable Lincoln Chapter Records, admirably edited by Canon Cole, affords us much desired information as to Appleby, who was for two periods organist and Master of the Choristers of Lincoln Cathedral. I take this opportunity, also, for expressing my sincere thanks to Canon Cole for his kindness in forwarding me the transcripts of all the Chapter Acts bearing on musical appointments from 1520 to 1560.

The name of this Tudor musician appears variously as Appleby, Appelby, and Appulby, but it will be more convenient to adhere to the spelling 'Appleby.' He was probably a native of Lincoln, born circa 1499, and educated as a chorister in the Cathedral, afterwards proceeding to Oxford. Be this as it may, he must have displayed unusual musical ability, and at the age of thirty-six he appears as acting-organist of Lincoln Cathedral in 1536, owing to the ill-health of Robert Dove, Vicar-Choral.* According to the Chapter Records, the said Dove received but 40s. for playing the organ at the Mass of the Blessed Virgin, and 20s. 8d. for playing at the Jesus Mass. His death took place in April, 1537, whereupon Thomas Appleby was provisionally appointed his successor.

By a Chapter Act of April 23, 1538, Appleby was confirmed in the joint-offices of organist and Master of the Choristers of Lincoln. However, he held the position only for a little over a year, as in July, 1539, he was induced to take the post of organist at Magdalen College, Oxford, being replaced at Lincoln by James Craue in the joint-offices of organist and 'Master of the Song,' with the salary and fees attaching to both offices, and with a gratuity of 13s. 4d. annually on condition that during his life he, or his deputy, 'shall duly and diligently instruct and teach the choristers both in the science of singing, namely, plainsong, pricked song, faburden, discant, and counterpoint, as well as playing the organ,' also teaching certain apt choir-boys 'to play on the instruments called Clavichords, said boys to provide Clavichords at their own proper cost and expense.' These Letters Patent of James Crawe are dated October 4, 1539.

* A namesake, Thomas Appleby, was Vicar of Braintree in 1535.

Two years later Thomas Appleby returned to Lincoln (being replaced at Magdalen College by John Sheppard), and on November 21, 1541, his Letters Patent were drawn up in somewhat the same form as those of James Crawe. In the Chapter Act it is stated that the said Thomas Appleby was unanimously reappointed to the joint positions 'vacant by the dismissal of Master James Crawe,' and that, as a mark of favour, he was to be given a suitable chamber 'situated over the outer gate of the Choristers' House.'

Evidently Appleby must have given satisfaction to the Chapter, for he held his post during the remaining years of Henry VIII., and also under Edward VI. and Queen Mary, although adhering to the ancient faith. The following extract from a Chapter Act of February 12, 1558, testifies to the esteem in which he was held:

On 12 Feb., 1558, the Sub-dean and Chapter, assembled chapterwise, for the good and faithful service rendered by Thomas Appleby, skilled in the art of music, unanimously granted to him the office of Seneschal or Procurator of the House of Choristers, and Collector of all farms, payments, and emoluments belonging to them, immediately after the death, dimission, &c., of Thomas Paget, the present Seneschal, to be held during their good pleasure.

Six months later, on August 18, 1559, we learn from the Chapter Acts that Thomas Appleby 'was admitted to the office of Seneschal of the Choristers, vacant by the dimission of Thomas Paget, according to a certain grant made to Thos. Appleby by the Chapter.'

'Dimission' evidently meant 'resignation,' for, on the same day, Thomas Paget, Seneschal, was appointed to the office of Sacrist, being also admitted Vicar-Choral.

Appleby was now an old man, and though he still played the organ the Precentor relieved him of the duty of teaching the choristers. This we learn from a Chapter Act of September 19, 1559, when Roger Dalison, Precentor, was appointed 'Master and Supervisor of the Choristers, poor clerks, and boys on the foundation of Bartholomew Burghersh.'

I have failed to meet with any record of Appleby after the year 1560, and evidently he died at the close of the year 1562, as in February, 1563, the illustrious William Byrd was appointed his successor. Through the courtesy of Canon Johnston, Chancellor of Lincoln Cathedral, I am enabled to give the exact date when Byrd was officially appointed in place of Appleby, a date unknown to previous investigators, although the usual authorities give us 'about the year 1563.' From the Chapter Acts the date of Byrd's appointment to Lincoln is given as February 27, 1563, when the composer was in his twenty-first year.

Appleby's compositions may be dated as between the years 1535-50, and though doubtless many of them have been lost, sufficient remain to appraise his merits. The Peterhouse MSS. contain a Mass and a Magnificat by him, while the British Museum, Add. MS. 17,802-5, includes a fine Mass. It does not appear that he composed anything for the English Service, and in fact his creative period was long before the reign of Elizabeth. His twenty-one years' connection with Lincoln continued the good tradition established by Thomas Ashwell, which was developed by his successor, Byrd.

THE CURSE OF THE CONCERT PROGRAMME

BY ROBERT LORENZ

I don't mean, of course, the programme to a symphonic poem, which has been proved over and over again to be a most fallacious document. The programme I refer to is the menu or bill of fare of any ordinary concert in any ordinary place. Here are two texts which bring out respectively the serious and comic sides of the question:

(1) 'Before the concert began I was in a fever. I kept on saying to myself, "I am going to hear the fifth and seventh Symphonies." I regarded myself with the most ridiculous self-adulation; I smoothed and purred over myself—a great contented tabby-cat—and all because I was so splendidly fortunate as to be about to hear Beethoven's fifth and seventh Symphonies.'—Barbellion's Diary.

(2) 'The Société Indépendante, in order to protest against the (alleged) prejudiced attitude of concert-goers and critics—or, to put it more charitably, in order to prove that opinions on new works were often influenced by the composer's name—gave a concert, the programme of which remained silent as to the authorship of the works produced, with the result that most of the critics refrained from mentioning the affair at all.'—M.-D. CALVO-CORESSI, Musical Times, April, 1921.

The first text echoes emotions that are often buzzing about in the soul of the average musical enthusiast in this country. Those who are temporarily under their sway regard them as their dearest possessions—as qualities which distinguish them, the idealists, from the ordinary run of humanity. I was a victim to this sort of thing once, so I can sympathise with the Barbellions' probable annoyance at my showing them up as a nuisance and a hindrance to musical progress.

Now what does such an one do when he knows he is going to hear the fifth and seventh Symphonies? It depends, of course, largely on the extent of his musical knowledge, but the one who usually gets afflicted in this way is an out-and-out amateur who has heard these works a good many times, loves them dearly, and picks up a few more snatches after each performance. Well, all day long he tum-tum-tum-tums or tum-tum-tum-tum-tums to the mingled amazement and annoyance of fellow-workers and tubers. Yes, but that's not the worst of the business by any means: these tum-tums are always those of some particular conductor—and woe to to-morrow's if he doesn't tum-tum in just that particular way. Being a new man he probably won't, and then the logical result of this 'enthusiasm' is seen in its full glory. After two bars our friend is thoroughly outraged, and though he may fool himself that he is listening to the music, he is actually carrying on with frenzied concentration a heated mental comparison between the particular conductor on the podium and his one and only. Now the splitting of hairs over the only very slightly different readings of different conductors (particularly where the classics are concerned) is one of the most vicious phases of present-day musical life, and though the modern virtuoso conductor is certainly to be blamed for having encouraged it in the first instance, his admirers are only a little less culpable. Perhaps the worst result of this working oneself up into a C minor-cum-Nikisch mood is that it destroys altogether that delightful sensation of 'coming' upon music which is the supreme joy of the sensitive music-lover. Were I to set out now on a ramble and could in the course of an hour or so have things like the opening bars of Mozart's G minor Symphony, of Götterdämmerung (even on the pianoforte), and the Brahms Clarinet Quintet—to name a few familiar favourites only—wafted over to me in succession from various houses, I should have tucked away more spine-creeps and musical stimuli into my system in that one hour than I should in a year in a concert-hall under the existing system. If, however, programmes were not announced, and the element of surprise were given free rein, why then I wager that the opening of the fifth Symphony would fall so like a bomb-shell on an unexpectant audience that all thoughts of conductors and their readings would be crowded out from brains already nearly bursting with musical emotion.

There would, of course, be many comic incidents. We all know that there is no more amazing mass of hypocrisy and sentimentality to be found anywhere than in our concert-halls, and one is quite safe in saying this here, as the worst offenders rarely read musical journals. But how it loves its names, and how the pressure of its plaudits is cunningly adjusted to some pre-ordained order of precedence in the case of both composers and artists! Picture, then, this helpless flock confronted with a novelty—no, no, that would be too cruel!—let us say an unfamiliar item by a famous defunct. Can't you see the sheep looking anxiously around for a shepherd—oh, just some one who'll tell them whether to applaud; it's so dreadfully difficult to know! In time professional shepherds would spring up, ardent champions of various composers, whose success would depend on how quickly they could make their hit after a performance, or the extent to which they had managed to wireless their feelings to their neighbours during its progress. I am afraid there is another reason why novelties would have to be ruled out of the scheme, at any rate until a reliable nucleus of shepherds had been formed. As things are at present, composers of 'novelties' always buck themselves up with the certainty that a sentimental public will applaud them irrespective of its real feelings. But under the new system the majority of the public would probably not know that a novelty was being performed, and perhaps express no feelings whatever. Imagine, then, the mortification, not to say the indignation, of the composer of The Children of Don Quixote if his Prelude met with such a fate. Yet he, methinks, would come 'soarin' in regardless' as a famous conductor once remarked to his double-basses!

Seriously, there's something in all this, and I am only joking about it because there is very little chance of it happening—in my time, at any rate. And yet there could hardly be a better time than the present to start a revolution of this kind. We're in the soup all round, and big issues have matured from soup before now. If the L.S.O. will announce a series of eight symphony concerts for 1922-23—just that, without any particulars except in regard to novelties—I am prepared to bet that they'll do a roaring trade. But go slow, and don't start—like Mr. Holbrooke—offering £10 to anyone who can spot unfamiliar outsiders. Above all, don't in the first flush of success suggest carrying out the new idea in opera as well. There are limits to all forms of human endurance, and I would not have even my worst enemy exposed to the torture of not knowing whether he was going to hear Parsifal or Nail.

SOME INNOVATIONS IN CRITICISM

Circumstances have enabled—or forced—me to take a detached view of musical criticism during the last few months, and perhaps some of the conclusions suggested by my dispassionate survey may not be without interest.

One thing has pleased me greatly—and that is the almost universal abandonment of the ex-cathedra 50,000-ton survey of the year's music. How bore some it used to be to write, and how difficult to read! It used to remind one of the old Oxford saying that lectures are cut-and-dried things: cut by the men and dried by the lecturers. A feature of the short—in some cases almost sportive—summaries I have read, was the varying degree of importance attached to the very newest phases of music. One very important daily did not even mention them, while in others, not unnaturally, they bulked very large, and we were told that they had passed out of the realm of controversy. That seems, indeed, to be the opinion of the writer first mentioned, but not in the sense intended by the others.

It is pleasant to notice that the number of criticisms the sole object of which is apparently to show the readers what a devilish clever fellow the writer is, is on the decrease, and that there is a corresponding increase of those who strive to tell us something about the music or the performances which are the subject of the article. This is entirely as it should be. There are still too many signs of malign sub-editorial activity, which results in obvious gaps in the chain of reasoning, and suggests that the copy has been 'handled' by a gentleman who does not know the difference between a double-bassoon and double counterpoint. I suppose it is inevitable. I know that the very able men who write the really important parts of daily papers—such as the reports of football matches and the fashions—are groaning under the same infliction. Why then should the mere musical critic complain to the high heavens?

An innovation that has struck me with some force is the growth of a penchant for what may be called 'zoological' criticism. I do not mean criticism like that of the member of parliament in a once famous novel, Ten Thousand a Year, who did immense service to his party by shouting 'Cock-a-doodle-do' at critical moments. That might in some cases be quite a useful way of settling a musical controversy. The newest school of thought, would, perhaps, object to it on the ground that it imports the quite undesirable element of 'emotion' into music. But that is neither here nor there. What I mean is something quite different. I mean the habit of crediting composers with the cerebral apparatus of the lower animals. Not long ago I read somewhere that Wagner and César Franck had the mental equipment of anthropoid apes. Elsewhere I was told that a certain composer had the brain of a hen. This school of critical thought finds it even more effective to say that Beethoven had not the intelligence of a wood-louse. One of those who now worship The Sleeping Princess asserted that Tchaikovsky had no brain at all—so possibly the remark was intended as a compliment to Beethoven.

The rule of the game seems to be to take the greatest composer and compare him to the smallest animal. An expert in zoology might draw up a useful table for the critics of this school. If you begin with Beethoven=wood-louse, you would, through numerous gradations, arrive at the other end of the scale, and find the author of the worst 'best-seller' compared to the fox terrier, the horse, or the gorilla, whichever is the brainiest of the three. Where would our friend the donkey be, and what composer would most aptly be compared to him?

I am afraid I myself would come very low down in the scale of cerebral equipment, for I cannot for the life of me see what good that kind of comparison does to any. It does not even tell us how clever the writer is. Quite the reverse. A. K.

Occasional Notes

Hearty congratulations to Dame Ethel Smyth and Sir Landon Ronald on the distinction they have so thoroughly earned.

In last month's 'Occasional Notes' we dropped a little aside concerning Mr. Percy Scholes's prae-mortem inquest on the Pizetti Violin Sonata. Our readers will remember that Mr. Scholes, feeling that the Sonata was not nearly so good as most people thought it to be, set out to justify his opinion by quoting some of its material and pointing out the poverty thereof. We remarked that this was judging at the wrong end. The proof of the pudding, we said, is in the eating of it, not in a critical dissection and inspection of its ingredients.

Mr. Scholes discussed the matter in the Observer of January 8, and raised some interesting points. He said he was careful in his examination of the Sonata to show that the weakness lay in the treatment of the themes as well as in the themes themselves, and he was specially careful to do this 'because,' he added, 'I knew that perhaps nine musicians out of ten at present hold the view I myself once unthinkingly held—that in music not the text but the sermon is what matters, and that numbers of master-pieces exist, evolved from insignificant material.' He went on, 'I am prepared to make this assertion: There do not exist cases where a first-rate piece of music has been fashioned out of poor or insignificant material.' Obviously, other things being equal, the best music results from the best material. There are, however, so many examples of fine music made from poor themes, and poor music from good, that Mr. Scholes's assertion strikes us as being bold to rashness.

Mr. Thomas Dunhill took this line in a letter to the Observer the following week. He asked if Mr. Scholes had ever heard or studied 'Beethoven's astounding Variations on a theme by Diabelli. If so [he went on] it would be interesting to know whether he regards the variations as less than "first-rate," or the theme as other than poor and insignificant.' We have not heard these Variations for a good many years, and no copy is handy, so we express no opinion. Instead, we turn up Parry's article on 'Variations' in Grove, where we find the work fully discussed, and described as being among 'the finest and most interesting [variations] in existence.' If Parry is right, Mr. Scholes must pronounce the Diabelli Waltz to be a good deal more significant than it appears to be. (Since the above was written, he has stated—Observer, January 22—that he regards the Diabelli theme as 'a quite excellent one'.)

Mr. Scholes rightly distinguishes between simplicity and insignificance. He quotes the opening subjects from Beethoven's fifth and Eroica Symphonies as examples of themes simple but significant.

Here he raises a question that demands for its discussion more elbow-room than is afforded by a mere 'Occasional Note,' or even a string of them. We can do little more than open it. If these themes are significant, are they not so chiefly because of Beethoven's treatment of them? The first:

by far the more arresting of the two, is merely the yellow-hammer's call, and until Beethoven took it in hand nobody thought of it as possessing any significance worth mentioning. No doubt letters to the newspapers of the day recorded the tremendous fact that our old friend 'Constant Reader' had heard the yellow-hammer for the first time that season, just as assiduous Daily Mailites let a waiting world know that they have heard some specially enterprising and impatient cuckoo. But nobody thought of it as 'significant'—that is (as Mr. Scholes says), 'charged with actual and potential meaning.' Beethoven, we are told on good authority, used to extemporise on it, just as others have toyed with the cuckoo's call. The composer having adopted it as a motto theme for his C minor Symphony, and worked a kind of miracle with it, the bird's pipe has become 'Fate knocking at the door.' It is now one of the most tremendously significant of musical subjects, but its significance is quite fortuitous.

Mr. Scholes suggests that had the theme been changed to:

it would have been so weakened that even Beethoven could have made nothing great out of it. Arguing from an hypothesis is perhaps fruitless, but we may point out that as a good deal of Beethoven's most striking use of the theme is derived, not from the intervals, but from the rhythm, the alteration would matter very little. Indeed, so far from weakening its germinal possibilities, it would have increased them. Had the yellow-hammer sung:

Beethoven would probably have done a great deal with some such derivative as:

which appears to contain more possibilities than:

However, our main point is that Beethoven has evolved a great movement from a theme that in itself was of no importance, though, thanks to the composer, it is now one of the most suggestive in music. We have not space to consider the Eroica subject. If we had, we should merely show that much of what we have said about the C minor theme may be applied to this also.

Bach inevitably comes into a discussion of this kind. Mr. Scholes mentions some fugue subjects, both strong and weak, and is convinced that good fugues are never produced from poor subjects. We almost agree with Mr. Scholes here, because a fugue depends, far more than does a free movement, upon the quality of its subject. A sonata movement is so largely a matter of development that a long work may be concerned far more with the derivatives of the subjects than with the subjects themselves, whereas the essence of the fugal form lies in its insistence on the subject, presented (usually without change) in a constantly varying polyphonic texture. To revert to Mr. Scholes's simile of the sermon and text: in a free movement the matter may be discursive. One thing brings up another, and the preacher may follow and develop the most promising of them, though the relation to the text may escape any but the closest observer. In a fugue the text may be left for a brief space (the episode), but the discourse must constantly return to it, showing it in a new aspect, either through its relations to other constituents (counter-subjects) or by regarding it from a fresh point of view (inversion, augmentation, diminution). Even the episodes are as a rule not entirely free, being in a well-behaved fugue derived from the subject or counter-subject. A fugue, then, cannot fairly be brought into the argument, though we should have no difficulty in showing that even here Bach has more than once or twice done wonders with trifling material. Leaving strict fugues we will draw Mr. Scholes's attention to one Bach movement only, choosing one that happens to be largely fugal and canonic—the Organ Toccata in F. As was shown by a writer in this journal a few months ago, the whole of this gigantic movement of four hundred and thirty-eight bars is derived from these two insignificant motives:

(We may even regard b as an augmentation of the first half of a.)

The fact is, the composer more than any other creative artist, has this power of evolving something from nothing, and as a general rule the greatest composers are those who have this power in the greatest degree. Nothing in Abt Vogler is truer or more easily applied to this question than the well-known lines:

I know not if, save in this, such gift be allowed to man,
That out of three sounds he frame, not a fourth sound, but a star.

Consider it well: each tone of our scale in itself is nought;
It is everywhere in the world—loud, soft, and all is said:
Give it to me to use! I mix it with two in my thought;
And there! Ye have heard and seen: consider and bow the head!

Strauss's visit to London roused far less interest than might have been expected. Comparing the half-empty Albert Hall and the absence of anything like the scenes that marked Kreisler's return, one is left with a fair idea of the relative importance of performers and composers in the public eye. As the Albert Hall had been filled a few evenings before at very high prices for the Cook-Carpentier prize-fight we may draw further deductions. Clearly, in order to fill such a vast place, one must be either a pugilist or a prima donna. The writer of a letter to one of the daily papers, expressing a hope that there would be no 'mob-worship' of Strauss, need not have worried himself. There was neither mob nor worship. The reports of the concert were respectful and dignified. Only one was gushing, that of Hannen Swaffer in the Daily Graphic. Headed 'Herr Strauss's Triumph,' it told us that Strauss 'blushed with nervous pride when he took his stand in front of the orchestra.' Mr. Swaffer must have been sitting at the great man's feet in order to observe this. Another report says that the Herr was singularly impassive and unconcerned, even a trifle bored. That was our own impression. If his colour did rise, the glow may not have been nervous pride, but annoyance at the rows of empty stalls that met his eyes. Mr. Swaffer gave us also the astonishing news that 'Strauss is the oldest living composer.' As he is still on the right side of sixty, he is a long way off being that. An emotional half-column ends thus: 'After last night there is no word about German art and German music that is left to be said. The war is, indeed, over.' Still dimly remembered, however, and likely to be for some time yet, though we do not suppose people were kept from attending the concert by any anti-German feeling. It was probably something far more fatal—indifference to the man and his music.

We are glad to read in the excellent Journal of the Federation of British Music Industries that the propaganda work of the Federation is prospering. As many of our readers probably know, this part of the Federation's activities consists in the placing at the free disposal of the Press articles on musical subjects of general interest. The articles are written in the right simple and readable style, and we repeat the suggestion we have already made—that readers who have any influence with their local press should help along the cause of native music and music industry by getting such articles inserted. In the January Journal appears the announcement that one of the most useful of the articles—that on Music in Industry—is to be published in an organ that is used as an 'inset' to five hundred parish magazines. This is something like propaganda, and Mr. H. B. Dickinson, who is responsible for both loading the gun and firing it, is to be congratulated. Any readers who wish for information about these articles should write to Mr. Dickinson at the Federation Headquarters, 117-123, Great Portland Street, W.1.

Though a liking for the funereal in music is less common than it was, some people still have it badly. In the Journal aforesaid we read of an old lady who went to a gramophone dealer for some records for Christmas:

'As she arrived in a bath-chair with an escort of three attendants, room was found for her with some difficulty. She heard three records, of which one was a hymn and one a carol, and finally departed with the record of her choice, the Dead March in Saul.

There is, we believe, some sort of society for preserving ancient monuments. Is it not time musicians started something of the kind to take care of the work of great composers? We are moved to ask the question by two desecrations that lie before us—That Meister Rag and a Faust Fantasy Fox-Trot bearing the hideous and silly title Mefoxtroteles. The former takes the Prize Song from the Meistersinger and debases it thus:

We have recently commented on the fact that the 'winners' of Charing Cross Road are usually the work not of a composer but of a small syndicate, one member writing the tune, another adding what purports to be harmony, a third scoring it, and one more (sometimes a couple) fitting some words to the result. We should have imagined that so simple a process as spoiling a masterpiece might have been managed single-handed, but it appears that here again the limited amount of intelligence required is not to be found in one head. Anyhow, two were employed, those of Claude Marx and Basil Davis.

Mefoxtroteles is a perversion of the song 'Gentle Flowers,' from Gounod's Faust. This is what W. H. Norman makes of it:

We need hardly add that in both cases the arrangements bristle with blatant vulgarities. The scarcity of original ideas in the quarter from which these things come has long been patent. But is the fact a justification for stealing other people's and spoiling them?

There appears to be some legal means of preventing the public performance of parodied versions of such ballads as those of (say) Teresa del Riego. Surely it should be possible to protect the living music of dead composers as well as the dead music of living ones.

We now propose to do a little stealing on our own account. Punch of January 18 contained a batch of musical howlers and comments that ought to be preserved in a musical journal, so we lift them with thanks:

Piano to suit beginner, with legs.—Scotch Paper.

Surely hands would be even more useful.

From a school magazine:

Perhaps the hors d'œuvre of the evening was —'s first violin solo.

A very natural error, attributable, no doubt, to his use of the sordine.

'LEAGUE OF NATIONS.'

Viscount Grey, K.G., will speak at the Colston Hall, Bristol, on Tuesday, January 10th, at 8 p.m. Groan Recital at 7.30.—West Country Paper.

We are glad to say that the hostile demonstration did not come off.

There was loud applause after Mr — had rendered Petit Sweet Deconcert on the violin.—Local Paper.

It is hoped that the Entente will survive this shock.

From an Indian band programme:

Two melodies from the League of Nations:

(a) 'Dream Bubbles' (Ager)

(b) 'What about it' (Darewski).

We fear Lord Robert Cecil will not be pleased.

Which of our enterprising chamber music parties will give us the first performance of Alois Hába's String Quartet on the Quarter-Tone System? The composer's preface tells us that the work is the result of long study and research. The quarter-tone is no novelty, of course. Some Oriental music has it, and we may occasionally hear specimens in our own concert-rooms, though our singers are a long way off anything like a system. Hába uses the signs ♭ and ♮, the first raising a note a quarter-tone, the second lowering it. The drawback of the first is that it looks too much like a flat rather the worse for wear. It seems to us that it would be safer to invert it, thus ♮. It is impossible to gain much idea of what this Quartet sounds like by looking at it. The work of the music reviewer has been getting harder for some time past, owing to the complexity and chromaticism of so much modern work. To the mental hearer an ordinary classical orchestral full score is child's play by the side of a good deal of recent music written for chamber combinations or even for pianoforte solo. If composers are going to hand out quarter-tones as well, we shall have to do what we really ought to be doing now in most cases—wait for a performance before writing our review. If Hába used his new resource sparingly we could get along fairly well, but he simply peppers his score with it. Readers who wish to test the 'mind's ear' (dealt with by Mr. Heseltine on page 88) should tie a wet towel round their brow and get to work on this Quartet. (Universal Edition, 6,418.) Here is a taste to start with—the last three bars of the work:

The Musician's Bookshelf

A MUSICAL PILGRIM

A little book from the Oxford University Press, A Musical Pilgrim's Progress, by J. D. M. Rorke, proves peculiarly attaching. It is by a self-declared 'outsider' and 'non-musician,' and records different stages in the love for music of one who had no musical schooling and hit on this vein by accident. Such a case is common enough—the case of those for whom music was not found, but who found music for themselves; and the first few pages of the book will start many a reader delving in his memories for the initiatory, deciding experience. (Mr. Rorke indeed challenges us all so to delve, and so this reviewer for one will unearth from memory a small boy, proud to be entrusted with the fiddle-case of a musical aunt, and suddenly smitten outside the rehearsal chamber of an orchestra of amateurs by a Hungarian Dance of Brahms. What an intoxication, how supernatural!)

For Mr. Rorke it was Chopin, the Funeral March,
'... in a Church organ-loft, I having been conscripted with another boy to blow because the regular blower was drunk. We toiled in a rapture. ...'

an experience reinforced at Oxford by a fellow undergraduate's performance on the violin of the E flat Nocturne. In a dozen years the 'pilgrim,' with the aid of the pianola, passed through stages of Chopin, Wagner, Debussy, and Tchaikovsky to his goal of beatitude in Beethoven.

Such a case is not uncommon, no doubt, but Mr. Rorke is someone uncommon, for this 'non-musician' struck a vein not only of the appreciation of music but also of a gift for writing about it. The tale of his stages interests, though not of itself matter for a book. But his delightful writing and the expression of acute feeling and thought make a book well worth having. Quite apart from the circumstances of his introduction to music, his appreciations of Chopin, Wagner, and Beethoven are pages of rarely beautiful criticism. Thus in a searching analysis of the charm of Chopin's music for the 'beginner,' he notes:

'It often has the quality of narrative—narrative of incident and adventure, in which anything might happen except a dull page, as against the self-determined and inevitable course of a narrative of character. To many a beginner, indeed, it has the quality of narrative as against the quality of preaching; the Nocturne or Ballade is like a splendid short story; the typical sonata movement more like a sermon, with much expiation on heads and sub-heads of the text.'

And here we come upon a peculiarity of this sincere 'amator,' a peculiarity which persists to the end of his confessions: that all his delight is in the matter of the music rather than in sheer sound. He gets his Chopin and Wagner out of the pianola, and when in the later pages he holds his breath with awe on his 'pinnacle' of Beethoven's music of the third period, we are not told from what sort of performance the ecstasy sprang, or from what manner of transcription, or whether it was from the printed page or the lodgment of the music in his memory. Here is Mr. Rorke with Chopin and a pianola:

'The first big taste came when I hired a cabinet-player for a month, with unlimited access to a music-roll library. All through the hot August of the Coronation year, with the rest of my people at the seaside, I played Chopin from morning to night in my shirt-sleeves, and, I'm afraid, missed the procession. No scenery and no wild adventures could have given me such a gorgeous and exciting holiday. When at a tremendous climactic moment I drove myself, stool and all, over backwards, and leapt to my feet to get into position again, I pitied from my heart the dull life of a cannibal chief or a big-game hunter.'

Wagner took him as Wagner takes everyone, like a fever, and we read him with pleasure in seeing our common experiences recorded; with pleasure, too, in his fine original observations. This is suggested by the Prelude of Tristan and Isolde:

'It is at the moment of opening that the composer has his chance, whatever he can make of it. It is then he is most a creator. There is silence, and, as God said "Let there be light," he says "Let there be sound." The conductor gathers his forces; the pianist holds his hand for a moment; there is stillness, wonder, expectancy; the ear of the listener is at its most sensitive, his mind a white sheet of paper. At that moment there is something of the miracle of birth, if it is only a little cool fugue subject that writes itself in single notes. Never will soft "6-4" chord sound so touching, nor harsh chord so devastating. How the abrupt announcement of the "C minor" brings one's heart to one's mouth! But in all music has that opportunity for the opening ever been so perfectly seized and filled full as by the first restless yearning phrases of Tristan? They are like the slow waking of some mortal on a strange planet—and strange enough world in truth it is, this elemental realm of love and death, for Mr. Smith and Miss Brown (who are having an evening at the theatre), and all the rest of us, in pit and stalls and gallery; and yet, strangest of all, a world which is theirs, too, and ours.'

The pilgrim does not rest in Wagner. Parsifal was not good enough—it came to this. The perception of this 'non-musician' notes that here Wagner's thought and philosophy point to ways that Wagner's music cannot tread. Wagner's music, so magnificently adequate to the conflicts of Love and Death (Tristan and The Ring), for all its straining 'never in Parsifal attains the point of Faith, in spite of all the place that is given to the word.' Is there a sublimer music, a music to meet the case of the Finale of Parsifal? Mr. Rorke's answer is, Beethoven, and to his chapter on the late Sonatas and Quartets we recommend the reader without more incitement—only adding that even for one who has breathed the adagio of the Cavatina of Op. 130 there may remain peaks not negligible. Bach is barely mentioned by Mr. Rorke, and the heavens of Byrd and Palestrina not at all. It is true we can't very well perform Palestrina on the pianola.

Dr. Ernest Walker writes a Preface, and, falling in with the author's challenge for confessions, the historian of Music in England gallantly recalls a Marche des Troubadours, by Henri Roubier, and a Gondellied, by Theodor Oesten, as having been his soul's awakeners.

C.

REAL DANCING

Dancing differs from most of the arts in that it reached its highest developments in skill and significance centuries ago. Its decline was inevitable. With the gradual loss of its religious and ceremonial associations went most of its dignity and a good deal of its technique. This is a dancing age, but it can hardly be said that popular dancing is notable either for beauty or skill. What dancing was and what it might still be is shown in Edward Scott's Dancing for Strength and Beauty (George Allen and Unwin). Mr. Scott would have us go back to some of the dances of old—his book bears the sub-title, Renasant Dancing—and he succeeds in putting us out of conceit with the fox-trots and shimmies and other more or less unseemly gambols with which the floor of our suburban palais de danse quivers. Not that the old dances were lacking in fling. For proof, look at Mr. Scott's illustrations of the galliarde and at the photographs of 'Lively Steps of Tudor Dances,' and above all at that of the saut majeur of the volta. The last-named (a note tells us) 'was the caper in which Queen Elizabeth jumped higher than her cousin Mary'—and, thanks to the ample skirts of the period, must have made a parachute-like descent. Mr. Scott devotes a long and valuable chapter to 'The real menuet de la cour,' and shows that the conventional stage minuet is the unreal one. Lengthy consideration is given also to the waltz and to classic dancing. One small musical point: Mr. Scott is not quite sound when (in the chapter on 'Art and the Public') he says:

It is a fact that not a few people pretend to admire Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms, when in reality their tastes incline towards quite a different form of music. There are those who will bore themselves by listening to fugal intricacies and contrapuntal combinations which they are quite unable to appreciate, when, if the truth were known, they would rather be enjoying light operatic selections, and some would even prefer ragtime!

There may be a certain amount of humbug in musical life, but at present it does not take this form. Mr. Scott's words apply to a state of things long since past. To-day nobody has any scruples in avowing a distaste for 'the three B's,' or in fact for every composer save those of the Ayer-Gideon-Tate-Darewski brand. Our concert public may be small, and it may lack discrimination, but we may be sure that, to a man, it goes to performances of good music because it really wants to, and not in order to acquire a reputation for 'culture.'

Mr. Scott claims much for dancing as an aid to health and even beauty, and he claims convincingly. Altogether a capital book, full of information, and written on a high note of enthusiasm that should make many a middle-aged reader (anxiously observant of his circumference) gird himself, and see whether Dancing will not do more for him than Diet, and do it far more pleasantly.

H. G.

Musicians will remember Mr. Charles T. Smith's striking book, The Music of Life, published a few years ago, which threw light on the possibility of producing, through a well-planned curriculum of music in elementary schools, intelligent listeners, knowing good music from bad, and equipped, from participation in fine music themselves, for fighting their artistic battles in the world that lies outside school.

Mr. Smith has now put forth another volume, The School of Life (Grant Richards, 6s.), in which he describes his experiments in the evolution of a school system of a new type. Briefly, this consists in linking up all the activities of the school—scientific, literary, and artistic—so as to enable the children to reproduce, by means of plays, ceremonials, literary and historical dramatisations, scientific demonstrations, and the like, the main incidents in every epoch of civilisation. The activities of the world would be divided into, say, nine epochs, through which the whole school would move in monthly periods. The highest standard in the school would represent the dominant cultural force or race in each epoch, the remaining standards representing, in descending order, the other nations in the descending order of their cultural importance. The evolution of the whole of civilisation would be covered every year, and as the child was promoted a standard each year, he would continue throughout his school life to play his part as a member of one of the higher civilisations until he had taken part in as many of the periods as his time at school allowed. But when his time came to leave school, what then? Mr. Smith envisages the children being encouraged to provide their own organizations for similar performances in social clubs and continuation schools, and the requisitioning of the assistance of parents in the movement, so that the school would in time be looked upon as a social centre and adult communal institute.

The details of these schemes must be studied in the book itself. They are fascinating, with the fascination of a thing that may be very far off, but that we feel in our bones is right.

The first part of the book is devoted to a full explanation of Mr. Smith's wide-flung but perfectly practicable scheme. Then comes the astonishing account of his production—at the Glengall Road Council School, in the Isle of Dogs, down Poplar way—of no less a work than Mozart's Magic Flute. How this task, that to the outsider appears perfectly appalling, was carried through may be read in Mr. Smith's very human, sympathetic, and charming pages. The vindication of this bold production was found in the fact that some very eminent critics went to Poplar to hear the performance, and came away marvelling at it and full of enthusiasm.

There is high but not heavy thinking in this little book, and an optimistic outlook on human nature—'dockers, labourers, miners, engineers, and kindred gentfolk'—that is cheering. How much more cheering to the inhabitants of the Isle of Dogs has been the influence of this kindly, far-seeing dominie, who has striven, with wonderful success, to bring music and kindred arts to the brightening and enriching of so many drab lives.

W. R. A.

 VERY MUCH AT HOME WITH GREAT COMPOSERS

No doubt there are many people whose interest in a musical work is quickened by a picture of the composer in his habit as he lived. We need not smile superiorly at them. It is an amiable and human trait, and as such is not without its value. Evidently it is a powerful factor in American musical life, if we may judge from Charles D. Isaacson's Face to Face with Great Musicians (New York and London: D. Appleton & Co. Two volumes, 8s. 6d. each). The work consists of sixty short sketches of musicians (chiefly composers), more or less cast in the form of imaginary conversations, thirty to a volume. Mr. Isaacson tells us that they were written for him to read to his audiences (he is an enthusiastic musical missionary, giving popular concerts of good music), and it is obvious that they are better suited for oral delivery, a few at a time, interspersed with music, than collected into two fat volumes. Moreover, a speaker is apt to seize on the picturesque details of a composer's life, and it so happens that as a rule those are just the things that are either apocryphal or unimportant, or both. Mr. Scott has not been overawed by the difficulty of putting words in the mouths of his great musicians. He even makes some of them talk American, with startling effect, as, for instance, when Handel, disgusted at the opposition in London, remarks, 'Now I am through,' and later, having written The Messiah, he says to his Dublin friends, 'We will produce it right here in your city.' Haydn, describing his early trials, says, 'And then there came a little storekeeper who hardly knew me, and loaned me enough to run my own apartment.' And thus the austere Cherubini to the youthful Berlioz, 'Fine, my boy . . . I better be careful or you will be showing me about music.' Auber, the septuagenarian, is great fun. Here are a few flowers of speech from his reminiscences: 'Jac has on a very big amour. Look at him blush! . . . I'm young; look at me. I'm spry. . . . When I think back, way back to the day I first went into that queer old building. . . . No, siree! Not for me. . . .', During a chat with Franck in the organ-loft at St. Clotilde we jump to hear, 'Anyway, last night was great. Nobody can deny that, eh, boys?'—from d'Indy, of all people!

The public likes its great musicians gushed over, as well as chatted about, and Mr. Isaacson has the right kind of thing on tap:

'See that gentleman sitting back there in the inner room—there, right past the alcove? That pale, sad-faced esthete, that sickly, beautiful-faced knight of melancholy! That is Chopin. Oh, what a conflict rages beneath that quiet exterior—what passions, what loves, what sorrows, and yet what fairy-like joys! What poems of exquisite finery and delicate melody have been written by those artistic hands! What bitter, damning, roaring, pæans of hate have issued underneath the flashing of those pitying eyes. . . . See with what a languor he opens and closes his eyes, with what Oriental and feminine grace he strokes his chin.'

And so on. The idea at the back of these volumes is excellent. It is a pity the author was unable to develop it without gushing, and turning so many of the great composers into New Yorkers. However, he meant well. He might apply to himself the astonishing phrase he puts into the mouth of Meyerbeer: 'I'm human, I'm just a living little man. But in the big I'm all for Art.' H. G.

LESSONS WITH LESCHETIZKY

A book, like a piece of music, may show bad workmanship, and yet be not without value if its subject-matter be good. Here, for example, is Ethel Newcomb's Leschetizky as I knew him (New York and London: Appleton, 18s.), an untidy piece of book-making, yet with few uninteresting pages. The author spent some years as pupil, and later as assistant of Leschetizky, and jotted down particulars of his methods, with a good deal of his conversation and comments. This material she dishes up, untidily, as I have said, but not without spirit. Pianoforte students and teachers will here find valuable hints, especially on the interpretative side. Despite its obvious failings, the book succeeds well enough to suggest a profitable task for some of our young people now studying with great teachers. A bit of Boswell's gift, and a habit of noting daily the most illuminating remarks heard during lessons: here are two simple ingredients that with care in the preparation should give us an educational book of great practical value. Unfair to the teacher? Not a bit. If he is dead or retired he won't mind. If he is still teaching he is more likely to gain than to lose pupils through such a book. Miss Newcomb shows us both how to do it, and how not to do it; the main point is that she shows it can be done. H. G.

LONDON STREET CRIES

Having done good work by unearthing, editing, lecturing on and conducting performances of old London street cries, Sir Frederick Bridge puts the seal on his efforts by bringing his data together in book form—The Old Cries of London (Novello, 7s.). The nine chapters and Appendix of which the book consists deal with: London Lackpenny, the famous old poem which gives so minute a description of life in the London of 1400 (the poem is printed in full, with the original spelling); 'The Music of the Cries'; Weelkes's Humorous Fancy: Rounds, and a Freeman's Song; Orlando Gibbons's In Nomine; Deering's Fancy, What d'ye Lacke? W. Cobbold's Fancy, New Fashions; 'The Cries of Later Years,' and Some Additional Cries and Tradesmen's Songs. The musical value of some of these old cries has been recognised by those who have made acquaintance with Sir Frederick's edition of the Fancies of Weelkes, Deering, and Gibbons. The Blacking Seller's cry, quoted in the Appendix, will be new to most people, and is so vigorous and well-constructed as to suggest the hand of one of our best old song-writers:

The effective sequence points to the skilled composer rather than to a folk-song origin. Sir Frederick has drawn on the Print Room of the British Museum for his numerous illustrations. Some are excellent specimens of old engraving, and all are quaint and amusing. The frontispiece is a finely printed coloured plate reproduced from a unique painting on glass, entitled 'The Dentist, or Teeth Drawn with a Touch.' Though it is later in date than the cry 'Touch and goe! Ha' ye work for Kind-Heart the Tooth Drawer? Touch and goe!' Sir Frederick reasonably considers that the use of the word 'touch' implies a connection. The plate shows the dentist gripping the victim's tooth with a pair of forceps large enough to negotiate a tusk. He is evidently enjoying himself immensely, while the damsel who completes the group watches the operation closely with amused interest. Not many readers of the book will leave this picture in its place. They will want to see it framed and hung.

An interesting point in regard to the musical examples is that they have been set up by the Oxford University Press in the type used for the Oxford Hymn Book—type 'based upon the fount for which punches were cut in Oxford about 1683 by Peter de Walpergen.' Its use here is a happy thought. The book as a whole, with its pleasant treatment of a fascinating subject, its fine print, and its wealth of illustration, is a delight both to handle and to read.

H. G.

ESSAYS ON CONTEMPORARIES

A well-produced and handy series of booklets has been started by Messrs. Chester—Miniature Essays (6d. each). Twenty-three are announced, nine of them dealing with British composers. The three so far published are on Bax, Goossens, and Stravinsky. We are left guessing as to the author. The essays are in both French and English, so we hope they will be read by our neighbours across the Channel, who appear to take little interest in modern music that is not home-made. That the essayist draws the eulogistic stop early, and leaves it out, need cause no complaint. In the past we English have been chary of writing about our composers while they were still alive and able to profit by encouragement and criticism. We have generally waited till the call was for elegy rather than eulogy. Probably our young composers are not greatly concerned as to their standing with the next generation. Why should they be? They are hardly human if they don't care far more about contemporary appreciation. We hope these Chesterian booklets will be widely read.

H. G.

FOR SINGERS AND OTHERS

A new work of considerable importance to teachers and students of singing and physical education is H. H. Hulbert's Eurhythm: Thought in Action. The Principles and Practice of Vocal and Physical Therapy (Novello). Dr. Hulbert is well-known as a lecturer and writer on voice, breathing, and physical education, and the theories advanced in the present work—which was begun in 1911—are, we are told, the outcome of practical work carried on for years in connection with vocal and physical therapy.

'Eurhythm' [writes the author in a Preface] 'is a term signifying perfect harmony. Harmony of mind and action, of impression and expression, is the poetry of movement and life. It includes principles that should animate life itself and all forms of education, mental, physical, and artistic . . . Thought in Action makes individuals intellectual units, and . . . is the one and only way of getting that harmony of mind and body that is indispensable for artistic movement.'

In the chapter on 'Physique and Artistic Movement,' the writer criticises our methods of physical education. There is too much of the element of drill, with its resultant inartistic, jerky movement:

'The jerky, vigorous stamp of the feet of bodies kept rigid while marching is untrue to nature and eurhythmics, and this unnatural artificiality in physical development is altogether unscientific and harmful . . . Although it is claimed that the educational gymnastics taught in our English schools are based upon strictly scientific principles, it will be found on careful investigation that those principles are the unscientific principles of antagonism in movement, rather than the scientific principles of co-ordination in movement which is the true basis of eurhythm and natural science. . . . Flexibility of body and masterly, graceful, and purposeful control of movements should be made the basis of all physical education. . . . Physical education would then assist vocal culture and dancing, and all accomplishments and games of skill.'

The chapter on 'The Poise of the Body and Tonicity' contains much that the singer should know. Incidentally we here discover that the author is obviously not enamoured of the quality of voice peculiar to our highly-trained choir-boys. Under the heading 'Tonality of the vocal apparatus'—tonicity being a term to indicate that the tension is proportionate to the purpose of the action—we read:

'While voice is being made, the walls of the vocal apparatus must be held in a certain state of tension varying with the pitch and tension of the note. Over-tension causes rigidity and under-tension flabbiness. Rigidity causes a hard tone and flabbiness a breathy tone. . . The coo-ing, breathy tones of children, taught to bring the head voice into the chest voice (although the sounds freed from the harshness produced by rigidity are more pleasing to the ear), are not musical, and cannot convey the real meaning of the music. . . . To the lover of real tone, the flutiness, so noticeable in the singing of some highly-trained Church choirs is almost as distasteful as the raucous but more hearty singing of those who have had little training. . . There is present in nearly all choirs, trained and untrained, either hardness or breathiness due to a too rigid or too flabby vocal apparatus. If the vocal apparatus is in a state of tonicity, the voices are musical, and beautiful tone, which alone is able to express the appreciation of a cultured mind, is present.'

Most of us have suffered at times from the coo-ing or hooting of imperfectly trained choirs, but many will probably feel that the author's criticism cannot fairly be applied in the case of our best Cathedral and Church choirs. On the other hand it must be admitted that too many choir-trainers would appear to concern themselves exclusively with the purely negative problem of eradicating harshness, and it is rare indeed to find a choir where the tone is musical, and yet has a real 'edge' to it. We are convinced that there are few choirmasters who would not materially benefit by a careful perusal of this thoughtful and suggestive chapter.

The subject of breathing is very thoroughly and clearly treated. The harmful effects of the crude, forcible methods too often adopted in the practice of so-called 'deep breathing' are pointed out, and the systematic practice of medium and short breathing is urged. A feature of this chapter is the attention given to the many and varied functions performed by the abdominal muscles. The part taken by these muscles, and the correct action of the diaphragm during breathing for voice according to

(Continued on page 112.)

Come, and let us return.

ANTHEM FOR THE SEASON OF LENT FROM "THUS SAITH THE LORD."

Joel ii. 12; Hosea vi. 1.

Music by GEORGE GARRETT, Mus. Doc., M.A.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED; NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

Andante con moto. $\text{♩} = 96.$

ORGAN. Sw. Diap. & Prin. Ped.

SOLO TENOR. RECIT. espress.

Thus saith the LORD, Turn ye e - ven to add Oboe. Diap.

me with all your heart, and with fast - ing, and with Andante con moto.

weep - ing, and with mourn - ing.

Andante con moto. $\text{♩} = 96.$

CHORUS. SOPRANO.

Come, and let us re - turn, . . . re - turn un - to the LORD, . .

ALTO.

TENOR.

Come, and let us re - turn, . . . re - turn un -

BASS.

Come, and let us re - turn . .

Come, and add 4 ft.

Ped.

let us re - turn . . un - to the LORD, to the LORD, let us re - turn un - to . . the LORD, . . to the un - to the LORD, come, and let us re - turn un - to the let us re - turn un - to the LORD, come, and let us re - add Oboe.

cres.

come, and let us re - turn,

mf

come, and let us re - turn, . .

LORD, . . re - turn . . un - to the LORD, let us re - turn

LORD

come, and let us re - turn,

turn,

come, and let us re - turn,

come, and

Gt. Org.

Gt. Org. Sw. coup.

L.H.

add to Gt.

Come and let us re - turn, re - turn . . . un - un - to the LORD, . . . let us re - turn un - - to Come, and let us re - turn to the LORD, . . . re - turn let us re - turn un - to the LORD, and let us re - turn . . . un - - rall. più lento. pp cres.

 - to the LORD; . . . for He hath torn, . . . and rall. più lento. pp cres.
 the LORD; . . . for He hath torn, . . . and rall. più lento. pp cres.
 un - to the LORD; . . . for He hath torn, . . . and rall. più lento. pp cres.
 - - to the LORD; . . . for He hath torn, . . . and rall. più lento. pp cres.
 Sw. Diap. pp Ped. cres.
 He will heal . . . us; . . . He hath smit - - ten, . . . and pp cres.
 He will heal . . . us; . . . He hath smit - - ten, . . . and pp cres.
 He will heal . . . us; . . . He hath smit - - ten, . . . and pp cres.
 He will heal . . . us; . . . He hath smit - - ten, . . . and
pp cres.
 Sw. pp Ped.

a tempo primo.

He will bind us up. Come, and let us re -

He will bind us up, He will bind us up.

He will bind us up, He will bind us up.

He will bind us up, He will bind us up.

Sw. a tempo primo.

turn, re - turn un - to the LORD, un - to the Come, and let us re - turn, re - turn un - to the

Come, and let us re - turn

Come, and let us re -

Ped.

LORD, come, and let us re - turn, cres. LORD, let us re - turn un - to the LORD, mf Come, and let us re - turn, let us re - turn to the turn un - to the LORD, come, and let us re - Gt.

Gt.

to Gt.

come, and let us re - turn, . . . come, and let us re - come, and let us re - turn, un - to the LORD, . . .

come, and let us re - turn, . . .

LORD, . . . come, and let us re - turn, . . . come, and let us re - turn, . . .

4 ft. add Reeds Sw.

turn, . . . let us re - turn un - to the LORD, un - to the LORD, . . . come, and let us re - turn, turn, . . . come, and let us re - turn un - to . . . the LORD,

come, and let us re - turn . . . un - to the LORD,

dim. let us re - turn . . . un - to the LORD.

dim. let us re - turn . . . un - to the LORD.

dim. let us re - turn . . . un - to the LORD.

dim. let us re - turn . . . un - to the LORD.

8 ft. Gt. Sw. Diap. Sw. p to Sw.

(Continued from page 106.)

the views of the author, receive close analysis. A description is given of an interesting experiment bearing on this point conducted by the author, while examined under X-rays by Dr. Lyster (the eminent X-ray specialist, who lately died a martyr to science).

Another chapter for singers and speakers deals exhaustively with the sounds of the English language. Particularly thorough is the treatment of diphthongs. The writer considers that

'The neglect of the proper pronunciation of the musical English diphthongs is so remarkable that it can be stated without fear of contradiction that no educated English person can pronounce them properly unless he has been carefully trained to do so by someone possessing the gift of an ear sufficiently musical to detect their real value.'

The book includes a description of the articulatory apparatus and of the larynx, and a chapter on hygiene for voice-users. There are numerous illustrations, and the large number of practical exercises scattered throughout the work include, besides physical and health exercises, exercises for pronunciation, ten for breathing, four for soft palate, several for the tongue, twelve for the lower jaw, and several for the lips.

Dr. Hulbert is to be congratulated upon the completion of a work which should prove a valuable text-book for serious students of voice and physical training.

G. G.

A BOOK ON SAINT-SAËNS

The brilliant and caustic old Frenchman and his neat, nimble art have the soberest of commentators possible in Saint-Saëns, by Arthur Hervey (London: at The Bodley Head, 6s.). A great deal of Saint-Saëns's music is like the talk of any clever, voluble Frenchman—even when it does not mean very much, the manner remains agreeable. But a strange expounder of such an art is Mr. Arthur Hervey, who gives the impression of speaking reluctantly, says as little as he decently can (142 pp.), and almost avows a mistrust of words. Concerning French composers younger than Debussy and Charpentier, 'it is,' Mr. Hervey casually declares, 'yet too early to speak.' Is it?

It is possibly better never, either late or soon, to speak at all about music, so helplessly after all do words seek to define that which is essentially ultra-verbal. But, the problem once tackled, there are no prohibitions against earliness or lateness, and all that matters is how it is done and the degree of sympathetic interest you manage to pass on. Saint-Saëns, himself a charming writer, did not say 'Concerning Rossini, Meyerbeer and Gounod, it is already too late to speak.' Concerning them he wrote, he was interested in them, he interests us. (A pity, by the way, that the translation of his papers, published last year by Mr. John Murray, was in such wretched English.)

Not, we gather, that Mr. Hervey is not interested in his subject. He professes indeed almost unmitigated admiration for the busy composer's remarkable output, even to the point of appreciating some aspects of The Promised Land (Gloucester Festival, 1913—a date which the printer with unconscious irony makes '1813'). No music-type is used, and a reader ignorant of Saint-Saëns's actual work might, if credulous, take him for a first-rate genius, or, if sceptical, for the merest epigone. 'Saint-Saëns is indeed absolutely unique, and has no counterpart' (p. 29). 'The incomparable' someone once dubbed Max Beerbohm, who with his own biographer pleaded (oh, in vain), 'Note that I am not incomparable. Compare me. Compare me as an essayist (for instance) with other essayists. Point out how much less human I am than Lamb, how much less intellectual than Hazlitt, and what an ignoramus.' The artist who indeed should be incomparable, absolutely unique, without counterpart, is no matter for criticism. Either he moves on the plane of patent medicines and portfolios of the World's Best Music, or he is a god. Comparisons are odious, but subtract them from criticism, and this is the sort of thing left (Mr. Hervey's account of Saint-Saëns's Op. 92):

'It is modern in spirit though classical in form, and contains various innovations of the highest interest to the musician. One can readily realise that the composition of this work must have been a labour of love.'

Mr. Hervey sketches the plots of Saint-Saëns's thirteen operas, and in an appendix makes a catalogue of the compositions. C.

New Music

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Cyril Scott's Inclination à la Danse (Elkin) has an impetus that is too often lacking in his music. Its harmonic flavour is sharper, and its rhythm more incisive. We could do with more Scott of this kind. Alec Rowley's graceful talent is shown to great advantage in his Six Improvisations—charming two-page pieces of moderate difficulty (Winthrop Rogers). Moods, a valse by Gerrard Williams, is in popular style, with some characteristic touches and a little too much repetition. Ginger-(k)Nuts is a fox-trot by Sydney Rosenbloom, better than its silly title, quite as jolly as the average fox-trot, and more musicianly. I hope more composers of the Rosenbloom and Gerrard Williams calibre will adventure into the field of popular dance music. At present it is almost monopolised by platitudinous vulgarians. Both these pieces are published by Paxton & Co.

Three sets of pieces by MacDowell have just been issued by Winthrop Rogers—Six Idylls (after poems by Goethe), Six Poems (after poems by Heine), and Four Pieces. Though not as a whole the best MacDowell, they are too good to be neglected by those who have a liking for the composer's music. They were first published in 1898 by Hainauer, Breslau. How far we have travelled since then is shown by an alternative passage in the Humoreske. The original gives us a few bars of consecutive fifths in the left hand. Below is printed a version in which the fifths are absent, a foot-note explaining that the alterations 'are specially recommended to those who find the strict style of the successive fifths too humorous.' The original is a very harmless flight compared with what our fifth-mongers of to-day can manage. H. G.

A NEW EDITION OF BEETHOVEN'S PIANOFORTE SONATAS

A complete edition of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas, published in single numbers, is no light undertaking. When, however, the editorship is placed in the hands of musicians of the standing of Mr. F. Corder (editor-in-chief) and Messrs. Carlo Albanesi, T. A. Matthay, and Oscar Beringer, the success of the venture should not be in doubt. The Newman Practical Edition (The Newman Publishing Co.) is excellently got up and clearly printed. Each Sonata is prefaced by a page of editorial notes giving practical advice to the student. For purposes of reference the bars are numbered line by line. Some of these references are a little vague, and occasional mistakes occur (in the first Sonata, bar 102 should be bar 107). Students will appreciate the many helpful suggestions given, though, possibly, out-and-out Beethovenites will be shocked at some of the recommendations. Compared with the over-edited foreign editions upon which most of us were brought up, the music stands out with almost startling clearness owing to the elimination of unnecessary phrasing marks and fingering. Occasionally, indeed, the fingering might have been a little less sparingly used. Altogether this is an edition which will be welcomed by students and teachers alike. G. G.

PIANOFORTE DUETS

Excellent fare of an old-fashioned tuneful type is contained in four books of Celebrated Ballet Music of the 17th and 18th Centuries (Augener), ostensibly for sight-reading, and useful for that purpose, but also well worth playing for its own sake, seeing that the composers drawn on include Lully, Rameau, Gluck, Méhul, Gossec, and other old French worthies. The music is mostly easy. Dennis Arundell's Nursery Tunes (Goodwin & Tabb) are free treatments of Girls and Boys come out to Play, There was a Lady loved a Swine, The Miller of Dee, and Over the Hills and Far Away. The title-page tells us that the treble is easy, but it is distinctly awkward in several places, owing to the cross-rhythms with the secondo, and also because the positions are sometimes inconvenient. The duets seem to have been inspired by Quilter's Children's Overture, but the treatment is far less happy, some of the harmonies being decidedly far-fetched. Surely we ought to be able to be simple and natural in dealing with nursery rhymes!

Those of us who heard Germaine Tailleferre's Image in its original version for eight instruments found a good deal of it piquant. An arrangement for pianoforte duet shows that the flavour lay in the instrumental colour. On the keyboard it shows itself to be decidedly small beer. The simultaneous use of two or three tonalities will not disguise poverty of thought, and the trick itself (which is far less clever than it appears to be) soon wears thin. On page 4, for example, the primo player is distinctly in G, the right hand of the secondo no less distinctly in E flat minor, and the bass in C major. But as all three constituents are puerile the total effect can hardly be otherwise. The trick is used to much better purpose by Casella in his Pupazzetti, 5 musiche per marionette (Chester). These make one wince at times, but players who get the hang of them and acquire the knack of treating the dissonances rightly will end by enjoying them, and will have at their fingers' end something to wake up the dullest audience. The Lullaby has real charm, and the Polka, at anything like the right pace, is a stunning success. (In bar 3, by the by, the two B's should be G's.) H. G.

CHAMBER MUSIC

Messrs. Augener's new edition of Tchaikovsky's famous Trio, A la Mémoire d'un Grand Artiste, bears evidence of the popularity this work enjoys, for it is of course inconceivable that so shrewd a publisher should embark on such an undertaking (it runs to about ninety pages) without having first ascertained what the public demand is likely to be. This being the case, it must be admitted that the situation encourages unusual hopes for music. On the one hand we have our moderns attracting a good deal of attention and receiving, on the whole, as much encouragement as was extended in days gone by to a Chopin, a Berlioz, or a Mozart. On the other side there is a large public ready to welcome the very things the moderns attack. Thus both Peter and Paul have their admirers and their supporters. This is the best of all possible worlds.

Tchaikovsky's Trio is perhaps the most typical work of its class. It embodies all the chief features of the Tchaikovskian school—its deep-seated sentimentality, the preponderance of the lyrical element, the long preparation to what purports to be a terrific climax. The limitations of the medium prevent the cloaking over of weaknesses in the work as easily as when the composer has at his disposal the resources of the orchestra. You can study Tchaikovsky's merits and demerits more easily in this Trio than in almost any other work of his. The death of Nicholas Rubinstein had moved him deeply, and the elegiac section of the Trio, if lacking in dramatic force, is nevertheless arresting, as all sincere expressions are. But even the sorrow he felt could not make him forget the tricks of the trade. He wept hot tears over the grave of his friend, but that did not prevent him from picking the best of handkerchiefs to wipe his eyes afterwards. Perhaps it was merely an act of routine, but it is a great pity he did at all, for the gesture was bad. There is nothing so fatal to effect as an anticlimax, and Tchaikovsky is guilty of more than one horrible anticlimax. After taking us slowly and laboriously over the hill, when we reach the summit he dismisses us with rhetorical flourishes. This Trio is a case in point. After the long preparation of the Variazione Finale comes the central theme played fff in unison by the strings. At first the noise made by the pianoforte does give us something like a thrill, but how soon that first impression fades, leaving us cold, critical, unsatisfied. It is only a little better than the appalling anticlimax in the Finale of the 5th Symphony, where, after a great display of barbaric strength and splendour, we are led to a climax worthy of Donizetti at his worst. The best features of the Trio are those which give an irresistible, popular appeal to his songs and to his symphonies—individuality and Byronic pathos.

Widely different in texture and outlook is the Trio in A minor for pianoforte, violin, and 'cello by M. Max d'Ollone (Durand). The composer has obviously heard that the seventh added to the common chord adds spice to harmony. There is no harm, of course, in making use of rich and sonorous harmonies, but this cold-shouldering of simple, straightforward statements, this insistence on calling a spade an agricultural implement, is rather apt to become a trifle monotonous, especially when, as in this case, the breezy harmonic treatment is at variance with the sophisticated treatment of the melody. Organic weakness is inevitable in music that attempts to serve two ideals.

F. B.

SONGS

One of the best of the new songs sung by John Coates at his recent recitals was Malcolm Davidson's A Christmas Carol, a fine setting of three stanzas from Masfield's Christmas Eve at Sea. It has just been published by Winthrop Rogers, for both low and high voice. The low voice should be one with a good top F. Another excellent song by the same composer is Sorrow of Mydath (Winthrop Rogers), words again from Masfield, the song-writer's friend. It calls for expressive singing of the intense type. Ivor Gurney is one of our most promising song-composers, with a fund of melody that has much of the naturalness of folk-song, and a knack of writing pianoforte parts full of interest, but not suggestive of a pianoforte solo to which an apologetic voice-part has been tacked on. The Bonnie Earl of Murray is a vigorous setting of an old Scots ballad. The music is almost entirely diatonic. The County Mayo is wistfully expressive, with a tune that owes something to folk-song, and a beautifully written accompaniment. Save in the third verse the music is mainly diatonic. Both these songs are for medium voice, and both are published by Winthrop Rogers. From the same house comes Janet Hamilton's The music that love made, an expressive affair in which the pianist has rather the more interesting part. Josef Holbrooke's A Lake and a Fairy Boat (Enoch) shows the composer in an unusually light and pleasing mood. A singer with a good control of the high notes can make a lot of it, especially of the beautiful cadence to each verse. A delightful song. Arthur Bliss's Two Nursery Rhymes (Chester), are as sprightly as we expect from the composer. The first is for soprano, clarinet, and pianoforte; the second for soprano and clarinet. At the end of No. 1 the singer and clarinettist are directed to 'hold on to their trill and note as long as possible'—a test of endurance that may lead to sporting rather than musical interest.

Louis Durey's Le Bestiaire, ou Cortège d'Orphée (Chester) is an album of twenty-six songs, delightful little fancies both as to words and music. Here is a procession of the animals we know, with some we don't know, from the flea to the elephant—just a kind of epigram about each one, set to slender, suggestive music, sprinkled with fashionable pungencies. The temptation to quote words and music is strong, but cannot be yielded to beyond a couple of the texts. The king of beasts cuts a poor figure:

O lion, malheureuse image
Des rois chus lamentablement,
Tu ne nais maintenant qu'en cage
A Hamburg, chez les Allemands.

And here is the new 'Song of the Flea':

Puces, amis, amantes même,
Qu'ils sont cruels ceux qui nous aiment.
Tout notre sang coule pour eux.
Les bien-aimés sont malheureux.

It is to be hoped that an English version of these songs may be forthcoming, though the translator will have no easy task in a good many cases. H. G.

Camille Saint-Saëns was a subscriber to the Complete Edition of Bach so far back as 1854, when his name appears among the list prefixed to the fourth volume. He and the late Dr. W. H. Cummings, who began even earlier with the second volume, were the last survivors of the original band of enthusiasts who supported the vast undertaking till it achieved finality in 1899, after almost half a century.

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

In its present state of development the gramophone does its best work when it gives us reproductions of familiar music rather than novelties—at all events, so far as orchestral works are concerned. The loss of a few details matters little in the case of a well-known score, because the mind instinctively supplies the deficiencies. Not that there are many in the two orchestral records received from H.M.V.—the Scherzo from the New World Symphony (Sir Landon Ronald and the Albert Hall Orchestra) and the Meistersinger Overture (Albert Coates). In the former we miss something of the electrifying power of the drum part, and in the latter the passage wherein the three subjects are combined loses a trifle by reason of the bass being a wee bit indefinite at the start. But these are small faults in two of the best orchestral records I have so far heard. Both are 12-in. d.-s.

Last month I spoke of the comparative failure of the contralto voice from a recording point of view. But a record of Madame Kirkby Lunn singing Elgar's Like to the Damask Rose is so good that I must take back something of what I said. This is an unusually distinct reproduction of an excellent bit of singing. (12-in.)

Here is a batch of operatic records, well up to standard: Dio, che nell'Palma infondere, from Don Carlos (Giovanni Martinelli and De Luca, 12-in.); Sempre libera deggio folleggiare, from La Traviata (Galli-Curci, 10-in.); and a 12-in. d.-s. with Be mine the delight, from Faust (Walter Hyde and Robert Radford), and the Spinning Chorus from The Flying Dutchman (the Grand Opera Company).

Mr. Robert Radford is heard to splendid advantage in Revenge, Timotheus cries. On the other side of this 12-in. he gives us Herbert Sharpe's The Mahogany Tree, which suffers from a lack of robustness in the male-voice chorus.

The pick of all these vocal records are undoubtedly the two of Chaliapin—Koenemann's How the King went to War, and Moussorgsky's Song of the Flea, both in Russian, and with orchestral accompaniment. Though the first is unfamiliar, its drift is easy to grasp, thanks to the vivid contrasts in the music and the finely expressive singing. The Song of the Flea is already familiar through Rosing's frequent performance of it. Chaliapin sings it with much more variety of tone-colour than does Rosing, and his sardonic laugh is something not to be missed. So, too, is Rosing's, but here again Chaliapin has a greater variety. It is a boon to have such fine records of this noble voice and dramatic style.

A few instrumental records call for little more than bare mention, the music being, as a rule, a good deal less important than the performance: a 10-in. d.-s. of Miss Isolde Menges playing Tod Boyd's Samoan Lullaby and Brahms's A flat Waltz (from Op. 39); a 12-in. d.-s. of Moiseiwitsch doing his best with the rather poor G flat Waltz of Chopin, a charming little Finlandish Dance of Palmgren, and an effective Arabesque of Leschetizky; and a 10-in. of Elman playing his own arrangement of a Country Dance by Beethoven.

Just as I am closing this column I find yet another record, evidently one that has come to the wrong address—a 10-in. d.-s. of two songs from the 'Co-optimists' entertainment, with Mr. Walter Jefferies singing Ivy St. Helier's Coal Black Mammy, and Melville Gideon's The Old Nigger. I am glad to make their acquaintance because they shed light on a question a few correspondents have written to me about. Some of us are perhaps a trifle too ready to blame the gramophone for the indistinctness of the words in vocal records. But that the fault lies chiefly with the singers is proved by these two excellent records, in which all the words come out clearly. Nor is it a case of a comic vocalist with no voice, who speaks rather than sings. Mr. Jefferies has a good voice, and, though he leaves his note occasionally in order to make a point, he is no less distinct in passages where he is giving us 'straight' singing. The fact is, too many of our serious singers make a fetish of tone, and sacrifice text and interpretation to it. As Mr. Newman, discussing a kindred question, wrote in the Manchester Guardian recently, they 'lay' a pet note pretty much as a hen lays an egg. What ought to be a mere factor in the expression of the idea at the back of the song becomes a distracting physical operation. Such singers will not amend until poor enunciation is received in the concert hall as it is in the variety theatre—with the 'bird,' not the bouquet.

London Concerts

DR. RICHARD STRAUSS

Dr. Richard Strauss conducted some of his early works at the Albert Hall (January 17), having come here from the United States, where he seems to have been made much of, mayors and millionaires paying him public and private homage. London could not be expected to rise quite to this pitch, and it turned out that the Albert Hall was rather too big for the purpose. Without verging at all on failure the concert, it must be admitted, took place with a certain flatness of effect. For one thing, there is the disproportion between that hall and any normal orchestra. For another, Dr. Strauss banked on three old symphonic poems (Don Juan, Till Eulenspiegel, Death and Transfiguration) all well established in popularity. This made for safety, but not for excitement. If the applause, kindly enough, was no more it must be that the young folk were not there applauding.

They, it appears, respond languidly to the show of energy put up by Strauss's music. A hollowness is detected in his emotional protestations. This imposing structure of the 1890's is not on the whole wearing well; it seems to have been put together too much for immediate show, good stuff and shoddy used indiscriminately, and the good is threatened with being undermined by the decay of the other. How Strauss blusters from the moment he has really nothing to say! Partly, too, it is the fault of the celebrated literary attachments, no doubt, which at first enhanced the vividness of the music. But the arts descend at their peril to anecdote, for what stales so soon as an anecdote? Till Eulenspiegel, although as music profuse with irrelevancies, has the most of inherent character, and Death and Transfiguration the worst pretence and tawdriness.

The London Symphony Orchestra was the English element in this concert. Several of the best known of Strauss's songs were sung by Miss Ethel Frank in that highly elaborate and considered style of hers which somehow makes us think of some great modern scholar inditing faultless verse in an ancient language—never less than admirable, but not so much captivating. C.

BRAHMS AT QUEEN'S HALL

Sir Henry Wood's Saturday afternoon symphony concerts at Queen's Hall are being devoted nowadays to music that has long since proved its worth, which is a virtue but not the whole of virtue in such an institution. English orchestral music finds no place, or hardly, under this order. (And for the moment most other orchestral concerts are from necessity or convenience in the same way.) Thus on January 14 Sir Henry Wood, giving us the third Symphony of Brahms, followed by his Violin Concerto, even packed the corners of the programme tight with related music (Beethoven's Leonora No. 2, and a Suite in F sharp minor of Dohnányi). Thus the afternoon was wanting in the element of the brilliant, the playful, and the picturesque.

The performance of the Concerto, however, rose above ordinary levels. The soloist was young M. Toscha Seidel. He had been heard two or three times before in the last six months, and still so masterful an execution made a surprise; he had hardly been reckoned a violinist of that stature. The eloquence of the reading became vehement, but there was to be felt enough conviction to support this, not to speak of all the technical power to carry it out. The Suite of Dohnányi had been heard at the 'Promenades.' It is on a largish scale, and in some ways derives from Brahms; good, sound material, firmly chiselled by a highly competent rather than sensitive hand. The leader of the orchestra on this occasion was Miss Doris Houghton. C.

MUSIC FOR THE PEOPLE

In London, of a Sunday afternoon, opportunities for indulging a musical taste at trifling expense were probably never more numerous than at present. We have the choice of the four leading symphony orchestras in Britain—and, therefore, presumably in the world. And if East had of late a cogent reason for undertaking the journey from Whitechapel to Kensington and paying eightpence—or more, according to circumstances—for admission to the Albert Hall, in order to greet West on an occasion for congratulation, attendance at the People's Palace, Mile End, on the following Sunday, January 15, suggested that West might—and, in some cases, does—find many occupations less profitable and pleasurable than returning the compliment. The Stepney enterprise has frankly educative aims, and offers sixteen hundred seats at a shilling, and a large number at two shillings (plus tax in each case). At these prices concerts of symphonic music are to be provided till Easter by the British Symphony Orchestra under the direction of Mr. Adrian C. Boult. If the performance under notice is a criterion, the music will be played with an efficiency unexcelled anywhere. A cardinal point, this, by which alone the recent decision to hold the concerts weekly instead of fortnightly, as hitherto, will be justified. One may bring instruction in music (or any other matter) to the doors of the people, one may print for their benefit, as here, brief instructive notes on musical form and standard composers in a programme sold at the nominal price of twopence, but, failing their entertainment in the truest sense, the response must not be expected to be encouraging or sustained.

It is clear that no fears need be entertained on this score. The audience was numerous and appreciative, not least of the conductor's forewords, illustrated by quotation of the leading musical themes by the band, incongruous as an occasional flippancy might appear in remarks generally sound and scholarly. But when he took up the baton, the fancy of neophyte and initiate alike was freed. No truer compliment can be phrased. The sunny formality of Mozart, characteristically displayed in the Don Giovanni Overture, Beethoven's monumental trick of genius by which a simple, almost commonplace sequence of notes is, as in the fourth Symphony, transformed by rhythm into a subject of vital significance—these wonders were unfolded with the sure touch of the artist. Nor were the late George Butterworth's folk-song English Idylls or Wagner's essay in tender sentiment, the Siegfried Idyll, treated with less sympathy. Warming one's intellectual consciousness at these sacred fires, bodily consciousness of the frigid conditions prevailing outside—and, to a certain extent, inside, the Hall—was for the time being happily lost. H. F.

MR. ARTHUR BLISS'S SONGS

Miss Anne Thursfield, Miss Jelly d'Aranyi, and Mr. Leonard Borwick took part in the Classical Concert Society's seventh concert (Wigmore Hall, January 18). The violinist and pianist began with Elgar's Sonata Op. 82, making as may be guessed a performance of no feeble quality. The violinist's style even proclaimed her too outspokenly as indomitable and unafraid, and there were tender phrases of Elgar which, in the eye of fancy, appeared like a small, shy boy submitting to the grip of a stalwart nurse. Later Miss d'Aranyi played two pieces by Charles Szymanowski, who is the pride of the modern Polish school. Arcthusa's Fountain displayed her remarkable technique, and a Tarantella the characteristic raw vigour and life of her playing, but these interesting pieces rise well above mere display-music. They, together with others performed not long ago in London by the composer and M. Kochanski, 'supply a felt want,' as the saying goes, in the way of highly-wrought modern violin music other than in the sonata and concerto forms. In the Arcthusa there are analogies with researches of the pianoforte-writing of the Debussy period.

Miss Thursfield's songs included a new set of three, on poems of Walter de la Mare, by Arthur Bliss—'Romantic Songs' they are called, but 'romantic' is not applied in the sense usual in music. They are more noticeably sprightly and whimsical. Mr. Bliss's sprightliness is a quality of his own which cuts sharply across the usual sort of manufactured sprightliness ('Rustic Merry-making,' Allegro vivace, 2-4 time!). His quips have a Puck-like uncertain flicker and mysterious poesy. The three songs are tiny. It argues a considerable talent that so defined a picture has been etched within this brevity. The composer accompanied, and of the third song, 'The Buckle,' a repetition was required. C.

CHORAL CONCERTS

The Carol concert given by the Royal Choral Society on December 17 was, as usual, a pleasant and popular function, interesting alike to musicians and others. There was a motet for double chorus Now once again our hearts we raise, founded on an ancient chorale, Bridge's A Babe ys borne I wys, Ravenscroft's Remember God's goodness, and Parry's rattling Welcome Yule, besides well-known traditional tunes and a number of well-chosen solos sung by Miss Laura Evans-Williams, Miss Olga Haley, Mr. John Coates, and Mr. Harry Dearth. In the absence of Sir Frederick Bridge through illness Mr. H. L. Balfour conducted.

Happily restored to health in the new year Sir Frederick conducted The Messiah on January 7, when the solo parts were taken by Miss Carrie Tubbs, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. William Boland, and Mr. Norman Allin.

The Oriana Madrigal Society took a typical programme to the Hampstead Conservatoire on January 10, and did it justice under Mr. Scott's guidance. The concert was the beginning of a suburban campaign, for the Society had arranged to repeat the programme at Blackheath on January 17, and at the Northern Polytechnic on January 19.

The Dulwich Philharmonic Society gave an expressive performance of The Dream of Gerontius at the Crystal Palace on December 17, Mr. Martin Kingslake conducting. The soloists were Miss Doris Manuelli, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Dan Richards. M.

CHAMBER MUSIC

Six of the Dolmetsch family gave old music on old instruments at the Guildhouse, Eccleston Square, on December 17. The recorder, lute, and cithara were brought into action, and all joined in a Fantasia for six viols by William Byrd.

Music of Brahms and Dohnányi was played on December 19 by the Meredyll Pianoforte Quartet—Miss Bessie Rawlins (violin), Mr. Raymond Jeremy (viola), Mr. Emile Dœhaerd (violoncello), and Miss Marguerite Meredyll (pianoforte).

The concert of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at Queen's Hall on January 4 was carried out by the Wynn Reeves String Quartet—heard in Borodin's Quartet in D and Hurlstone's Fantasy Quartet in A flat—and by Mr. Philip Wilson, who gave 16th century songs, accompanied on the harpsichord by Mr. Gerald Cooper.

The Snow String Quartet, at Æolian Hall on January 10, was at its best in the Quartet of Elgar. On January 12, at Wigmore Hall, the London Trio played Arensky's work in D minor in obedience to a plebiscite.

Schönberg's Sextet was played by the Philharmonic Quartet, with Mr. Ernest Tomlinson and Mr. Gauntlett, at Chelsea Town Hall on January 12. It sounded less startling after an interval of several years, and its beauty and strength stood forward more clearly.

Arnold Bax's G major Quartet was played by the Kruse String Quartet on January 14. The Spencer Dyke party was excellent in the Debussy Quartet on January 16, at Wigmore Hall. M.

RECITALS

Brief mention must suffice for the December recitals which occurred too late for inclusion in my January list. Saturday, December 17, was a day of pianists. Mr. Samuel was at Wigmore Hall; Miss Myra Hess was at Queen's Hall, giving her farewell recital before an American tour; in the evening Miss Lilian Mackinnon played Scriabin, including the fifth Sonata. Mr. John Coates sang Christmastide songs, ancient and modern, English and French, at Chelsea Town Hall on December 20, before a delighted audience. One felt that the recital ought to have been given at Queen's Hall as well as at Chelsea. Two violinists showed distinct ways of being excellent—Madame Fachiri on December 20 and M. Thibaud on December 31.

In the early days of 1922 no recital has been more interesting than Prof. D. F. Tovey's, at Æolian Hall, on January 9, when he showed what could be done with the new Duplex-Coupler pianoforte. This instrument is discussed elsewhere in this issue. Prof. Tovey did not stand as an expert, having had little practice in the new technique. The demonstration was all the more convincing. A week later, M. Max Pirani gave a recital on a duplex-coupler, but his enthusiasm outran discretion and his doubling became tiresome. He forgot the old graces of pianoforte-tone.

Among players on the ordinary pianoforte Miss May Bennett deserves commendation for the brightness, vigour, and intelligence of her playing at Æolian Hall on January 17, and for keeping her tone within bounds. She played a Sonata by Carlo Albanesi, some Scriabin—very effectively—and Chopin.

Miss Sarah Fischer, a newcomer, from Canada, showed unusual gifts and great versatility at Wigmore Hall on January 11. Of other vocalists who have appeared, Madame Adelina Delines led the way, and Miss Mignon Trevor, Mr. William Denys, and Miss Florence Parbury followed. M.

MR. STERNDALÉ BENNETT'S CONCERT

A crowded audience at Æolian Hall, on December 30, laughed long and loud while Mr. T. C. Sterndale Bennett sang about a score of his own droll songs. None the less—perhaps all the more, by reason of the contrast—they enjoyed Mr. Felix Salmond's playing of solos by Couperin, Pianelli, Glazounov, and others, and Mr. George Baker's two groups of songs (Frank Bridge, Vaughan Williams, Ireland, &c.). This excellent concert of humorous fare, relieved by serious music, suggests that our recitalists might well reverse the process frequently, and help themselves and their hearers by the inclusion of a few items not merely light, but actually funny. H. G.

The Strolling Players' Amateur Orchestra was not too ambitious, on December 15, in choosing Elgar's Cockaigne, the Midsummer Night's Dream Overture, Haydn's Symphony in C, and Howard Carr's The Jolly Roger. The Orchestra played in professional style under Mr. Joseph Ivimey.

Opera in London

Grand opera (save at the 'Old Vic.') having disappeared from our midst with the close of the Carl Rosa season at Covent Garden on December 10, the taste for that particularly satisfying form of entertainment has had to be content chiefly with the Gilbert and Sullivan performances at the Princes Theatre. And very attractive they have proved to be. The present generation has taken very kindly to them, so kindly in fact that the German 'musical' pieces have one and all had to shut up shop. This is one of the good things that Gilbert and Sullivan speaking from their graves have accomplished; another is that they have helped the public to show that it still possesses good taste, and that melody and wit in combination are still preferred above all other kinds of material that has had to form its musical pabulum. I prophesy that much will come of this season of Gilbert and Sullivan, and that we shall shortly see a development of our light opera which will bring satisfactory results.

Grand opera representation in the meantime remains in the crucible. Foreign artists we must hear. The gramophone will not satisfy for ever; we must see and hear the great lights of the Continent, if only to show us how much better are our own people. Just at the moment we are at the opening of a new page in that worn and frayed volume entitled 'Grand Opera in London,' and time alone will show what will be the first words written thereon.

In the meantime there can be no question about the popularity of such light opera as we possess. The Gilbert and Sullivan works have been given to overflowing audiences, and will continue to do so until the first week in April. The last seven weeks of the visit—that is, from February 20—will be a répertoire season whose effect will be to induce those who went occasionally to go every night, as they will see a different work each time. All through Christmas the attraction was The Mikado, which proved irresistible. It was very well done with the aid of Mr. Darrell Fancourt (as the Mikado for the first time), Mr. Henry Lytton, Mr. Leo Sheffield, Miss Gilliland, and Miss Bertha Lewis. In due course H.M.S. Pinafore reappeared, and then the ever-attractive Iolanthe, which went uncommonly well. The truth is that the London atmosphere agrees thoroughly with the pieces—it is their native air, we must remember. Their exponents, too, seem to be getting acclimatised, and with them the orchestra and its painstaking conductor, Mr. Geoffrey Toye, who is gradually acquiring the real Sullivan balance whose secret Frank Cellier knew so well. I hope and trust that the end of it all will be that we shall have Gilbert and Sullivan back permanently in London before very long. F. E. B.

THE BEGGAR'S OPERA

On January 19 some of the original songs hitherto omitted from the Lyric Theatre version were introduced. There are nine of them, and all were received with acclamation. The delightful old opera should be 'still running' for a long time yet. C. W.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players. We shall be glad if those making use of the scheme will let us know when their announcements have borne fruit. Failing such notice, advertisements will be inserted three times.

Pianist desires to meet violinist in Beaconsfield or Gerrard's Cross district for practice of violin sonatas, &c., classical and modern.—'DIGIT,' c/o Musical Times.

Young enthusiast would be glad to meet instrumentalists with a view to forming small orchestra. Rehearsals could be held at Slough or Windsor.—'DATCHET,' c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist. Good amateur wanted to join violinist and pianist for the practice of trios, classical and modern.—G. F. H., 224, Reddings Lane, Hall Green, Birmingham.

Amateur orchestra would welcome string and wood instruments at a South London Parish Church. Practice and one service weekly.—S. C. C., 59, Waleran Buildings, Old Kent Road, S.E.1.

Gentleman, baritone, would be glad to meet a capable pianist (gentleman) for mutual practice in Manchester or Hightown districts.—S. CARLTON, 57, Peter Street, Hightown, Manchester.

Violinist, violist, and harpist would give services. Church, orchestral, or chamber music.—Address, S. B. S., 6, Hauberk Road, London, S.W.11.

Lady pianist would be glad to meet capable violinist and 'cellist for chamber music practice.—Miss RITZ, L.R.A.M., 266, Elgin Avenue, W.9.

B. W. A. (North Finchley) is fond of playing pianoforte accompaniments, and would be glad to meet a singer (amateur or professional) for the purpose.—B. W. A., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist, Leeds district, desires to meet violinist for practice of classical sonatas, &c., or vocalist for practice of classical songs, Wolf, Schubert, &c.—A. F., c/o Musical Times.

Ladies and gentlemen, all instruments, with good orchestral experience, are invited to attend the symphony rehearsals held every Tuesday, at 7.30 p.m., at the Philological College, 248, Marylebone Road, N.W. (near Great Central Station).—EDWIN C. WHITE, Principal.

Claremont Orchestra.—Required immediately, leading violin, 'cello, double-bass, brass, and wood-wind.—Write, V. B., 34, Frances Street, Battersea, S.W.11.

Soprano singer, having recently studied in Italy, would be glad to meet accompanist for mutual study. Manchester or Altrincham district.—B. H., c/o Musical Times.

Mezzo-soprano, with some professional experience, would like to meet accompanist for practice. Crystal Palace district.—F. C. W., c/o Musical Times.

A string orchestra is being formed at the Working Men's College, Crowndale Road, Camden Town (near Mornington Crescent tube station, Hampstead Railway). Players of all string instruments are required; rehearsals commenced in the middle of January on Thursday evenings, 7.30-10.—Mr. WALTER YEOMANS, Director of Music Studies, Working Men's College, Crowndale Road, N.W.

Young tenor wishes to meet a good pianist, lady or gentleman, for mutual practice. S.W. district preferred.—H. M. W., c/o Musical Times.

Violinist wanted to form trio or quartet to play chamber music. S.E. London district.—C. B., c/o Musical Times.

Wanted for Sunday evenings during the musical service, good amateur musicians (two violins, viola, and violoncello) to form a string quartet for Whitefield's Church, Tottenham Court Road, W. 1.—Apply, SPENCER SHAW, 690, Barking Road, Plaistow, E. 13.

South Hampstead and St. John's Wood, N.W. There are vacancies for good amateur instrumentalists in the Amateur Orchestral Society. Meetings on Thursday evenings in the Lecture Hall of the New College Chapel, Adelaide Road entrance. Low fees. Music provided.—Apply, WATSON HARDING, 6A, Upper Park Road, N.W. 3.

Accompanist (lady) will give services to a teacher or choral society for (say) two evenings a week in return for use of room (preferably in West End) for pianoforte practice twice weekly. Afternoons or evenings.—M. B., c/o Musical Times.

Orchestra (Stockwell Philharmonic Society). There are vacancies for good string and wood-wind players.—Write, Hon.-Secretary, 153, Clapham Road, S.W.9.

A lady (amateur vocalist) would like a good accompanist for practice one or two evenings a week, and offers instruction in singing in exchange. Moseley or Edgbaston district preferred.—141, Stratford Road, Birmingham.

Vacancies for players of violin, viola, violoncello, and clarinet, in good orchestra. Practice room near Oxford Street.—CONDUCTOR, 15, Eleanor Road, E.15.

Violinist desires to join quartet or trio for practice of classical and modern chamber music. Manchester district.—Apply, 'GAMMA,' c/o Musical Times.

Gentleman, tenor vocalist, well-trained amateur, desires to meet a good pianist for mutual practice. Fond of the classics.—D. G. T., 83, Uplands Road, N.8.

Amateur instrumentalists, all parts, required in the formation of an orchestra at St. Philip's Church, Kennington Road, S.E., in connection with monthly recitals and service accompaniments. Fine modern organ.—F. A. EUSTACE, 42, Dawnay Road, Wandsworth, S.W.18.

Young enthusiast in chamber-ballet would like to hear from others interested in order to form party. Croydon and South London.—C. B., c/o Musical Times.

South London Philharmonic Society.—There are vacancies in the orchestral section for violas, wood-wind, and brass players. Rehearsals, Friday evenings, at Lewisham. Works under rehearsal, Spectre's Bride (Dvorák), fifth Symphony (Beethoven), &c. Conductor, William H. Kerridge.—Apply, JOHN W. WATERER, 19, Adelaide Road, Brockley, S.E. 4.

Wanted.—North London Amateur wind and string players to collaborate in introducing good orchestral music at monthly services at an Islington Free Church. Alternate services are devoted to a specific composer (February—Haydn), whose life and works are appropriately discussed from pulpit. Rehearsals on Thursdays.—Write, WILL F. JAHNOW, Unity Orchestra, Unity Church, Upper Street, N. 1.

Tenor and baritone required to join really good alto and bass to complete male quartet. Objects: The mutual study, enjoyment, and performance of the best vocal quartet works. Only enthusiasts for this type of music need apply. West London district.—E. H., c/o Musical Times.

Amateur string quartet would like to meet tenor vocalist in order to study Vaughan Williams's Wenlock Edge and similar works for voice and strings.—'KEEN,' c/o Musical Times.

Two ladies, violoncellist and pianist, would be glad to meet violinist, for trio practice, classical and modern.—Mrs. MATHEWS, 21, Ladbroke Gardens, 3, Ladbroke Court, W.11., where practices would take place.

Church and Organ Music

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

PASSED FELLOWSHIP, JANUARY, 1922

H. Bentley, Halifax,	B. J. Orsman, London.
T. A. Davies, Dowlais.	(Lafontaine Prize.)
P. G. Dore, Chichester.	H. E. West, London.
F. Green, Macclesfield.	(Turpin Prize.)
A. E. B. Hart, Nottingham.	R. J. Wyeth, Epsom.
E. E. Lawrence, Georgetown.

PASSED ASSOCIATESHIP

H. J. Andrews, Brentwood.	J. A. Mallinson, New Mill.
H. E. Atkinson, London.	(Lafontaine Prize.)
H. J. Austin, Lewes.	H. Marsden, Thurgoland.
W. J. F. Avery, London.	T. P. Miles, Westcliff-on-Sea.
C. Borrow, Felstead.	H. W. Mills, London.
B. W. M. Chapman, London.	W. Neill, Edinburgh.
G. A. Costain, Liverpool.	L. D. Paul, London.
R. F. J. Darch, London.	T. A. Rushworth, Manchester.
E. M. Dent, London.	(Sawyer Prize.)
L. Dorsett, London.	S. Shaw, London.
T. Evans, Moss.	P. B. Tomblings, Exeter.
Miss L. M. Harris,	G. A. Trash, Edinburgh.
Spinney Hill.	P. E. Underwood, Gloucester.
C. E. Hobbs, Bridgwater.	M. Unwin, Brimington.
Miss M. Hosie, Aberdeen.	G. F. Walker, Elland.
S. Kerry, London.

THOMAS SHINDLER, Registrar.

THE ORGANS OF LAMBETH PARISH CHURCH

BY ANDREW FREEMAN

So far as music is concerned the history of Lambeth Parish Church has not been unduly exciting, but its existing Annals, which commence in 1504, bear witness to the labours of two celebrated organ builders of bygone times, whilst at least one of its organists, James Coward, achieved something more than parochial fame.

The earliest mention of an instrument is an entry of x.s. 'pay' to S. wyllm Argall for the organys.' This was in 1517-18. Sir William seems to have been one of the assistant clergy of the church, for his name occurs many times in the account book between 1515 and 1522, though only this once in connection with the organ. For this reason, and because of the indefinite nature of the entry already quoted, it is quite impossible to decide whether he is entitled to inclusion in the long and honourable roll of English organ builders. The fact that there were others who bore the same surname, including a certain 'goodwyffe Argall' who busied herself in gathering 'monies of the parrysōn' for the tryndelle lyte a fore the rōde' and other church work, suggests that the said William may quite possibly have been born and bred in Lambeth.

Nearly forty years elapse before we meet with any further references to things musical. Then, in the time of Philip and Mary, about the year 1554, we come across several items of some interest:

Itm paid to vj syngngmen on trenite Sunday evyn iij.s. iiij.d.

It to Ms. Spryngwell & Smythe for syngng in the precession that daye, xij.d.

It paid to Edward Smyth syngngman for hys quarter wage dewe at Mychellmas the yere aforesaid, iij.s. iiij.d.

Item paid to the orgyn maker for mendyng of the orgyns in the moneth of August for soder, lether, fyer, and workmanshipe, vj.s. xd.

The first two entries refer to the custom of walking in procession each year, on Trinity Sunday evening, 'to sent mare overes'—one that might well be revived, since the church of St. Mary Overy, now dedicated to St. Saviour, has become the Cathedral Church of the Diocese of Southwark.

In the two succeeding years we find Smyth or Smythe still in receipt of iij.s. iiij.d. a quarter for his services as 'syngngman,' and we also meet with two entries of xij.d. 'paid to the orgynmaker for hys fee this yere.'

About this time there appear to have been two pair of organs, for in the year 1565, amongst the Receipts, apparently for certain goods sold, there is an 'Item for an olde paire of organs xxxs.' whilst other entries in the same and succeeding years prove that an instrument remained in the church in active use. The remaining extracts, given below, all refer to this instrument. They are also of note since they show that it was for some time in the care of John Howe, one of the most celebrated builders of the period, and because they bring to light the name of another craftsman, one Harry Lythe, whose identity seems to have been recovered from oblivion by the discovery of this single trace of his work.

1564-65 (?). Itm for mending one of the organ pipes, iij.d.

1566-67. It p^d to the organ maker for his fee, xij.d. (Similar entries 1568-69 and 1569-70.)

1567-68. Itm p^d to father How for his fee for kepinge ye organs for one yere, xij.d.

Itm to father How for mending of the organs the xix of September, iij.s.

1574. Itm payd to Harry Lythe for mendyng the organs, xs.

From this year till 1645, when the first book of accounts comes to an end, I have not come across a single reference to the organ.

For considerably over a century Lambeth Church was apparently without an instrument. The first indication of a better state of affairs is an expenditure of half-a-guinea, on July 25, 1700, for 'watteridge [i.e., ferry-boat] and expenses when some gentlemⁿ went to Mr. Harris to treat with him about the Organ.'

The result of this visit was that Renatus Harris was given an order to build a new instrument. This was completed about the end of April, 1701, and an organist installed, though it was not till July 21 that the appointment of the latter was confirmed. On that day 'Mr. Richard Brown was unanimously chosen, . . . and it was likewise ordered that he shall have for his salary twenty pounds p. ann., his Salary to begin from Low Sunday the 29th of Aprill last.'

Low Sunday, 1701 (or possibly Easter Day), was probably the date on which the organ was opened, for on Saturday, April 26, 5s. was 'expended with Mr. Harris & Mr. Brown about the Organ,' and a like sum given to the organ-builder's men. Other indications of its completion are contained in such extracts as the following:

1701. May 2. Expended with the Justice & 5 other gentlemⁿ that came over to try the Organ, 14s. 3d.

May 19. pd Mr Thorey p. Bill when the organ was tryed by severall gent. from London. 9li. 15s. 9d.

On April 26, 1702, £1 11s. 10d. was spent 'on Severall gent. that sung an Anthem in the church,' and on August 27 £1 5s. was 'Expended with Justice Marsh & Justice Isaacson [Lambeth has always taken a delight in doing things decently and in order] when they went to agree with Mr. Harris about the Bazoorn stop of the Organ.'

The following Minute of Vestry bears directly on this addition to the resources of the instrument and indirectly on the mode of payment of the main account:

1702. Dec. 3. Ordered Whereas there is in the hands of Mr. Symon Lemon a certayne sume of money wch was collected of the inhabitants of this prsh towards paying for the Organ now placed in Lambeth Church; And also whereas there is money still due to Mr. Renatus Harris for the Bassoon stop in the sd Organ; It is this day ordered in vestry that the prsent overseers of the poore doe pay into the hands of Mr. Symon Lemon such sumes of money as remayne now in the hands of the sd overseers as appears by their Auditt, and his receipt shalbee their discharge, and that the sd Mr. Symon Lemon doe pay into the hands of Mr. Justice Marsh what he hath collected of the sd pishoners towards the sd. Organ together with what hee shall receive of the prsent Overseers, and also what hee hath received of the late Overseers.

And that Mr. Justice Marsh wilbee pleased to settle accounts wth the sd Mr. Harris and pay him in full for the sd Organ.

The total cost of the organ does not appear.

Renatus Harris had charge of the instrument at a salary of £8 per annum till the year of his death, namely, 1724,* when his son, John Harris, took over his office at a salary of £6. An entry on April 13, 1744, establishes, within a few weeks, the date of John's decease:

By cash pd Mr. Byfield Exors to Mr. Harris $\frac{1}{3}$ Salary due at Xmas last, £4 10s.

Byfield (the Elder) who was, of course, John Harris's partner, did not succeed to the office of organ keeper. That position was conferred on a person named John Hitchcock, who was followed at Michaelmas, 1755, by an equally obscure personage indifferently styled John Maiden and James Meaden. The last-named was still holding the position in 1765-66. After a short gap in the accounts we find John Byfield (the Younger) in charge of the instrument—from 1773 to the close of the book, 1778-79.

The only other item of interest about this time refers to the payment of £20 for 'Repairing and beautifying the Organ and Organ Case.' This was in 1766.

From 1779 to 1802 there is a gap in the accounts, but there is reason to believe that some considerable improvements were effected in the early part of this period. A writer in Musical Opinion of January, 1899, quoting from some unnamed book or document, says that in 1778 'a public subscription was made for adding a Swell and other improvements to the organ,' while a Service List, issued at the reopening of the organ in April, 1879, states that the instrument was 'built by Hiram Smith, about 1776.' Taken together, these two statements seem to suggest that about this time (probably 1780), either an entire Swell organ was added, or, that Swell shutters were fitted to the box containing the Echo organ—supposing that the original organ contained an Echo.* Hiram Smith presents rather a difficulty, not because he is practically unknown as an organ builder—for there are others, even in this account, who seem to be mentioned nowhere else—but because the younger Byfield, who had charge of the organ from 1773 to 1779, and, also in 1802-03, would seem the most likely person to have done the work.

In 1803-04 England appears on the scene as organ tuner in the place of Byfield,† and at the same salary, namely £6. His successor, a Mr. Truin, held the office from 1815 till 1818. During the first two years of this period Truin was paid £72 8s. 3d. for repairs, in addition to his ordinary salary. Next came William Jones, at £8 per annum, and then, in 1838-39, Mary Jones, presumably his widow.

From 1839 till the end of the book, 1850, there is only one reference to things musical. This was in 1845, when we find the cryptographic entry, 'April 15, by Walker. Gothic Columns, Organ, £6 5s. 3d.' It probably refers to the provision of additional supports to the organ loft. It also serves to mark the beginning of Messrs. Walker's long connection with the Lambeth organ.

Towards the middle of the 19th century the church became unsafe, and it was decided that the fabric was too far gone for it to be put right by mere repair. The consequence was that with the exception of the fine 14th century tower the walls were taken down to within a few feet of their foundations, and what was practically a new church was built. The old materials were used so far as possible, and the old ground plan kept, but in style there was little in common between the two buildings—decorated Gothic taking the place of Perpendicular.

Advantage was taken of the rebuilding of the church to reconstruct and enlarge the organ. Up to this time it had retained its original appearance,‡ but now its outward form was sadly changed, and its character altered from Renaissance to what was thought to be Gothic. Practically all the woodwork above the impost was swept away, and two double-storied flats of small pipes replaced by single flats of larger pipes. The case was also extended considerably on either side. All this was done under the guidance of Mr. P. C. Hardwick, the architect of the church.

The organ was reopened on Tuesday, February 3, 1852. The choirs of the Chapel Royal, St. James's, and of Westminster Abbey attended. Dr. Elvey, of St. George's, Windsor, presided at the organ, assisted by Mr. J. Coward, organist of the church. Mr. Turle, organist of Westminster Abbey, also helped on this occasion.

The instrument, rebuilt by Messrs. Walker, contained the following stops, at this time:

GREAT ORGAN (CC TO G)

	No. of Ft. Pipes.			No. of Ft. Pipes.
Bourdon (CC to B) ...	16	12	Principal... ..	4	56
Open Diapason, Large ...	8	56	Flute	4	44
Open Diapason, Small ...	8	56	Twelfth	2½	56
Stopped Diapason, Bass ...	8	12	Fifteenth... ..	2	56
Stopped Diapason, Treble ...	8	44	Sesquialtera ...	III.&II.	154
Mixture	II. & I.	98	Horn	8	56
Furniture	II. & I.	98	Clarion	4	56
Trumpet... ..	8	56

SWELL ORGAN (TENOR C TO G)

Double Diapason ...	16	44	Fifteenth... ..	2	44
Open Diapason ...	8	44	Sesquialtera ...	III.&II.	118
Stopped Diapason ...	8	44	Trumpet	8	44
Dulciana	8	44	Hautboy	8	44
Principal... ..	4	44	Clarion	4	44
Twelfth	2½	44

* Some of the stops of the present Swell organ have pipes of three different dates. The oldest portion is from fiddle G up (presumably c. 1780 or 1700). These were extended to tenor C (in 1852 ?) and subsequently (in 1879) to CC.

† Byfield lost another stop about the same time. The Vestry of St. Andrew Undershaft, having found that he had 'neglected to attend to tune the organ,' in their church, decided to employ him no longer, and proceeded to elect England in his stead. Byfield was then an old man. He had looked after the organ at St. Andrew's from the death of his father in 1757, a period of exactly forty-six years.

‡ Harris was rather fond of this design—three semicircular towers, two double-storied flats, with the cornices of the flats forming curves convex to the line of the impost—for he used it several times with but slight variation. Well-known instances are: 'Popish Chapel,' Whitehall (now at St. James's, Piccadilly); St. Andrew Undershaft; St. Lawrence Jewry (since altered); St. Bride, Fleet Street; and Christ Church, Newgate Street (since altered).

* Rimbault says he died in 1715, but this is an error. Letters of Administration of his estate were taken out on February 11, 1725, by his sons John and Renatus. His death occurred in 1724—probably in August or September.

CHOIR ORGAN (CC TO G)

	No. of Ft. Pipes.		No. of Ft. Pipes.
Open Diapason ...	8 44	Principal... ..	4 56
Stopped Diapason ...	8 56	Flute	4 56
(Probably, as now, in halves.)
Viol di Gamba ...	8 44

PEDAL ORGAN (CCC TO D)

Pedal Pipes ...	16 27	Fifteenth... ..	4 27
Stopped Diapason ...	16 27	Sesquialtera ...	111. 81
Principal... ..	8 27	Opficleide ...	16 27

COUPLERS

Swell to Great.
Choir to Pedals (the list gives "Choir to Great").
Great to Pedals.
Octave coupler to Great.
Pedal octave coupler.

Twenty-seven years later there was a further reconstruction when the Swell was carried down to CC, new couplers and new keyboards added, and the following substitutions made:

On the Great.

Wald Flute 8-ft. in place of Stopped Diapason, Treble.
Harmonic Flute 4-ft. " " Twelfth.
Horn Diapason 8-ft. " " Furniture.

On the Swell.

Voix Celeste 8-ft. " " Twelfth.

This work was carried out by Messrs. Walker at a cost of £230. The reopening took place on Sunday, April 27, 1879.

Up to 1906 the organ retained its original position in the West Gallery, but in this year it was brought down by Messrs. Walker, and re-erected in the Howard Chapel on the north side of the chancel. A set of dummy zinc pipes was added to make a frontage to the north aisle, the bellows re-leathered, new blowing action fitted, and a certain amount of renewal effected, the cost being £240.

In March, 1918, when the present writer was appointed priest-organist, the organ was in a deplorable state of dirt and disrepair. Cleaning was a necessity, for until this was done, tuning was useless if not impossible. In addition the wind pressure was unsteady, the stop-action defective, and cipherings frequent, while the reeds were coarse and blatant and the diapason tone very weak. A 'war-time' renovation was accordingly decided on, and the work entrusted to Messrs. Hunter & Son, of Clapham. New pipes of large scale and thick metal were substituted in the large open diapason of the Great, from tenor C sharp up; the pipes of the horn and clarion on the same manual were 'scrapped'; a new horn was made, and the old Harris trumpet (of almost pure tin) converted into a clarion. New shallots and tongues were provided to all the other reeds, and the whole of the metal flue-work re-voiced. The addition of a tremulant to the Swell, and of three pneumatic pistons, added to the resources of the instrument—the latter making the organ rather more manageable than it had ever been in the past. The cost of this work was £137 15s.

Of the original front pipes only fifteen now remain in situ. These are in the three towers, and belong to the small open diapason. Nineteen others (belonging partly to the same stop and partly to the principal) which were formerly in front are now inside the case over their respective sliders. They still retain their gilt. Together with other small pipes (probably dummies, and now destroyed), they were removed from their position 'in prospect' in 1852, when Mr. Hardwick remodelled the case and spoilt it. Their place was taken by pipes belonging to the large open diapason: others, belonging to the pedal principal, were at the same time placed in the wings.

Practically the whole of the case below the impost is old and even some of the carving in the upper portions. All the old work (of oak) is excellently wrought.

The key-action (which was not touched at the 1918 renovation) is dilapidated—indeed the whole of the mechanism is worn out beyond possibility of repair—but it must be confessed that, when due allowance is made for its date and condition, the instrument sounds very effective. A few of its stops are really quite good, and one or two of them even beautiful. There are still some hundreds of Harris pipes in use, including the small open diapason, principal, and clarion (= trumpet) on the Great, which are of almost pure tin.

THE ORGANISTS

1701. Richard Brown. Buried at Lambeth, May 21, 1710.
1710. Strangeways Simpson.
1725. James Scott.
1738. William Godfrey. Pensioned at Christmas, 1776. Buried at Lambeth, January 11, 1785.
1785. Charles Lockhart (deputy-organist, 1776-85). Buried at Lambeth, February 18, 1815, aged 70.
1815. William Henry Warren. Resigned.
1825. John Edwick Long. Buried at Lambeth, May 26, 1842, aged 57.
1842 (?) James Coward. Resigned in 1866. Organist of the Crystal Palace from 1857 till his death, January 22, 1880.
1866. — Benstead.
1868. F. Kinke.
1879. T. Merton Clark. Resigned.
1882. C. E. Miller.
1883. Ernest Slater. Subsequently organist of Calcutta Cathedral. Afterwards Mus.D. (Cantuar.) and F.R.C.O.
1886. Alfred E. Izard.
1889. T. Merton Clark. Reappointed. At present organist of St. Mary's, Balham.
1911. Percy Scaife, Mus.B. (Dunelm.), F.R.C.O. Resigned.
1918. Andrew Freeman, B.A., Mus.B. (Cantab.), F.R.C.O. Assistant-curate and organist.

ST. COLUMBA'S CHURCH OF SCOTLAND

As part of a War Memorial at St. Columba's (Pont Street, London, S.W.), the Kirk Session decided on the rebuilding of the organ. The specification was approved by Dr. Charles Macpherson, and the work of rebuilding has been carried out by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper, of Liverpool.

The dedication took place on December 18, when a recital was given by Dr. Macpherson.

The specification of the organ is as follows:

PEDAL ORGAN

	Ft.		Ft.
1 Open Wood ...	16 4	Octave Wood ...	8
2 Violone ...	16 5	Flute Bass ...	8
3 Sub-Bass ...	16 6	Opficleide ...	16

Couplers:

- 1 Swell to Pedal.
2 Great to Pedal.
3 Choir to Pedal.

CHOIR ORGAN

(Enclosed in separate Swell-Box)

1 Geigen Diapason ...	8 4	Flauto Traverso ...	4
2 Lieblich Gedackt ...	8 5	Clarinet ...	8
3 Dulciana ...	8 6	Orchestral Oboe ...	8

Tremulant.

Couplers:

- 1 Octave } Acting also
2 Sub-Octave } through
3 Unison Off } Unison Couplers.
4 Swell to Choir.

GREAT ORGAN

1 Double Open Diapason ...	16 7	Wald Flöte ...	4
2 Open Diapason I. ...	8 8	Twelfth ...	24
3 Open Diapason II. ...	8 9	Fifteenth ...	2
4 Hohl Flöte ...	8 10	Mixture ...	3 ranks
5 Dolce... ..	8 11	Posaune (heavy pressure)...	8
6 Principal ...	4

Couplers:

- 1 Swell to Great.
2 Choir to Great.

SWELL ORGAN

(On increased wind pressure)

1 Lieblich Bourdon ...	16 7	Flageolet ...	2
2 Open Diapason ...	8 8	Mixture ...	2 ranks
3 Stopped Diapason ...	8 9	Contra Fagotto ...	16
4 Echo Gamba ...	8 10	Cornopean ...	8
5 Voix Celeste... ..	8 11	Oboe... ..	8
6 Gemshorn ...	4 12	Vox Humana... ..	8

Tremulant.

Couplers:

- 1 Octave } Acting also
2 Sub-Octave } through
3 Unison Off } Unison Couplers.

The accessories include 5 Thumb Pistons to Great, 5 to Swell, 4 to Choir, and 5 to Pedal.

The wind is generated by a 'Discus' rotary blower and electric motor.

LONDON SOCIETY OF ORGANISTS

There was a good attendance of members and friends at St. Mary's, Vincent Square, on January 14, when Mr. Godfrey Sceats and his choir gave a recital, and Mr. Sceats read a brief paper on the accompaniment of plainsong. The choir sang unaccompanied music by Tye, Elgar, and Sceats. The organ solos were drawn from Ropartz's collection of short pieces, Au pied de l'Autel, and Karg-Elert's Choral Improvisations. In the course of his lecture, Mr. Sceats, after discussing the pros and cons of plainsong, gave practical advice. We quote the main portion of it:

'It is not a good plan to play plainsong accompaniments to the Psalms from printed harmonized transcripts. There are scarcely two verses of a Psalm which should be accompanied in exactly the same way. The best results are secured by playing from the words only—such as the small edition of the Manual of Plainsong, in which the syllable on which the note of recitation is quitted is printed in italic. The organist can then watch carefully the words without the added distraction of a harmonized chant, and plan his accompaniments usually so that a fresh chord is given to a stressed word or syllable. He will—in avoiding as a rule all chords (fundamental chords, as distinct from chords heard from the movement of passing-notes, &c.) except the common chord and its first inversion—discover that he can secure almost infinite variety without impairing the psychological value which diatonic and especially modal accompaniments possess. The use of modern chords is not wrong; it is simply a question of taste, and a good musician will usually play a good accompaniment whether modal or not. To the extent to which his accompaniments are not modal, to that extent will they be liable to bring out less perfectly the archaic quality of the plainchant, and be open to the charge of anachronism. This would not be an absolute offence against the art, but the aesthetics even of modern melodies having a strongly modal character would surely demand a modal accompaniment as a rule. So long, also, as the accompaniment is very quiet, there is nothing necessarily wrong in changing chords at weak (unstressed) points in the recitation. Last year, at an Abbey where plainchant is exceptionally well performed, I heard an expert accompaniment occasionally displace all the stresses in a verse—very quietly, to be sure—with excellent and altogether charming effect. (But the stresses of English become quantities in Latin, and this is a reason perhaps why it did not matter so much.) The rule is necessary in general practice because otherwise the singers would derive much less assistance from the accompaniments than they have a right to expect. We have had an opportunity for hearing another kind of accompaniment to plainchant—fa-burden, which may be described simply as a vocal accompaniment with a different top line. There are no rules for accompaniment in this form except those of musical grammar—correctness and dignity of harmony, preferably with some regard also to counterpoint. The freedom of rhythm of the plainchant must be preserved; and rather more freedom may be exercised in the harmony than we should allow in a strictly modal organ part.'

The lecture was followed by the annual general meeting, when the balance sheet (highly satisfactory) and report were presented. A large number of new members have joined during the year, and many meetings, recitals, and social events have been organized. The hon. treasurer and hon. secretary were re-elected, and to fill the vacancies created by the resignation of members of the Council under Rule 6, the following five were elected out of nine candidates: Messrs. H. L. Balfour, Reginald Goss-Custard, Harvey Grace, Herbert Hodge, and Dr. Sydney Scott. The president for 1922 is Mr. E. Stanley Roper.

COLSTON HALL, BRISTOL

The committee appointed by the City Council to manage Colston Hall (which was recently acquired by the city) has unanimously appointed Mr. Ralph Morgan to the post of municipal organist. Mr. Morgan has done fine work on behalf of organ music at St. Mary Redcliff, where for years past regular recitals of the best music have attracted large gatherings. We hope he will be equally successful at Colston Hall, where, judging from the sparse attendances at recent recitals by various brilliant players, a great deal of missionary work needs to be done. Mr. Morgan will now have under his charge two of the finest and most interesting organs in the country—St. Mary Redcliff with eighty-seven stops, and Colston Hall, with a hundred and thirty stops.

On December 12 a recital was given in Nenagh Church, Co. Tipperary, by the Band of the 2nd Battalion North Staffordshire Regiment, assisted by Mr. F. C. J. Swanton, the organist. The band played the Unfinished Symphony the first movement of Beethoven's second Symphony, &c. Mr. Swanton's organ solos included Bach's 'Great' G minor, the Prelude and Angel's Farewell from Gerontius, and Choral Preludes by Bach, Parry, and Stanford. An effective item was Bach's 'Sleepers, wake' Prelude, arranged for strings, brass, and organ.

Mr. Alan May gave a lecture on Old English Carols at the City Temple on December 29, with Mr. Thomas Dunhill in the chair. The illustrations were drawn chiefly from the Cowley Carol Book, and were sung by an unaccompanied quartet. There was a large audience. Mr. Allan Brown opened the proceedings with a short recital, playing seasonable pieces by Bach, Guilmant, and John E. West.

Organ news from Spain is so scarce that we thank Mr. C. J. Colborn for a note to the effect that at Gerona, on December 30, the Rev. José M. Pedro, organist of the Cathedral, gave a recital at the Municipal School in memory of two recently deceased French composers, Deodat de Séverac and Saint-Saëns. He played the former's fine Suite and the latter's three Rhapsodies on Breton melodies.

The organ at the Congregational Church, South Woodford, enlarged and reconstructed by Mr. Alfred Kirkland, was recently dedicated, Mr. Archibald Farmer giving a recital. His programme included Borowski's Sonata, Muffat's Passacaglia, four Chorale Preludes of Bach, Barie's March, and a Toccata by Reger.

Mr. E. H. Lemare's first recital as municipal organist of Portland, Maine, drew an audience of over three thousand, 'standing room only' being the portion of a good many. Mr. Lemare played the 'Great' G minor, his own Summer Sketches, Hofmann's Scherzo, the Ride of the Valkyries, and an improvisation.

We hear with pleasure that the Pope has been pleased to confer on Dr. Grattan Flood the title of Chevalier, in recognition of his services to Church music.

ORGAN RECITALS

- Mr. Harold M. Dawber, St. George's, Stockport—Dithyramb, Harwood; Sonata, Reubke.
 Mr. T. Keynes, St. Gabriel's, Bounds Green—Sonata in E minor, Rheinberger; Fugue No. 2, on BACH, Schumann; Finale (Symphony No. 6), Widor.
 Mr. R. Ellis Roberts, St. Luke's, Battersea (three recitals)—Prelude and Fugue in D minor and Toccata in F, Bach; Sonata No. 3, Guilmant; 'Le Cygne,' Saint-Saëns.
 Mr. Bertram Hollins, Beckenham Congregational Church—Overture in C minor, Hollins; Sonata No. 2, Mendelssohn; Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach.
 St. Lawrence Jewry—Preludio (Sonata in E flat minor), Rheinberger; Fantasia in E minor, Silas.
 Mr. J. A. Sowerbutts, St. Lawrence Jewry (two recitals)—Preludes on 'Christe Redemptor,' Parry, 'Martyrs,' Wood, and 'Bryn Calfaria,' Vaughan Williams; Psalm Prelude No. 1, Howells; Choral, D. de Séverac; Canzone in E minor, Rene Vierne; Prelude and Fugue in E flat, Saint-Saëns.
 St. Stephen's Walbrook—Rhapsodie, de Bertier; Scherzo (Symphony No. 4), Widor; Meditation, Harvey Grace; Final in B flat, Franck.
 Mr. Harry Wall, St. Michael's, Stockwell—Adagio (Sonata No. 3), Bach; Andante, Silas; Marche Triomphale Karg-Elert; Fantasy on Two Christmas Carols, West.

Dr. M. P. Conway, St. Stephen's Walbrook—Passacaglia in C minor, Bach; Legend, Harvey Grace; Improvisation, 'In dulci jubilo,' Karg-Elert; Prelude and Fugue in G minor, Dupré; Elegiac Prelude, Jongen; Rhapsody on two French carols, Ropars.

Mr. Frank E. Charlton, Goldsmiths' College, New Cross—Overture in C minor, Hollins; Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Prière et Berceuse, Guilmant.

Mr. Paul Rochard, Kendal Parish Church (four recitals)—Prelude ('Dream of Gerontius'), Larghetto with Variations, Wesley; Symphonie No. 5, Widor; Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; Sonata, Reubke.

Mr. J. A. Gaccon, Bristol Cathedral—Sonata in A minor, Borowski; Variations on an Original Theme, Stuart Archer; Prelude to 'The Deluge,' Saint-Saëns.

Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson, High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham—Allegro Pomposo, Bellerby; Romance, Lemare.

Dr. R. Walker Robson, Christ Church, Crouch End (three recitals)—Rhapsodie sur deux Noëls, Gigout; Pastorale, Pierre; Chant Pastorale, Dubois; Fantasia in G, Bach; La Demoiselle Elue, Debussy; Kieff Processional, Mousorgsky.

Mr. Purcell J. Mansfield, Paisley Abbey—L'Organo Primitivo, Yon; Funeral March and 'Hymn of Seraphs,' Guilmant; Introduction and Fugue, Reubke. Alexandria Parish Church—Symphony in E minor, Holloway; Improvisation—Caprice, Jongen; Concert Overture in C minor, P. J. Mansfield.

Mr. Arthur H. Egerton, Christ Church Cathedral, Montreal (two recitals)—Sonata in the Style of Handel, Wolstenholme; 'Sleepers, wake,' Bach; Noel, d'Aquin; In dulci jubilo, Buck; Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; Pastorale Symphony, Corelli.

Mr. J. H. Lilley, Wells Parish Church—Question and Answer, Wolstenholme; March on a Theme of Handel, Guilmant.

Mr. H. Cyril Robinson, St. Mary's, Haverfordwest—First movement Symphony in C minor, Holloway; Preludes on 'Rhosymedre' and 'Hyfrydol,' Vaughan Williams; Capriccio, Ireland; Lament, Harvey Grace; Third movement, 'Sonata Britannica,' Stanford.

Mr. W. E. Kirby, St. Luke's, Southport—Voluntary in D minor, Blow; Toccata in A, Purcell; Larghetto in F sharp minor, S. S. Wesley; Allegro maestoso from Organ Sonata, Elgar; Dithyramb, Harwood.

Mr. Thomas J. Crawford, St. Stephen's Walbrook—'The Princess' (A Fairy-Tale), Frank Bridge; Evening Melody, Crawford; March of the Meistersinger; Shepherd's Fennel's Dance.

Mr. H. C. Warrilow, St. Clement Dane's, Strand—Choral Prelude, Bach; Canzona in B flat, Wolstenholme; Overture in C, Hollins. Armitage Hall, National Institute for the Blind (two recitals)—Choral Song and Fugue, Wesley; Intermezzo (Sonata No. 4), Rheinberger; Postlude in D minor, Stanford; Impression No. 1, Karg-Elert; Grave and Adagio (Sonata No. 2), Mendelssohn.

Mr. W. Wolstenholme, Armitage Hall, National Institute for the Blind—Rhapsody No. 3, Saint-Saëns; Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; Fantasia in E, Wolstenholme.

Mr. H. V. Spanner, Armitage Hall, National Institute for the Blind—Pastoral Sonata, Rheinberger; Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Prelude and Angel's Farewell ('Dream of Gerontius'); Fantasia on Darwell's 148th, Harold Darke.

Mr. Sydney Jones, St. Clement Dane's, Strand—Sonata No. 2, Mendelssohn; Minuet and Trio, Wolstenholme.

Mr. Cecil G. Brown, Cricklewood Presbyterian Church—Choral Prelude, Bach; Adagio, Guilmant; Prelude on 'Old 104th,' Parry.

Mr. W. J. Lancaster, Bolton Parish Church—Two Choral Preludes, Bach; Psalm Prelude No. 2, Hawells; Chorale Prelude, 'Hanover,' Parry.

Mr. Fred Gostelow, St. Alban's Tabernacle Baptist Church—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Meditation, Gostelow.

Mr. Albert Orton, St. Saviour's, Paldington (two recitals)—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Andante in F, S. Wesley; Sonata No. 4, Mendelssohn; Church Festival March, Rust.

Mr. C. H. Trevor, St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta (five recitals)—Toccata and Fugue in D minor and Fugue in Dorian mode, Bach; Rhapsody in A minor, Saint-Saëns; Preludio and Intermezzo, Rheinberger; Prelude in F, Stanford; 'Now thank we all,' Karg-Elert; Voluntary in A minor, Orlando Gibbons.

Mr. Leitch Owen; Edge Hill Parish Church—Prelude, Smart; Allegretto and Romanza, Wolstenholme.

Mr. A. E. Jones, Town Hall, Bolton—Offertoire on Christmas Carols, Guilmant; Overture, 'William Tell.'

Mr. James M. Preston, Stocksfield Wesleyan Church—Fantasia and Fugue, Rest; Pastorale, Claussman; Capriccio, Ireland.

Mr. Frederick J. Tarris, All Hallows', Bromley—Imperial March, Elgar; Fantasia in F, Rest; Mélodie Lyrique, Borowski.

Mr. Ezra Edson, Primitive Methodist Church, Ripley—Grand Chœur, Guilmant; Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; Réverie and Cantilène, Quef.

Mr. Francis Crute, St. Agnes', Kennington Park—Gothic Suite, Boilmann; Curfew, Horsman; Last movement Sonata No. 1, Mendelssohn.

Mr. G. Bernard Gilbert, Town Hall, Stratford—Sonata No. 6, Mendelssohn; Requiem Æternam, Harwood.

Mr. B. J. Maslen, St. Stephen's, Lansdown—Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; Scherzo, Bairdshaw; Sursum Corda, Ireland; Preludes on 'St. Peter,' Darke and 'Old 104th,' Parry.

Mr. Cyril S. Christopher, Wednesbury Parish Church—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Fantaisie in E flat, Saint-Saëns.

APPOINTMENTS

Mr. R. J. Cooper, organist, All Saints', Sudbury, Suffolk.

Mr. W. H. Davies, organist and choirmaster, St. Mary's, Hulme, Manchester.

Mr. Arthur H. Egerton, organist and choirmaster, All Saints', Winnipeg.

Mr. W. Meacham Haley, organist and choirmaster, Leyton Parish Church, E.

Mr. A. Martin Hawkins, organist and choirmaster, St. Andrew's, Westminster.

Mr. Frederic Lacey, organist and choirmaster, Parish Church, Thornton Heath.

Mr. Richard V. Seddon, organist and choirmaster, Parish Church, Sutton, Surrey.

Letters to the Editor

MR. YEATS AND A MUSICAL CENSORSHIP

SIR,—Composers who, having succumbed to the temptation of setting to music some of the lyrics of Mr. William Butler Yeats, desire to reap such benefit from their work as may be afforded by publication, must realise that between themselves and the public there exists a censor, the appeasing of whom might be more accurately termed a game of chance than a game of skill.

Two London publishers having expressed great reluctance even to consider manuscripts of Yeats-settings on account of the trouble this censorship had already given them, I called on Mr. Yeats and explained the matter to him. He informed me that his object in establishing a musical censorship (which is, of course, quite independent of his publishers) was not to prevent composers from setting his poems to music, but to make them careful in doing so. The idea was apparently born of his horror at being invited by a certain composer to hear a setting of his Lake Isle of Innisfree—a poem which voices a solitary man's desire for still greater solitude—sung by a choir of a thousand Boy Scouts.

Some months later I wanted to publish some Yeats-settings of my own, and it occurred to me that the publishers' reluctance to look at them might be overcome if the MSS. were submitted with the censor's august imprimatur already upon them. I therefore wrote to Mr. Yeats for the address of this individual, which he sent me, adding that he was 'very much obliged' to me for 'finding so friendly a way out of the difficulty.' The censor, however, thought otherwise, for after my songs had been ruthlessly turned down, I was informed that 'no songs should be sent unless they have first been accepted by a publisher.'

I wrote asking if I might be allowed to know in what respect my unfortunate little songs had offended, and suggested that much trouble and annoyance would be saved if the censor would reveal the principles to which musical settings of Mr. Yeats's lyrics are expected to conform.

To the more personal query no reply was given. It appeared, however, that insuperable difficulties prevented compliance with my 'admirable suggestion,' because,

'however carefully principles are laid down . . . so much in art must always be a matter of individual feeling. For instance, might it not be perfectly possible to follow every given rule, and yet for the general atmosphere and character of the music to be utterly unsuited to the poetry it was intended to enhance?'

But unless 'individual feeling' is controlled by some principles, criticism becomes a mere matter of caprice. If the music of a song were so flagrantly at variance with the poetry with which it is associated, it would not be impossible for any capable critic to show the reason why. (Mr. W. J. Turner might go further, and praise it for being so!)

Mr. Yeats himself is, on his own confession, completely insensitive to music. If he were not, a great many settings of his poems—which, since they are to be had in print, have presumably been passed by his censor—would cause him considerable pain. But however great an aversion he may have to the very idea of his beautiful rhythms and cadences being distorted to suit the fancy of any Tom, Dick, or Harry who pays the publishers their fee for the use of the poem, it is not, I think, unreasonable on the part of composers to request that he shall appoint as his censor some competent musician who will be consistent in his judgments and articulate when they are called in question.

I enclose, Sir, for your inspection two of the rejected MSS. with the request that if you find the 'general atmosphere and character of the music to be utterly unsuited to the poetry' you will not print this letter.—Yours, &c.,

PETER WARLOCK.

SCRIABIN'S MUSIC AND THE THREE CHOIRS FESTIVAL

SIR,—It is with considerable astonishment that I observe, in the preliminary programme of the next Three Choirs Festival, that it is proposed to perform Scriabin's Poem of Ecstasy in Gloucester Cathedral. Without advocating a narrow division of music into two definite categories of 'sacred' and 'secular' according to the subject-matter with which it is associated, it will, I think, be generally admitted that there is music of a kind which, however admirable some people may find it in the concert-hall, is nevertheless quite unsuitable for performance in a place of Christian worship.

The fact that this work of Scriabin's is associated with a so-called theosophical 'programme' may have given rise to an impression that it is a work of religious character. This, however, is very far from being the case. It is thoroughly morbid, erotic, and sensational in the worst sense of these terms, and its performance at Gloucester would create a most undesirable precedent. Music performed at these festivals cannot fail to influence the general opinion as to the style of composition that is fit and proper for use in our churches.

At present the tendency of taste in Church music is, happily, towards a return to those ideals of dignity and sanity which are embodied in the glorious heritage of English music that has come down to us from the 16th century. The admission to our Cathedral festivals of a composer whose influence, were it to make itself felt, would be even more destructive of good taste than that of the saccharine school of the last century, might prove a serious hindrance to the success of devoted and learned enthusiasts such as Dr. Edmund Fellowes,

Dr. R. R. Terry, Archdeacon Gardner, Mr. Martin Shaw, and last, but by no means least, yourself, Sir, who are now endeavouring to purge our worship music of the impurities of this school—of whom Scriabin is a fitting successor—and to reveal to us the more worthy treasures of our grand old English tradition.—Yours, &c.,

CAMBRENSIS.

January 9, 1922.

HYMN SINGING

SIR,—Your correspondent, Mr. Arthur S. Warrell, gives a very accurate reason for the omission of hymn practices, but I venture to suggest that this omission does not altogether originate in dull tunes. Organists and choir-masters are largely to blame for the present status (a not very important one) which hymns hold in our services. The senior boy who says 'We know this tune,' and the choir-men who will speedily hunt up a hymn having the same metre (rather than learn a new tune) wield an unfortunate influence over organists, and until it is borne in mind that the words have a meaning (also, that there are such things as commas in the middle of a line, &c., &c.), I am afraid that our hymn singing will continue to suffer.

It does not necessarily follow that because a tune is dull or sentimental that it cannot be well sung; on the other hand, because a particular tune is bright, interesting, spirited, and varied, it must not necessarily be assumed to be more acceptable than a dull tune. It will still need as careful singing as the dull tune, and so I would formulate an opinion and say that 'what's best rendered is best.' Such a tune as 'St. Cuthbert' (207 A. & M.) is just as acceptable to me as 'Sine Nomine' (641 English Hymnal) when decently interpreted.—Yours, &c.,

ORGANIST AND CHOIRMASTER.

'THE IMPORTANCE OF CORRECT PLACING OF THE VOICE': THE CHALLENGE ACCEPTED

SIR,—In my controversy with Mr. Charles Tree the time appears to me to have arrived for examining the facts of the case. A letter by Mr. Tree appeared in your issue of April, 1921, propagating his own particular theory. I thought it not uninteresting to discuss the subject dispassionately from another point of view. Mr. Tree chose to make light of my observations. I proceeded to specify wherein I found his theory wanting, and, in order to attain a practical result, issued a challenge to him, which he declined. In my turn, I stated my reasons for not accepting his invitation.

Now Mr. Tree has given my challenge a new and quite unwarrantable direction. He advocated his own theory, while I supported the time-honoured method which has produced all the really great singers of the past, and needs no new demonstration. Thus only a difference of opinion lay between us, yet he has contorted that into a direct challenge in which he is supposed to be the injured party. To put it mildly, it seems to me to be a decidedly irregular proceeding on Mr. Tree's part. However, I am not daunted by his post-war manner, and, with reasonable reservations (which I hope to arrange with him privately), I accept his challenge.—Yours, &c.,

A. KEAY.

2, Gledstanes Road, W. 14.

January 4, 1922.

UNKNOWN WORKS OF THOMAS TOMKINS

SIR,—I have been asked by the assistant-librarian of the Paris Conservatoire of Music, Mlle. Pereyra, to state that she would be glad of any lists of compositions by Thomas Tomkins, organist of Worcester, early 17th century, with a view to forming a complete catalogue of his works. It seems unlikely that more of his virginal and organ works exist than those found in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, the Bodleian, and in the libraries of the Paris Conservatoire and at New York, but there may be vocal works of his hidden in Cathedral libraries that are unknown. If any librarian will kindly send such information to me, I will forward it to Mlle. Pereyra.—Yours, &c.,

The Well House,
Ewell, Surrey.

MARGARET H. GLYN.

THE DEARTH OF ACCOMPANISTS

SIR,—How is it that so few musicians can accompany? Is this the reason why at so many concerts violin or 'cello sonatas are never heard? Anyone who plays a stringed instrument knows that nothing is so tiring as to rehearse well-known concertos and other works which every musician worthy the name ought at least to have some knowledge of. I have lately heard four of London's best pianists. The accompanying of one of them was certainly everything that could be desired; another was certainly accurate, but mechanical to the last degree; the other two had only one idea, so far as I could discern, viz., to smash the pianoforte. How any string quartet could play with such blacksmiths (the only term that accurately describes such thumping) I cannot imagine. Hundreds of singers have failed simply because their accompanists had no idea of interpretation, nor desired to get it. With perhaps two exceptions we have had no one to equal the late Henry Bird, yet personally I never saw anything in his playing that could not be acquired by any pianist of average intelligence; the difficulty is that unless a pianist has the gift it is useless to try and explain what one wants. Is accompanying a branch of study at our music colleges? If so, the results are poor in the extreme.—Yours, &c., A. M. GIFFORD.
Hunstanton.

AN INTERESTING SPECIFICATION

SIR,—At p. 39 of your January issue you quote from Le Monde Musical a specification of a unique organ, of six stops divided into two sections. This reminds me of a specification I have had for many years, but cannot say whence it came. The full tone is stated to be quite satisfactory.

Upper—Great

4-ft. stopped flute	} All Metal.
Two Fifteenth Mixture (two ranks, 19th & 22nd, bass; 12th & 17th, treble)

Lower—Great

8-ft. open diapason	} Wood (oak).
8-ft. stopped diapason
4-ft. Principal...

Perhaps some of your readers may be able to identify it.—Yours, &c.,
R. H. GATES.

The Mindens, Paignton,

S. Devon.

January 5, 1922.

THE ENCORE NUISANCE

SIR,—I write to protest against the general custom of 'encores' at provincial concerts. Whether this bad practice is tolerated in London to the same extent I cannot say, but in these parts we are certainly overdone with it.

The most annoying part of the business is that programmes are either unduly prolonged or something one is really anxious to hear has to be cut out. Why cannot programmes be strictly adhered to?

Also, is it not possible to educate the musical public until it sees that it is bad form to intrude between movements with a discordant burst of hand clapping?—Yours, &c.,

MUSIC LOVER.

MR. WALTER RUMMEL'S RECITALS

SIR,—It was with much regret that I read the short criticism on Mr. Walter Rummel which appeared in your January issue (page 44). Unfortunately I did not have the pleasure of attending Mr. Rummel's recitals at Wigmore Hall, but I have heard him play on other occasions, when his performance certainly showed him to be a 'clever pianist,' but not one who 'is apt to reduce music to noise.' On the contrary, I have never heard the works of Beethoven, Chopin, and Schumann interpreted with more feeling and sympathy. His readings of these famous compositions were not only very fine, but also carried with them an irresistible appeal to every lover of music. As an enthusiastic member of a large audience I desire to express my appreciation of a great artist.—Yours, &c., M. M. G. T.

January, 1922.

[The writer of the criticism attended Mr. Rummel's recitals at Wigmore Hall; 'M. M. G. T.' did not. The criticism concerned those particular recitals, not 'other occasions.'—ED., M. T.]

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of February, 1862:

PRINCE ALBERT'S SONGS AND BALLADS, the Words in German and English; set to Music for the Pianoforte; 42 pages; folio, 5s. (Free per post.)—Henry G. Bohn, York Street, Covent Garden.

GOD BLESS OUR WIDOWED QUEEN. A National Prayer. Words by W. S. PASSMORE. Music by W. T. WRIGHTON. Appropriately illustrated. 2s. 6d.

IN MEMORIAM.—His late R.H. The Prince Consort. Elegy, for Pianoforte. By BRINLEY RICHARDS. With appropriate illustration. 3s.

HANOVER SQUARE ROOMS.—A musical lecture was delivered at these rooms, on January 24, by the Rev. Mr. Rogerson Cotter, for the purpose of introducing to the public an instrument called the Lyrachord, invented by himself. The object of the inventor was to produce an instrument capable of being played like a pianoforte, but emitting the sound of a harp. This object has been most effectually carried out by rather a simple process—that of striking or pulling the ordinary pianoforte wire in the centre, instead of the end. The lower half of the wires are struck with a hammer, the upper half are pulled by an ingenious little machine operating precisely like a finger and thumb. The tone thus emitted resembles the sound of the harp, and any player capable of performing on the pianoforte is thus enabled to play with ease upon the harp, an instrument which every one must admit is a charming adjunct to the pianoforte, either for vocal or instrumental performances. There are at present some slight defects observable in the mechanical contrivances, but there is reason to believe that these can readily be removed, and that we shall very soon be able to perform upon the harp without the trouble of learning the instrument.

WAKEFIELD.—A new organ was opened at the Asylum Church, on Sunday, January 19, which was played by the Rev. Dr. Dykes, precentor of Durham Cathedral.

NOTICE.—Persons having Poetry, and wishing it set to new and appropriate Music, as a song (with accompaniment), glee, hymn-tune, &c., can have it efficiently done. Terms stated on receipt of stamps.—Address, Thorough Bass, 50, St. Peter Street South, Hackney Road, London, N.E.

Sharps and Flats

Someone varied the usual procedure of sending the singer bouquets by passing up to her a plate of fruit . . . If fruit, why not other things? There have been occasions lately when no one would have seen anything inappropriate in the handing of a bird to the singer.—Ernest Newman.

Mr. Newman is a bit of sheer good luck for an art that has submitted itself far too much to incompetent sentimentalist on the one hand, and academic experts on the other hand, with the brains and outlook of a hen.—J. D. M. Morke.

The [Stravinsky] Symphony for wind instruments . . . is a masterpiece in the analysis of wind-timbre. . . . One need not consider the idiots who found it dreary.—T. Warner Wharton.

No sound which has for its aim the expression of a deliberate purpose can ever be termed ugly.—Eugène Goossens.

Art is long and life is short; here is evidently the explanation of a Brahms symphony.—Edward Lorne.

I would sooner watch a good fight than listen to a bad opera.—Dr. Richard Strauss.

Although Carpenter can still beat any ordinary heavy-weight, he is not quite the old Carpentier.—Ernest Newman.

The death of Camille Saint-Saëns definitely removes into historical impassability a man's work that had already been pigeon-holed by most of us.—G. Jean-Aubry.

Although prevalent historical-culture systems of education, by their insistence on general learning, in place of individual knowledge, render us liable to forget the fact, the ultimate realisation and judgment of actualities devolves upon the individual, since the inherent impulses and experience of no two human beings are identical in all respects.—Leigh Henry.

Obituary

By the death of GERALD HAYWARD at the age of sixty-eight, which occurred at Redhill on New Year's eve, there has passed a figure of great personal charm and wide sympathies. The deceased was educated at Malvern, and afterwards proceeded to Clare College, Cambridge, where he made a close study of Church and choral music, as well as early musical history. Upon leaving the University he lectured extensively, and revealed an intimate knowledge of these subjects. In 1905 he was appointed to the musical staffs of the Standard, the Evening Standard, and the Daily Express, with Mr. Wakeling Dry and the late Mr. Lionel Bingham as his colleagues—a post that he held until 1915. As a critic Mr. Hayward's opinion was valuable for its soundness and deep sense of fair play. He was never known for the severity of his judgment—preferring rather to deal leniently with the offender, and to point out in kindly terms the error of his ways. His help and advice, indeed, were ever at the disposal of the young musician. After his retirement from active musical life he devoted himself to his hobbies, botany and ornithology, and became a regular contributor to the provincial press. He will be missed by many, for his unfailing thought for others, his loyal friendship, and his fine courtesy.

Switzerland has lost her foremost composer—HANS HUBER—who died on December 25. He was born on January 28, 1852, at Schönenwerd (Canton Solothurn), and lived most of his life at Basle as music-master and conductor of various societies. Huber had cultivated all forms of musical composition, from the simple song to the opera and great choral works with orchestral accompaniment, from the easy pianoforte piece to the well laid out sonata for one or more instruments, the concerto and the grand symphony. He was a prolific writer, fanciful and vigorous, although some of his compositions have the character of improvisations. The Sonatas for pianoforte and string instruments belong to his best works. Their individual movements are not equally valuable, but the composer is always master of the form, which he fills with original matter, and beautiful melodies, whose romantic character suggests Schumann's influence and whose harmonies point towards Wagner and Liszt.

By the untimely death of JULIAN CLIFFORD at the age of forty-four music in England loses one of its noted personalities and a worker of the kind that we can ill spare. He had high ideals and practical gifts that peculiarly fitted him for the work which occupied the greater part of his career. His name will long be associated with Harrogate, where for some fifteen years he was the head of musical affairs, and as conductor of the Julian Clifford Orchestra at the Royal Hall (formerly the 'Kursaal') gave the town a high musical standing. In 1919 he went on a similar mission to Hastings, where, at the time of his death, he had begun to exert a strong influence. As a naturally-gifted conductor, thoroughly grounded in the school of experience, he seemed destined to take his place among the foremost in the country. Julian Clifford was born in London, and educated at Tonbridge School. He studied music at Leipzig and the Royal College of Music. A brilliant pianist, he was able to sustain the ordeal of a recital with confidence. As a composer he showed decided talent. His Lights Out, written in memory of Ernest Farrar, was fittingly played on the occasion of his funeral at Hastings, on December 30.

At a late moment we hear with great regret of the death of FRANZ LIEBICH, pianist, teacher, lecturer, and devotee of modern music. Our early appreciation of Debussy—and of many other foreign composers—was due largely to his efforts. Concert-goers will remember the interesting recital-lectures on modern music given by Mr. and Mrs. Liebich.

We regret to record also the following deaths:

WINTHROP L. ROGERS, founder of the music publishing firm of Winthrop Rogers, Ltd., which he developed from the London branch of Schirmer's, of New York. He was assiduous in his support of modern British music, and published many works by Frank Bridge, John Ireland, Alec Rowley, Peter Warlock, Roger Quilter, and other contemporaries.

MRS. F. WYATT-SMITH, for many years a noted worker in musical journalism, well-known to the old order of critics such as Dr. Frost, Shedlock, Prout, Percy Betts, &c. She acted as music critic to the Musical Standard, under Crowdy, and was afterwards on the staff of the Musical News until 1906. She made excellent English translations of a number of French and German lyrics.

FLORENCE ETLINGER, on January 7, founder of the operatic and dramatic school which bears her name.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The Director's opening address was mainly concerned with the development of the opera class, which will this term rehearse Madame Butterfly and Don Giovanni.

Of special interest among the prizes periodically competed for, is a new exhibition for extemporising—the result of a bequest by the late Rev. F. G. Wesley. The Wesleys have long been famed for their talent in this most fascinating branch of the art, one which is not usually given the place in music study that it deserves, and it is to be hoped that this exhibition—probably the first of its kind—will be the forerunner of an increased interest in the subject. The exhibition will cover tuition fees, and will be open to organ or pianoforte students of the College, who will be expected to extemporise on given themes, and on themes of the Wesleys. It is hoped to hold the first competition in June or July.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The Lent term was inaugurated on January 11 by an address to the students by Dr. C. W. Pearce, and the distribution of certificates and prizes, together with a performance of solo music by several students of the College. Sir Frederick Bridge, the chairman of the Board of the College, presided.

Dr. Pearce said it had been decided that during the year the College would fittingly celebrate its Jubilee, an event which coincided with the centenary of the Royal Academy of Music. He traced the growth of the Institution from the then (1872) newly-formed association of Anglican Church Musicians, and stated that right from the beginning the College had been governed by men of the foremost rank in the musical profession, and that the eminent musicians who taught, lectured, and examined under its auspices accepted lower fees than their professional attainments deserved, or, indeed, realised outside the College. The College had not from its foundation received a single penny from the State by way of 'grant.' In illustration of the progress of the College, Dr. Pearce mentioned that in 1913 the average number of students per term was 355, whilst last year it was 616, and the number of examination candidates in the same period had risen from 32,981 to 52,180.

A very useful course of training included in the College curriculum, and one that should appeal especially to organists, choirmasters, and teachers in elementary schools, was that conducted by Mr. Stanley Roper. The scope of the thirty lecture-lessons a year, of which the complete course consists, is indicated by the following general headings: Aural Training, Class Sight-Singing, Class Voice-Culture, and Choir-conducting, and student-teachers are given opportunities for the practical application of their knowledge of these subjects. Here, then, is another example of that union of theory and practice which has been, and is, an essential feature of the College work.

The following professors have recently been appointed to the teaching staff: Dr. G. Oldroyd, Dr. J. W. C. Hathaway, Madame M. Rosenberg, Miss M. Dalzell, and Signor E. Panagulli.

As a result of the recent open competition, scholarships have been awarded to Helen A. Horgan, Fred Maybank, Goldie Rosenwary, Norman W. G. Tucker (pianoforte); Annie Cross, Ivy M. Joynson, Alexandrina M. Stringer (singing); Frank E. I. Bilbe, Eric C. Coleridge, Leon Kitchenoff, Dorothy F. Sexton (violin); Winifred T. Stiles (viola); Alec Compinsky, Reginald F. J. Kilbey, Gastone Marinari, Maurice Zimble (violoncello); George W. Batchelor (clarinet). Doris M. Clarke and Edith M. Coates were highly commended. The examiners were Sir Frederick Bridge, Dr. C. W. Pearce, and Dr. E. F. Horner.

THE MUSIC OF ANCIENT EGYPT

On December 13 the members of the Musical Association listened to an interesting and exhaustive paper on 'The Music of Ancient Egypt' by Mr. Jeffrey Pulver. He said that when Greece was just beginning to show her first promise of later greatness the Twelfth Dynasty of Egyptian kings was ruling a country that enjoyed an astonishing musical culture. So far back as the Fourth and Fifth Dynasties we found evidences of musical activity which must have been preceded by a long era of development. The Egyptians had a perfect mania for leaving pictorial representations of everything they did and everything they used; to this circumstance we owed such proof of their musical skill as we possessed. There was no trace of a bow or bowed instrument, but pictures of nearly every species of stringed and plucked instrument, very many wind instruments, and a good deal of percussion were very plentiful. Loret said quite rightly, 'There is scarcely a necropolis in which one does not meet with pictures of musical scenes.' Some examples of the instruments themselves had been discovered in the tombs, and were of considerable importance.

All Egyptians, from the king downwards, enjoyed music in some form or other. The Pharaohs maintained orchestras, and so far back as 4,000-3,000 B.C. there were employed three superintendents of the royal singing. In fact, the customs of the Tudor times that we self-complacently praise in our own history were already very much the same in ancient Egypt. The folk-song also was developed, and almost every class had its own peculiar working-songs. Many varied influences were brought to bear upon the art of the country, and some of the Egyptian instruments of music were of Asiatic origin, improved or altered in Egypt. The great period of Egyptian culture that began in the Fourth Dynasty extended through the Fifth and Sixth, and at this time we found many proofs of musical excellence.

It was a pity that so intellectual a people as the Egyptians should not have left some sort of musical notation. Since no written music of any kind had been found, it must be assumed that there was none. Greece without doubt borrowed her musical system from Egypt—indeed there was no other country frequented by Greeks of these early days that could have imparted the knowledge—and with it the tetrachord system came to Europe. Through them we might look upon the Egypt of the Eighteenth Dynasty in particular as one of the chief sources of our European civilisation.

As regarded the harmonic system, we must accept the fact that nothing was known of it at all, and that what we could learn from a consideration of the instruments was all that we were likely to know on the matter. It was obvious that a flute with finger-holes to produce sound would help us considerably in deciding the nature of the scale used. Some sort of system must have obtained, otherwise we could not reconcile the fact that so many flutes played ensemble. Several wind instruments, each with a different series of natural notes, could not be used simultaneously by so cultured a people as the Egyptians. Moreover, wind and strings were so often employed together, that some system of tuning must have existed. We could not imagine so mathematically-minded a race, and one so scientific in all other respects, not knowing the principles of harmony. The nature of this harmony, whatever it was, need not detract from our admiration of the country's art. The fact that some sort of harmony, according to rule, was practised is sufficient cause to accept the music of ancient Egypt as an art.

We must look for the Egyptian scale in the music of Greece. The Greeks were taught many things by refugees from Egypt. The poets and musicians of Greece visited Egypt for purposes of improvement. Moreover, in later times, large colonies of Greeks were settled in Egypt, members of which were continually returning to their native land. Should we be far wrong then if we supposed that the scale based on the usual tetrachords was originated on the banks of the Nile? The double pipe, discovered in 1890 by Flinders Petrie in the tomb of the Lady Maket (c. 1100 B.C.), now in the National Museum at Berlin, gave the notes of one pipe as E flat, G (slightly flat), A flat, and B flat (slightly flat), and those of the other as E flat, F, G, and A flat. This latter was a tetrachord such as we knew to-day as the basis of our major scale.

The lecturer then described the various instruments, and finally arrived at the conclusion that Egypt in the most ancient times enjoyed a high musical culture, that there were grounds for supposing that music was used for every occasion much as it was to-day, and that since the nation was so intellectual, it could not have produced music for so long a time without developing some method and system. Everything pointed to the present-day system of European music having originated in the land of the Pharaohs five to six thousand years ago.

THE QUARTERLIES

Outstanding articles in the current Music and Letters are Prof. Tovey's description of the Emmanuel Moor Pianoforte, Cecil Gray's discriminating study of Schönberg, and the Editor's discussion of 'Tune.' There is a further instalment of 'Song-Translations,' and other features of an excellent number are articles by Ernest Walker ('The Songs of Schumann and Brahms'), A. P. Graves ('Songcraft'), and some attractive reviews of books. Dr. Grattan Flood's paper on 'Irish Ancestry of Garland, Dowland, Campion, and Purcell' sets us wondering how many composers the writer will leave to the credit of poor old England by the time he has finished his researches.

The Organ is a strong number, with articles by Lieut.-Col. George Dixon ('The Tonal Structure of the Organ'), Ernest Adcock ('The Organs of Lubeck,' with two fine plates), the Rev. Andrew Freeman ('The Organs of St. Stephen's Walbrook'), Eaglefield Hull ('Joseph Bonnet: the Artist'), and a half-dozen other varied papers. Illustrations are again a capital feature. Dr. Hull's article, by the by, is surely too eulogistic. As a composer Bonnet is by no means considerable. He is an excellent performer, but we fancy Dr. Hull is rash in writing: 'I have never known such absolute perfection as Bonnet's playing. During the scores of recitals which I have heard him give in various countries, I have never heard a wrong stop or a wrong note.' What, never? On the only occasion of our hearing Bonnet we were aware of a fair number. There never was and never will be, world without end, a performer so inhumanly perfect as to deserve Dr. Hull's encomium. And a good thing too. The occasional slip is the touch of nature that makes us all akin.

A lecture and demonstration of the 'Technique' was given at the London Academy of Music, on January 5, by Mr. R. J. Pitcher. The chair was taken by Mr. R. H. Walthew, who spoke highly of the invention. An interested audience evinced great pleasure at the pianoforte items which followed the lecture, Mr. Pitcher and Miss F. J. Fitch performing the first movement of Tchaikovsky's Concerto in B flat minor (two pianofortes).

Music in the Provinces

BASINGSTOKE.—The Victory Choir gave Stanford's The Voyage of Maeldune on December 15, under Mr. Duncan Hume, with accompaniment supplied on the pianoforte by Miss Grace Smith. Rebikov's female-voice Slumber Song was among the miscellaneous items.

BIRMINGHAM.—One of the most interesting events of the year was the concert of the Midland Institute on December 12, for it brought the second performance in England of Sibelius's fifth Symphony—a work with a future. Mr. Bantock conducted, and the students played well. The same programme introduced a Tragic Poem by Mr. W. J. Fenney.—Così fan Tutte was produced again at the Repertory Theatre on December 17, to general delight. Mr. Appleby Matthews conducted.—Christmas was of course celebrated by sundry Messiah performances.—The City Orchestra visited Saltley on January 8, and drew a large audience with a popular programme. The first year's work of this organization having occurred in a peculiarly unfortunate period, has resulted in a heavy call on the guarantors.—The Philharmonic Quartet played Haydn, Tchaikovsky, and Beethoven at the Grand Theatre on January 8.—Ireland's A minor Violin Sonata was played by Mr. Paul Beard and Mr. Michael Mullinar on January 12, and songs, French, Russian, and British, were sung by Mr. Leslie Bennett.

BOURNEMOUTH.—S. H. Braithwaite's By the Hot Lake and Near an Eastern Bazaar were given for the first time at the Symphony Concert on December 15. The interest of these concerts has been kept alive recently by Dr. Cyril Rootham's Miniature Suite, Stravinsky's L'Oiseau de Feu Suite, Dr. H. Holloway's second Symphony in D minor, Reyer's Sigurd Overture, Chabrier's España, Borodin's B minor Symphony, Mackenzie's Twelfth Night Overture, and Mr. Edgar Bainton's Concerto Fantasia, with the composer as pianist. Mr. Paul Kerby has come to the fore with his The Lover's Quarrel, conducted by himself at the Symphony concerts, and his Overture to As you Like it, played at the Ben Greet production.

BRADFORD.—Mr. Julius Harrison conducted the Bradford Permanent Orchestra on December 17, in Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the Siegfried Idyll, and the Ruy Blas Overture. Mr. Arnold Trowell was solo violoncellist, and Miss Violet Allen sang excellently.—The advance booking gives excellent prospects for the British National Opera Company's fortnight at the Alhambra from February 6. Arrangements are being made for choral assistance by local societies.—Bingley Orchestral Society gave Haydn's Surprise Symphony on December 14, under Mr. A. J. Coates.

BRISTOL.—Messrs. Duck, Son, & Pinker have undertaken the formation of a new Bristol Symphony Orchestra, and promise a series of concerts at Colston Hall under the direction of Mr. Maurice Alexander and guest-conductors.

CHATHAM.—A new chamber music party, to be known as the Gillingham String Quartet has been formed for the benefit of the truly musical in the Medway district. Its members are Miss Elsie Dudding and Mr. J. S. Roberts (violins), Mr. Bernard P. Dudding (viola), and Mr. Francis Hill (violinello). In works for pianoforte and strings they will be joined by Mr. W. Petchey. The first concert was arranged for January 31.

COLWYN BAY.—The Jupiter Symphony was played by the Amateur Orchestral Society under Miss Meier, on December 14.

DUBLIN.—Mr. Hans Wessely and Miss Lord gave an exacting programme of violin and pianoforte music at the Royal Dublin Society on December 12. They played the Dohnányi and Pizzetti Sonatas, Handel's in E, and a group of smaller pieces.—Miss Geraldine Sullivan, on December 14, played Chopin's Preludes, adding literary interpretations.—A recital was given by Miss Rhoda Coghill (pianoforte) and Miss Jessica Gordon (violin) at the Abbey Theatre on December 16.—At the concert of the Dublin Amateur Orchestral Players, on December 19, Mr. Patrick Delaney conducted the first performance of a Suite, Fais Ceoil No. 2, by Molyneux Palmer, and Mr. Hubert Rooney conducted Mozart's Eine kleine Nachtmusik.—The 'Mater' Concert on January 1 provided orchestral music of Wallace, Beethoven, and Cowen (the Language of Flowers Suite) and miscellaneous items.—At the Royal Dublin Society, on January 9, Signor Esposito conducted a Bach D minor Concerto, the Liebeslieder Waltzes of Brahms, two Norwegian Melodies by Grieg, and (in memory of Saint-Saëns) the Prelude du Déluge.—The Andante from Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the '1812' Overture, and songs given by Miss Louise Trenton and Mr. Harold Williams, were the features of the 'Mater' Concert on January 15.

EDINBURGH.—The Paterson Orchestral Concert, on December 19, provided a splendid performance of Elgar's second Symphony by the Scottish Orchestra under Sir (then Mr.) Landon Ronald. The rest of the programme was chiefly from A Midsummer Night's Dream music. The following week Georg Schumann's Overture to a Drama and Havergal Brian's tone-poem, In Memoriam, were heard for the first time, and M. Pouishnov played the Rachmaninov Pianoforte Concerto in C minor, Op. 18.—Choral music of importance has been limited to performances of The Messiah.—Miss Dorothy Silk sang old English songs and Brahms at Freemasons' Hall on December 20, and Prof. Tovey played Schumann and Chopin.—Mr. A. M. Henderson, organist of Glasgow University, lectured on French musical art from the 16th to the 20th century at the Y.M.C.A. Hall on December 23. In giving illustrations, old and modern, he was assisted by Mrs. Henderson (vocalist).—Lamond played Chopin at Usher Hall on January 12.—At Musselburgh, on January 12, a programme of ancient carols was given at the Church of Our Lady of Loretto and St. Michael. There were nine carols (says The Scotsman), collected by the Rev. Dom Gregory Ould from ancient manuscripts at Cambridge and the British Museum, and on the Continent. He had edited the text and melody of the Angelus ad Virginem from the Arundel manuscript in the British Museum—this being the Angelus referred to in Chaucer's Canterbury Tales.—Members of the Bach Society listened to a Bach recital by Mr. Harold Samuel on January 13.—On January 16, at a Paterson Concert, Mr. Julius Harrison introduced three movements from The Planets of Holst—namely, Venus, Mars, and Jupiter. The same programme included Liszt's Les Preludes, and Chabrier's Spanish Rhapsody.

GAINSBOROUGH.—The Musical Society gave its annual concert in the Town Hall on December 16. The choir, under Mr. Alan Stephenson, sang madrigals and modern works; the orchestra played Suites by Purcell and Frank Bridge; the Sheffield String Quartet assisted the Hon. Mrs. Sandars and Miss Isobel Watts in the Bach D minor double Violin Concerto; and Miss Dorothy Howell gave pianoforte solos. Such a programme is recorded with pleasure.

GLASGOW.—Since December 17 the Scottish Orchestra has played the following works at St. Andrew's Hall Saturday night concerts: Landon Ronald's Garden of Allah, Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, Berlioz's Carnaval Romain, Dance of the Bocks-Füßler by Itja Satz (a modern Russian), L'après midi d'un Faune, the New World Symphony, and Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel Overture—all these under Sir Landon Ronald. On December 20 the same orchestra and conductor gave Elgar's second Symphony and Strauss's Don Juan. César Franck's Symphony (on January 7) was conducted by Mr. Julius Harrison—also Till Eulenspiegel. Among the soloists Mr. Tertis stood out with his playing of Dale's Romance and Finale for viola and orchestra.—On December 19 the Glasgow Bach Choir gave a programme of exceptional quality at St. Mary's Cathedral under Mr. A. M. Henderson. It included the Cantatas The Lord is a Sun and Shield and Thou Guide of Israel, Purcell's Te Deum in D, and some a cappella church music.—At the St. Andrew's Hall popular concert of January 14, Mr. Harrison introduced to Glasgow Debussy's Sirènes—the third of the orchestral Nocturnes. That part of the orchestration which is written for female-voice choir was entrusted to forty singers of the Glasgow Choral Union.

Elgar's first Wand of Youth Suite was also in the programme. —The New World Symphony was played by the Amateur Orchestral Society on December 21.

HUDDERSFIELD.—Mr. Harold Hallas gave a recital of British songs on January 16, accompanied by Mr. James Stott. The programme was taken chiefly from Tudor and modern music. Miss Jane Marcus assisted in carols by Holst for voice and violin.

LEEDS.—Bach's Christmas Oratorio was sung by the New Choral Society to a large audience at the Town Hall on December 14, Mr. Matthias Turton conducting. Mr. Hartley did valuable work at the organ. This Society, which gives a Bach performance annually, has been dubbed the 'local Bach Choir.'—For the Christmas season the Philharmonic Society and the Parish Church Choir gave their attention to The Messiah.—'Popular' concerts at Belgrave Hall justify their title by results. At one of them, on January 7, Miss Minnie Tomchinsky (violinist) made her first appearance at Leeds, and played creditably.—A 'Brahms Festival' of chamber music is to be held at the University on March 3 and 4, the artists being the Catterall Quartet and two other string players, and Mr. Charles Draper (clarinet).—At the Saturday Orchestral Concert of January 14 Mr. Goossens introduced to Leeds Stravinsky's L'Oiseau de Feu, and a Symphony Old England by a Town Councillor, Mr. Harding Churton, was given for the second time.

LIVERPOOL.—M. Ansermet conducted the orchestral music at the Philharmonic Society's concert on December 13. This included Schumann's fourth Symphony, Stravinsky's L'Oiseau de Feu, Ireland's Forgotten Rite, and Debussy's Fêtes. Dr. A. W. Pollitt conducted the choir in Blest Pair of Sirens.—The Liverpool Welsh Choral Union occupied itself with The Messiah on December 17.—Three movements (Mars, Saturn, and Jupiter) from Holst's The Planets were played under Sir Henry Wood at the Philharmonic concert of January 10. The choir, under Dr. A. W. Pollitt, sang Cornelius's O Death, thou art the tranquil night.

MAIERN.—At the Priory Church on December 18, the Oratorio Choir sang Bach's God's time is the best and Holst's Two Psalms.

MANCHESTER.—The Hallé programme of December 15 had Delius's Brigg Fair and Ravel's La Valse instead of a Symphony; M. Toscha Seidel played the Brahms Violin Concerto; and the smaller orchestral works were Bach's F major Toccata, the Londonderry Air, and Albeniz's Catalonia.—The next concert was a Messiah performance with Miss Esta d'Argo, Miss Margaret Balfour, Mr. Sydney Coltham, and Mr. Norman Allin as soloists.—On January 12 Brahms's first Symphony was heard, with Mozart's Magic Flute Overture, and Berlioz's Carnaval Romain. Miss Désirée Ellinger sang Debussy and Mozart, and Mr. Arthur Catterall played the D minor Violin Concerto of the conductor, Mr. Hamilton Harty. The Yorkshire Post points out the curious juxtaposition of Brahms at his strongest, and solo singing by the Principal Girl in the Leeds Pantomime.—On January 14 lighter fare was provided with Carmen, Madame Kirkby Lunn taking the name part.—The Messiah also came into the Brand Lane series on December 17. The next of these concerts, on January 7, was operatic. Cavalleria Rusticana went splendidly under Sir Henry Wood, with Miss Buckman, Mr. d'Oisy, and Mr. Lewys James as soloists.—Manchester looked forward eagerly to the visit of Dr. Strauss, which occurred too late for comment here.

NEWCASTLE.—Glazounov's sixth Symphony was played by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Hamilton Harty on December 13. The soloist of the concert was Miss Isolde Menges, who played the Beethoven Violin Concerto.—On the following evening Armstrong College Choral Society gave its thirty-fifth concert. Dr. W. G. Whittaker conducted the choir in Bainton's Sunset at Sea, and choruses from Dioclesian.—The Bach Choir's Christmastide programme on December 17 consisted of carols by Herbert Howells, Walford Davies, Bax, and Holst, and carol arrangements by Vaughan Williams. The programme concluded with a Bach eight-part Motet. Dr. Whittaker conducted.—Mr. Arthur Bliss gave a lecture on 'Modern Music' for the British Music Society on January 14, assisted by Mr. Tom Purvis (vocalist), Miss Annie Eckford (pianoforte), and a string orchestra.

NEWPORT.—The last of the subscription concerts at Central Hall was a joint recital by Miss Dorothea Vincent—whose pianoforte solos included Ireland's The Island Spell—Miss Vera Horton, and Mr. Frank Mullings, who sang a selection of Prof. Bantock's songs, accompanied by the composer.

RIPON.—Brahms's Requiem was sung in the Cathedral on December 14 under Mr. C. H. Mooly in the presence of a large congregation. Dr. H. G. Ley was at the organ.

ROTHERHAM.—The concert given on January 11 by Miss Pansy Moore with the assistance of the Sheffield String Quartet had a programme that we would quote in full, did space permit. Miss Moore sang a Bach Cantata, a dozen British songs of the Parry-Quilter-Vaughan Williams period, Schubert (four), Purcell, the big Coq d'Or Aria, and Ritorna Vincitor. The chamber music included a Dittersdorf Quartet in E flat and Beethoven's F minor, Op. 95.

SHEFFIELD.—J. R. Heath's three Macedonian Sketches for violin and pianoforte were played by Miss Winifred Williams and Miss Frances Mercer at a 'Five o'clock' concert in December. The same programme included a series of Schubert waltzes for four voices.—There was distinguished quality in the performance of The Kingdom given by the Amateur Musical Society under Dr. Staton on December 20. The solo parts were sung by Miss Ida Cooper, Miss Doris Manuëll, Mr. Henry Askew, and Mr. John Buckley.—The Wath and District Choral Society gave Acis and Galatea under Mr. George M. Coates on December 16.

STOCKPORT.—The Dream of Gerontius was given by the Vocal Union on December 19. Dr. T. Keighley introduced the performance with a short address on the words and music. The principals were Miss Helen Anderton, Mr. John Adams, and Mr. Joseph Farrington.

TREGARON (Cardigan).—Mozart's twelfth Mass was given by the local choir and orchestra on January 4, Mr. Lewis J. Evans conducting.

WOKING.—A Symphony Concert was given at the County Secondary School on December 17. Mr. Patrick White conducted the William Tell Overture, Tchaikovsky's Pathetic, and Finlandia—an ambitious programme for amateurs, but not beyond the powers of Woking. The choir gave Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast under Mr. H. Scott-Baker, Mr. Charles Titheradge being tenor soloist. An excellent concert, and a credit to the town—or suburb.

YORK.—A concert of exceptional interest was given by the Musical Society on December 13. Under Mr. H. A. Bennett, assistant-organist of the Minster, the choir gave Sing ye to the Lord, Parry's My Soul, there is a Country, the Hampshire folk-song I sowed the seeds of love, as arranged by Holst, and Balfour Gardiner's Sir Eglamore. Madame Agnes Nicholls brought an excellent programme of songs, and solos were given by Miss Gladys Clark (violin) and Miss Dorothy Howell (pianoforte) included Tartini's G minor Sonata and Bach's Italian Concerto.—A programme of Tudor music was heard on January 14, as illustration to a lecture given by Dr. R. R. Terry for the British Music Society. String quartet music was played, and a choir under Mr. H. A. Bennett sang Robert Parsons's Ave Maria and settings of Lumen ad revelationem gentium by Byrd and Palestrina.

Sterndale Bennett's The May Queen was performed recently at the Conservatorium Hall, Sydney, in the form of an operetta, with added numbers from Lane Wilson's Old English Melodies and his song-cycle, Flora's Holiday. The result seems to have been highly effective. Mr. Roland Foster conducted, and Mr. Frederick Ward produced.

At St. John's, St. Leonards-on-Sea, on December 14, Parry's Job was well sung by the choir. The soloists were Messrs. Albert Crouch, R. Slater, and D. Barker. The accompaniments were provided by a small amateur orchestra and the organ (Dr. W. H. Speer). Mr. Leonard O'Connor conducted.

Musical Notes from Abroad

AMSTERDAM

In the last series of symphony concerts which he conducted prior to embarking for his United States tour, Mengelberg saw fit to impress once more upon us that a great deal of Mahler's fame is due to his untiring advocacy. A Mahler symphony figured as chief item in no less than four of the seven orchestral concerts. The concert of January 16 consisted of Beethoven's first and ninth Symphonies, the latter with Mesdames Di Moorlag and Reidel and MM. Urlus and Denys as soloists. The sudden death of Saint-Saëns necessitated a change in the original scheme of the concert at the end of December, which was recast as a Saint-Saëns commemorative programme comprising the Prelude to Le Déluge, the symphonic poems Le rouet d'Omphale and Danse macabre, the A minor Violoncello Concerto, admirably played by M. Marix Loevensohn, and the magnificent third Symphony.

On January 5 a first performance of Kurt Atterberg's fourth Symphony furnished us with an introduction to a composer—from Sweden—responsible for at least two movements (the first and second) which can be classed as indubitable masterpieces. We certainly ought to keep an eye on his future works.

During the concert on January 8 a fortuitous incident was the cause of a magnificent treat. The concert opened with a splendid performance of Weber's Oberon Overture, after which M. Zimmermann introduced his new Violin Concerto, a work which gave evidence of his being endowed with very respectable qualities as a composer. The final piece (Strauss's Heldenleben) had progressed to somewhere about the battle-scene, when a failure of the electric light seemed to announce an end to the proceedings. But M. Loevensohn rose to the occasion, and gave us a selection of Bach's Suites for violoncello solo. The effect in the Egyptian darkness was fascinating.

Of chamber music concerts mention has to be made of an evening programme by the Amsterdam String Quartet, when the players were heard in Mozart, Beethoven, and Schubert. Highly commendable work has also been done by the Hague String Quartet and the Groningen String Quartet. At the second 'Anbruch' concert we heard a heretofore unknown Quintet by Philippe Jarnach, which proved a valuable addition to that branch of musical literature. A concert of the trio combination, Kwant-Törmgren-Wagenaar (song, flute, and pianoforte), brought much interesting and rarely-heard old music.

The three-hundredth anniversary of J. P. Sweelinck's death has, regrettably, been celebrated only in a very meagre way, and much post festum at that (he died October 16, 1621), not more than half a programme having been allotted to his works. To the credit of the Schola Cantorum, under M. Hubert Cuypers, a flawless presentation may, however, be recorded.

On the evening of the same day, January 8, little Erna Rubinstein, who will accompany Mengelberg on his American tour, drew an enormous audience. Well-earned success was reaped by the violoncellist, M. Johan Ijdo, who, in association with M. Willem Andriessen, played Sonatas by Brahms, Huré, and Grieg. Soloist recitals did not, for the major part, contain much beyond the usual repertoire works. A laudable exception, however, was made by Mr. Howard-Jones, who, besides proving himself in splendid form, gratified us with the Pianoforte Sonata in E minor by John Ireland, a work which gained universal praise at Amsterdam. In addition, he played two interesting new pieces by Moeran and Delius. Madame Berthe Seroen and the pianist, M. Evert Cornelis, always embellish their programmes with items of interest. This time their choice had fallen on works by Pizzetti and Mario Castelnuovo-Tedesco.

By way of completeness mention may be made of the song recitals given by the French tenor, M. Gabriel Chamlys, and Madame Minnie de Jonge, on which latter occasion M. Francis and Madame Cornelia Koene played Brahms's Violin Sonata in G and a Poème by Chausson. The pianists, M. Dirk Schäfer and M. Ary Belinfante, confined themselves in their recitals solely to the interpretation of classical works. Their qualities are too well known to necessitate entering into particulars.

W. HARMANS.

GERMANY

OPERA

There was a time when a German music-loving family belonging to the upper middle classes considered it nothing short of a work of necessity to see every new opera that was brought out, to say nothing of every old one that was revived, and to hear each artist of note who visited the town. Thus a German family paid a dozen visits to the theatre or concert hall where an English family of the same status would pay, perhaps, but one. Jean Paul has said that 'Art is not indeed the bread, but the wine of life.' So far as the art of music is concerned, his countrymen practically disagreed with him. To them music was quite as necessary as their bread, almost as much so as their beer. Things have changed since the recent political upheaval. The beer has become thin, for John Barleycorn is required for foodstuff, and cultured German families do not now possess the wherewithal to attend many concerts and theatre performances. And yet the theatres are crowded, the audiences being largely composed of Schieber and Kriegsgewinnler. In all of this, far-seeing people observe signs of decadence. Church choirs are disappearing; the military orchestras, with their excellent playing and programmes, have disappeared; cinema performances are successfully challenging the legitimate stage. Yet powerful factors are at work to stem the impending decay. It is a proud thought that the German opera houses, in this hour of Germany's deepest humiliation, are proving what the world owes to German art. Munich, the rallying point of thousands of foreigners, with her Residenztheater for the performance of Mozart and Strauss and the Prinzregententheater for Gluck, Wagner, and Pfitzner, has lately produced operas whose presentation bordered on perfection. The scheme of performing all the great German operas from Gluck down to Strauss and Schreker taxed the resources of these theatres to the utmost. It is impossible to be in festive mood day by day. The custom of employing local singers had on two occasions to be broken through, and owing to the illness of a leading tenor and the inability to obtain a substitute, two important works—Hugo Wolf's Corregidor and Hans Pfitzner's Armer Heinrich—had to be suspended.

The subject of Don Quixote has frequently attracted the attention of composers. Kienzl's Don Quixote, first performed November 18, 1898, at the Royal Opera House, Berlin, did not achieve the success of his former opera 'Der Evangelimann.' The composer did not possess the creative power to infuse life into the story, and his imaginative flight fell short of realisation. The figure of Kienzl's Don Quixote on the stage is for us an impossibility.

It was a bold undertaking when Anton Beer-Walbrunn produced another operatic Don Quixote. Georg Fuchs, of Munich, the author of the text-book, a poet and a humorist, has mastered the subject most successfully. Unlike Kienzl, whose hero, restored to his senses, falls down dead when he learns that he had been a laughing-stock (an ending quite in style with the old opera), Fuchs's Don Quixote, through the instrumentality of his adored Dulcinea, restrains his ardour for knightly deeds, and returns to a peaceful life. Interwoven in the plot is a love episode giving the necessary lyrical contrast. Altogether Fuchs has written one of the best operatic books that have appeared for years past. Beer-Walbrunn's music is influenced by Wagner, but he remains in touch with the classic-romantic opera of the pre-Wagner time. He makes use of the Liedmotiv but sparingly, and only when it is necessary. Beer possesses a rich melodious vein, and he has succeeded in finding expression for the hero's mixture of madness and chivalry, of ridicule and tragic earnestness, thus creating a character who demands our sympathy, and provoking not laughter but a smile. He has in a beautiful Finale focussed the mood pervading the entire opera. The comic element disappears, and we witness the tragedy of a human life. Thus by the aid of music, is the masterpiece of Cervantes made to acquire a new significance. The new opera has proved that Beer-Walbrunn is one of the most gifted of living musicians.

The Berlin winter season has up till now been rich in concerts and musical entertainments, an ebullient presentation of local and other players and singers of all sorts. Everyone wished to be seen and to be heard. In this tumult of programmes the host of pianists—that seems to be increasing from year to year—was prominent, many of the newcomers possessing a respectable degree of ability and ambition. Some, however, ought to continue their studies until they are ripe for public utterance. The love for Eastern music has developed into a vogue in certain Berlin circles, although an æsthetic demand does not seem to emerge. The advantages and disadvantages of Russian music are apparent when one is obliged to listen to a lengthy programme as submitted by Sergei Kussewitzky, an exquisite solo contra-bassist, who drew from his uncouth instrument sweet cantilenas. The passion and colour are prevalent in Russian music, but depth is wanting. Russian literature is so well-known in Germany that the compositions of Glinka, Rimsky-Korsakov, Glazounov, and Liadov are inopportune at the present time. Kussewitzky's second concert, however, brought new matter: Une nuit sur le mont chauve, by Moussorgsky, living music of a glowing temperament; three fragments from Petrushka, by Stravinsky, that musical pioneer par excellence, a grotesque work, inspiring and invigorating and brimful of passion, mirroring the genius of a great people; finally, Scriabin's Poème de l'extase (Op. 64), music of a man who envisages warfare against a remorseless fate.

Moussorgsky has in a way obtained citizen right in Germany, for two of his pianoforte compositions have recently been admitted into the Peters Edition, viz., Zwei Klavierstücke ('Kinderschmerz,' 'Intermezzo'), and Tableaux d'une exposition, a series of ten pieces each bearing the name of a picture, the inspiration of which the composer received from an exhibition of water-colours and drawings by the architect, Hartmann.

In German concert programmes the name of Walter Niemann occurs more and more frequently. When a composer devotes his whole energy to the cultivation of one instrument we may be sure that the result cannot but be satisfactory. By birth, nature, and character a North German, by education and choice a Rhinelander, Niemann imparts to his compositions the Stimmung of the Northerner along with the colour and sound of the Southerner. In his Romantic Sonata (Op. 60) (Leipsic, Kahnt) we find the reflexes of his tours in the Black Forest, the Taurus and the Harz Mountains. We think of Wiesbaden and the Rhine. It is a bunch of fairy-tales told by Grimm, a set of pictures drawn by Kate Greenaway. In the Northern Sonata (Op. 75) the composer strikes a serious note, something heroic, reminiscent at once of Heibel, Storm, Frenssen, of the greyish-green German ocean of Ossian and Strindberg. There is plenty of colour, attaining even to brilliancy, but the background is sombre. Niemann is one of the most gifted of living composers for the pianoforte, an artist who takes rank with Debussy, Ravel, Scott, Scriabin, and Albeniz.

At Munich a school of composers is growing up with the motto: 'Away with the big orchestra and the restricted academic spirit! Return to chamber music!' and in accordance with this slogan Prof. von Waltershausen produced at Bochum two movements from Alfred Reuss's Sommeridylle for small orchestra, Weismann's Pianoforte Concerto in D flat major (with Thérèse Pott at the pianoforte), and Braunfels's Serenade for small orchestra. At another concert H. Scherchen explained the problems of the young-Berlin-music and had his String Quartet (Op. 1) played by the Leipsic Schachtebeck Quartet. It is a work showing the striving of a serious musician to move in a free medium. The cosmopolitan spirit of Bochum was demonstrated by a concert dedicated to the Vienna school (Wellesz, Schönberg, and A. v. Weber), and by a modern Russian-French concert. These and other concerts conducted by Schulz-Dornburg gave lovers of music at Bochum an opportunity for becoming acquainted with some aspects of modern music, without neglecting the great masters—Bach (St. Matthew Passion), Beethoven (ninth Symphony), and Bruckner (Mass in F minor), the latter under the baton of Arno Schütze.

The musical re-birth of Germany must come from within, not from without, and where the programmes root in the soil—as, for example, the concerts of the Deutsche Musikabende, organized in 1912 by Musikdirektor Ernst Wollong, of Rudolstadt—a regeneration may be expected. A little town like Rudolstadt is of course restricted to chamber music, and the danger of running in a groove must be avoided. These concerts represent a good deal of the musical development in Germany. Wollong does not love the mixed programme. He prefers the principle of unity and abhors the lionising system of soloists. First the artwork, then the performer. His concert programmes dealt with: The Bach family—A chamber concert at the court of Frederick the Great—Song and dance during the 18th century—Goethe's female characters—Faust music—German children songs—A little comedy with music of old masters—Melodrama. In addition there were Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Schubert, Schumann, and Brahms evenings, as well as Church concerts of a similar character. Finally Wollong organized a grand historic music festival lasting four days. The first concert, which took place in the rococo hall of the beautiful castle of Fleidecksburg, was dedicated mainly to compositions by Philipp Heinrich Erlebach, court conductor at Rudolstadt at the end of the 17th century. The other concerts bore the uniform title 'Deutsche Hausmusik aus vier Jahrhunderten,' and the final concert crowned the festival with an excellent performance of Handel's Saul edited by Chrysander.

Saul was also performed in the Kreuzkirche at Dresden by the Bach Society and the Handel (Orchestral) Society, when it made a profound impression. By certain abridgments the sacred drama has been made more condensed, and its impressiveness deepened. Handel's suggestive music, supported in the powerful choruses by a wealth of instrumental accompaniment, appealed the more to listeners as it was reminiscent of recent national events.

F. ERCKMANN.

NEW YORK

Die Walküre, not heard here since 1917, has burst on New York again in all its glory, thrilling all to the point of intoxication, sweeping out of memory the futilities of so many of the modernists, and filling its hearers with an indescribable sense of satisfaction—while incidentally selling the Metropolitan out to the doors at every performance. Mr. Bodanzky's interpretation of the score was very well done. It was intensely dramatic, and full of life and vigour, yet the reading of the drama was poetically conceived. In her interpretation of the rôle of Brünnhilde, Madame Matzenauer was vocally sumptuous, revealing fine artistry and familiarity with the score. Interest, however, appeared more centred in the Sieglinde of Madame Jeritza, who is a great artist, vocally and histrionically. But if among the singers there was a star it was Mr. Whitehill, whose magnificent Wotan was superbly tragic and tender. Rumour says that when the Ring trilogy is performed next year a number of new German singers will be imported. Why? Certainly no German can surpass Mr. Whitehill as Wotan, or as Amfortas, Telramund, Kurvenal, Hans Sachs, or any other Wagnerian rôle he has undertaken. Possibly there is some excuse for importing tenors, as American tenors hate to sing Wagner. They say it strains the voice. No finer Parsifal was ever heard on the stage of the Metropolitan than that of Mr. Orville Harrold: yet he sang under protest. It is said that Caruso always wanted to sing Siegfried, but was not allowed to do so.

The Russian basso, Chaliapin—a more familiar figure in London than in New York—has returned after an absence of many years. He has appeared twice at the Metropolitan Opera House as Boris in Boris Godunov, and has sung in a number of concerts. From the box-office point of view his American appearances are very successful, as he sings to packed houses at enormous prices. But the great crowds are composed chiefly of his own countrymen, his only listeners who understand him, his repertory being entirely in Russian.

Other misfortunes come to musicians than those of war. Moritz Moszkowski lies ill and almost penniless in Paris. A concert was given lately for his benefit by fifteen pianists, who played solos, duets, trios, quartets, sextets, and, as a climax, the whole fifteen played together, each on his own instrument. If anybody thinks this is a joke he is mistaken. The fifteen pianofortes were perfectly tuned, and the ensemble, with Walter Damrosch conducting, was almost orchestral.

Those who expected mere noise found that really good music could be made inspiring in this way. The contributing artists were (alphabetically) Bachaus, Bauer, Casella, Friedman, Gabrilowitsch, Grainger, Hutcheson, Lambert, Lhevinne, Madame Mero, Madame Ney, Ornstein, Schelling, Miss Schnitzer, and Stojowski. By the sale of tickets, photographs, and autographed programmes, the sum of fifteen thousand dollars was raised above all the necessary expenses.

MARY H. FLINT.

PARIS

At the Opéra-Comique two new works have been produced; a very pretty little ballet by Blair Fairchild, Dame Libellule, and a lyric drama by Georges Hue, Dans l'ombre de la Cathédrale, the libretto by Maurice Léna and Henry Ferrare. At the Opéra, Ravel's L'Heure Espagnole has been successfully revived, and a revival of Moussorgsky's Horis Godounov is expected to take place shortly. There is little to be said of Blair Fairchild's ballet score, a delightful trifle, as unpretentious as it is genuine. Georges Hue's music is good, thought out with care, carried out with skill, and, at times, convincing, although not very original.

On December 31, the programme of the Concerts-Pasdeloup was entirely devoted to the works of Saint-Saëns, Rhéné Baton conducting. On January 15, Pierné, at the Concerts-Colonne, paid a similar homage to the master's memory. At the Concerts-Lamoureux, an interesting event was the performance of an Evocation Symphonique for pianoforte and orchestra (soloist, Madame Lucie de Lausnay), by Roger de Francmesnil, a composer who died a year ago at the age of thirty-seven, and whose output comprises several good examples of chamber music.

Those who have read the articles on Charles Kœchlin recently published in the Musical Times will be particularly interested to hear that his Sonata for two flutes (a very old combination unexpectedly revived) was successfully performed at a concert of the Société Moderne d'Instruments à Vent. The whole of this concert proved particularly interesting. The other items were Mozart's Quintet for pianoforte and wind instruments; a charming Divertissement by Roussel; a quaint little Air with Variations by Rossini, for flute, clarinet, horn, and bassoon; a Rhapsody by Honegger for pianoforte, two flutes, and clarinet; a Sonata by Milhaud for pianoforte, flute, oboe, and clarinet; and three Poems by Poulenc for tenor voice and five wind instruments.

Works by Kœchlin (fifth Sonatina), Honegger (vocal excerpts from Le Roi David), Pizzetti, Schönberg, Bartók, Malipiero, Caplet (Fables de la Fontaine, well sung by Fabert, with the composer at the pianoforte), and others formed the attractive, most variegated programme of the concert of the Revue Musicale on January 21.

Music-lovers are welcoming with special gratification the reappearance of Ricardo Viñes, the peerless pianist, who has played works by Debussy, Albeniz, Mompou, and Falla at the Société Nationale, and taken part in the first performance of a Trio by E. Royer at the Société Indépendante. Other novelties performed were: at the latter Society's concert, a Trio by M. de Manziarly, a Pianoforte Quartet by Pierre Menu, and songs by Melville Smith; at that of the former, a String Quartet by R. Ziohan, a Violin Sonata by Rohozinski, and songs by Jacques de la Presle.

The last-named composer is endowed with a genuine lyric sense, in many respects akin to that of Henri Duparc, revealed not only in his songs, but in various minor instrumental works recently performed.

An excerpt of Roland Manuel's Pantomime, Isabelle et Pantalón, given at the Concerts-Colonne, proved very pleasing in its simple humour. Canteloube's Orchestral Preludes from his unpublished dramatic score Le Mas, are thoughtful and, in a quiet way, picturesque.

Other interesting concerts were those given by Miss Marguerite Babaian and Madame Laloy Babaian (old clavichord music, Armenian, Greek, Lettish, Basque, Spanish, and Norwegian folk-songs, works by Ravel, Debussy, Moussorgsky, and Stravinsky, all delightfully interpreted); a song recital by C. Hubbard, whose comprehensive programme gave sidelights on practically every aspect of contemporary French music, from Fauré and d'Indy to Honegger, Durey, and Auric; a matinée given by the Schola Cantorum, at which Marcel Labey's String Quartet, Louis de Serres's Heures Claires, and Pierre de Bréville's fine Violin Sonata were performed; a recent evening of modern music given by the Société Olénine d'Alheim; and a concert at the Salle des Agriculteurs, at which songs and a Pianoforte Trio by Raymond Lebrun were performed.

A. BOLD.

ROME

To have established a concert hall which has at once taken a foremost place in the Roman musical world, and organized two permanent quartets in connection with the same, all in the space of a year, is an achievement of which Dr. Hippolyte Golante and his helpers at the Sala Bach may well be proud. The season was opened this year with a concert by the string quartet, which played Boccherini's D major Quartet, that of Dvůrák in F major, and also gave the first performance at Rome of Sinigaglia's Quartet in D major. The vocal quartet gave its first concert on January 3 with a programme that vindicated the high aims and ideals of the singers. The scheme included three madrigals of Palestrina, one of Jan Gero, and three of Luca Marenzio.

I have had the opportunity for examining a volume of pianoforte music, Dolomenta, recently published by Dr. Golante. The compositions reveal a genuine inspiration, and a deep assimilation of the Debussyan spirit; but also they assert a personal note which maturer study and experience will doubtless intensify and elaborate.

With that genial sense of novelty which characterises his direction of the Society Amici della Musica, the noted violoncellist, Eugene Albini, interested a crowded audience on January 6, when he accompanied two 17th century airs on the viola da gamba, thus following the directions of the original MS. The airs were from Bach's St. John Passion, and Gabrielli's Clearco in Negroponte, and the singer was Ghita Lenart. The programme included songs of Alaleona, Canterini, Respighi, Pizzetti, and Castelnovo.

A second concert given by the Amici della Musica also aroused great interest, in that it presented Verdi's little-known Quartet in E minor.

Concerts have been given by Alfred Tazzoli (pianoforte), and Etrusca Degli Amadei (vocalist), and by Pachmann.

In commemoration of the sixth Dante centenary, Refici's vocal symphonic poem Transitus Dantis Poete has been given twice at the Augusteum. In the Musical Times for November I noted the success of this work at the Ravenna commemoration. At Rome it has raised a good deal of criticism, of which the gist may be said to be that, whilst demonstrating an admirable technical capacity in the composer, the work lacks that genial and melodic element which the Italian ear above all looks for. Personally I carried away the impression that it was a beautiful work of statuary—finely modelled, scintillating with light, but lacking all warmth. As to the poem (which greatly resembles the Dream of Gerontius) it has been justly pointed out that the author (Giulio Salvadori) has represented, not Dante, but an ordinary sinner who has arrived at his last hour.

Amongst the other concerts given at the Augusteum this month, that on Christmas Day was notable for the presentation of a new work by Carlo Perinello, of Trieste, who is a member of the Commission for the publication of the 'National Collection of Italian Music.' The works played on this occasion, under the direction of Bernardine Molinari, were: Glazounov's sixth Symphony, Perinello's Il Cigno morente, Zandonai's Serenata Mediceale, Berlioz's Scherzo from Romeo and Juliet, and the Finale from Götterdämmerung.

A good season is at present running at the Costanzi, which opened its doors on Boxing Day with a new opera by Richard Zandonai, Francesca da Rimini, to D'Annunzio's poem. The work had a great success, and was succeeded by Die Meistersinger and Tosca.

At the Comunale of Bologna a new opera by Franco Alfano, the director of the Conservatory, The Legend of Sakuntala, from the Indian poem of Kalidasa, who lived in the 6th century, has had a fine success and is eagerly awaited at Rome.

LEONARD PEYTON.

VIENNA

To the casual observer, Vienna must have the appearance of being the most musical of all cities. Surely it unites within its walls some of the most potent musical personalities of our era—e.g., Richard Strauss, withal the representative musician of Germany (it would, perhaps, not be superlative to add, 'and of the world'), who wields the sceptre of the Staatsoper; Felix Weingartner, a celebrated conductor of an older school, who divides his time between the justly celebrated Philharmonic scheme and the Volksoper; and the towering personality of Wilhelm Furtwängler, quickly recognised as a genius when he came here unknown about three years ago, who is the leader of the subscription series of the Tonkünstler Orchestra. Conductors like Franz Schalk and Ferdinand Löwe are still among us, revered guardians of Vienna's great musical tradition, if not brilliant orchestral leaders. And, lest we forget, let mention quickly be made, by way of contrast, of Arnold Schönberg, who is preaching musical radicalism at his newly founded Schönberg-Seminar, and himself playing the part of a musical Trotzky in his Society for the Promotion of Private Musical Performances, which is the stronghold of the city's musical extremists, and accessible only to the elect and initiated few.

Apart from these artists resident at Vienna, practically all Germany's great conductors, instrumentalists, and singers count among the frequent visitors here. Concerts have become so numerous as to necessitate the opening of not less than three new concert-halls this season, two of which are situated within the luxuriously beautiful old interior of the once Imperial Castle. In order to satisfy the onrush of artists eager for a hearing, managers have had to revert to morning musicales, noon concerts, afternoon recitals, and even to night concerts, in addition to the regular evening productions. All this might convey the impression of flourishing musical life, but for the fact that these performances are attended almost exclusively by a public which has very little in common with former Viennese audiences, that were so celebrated for their exquisite and highly-cultured taste. Average audiences at Vienna now consist largely of a more or less proletarian element of 'Schieber,' who have risen from economic and social obscurity by virtue of wealth acquired during the war and post-war periods. Their eagerness for a musical education is indeed comforting, but all too frequently artists and managers are rather inclined to cater to their taste, instead of lifting them to a higher standard. Also the fact is to be deplored that these people alone are able to afford the extremely high admission fees, while the impoverished intellectual class that built up the city's venerable culture is barred from the concert-halls.

All this applies in even greater measure to the Staatsoper. This house—which, since the 1918 revolution, has been under the management of Dr. Richard Strauss, in conjunction with Franz Schalk—is gradually assuming the character of a place of merely superficial amusement for the wealthy classes, and for those nouveaux riches whose taste is all too often heeded by the management. The once perfect ensemble of the theatre has become practically disorganized, owing to a strong preference on the part of the directors for 'guest' singers whose mission is sensationalism, while some of the finest artists of the theatre are enjoying involuntary leisure. The consequent enormous outlay constantly increases the deficit of the Staatsoper, which now amounts to well over a hundred million crowns annually. This deficit is covered by the State. Ultimately it has to be defrayed by the populace, in the shape of tremendously high taxes. Thus is witnessed the grotesque spectacle of a bankrupt State that, unable to supply its population with necessary food, yet lavishly supports what purports to be a national institution, but in fact is a luxurious resort benefiting a privileged class or casual visitors from abroad. The expenses of maintenance fall upon a majority of the State's best citizens, whose lot it is to be excluded from ever hearing the performances, on account of the exorbitant fees of admission, whose increase grows with the accumulating deficit.

An attempt has been made quite recently to increase receipts by adapting the beautiful Redoutensaal of the Imperial Castle for performances of works of a more intimate character. By running two houses it was hoped that the Staatsoper would be able to dispose of its surplus of singers, and thus effect an economy. Many millions of crowns were devoted to the adaptation of the hall, but after a few performances of the Marriage of Figaro it was found that the new house also was accumulating heavy financial loss; Vienna opera-goers refused to pay the high prices necessitated by the small seating capacity of the theatre. For this reason, and for lack of a suitable repertoire, it was soon closed for an indefinite period. Thus did an ill-prepared and costly venture find a fitting end. The troubles of the Staatsoper can be remedied only by a complete change of policy. When the management has decided to reduce its numerous artistic personnel, a large proportion of which is practically unemployed and at any rate superfluous, expenses will be lowered and prices will respond.

The purely artistic aspects of the Staatsoper, too, are not at all satisfactory. The 'guest' habit already referred to has completely demoralised the repertoire, which is now arranged according to the whims of visiting stars. Performances of Wagner, Mozart, and masters of all nationalities frequently reveal an utter lack of discipline. Perfection distinguishes the presentation of Richard Strauss's own works, which bulk largely in the programmes, but other contemporary composers receive scant attention from the directorate, with the possible exception of Puccini's all-too-pleasing operas and the works of Erich Wolfgang Korngold, which, though doubtless effective thrillers, cannot possibly be said to represent present-day operatic tendencies. Schreker, Pfitzner, Braunfels, Busoni, the modern Italians, Debussy, Dukas, Charpentier, and Moussorgsky, are conspicuous by their absence. This season's output of novelties has been pitifully poor, consisting so far of Wilhelm Kienzl's mildly entertaining opera Kuhreigen, already familiar from former presentations at the Vienna Volksoper; Franz Schreker's Schatzgräber, accepted and rehearsed by the Staatsoper with apparent reluctance, and indefinitely postponed one week prior to the date scheduled for its première; and director Strauss's own ballet, Josefslegende, the only novelty of the current season, which is to be produced in the spring.

PAUL BECHERT.

Miscellaneous

A LONDON VIOLIN-MAKER

An interesting gathering of string-players and violin-makers took place at the Edric Hall, S.E., on December 10, when a trial Chamber concert, arranged by Mr. James Brown, was given in order to exhibit the qualities possessed by the stringed instruments made by Mr. William Robinson, of Plumstead. During the interval Mr. Brown gave an account of his first acquaintance with a Robinson fiddle at the house of the distinguished amateur, Mr. W. W. Cobbett, where one of the new violins was tried against a J. Guarnerius and a Strad. Besides solos and quartets by the Dunstable String Quartet (Mr. Brown, Misses K. Easton and H. Milne, and Mr. Sebastian Brown), a fine performance of two solos on a Robinson violin was given by M. Godowsky. As a concourse of players and makers the occasion was probably unique, and may lead to developments.

The Havant Choral Society began its season well, on December 14, with capital performances of Stanford's The Revenge and Songs of the Fleet. The solos in the latter were sung by Mr. A. Wigglesworth, of Chichester Cathedral. The instrumental items included Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto (Miss I. Spurgeon) and violoncello solos by Miss Marjorie Alcock. Mr. R. T. Carraway conducted.

Can any of our readers tell us of a London musical club for membership of which a young organist and pianist of eighteen would be eligible?

The Incorporated Society of Musicians held a conference at University College on January 4 and 5, its annual general meeting on January 6, and gave a chamber concert at Queen's Hall. The subjects dealt with were 'Education and Teaching,' by Lieut.-Col. Sir Theodore Morison, Principal of Armstrong College, 'The Musician in the School,' by Mr. Robert McLeod, 'Army Bands and Bandmasters,' by Col. J. C. Somerville, and 'Scriabin,' by Mr. Herbert Antcliffe.

At the Smetana Hall, Prague, on January 5, a memorable concert of British music was given before a large audience. Under Mr. Adrian C. Boult the Czech Philharmonic Orchestra played Elgar's second Symphony and shorter works by Butterworth and Bliss. What delighted the audience most of all, however, was (according to the Prague correspondent of the Morning Post) the singing of madrigals and folk-songs by the 'English Singers.'

The Society of Women Musicians announces that a programme of its members' works will be performed at the Incorporated Society of Musicians' Concert on February 11.

As a great many advertisements arrive too late for insertion, we shall in future announce the latest date on which they can be received for the ensuing number. (The date varies slightly from month to month.) For the March issue they should reach us not later than February 17. Advertisements and correspondence relating thereto should be addressed, not to the Editor, but to the Advertisement Manager, Musical Times, 100, Wardour Street, W. 1.

CONTENTS

	Page
British Players and Singers II.—Albert Sammons (with Special Portrait)	83
The Emmanuel Moor Pianoforte. By Ernest Newman	85
A Note on the Mind's Ear. By Philip Heseltine	88
Saint-Saëns as I knew him. By Herman Klein	90
Stravinsky and Pure Music. By Basil Maine	93
There and Here: A Retrospect and Comparison. By M. D. Calvocelessi	94
New Light on Early Tudor Composers. XXIV.—Thomas Appleby. By W. H. Grattan Flood	97
The Curse of the Concert Programme. By Robert Lorenz	98
Some Innovations in Criticism	99
Occasional Notes	100
The Musician's Bookshelf	103
New Music	112
Gramophone Notes. By 'Discus'	114
London Concerts	115
Opera in London	117
Chamber Music for Amateurs	117
Church and Organ Music	118
Royal College of Organists	118
The Organs of Lambeth Parish Church. By Andrew Freeman (Illustrated)	119
Letters to the Editor	123
Sixty Years Ago	125
Sharps and Flats	125
Obituary	126
Royal College of Music	126
Trinity College of Music	126
The Music of Ancient Egypt	127
The Quarterlies	127
Music in the Provinces	128
Musical Notes from Abroad	130
Miscellaneous	133

MUSIC:

Come, and let us return. Anthem for Lieut. By G. M. GARRETT 107

THREE EXTRA SUPPLEMENTS are given with this Number:

1. Portrait of Albert Sammons.
2. Now is come Salvation. Anthem for Easter. By Percy E. Fletcher.
3. Competition Festival Record.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

CHARGES FOR ADVERTISEMENTS:—

	£	s.	d.
Two Lines	0 3 0
Three Lines	0 3 4
For every additional Line	0 0 10
One inch (displayed)	0 10 0
Half a Column	2 0 0
A Column	4 0 0
A Page	7 10 0

Special Pages (Cover, &c.) by arrangement.

A remittance should be sent with every Advertisement.

DURING THE LAST MONTH.

Published by NOVELLO & CO., LIMITED.

BYRD, W.—"Not unto us" (Non nobis Domine). A.T.B. or S.S.B. Staff Notation and Tonic Sol-fa. (No. 1065, Novello's Parish Choir Book.) 2d.

FLETCHER, P. E.—"Now is come Salvation." Easter Anthem. (No. 1094, Novello's Octavo Anthems.) 4d.

GARRATT, G. M.—"Come, and let us return." Anthem for Lent, from "Thus saith the Lord." (No. 948, The Musical Times.) 2d.

GERMAN, EDWARD.—"Shepherds' Dance." Accompaniment for Two-part song: 1st Violin, 8d.; 2nd Violin, 8d.; Viola, 8d.; Cello, 8d.; Bass, 4d.; Wind Parts, 4s. 4d.

— "The Three Knights." Part-song. Arranged for T.T.B.B. by the Composer. (No. 576, The Orpheus.) 4d.

GILES, ARTHUR E.—"Noble Heroes round his grave." A War Elegy. For Mixed Voices. 2d.

— "The Song of Peace." A Christmas Carol. 1½d.

HARWOOD, BASIL.—"Missa de Angelis." Adapted from the version in the Solesmes Gradual. Voice Part only. (No. 835a, Novello's Parish Choir Book.) 3d.

MACKENZIE, A. C.—"Distant Chimes." Op. 80. For Violin and Pianoforte. 3s.

MASSON, ROBERT.—Two Songs: "Love in the Woods" and "Pale Roses." For High Voice. 2s.

— "A Message." Song. 2s.

SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW, No. 356.—"The Flower Barrow." Unison Song. By ETHEL BOYCE. 2d.

SCHOOL SONGS. Published in two forms. A. Voice Parts in Staff and Tonic Sol-fa Notations, with Pianoforte Accompaniment (8vo). B. Voice Parts only, in Tonic Sol-fa Notation. A. B.

No. 850. "O come, do not delay." From "The Marriage of Figaro." MOZART 2d. —

No. 852. "The Violet." Unison Song. MOZART 2d. —

No. 853. "Gentle Flowers in the Dew." From "Faust." GOUNOD 4d. —

No. 854. "Jerusalem." From St. Paul. MENDELSSOHN 2d. —

No. 855. "The Gentle Touch." Unison Song. H. GOETZ 1½d. —

SPRINGETT, REV. CANON.—"By the grave where Jesu sleepeth." 2d.

TONIC SOL-FA PUBLICATIONS:

BAUGH, J. S.—"Jesu Dyrchafedig" (Jesu meine Freude). Welsh Words. 1s.

TONIC SOL-FA SERIES:

No. 2377. "My soul truly waiteth." Chorus. G. F. COBB 3d.

VESPER HYMNS.—Twelve Vesper Hymns by various composers. (No. 1064, Novello's Parish Choir Book.) 1s.

PUBLISHED DURING DECEMBER.

THAYER, A. W.—"Life of Beethoven." Edited by H. E. KREMBEL. Three Volumes. Cloth, £5 5s. net.

PUBLISHED FOR

THE H. W. GRAY CO., NEW YORK.

CLOKEY, J. W.—"Dawn." Song. 60 cents (2s. 6d.).

GARRATT, F. T.—"Meditation." For String Quartet, Harp, and Organ or Violin, Violoncello, Harp, and Organ. $3 (12s. 6d.).

RUSS, H. H.—"The Night-dance." Intermezzo. For Female Chorus. 20 cents (10d.).

LUTKIN, P. C.—"Cargoes." Part-song for Mixed Voices. 12 cents (6d.).

MATTHEWS, H. A.—"Benedictus Domine." For Mixed Voices. 12 cents (6d.).

SPELMAN, T. M.—"Christ and the blind man." A Symphonic Poem for Orchestra. Full Score, $5.

No. 949

THE

MAR 14 1922

MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED 1844

MARCH 1, 1922

Price 6d.

SPENCER PIANOS

GRANDS ▽ UPRIGHTS ▽ PLAYERS

Sole Agents

MURDOCH MURDOCH & CO

Piano & Player Piano Experts

461 & 463 OXFORD STREET

And at BRIGHTON · PORTSMOUTH · SOUTHAMPTON
FOLKESTONE · DOVER · CHATHAM
BIRMINGHAM · CAMBRIDGE

ARCHIBALD RAMSDEN LTD.

PATENT THREE COMPARTMENT TOP LID FOR GRAND PIANOS

We have already fitted over

1000 PIANOS

by most of the leading makers with this New Device.

Kindly send for Booklet giving particulars.

CECILIAN HOUSE,
65, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON.
12, Park Row, LEEDS.

Patented in AMERICA - FRANCE - GERMANY.

FOUNDED
1837.

AGENTS
THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

GRANDS-UPRIGHTS.

AWARDS

for Good

Tone:

LONDON - - - 1851
PARIS - - - 1867
LIMA - - - 1872
CHRISTCHURCH
N.Z. 1882
LONDON - - - 1885

PLAYER-PIANOS.

Showrooms: 60, WIGMORE STREET, W.1. 'Phone; Langham 1418.
FACTORIES - - - LEIGHTON ROAD, KENTISH TOWN, LONDON, N.W.5.

ESTEY ORGANS ESTEY PIANOS

ONLY ONE GRADE OF EACH.
THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE.

Largest Stock of Organs in the World.

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE POST FREE. CORRESPONDENCE INVITED.

Telephone: Museum 1817.

Telegrams: "ESTEY OX. LONDON."

Estey Organ Co.

- 12 -

RATHBONE PLACE,

OXFORD STREET,

LONDON, W. 1.

TWELVE NUMBERS NOW READY.

Historical Songs and Ballads of Ireland

ARRANGED BY

HERBERT HUGHES.

SILENT, O MOYLE
KITTY OF COLERAINE
THE DEAR LITTLE SHAMROCK
THE WIDOW MALONE
THE WIND THAT SHAKES THE BARLEY
RORY O'MORE

SHE IS FAR FROM THE LAND
THE LOW-BACKED CAR
GENERAL MUNROE
THE WINDING BANKS OF ERNE
THE BARD'S LEGACY
ERIN, THE TEAR AND THE SMILE

Price, 2s. each net.

METZLER TRIO SERIES

(Trios for All.)

FOR PIANO, VIOLIN, AND VIOLONCELLO. PRICE 1s. NET, EACH TRIO.

(Extra parts may be had for 1st violin, 2nd violin, 'cello, bass, and harmonium, price 4d. net, each.)

20 celebrated familiar numbers easily arranged for Cinemas, Restaurants, and for use in the HOME CIRCLE.

METZLER & CO. (1920), LTD.,

(ESTABLISHED 1788.)

142, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.2.

Reproduced from a Photograph by Instead, Conduit Street, II.

LIONEL TERTIS

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

MARCH 1 1922

BRITISH PLAYERS AND SINGERS

III.—LIONEL TERTIS

BY EDWIN EVANS

It is a perennial subject of discussion, especially in theatrical circles, as to whether the performer or interpreter can legitimately claim credit for creative work—whether for instance the great actor who infuses life into a character is not something more than the interpreter of the dramatist. Actors as a rule have not been slow to advance such claims, and to regard such a part as being more of their own making than the author's. In music there is a better sense of proportion. Performers may have their little vanities, but it does not commonly occur to them to claim a sonata as their own because they played it well. Yet there is a point at which the interpretative artist may merge into the creative without being himself a composer—we might even say preferably not being a composer, judging by our knowledge of those who were performers first and composers afterwards. They become creative artists when they so influence the medium of their interpretation as to revolutionise its possibilities, and so broaden the outlook of their art that it furnishes a new incentive and a new impulse to creative effort. In the whole history of music such performers have been rare. Every instrument in turn has owed far more to composers than even indirectly to virtuosi as such. But there occurs occasionally an exception. There arises a player whose convictions turn to idealism, and whose sense of artistic responsibility develops into a mission. They then become, as it were, apostles, whose gospel is carried far and wide, gathering converts on its way. To this sparse category of players belongs Lionel Tertis.

We need not be very old to remember the days when the viola desks in the orchestra were a haven of refuge for those who had failed to satisfy the more exacting standard enforced from violinists, and when the majority of composers wrote accordingly for the viola, treating it as an ancillary instrument, useful to complete the harmony, but being careful to avoid saddling it with much responsibility, as they were well aware in those days of the risk involved. There were exceptions, and they acquired prominence as such. When Berlioz or Liszt employed the viola as a solo instrument in a symphony, it was a much discussed incident of the day, and Rubinstein's Viola Sonata remained for many years almost an isolated work. Even in the string quartet, the viola was rarely treated as an equal partner, though the best players of the instrument were naturally attracted to chamber music. The actual writing for the viola was kept within narrow limits. Scarcely any use was made of its upper register, and technical difficulties were avoided so far as possible. Moreover, just as there were few players, there were also few teachers. If a student took up the viola, he generally had to take lessons from a professor of some other stringed instrument, who regarded this one as a subordinate section of his own sphere of activities. In short, it was a kind of Cinderella of the string family, admitted on sufferance to the august society of violin and violoncello.

If all that is now changed the credit, so far as this country is concerned, is due to the influence which Lionel Tertis's playing has exercised upon the fortunes of his instrument. Not only have other players been inspired by his example, with the result that the general standard of technique has been raised, but composers have learned to view the instrument from a new angle, exploiting its possibilities in a manner that a generation ago would have been regarded as foolhardy. In all Europe there has been a progressive tendency to develop the individual qualities of every instrument, and of the viola with the rest, but it is in England that a special literature has grown round the instrument, and that it has acquired the most importance in concerted music. It is only in the last few years that the viola has received corresponding attention on the Continent, and even now our foreign visitors readily admit, on hearing Tertis, that in this field we have stolen a march upon them. So far as his mission is concerned, he is now preaching to the converted, for there can scarcely remain many musicians whom his playing has not convinced, and we have quite a number of players of the foremost rank. Moreover, he has made us critical, and the viola is no longer a cloak for incompetence. Even in second-rate orchestras it is usually played as proficiently as the other instruments. To those whose experience of music has been gained in the last dozen years or so it may even seem strange that we should mention this. But it is not easy to forget the toneless scrapings and scratchings that were heard twenty years ago.

Lionel Tertis was born at West Hartlepool in December, 1876, and was brought to London when he was three years old. As he revisited the town for the first time last year to play at a Melba concert, arriving at night in a dense fog, and leaving early next day in torrents of rain, his memories of his birthplace consist chiefly of fog, blazing furnaces, and an over-heated concert-room. At the age of five and a half he began to study the pianoforte with a German professor, and he remembers playing a Tarantella by Stephen Heller at a concert-hall in Highbury at the age of seven. Still more vividly does he recall the pride with which he donned for the occasion a wonderful new velvet suit with a lace collar. He adds:

'Another episode is imprinted on my memory: I was playing duets with my teacher one day, and there was a passage in which his right hand and my left were note to note. It was an exciting passage, fortissimo. I made a dash for my part, and the result was a fearful howl from the professor. I had missed my note and, my nails being rather long at the time, I had dug a lump out of his little finger. I remember the precautions he took whenever we played duets after that.'

He continued working at the pianoforte, generally without a teacher, as the available funds did not suffice to provide one. From the age of twelve he began to develop ambitions, one of which was to attend a musical institution. He scanned the advertisements of the musical papers, and was fortunate enough to secure employment as an accompanist for a few months, during which he saved sufficient to study for a time at Trinity College, London. He remembers playing a good many concertos with the orchestra there, but confesses that by that time he did not care much for the pianoforte, which was too mechanical for his taste. His parents, however, were very keen on his becoming a pianist, and he recalls that his mother used to lock him in a room to make him work. He practised from six to eight hours daily, loathing it more and more, and he often substituted a novel on the desk in order to read, whilst making a more or less musical noise with his hands on the keyboard to deceive the parental authority.

His stay at Trinity College was not a long one, for he was soon compelled to resume earning his living. In fact, he describes his musical training as having been acquired in spasms. Among the engagements he filled between the ages of thirteen and fifteen, there was one as pianist with the Southend Pier Orchestra and another at Scarborough for which, he relates, he had to disguise himself as a brigand. At least that is what he looked like. In reality he became a member of a so-called Hungarian band, as was the custom in those unregenerate days. This, and other engagements of the same kind, enabled him not only to live but to put by a little with a view to continuing his musical education.

It was during this period that he definitely gave up practising the pianoforte and turned to the violin. He began with the usual spasmodic lessons from a very bad teacher whom he soon gave up in order to continue by himself. At about sixteen years of age he had saved enough to realise what he had always regarded as the wildest possible flight of ambition. He went to Leipzig, and took up the violin as his principal study. He says that he had the bad luck to be put under a professor who was a philatelist, and thought more of his collection than of his pupil. The lessons took place in a very large room, in a remote corner of which the professor would be playing with his stamps, while Tertis was supposed to be profiting by his guidance. 'However, I heard a lot of good music there, especially at the Gewandhaus concerts, which did me a lot of good.' On returning to London he played to Sir Alexander Mackenzie, whose report was so good that it enabled him to obtain support with which to continue his studies, and he entered the Royal Academy of Music. It was here that he reached the turning-point of his career. A fellow student was very keen on quartet playing, but there arose the usual difficulty—at that time—of discovering a viola player. There were hardly any to be found, and most of these were discouragingly bad. Tertis was asked if he would learn the clef and play the viola in the quartet. He consented, thinking it would be 'good fun,' and in three weeks he took part in a quartet at an Academy concert, at the conclusion of which Sir Alexander Mackenzie assured him that he would never regret having taken up the viola. It was a true prophecy, for he declares to-day that he has never regretted it, in spite of the uphill fight, which is by no means over. 'From the moment I played the first note on it, I loved it. It has always appealed to me as more human in expression than the violin.'

He studied at the Academy for a few terms, at intervals, with a professor of the violin, there being none of the viola in those days. Eventually he dispensed with a teacher altogether and went ahead unaided. As there was scarcely any music then for viola except the inevitable Harold in Italy of Berlioz, for which Tertis has no liking, he played violin concertos and all kinds of violin pieces, on the viola. Among other works he played the Mendelssohn and Wieniawski Concertos at the Academy Fortnightly concerts, and attracted so much attention that he was appointed professor of the viola at the Academy, where he taught for many years.

'Before I go further I would like to say how much I am indebted to my harmony professor there, Mr. Frederick Corder. I shall never forget his unfailing kindness, sympathy, and help in all my struggles, and there are many students who would say the same. We all owe him much gratitude, and the Academy is indeed fortunate to have him.

'However, I left the Academy, perhaps because I felt that I was not making enough headway, and I launched out as a fully-fledged solo player of the viola. I gave lots of recitals, but the prejudice I came up against was extraordinary. Everybody seemed to be up in arms at my daring to play solos on the viola. They declared that it was never meant to be, and never could be, a solo instrument, and more in the same strain. I was made to feel almost that I was doing something criminal. However, I have managed to live that down, and the public in general is at last beginning to take more kindly to the viola. It is still much neglected as a solo instrument, but I hope that some day it will find its rightful position as such. But of course there are great difficulties in the way.'

The first of these difficulties, according to Tertis, is the dearth of viola literature. At present the limited prospects of a viola work are such that he considers it almost philanthropy for an eminent composer to write one. He has had definite promises, so far unfulfilled, from Delius, Ravel, and Glazounov, to write works for viola with orchestra, and he tells me that if one of them would keep his word, it would advance the viola twenty-five years in a night. He is too modest. He has done that much himself, perhaps not in a night, but certainly by the series of recitals with which he attracted attention to the viola when he entered upon his career as its missionary. And, as for the dearth of literature, his influence on composers has done much to relieve it, as may be gathered from the following list of works, the majority of which were directly due to the incentive supplied by his magnificent playing :

VIOLA AND ORCHESTRA

Romance and Finale from Suite	...	B. J. Dale
Concerto	...	York Bowen
Concerto	...	J. B. McEwen
Concerto	...	A. Carse
Concerto	...	Arnold Bax

VIOLA AND PIANOFORTE

Two Sonatas	...	York Bowen
Sonata	...	Ernest Walker
Sonata	...	W. H. Bell
An Arab Love Song	...	W. H. Bell
Concert Piece	...	Arnold Bax
Sonata (just completed)	...	Arnold Bax
Suite	...	B. J. Dale
Phantasy	...	B. J. Dale
Two pieces	...	H. Farjeon
Fantasia	...	Cyril Scott
Two pieces	...	Frank Bridge

OTHER WORKS

Duet for two violas	...	Frank Bridge
Romance for viola and organ	...	York Bowen
Poem for viola, harp, and organ	...	York Bowen
Fantasy Quartet for four violas	...	York Bowen
Sextet for six violas	...	B. J. Dale
Nocturne for viola, oboe d'amore, and pianoforte	...	Josef Holbrooke

The above does not profess to be complete, but it will suffice to show that the difficulty presented by the paucity of available works is no longer so great as it was before Tertis appeared on the scene. The other difficulty to which he referred at our interview is more serious. It is that of getting viola works published. It required some years to induce English publishers to take a broader view of their responsibilities and include in their catalogues works of art as well as potential best-sellers. They are no longer exposed to the reproach that it was of no use to offer them anything but a drawing-room ballad or an anthem. In fact, to-day the difficulty of getting good music published in England is not much greater than it is on the Continent. But even for a string quartet, which it was until recently considered philanthropy to publish, there are many more buyers than there are for a viola concerto or sonata. There is therefore some excuse if publishers are a little reluctant. The only way in which this difficulty can be overcome is by appealing to a wider body of buyers. There may not be enough viola players in this country to make such a work commercially feasible. But in the whole of Europe and America there must be a sufficient number, and the chief difficulty is that of reaching them.

A third difficulty was mentioned, that of persuading the organizers of orchestral concerts to accept viola concertos for performance; but as this difficulty affects more or less all contemporary music, Tertis is not entitled to claim it specially for his instrument.

In spite of these difficulties, the viola and its champion have made wonderful progress in recent years, and it is not surprising that Tertis feels encouraged to go on. 'After all,' he says, 'the great thing is to have an object in life, and here is one. But I wish there were a dozen others besides myself pursuing it.' One of his many suggestions is that composers should make a more frequent use of the viola as an obbligato to the voice. He claims that the effect is much better than with any other stringed instrument, the peculiar timbre of the viola, and especially its middle register, being so much more suitable.

Finally, Tertis offers some valuable advice to aspirants. His first counsel is, 'Don't play on a viola the body of which is less than 16½-in. long. An instrument which is less than 16¼-in. in length does not give the true viola tone. It is neither a violin nor a viola. It is a mongrel, and there are far too many of them about.'

The next maxim is, 'Don't restrict your playing to the third and fourth positions and thereabouts. The reason why most violas do not sound well in the higher position is because players do not practise up there, and the vibrations are, so to speak, rusty. So don't be afraid of climbing well up the finger-board.'

With these two maxims we will part company from Lionel Tertis, but not without a final tribute to the success that has so far attended his mission—a success that is much greater than he appears to believe, for it is not by numbers that we judge the progress of such movements as that which he initiated. It may be that the viola has not yet struck the public imagination in such a way as to ensure a crowded hall, even for so brilliant a player as Tertis himself. The viola player is not yet a fashionable virtuoso. But it is no small thing to have achieved that the musical world of to-day has a completely different conception of the tone-quality and the capabilities of the viola from that which was current at the time he began his campaign. Consciously or not, we all—commencing with composers—think more sympathetically of the viola than ever before, and we are only too ready to concede the claims that Tertis urges on its behalf, especially when they have the support of his own playing, than which there could be no better argument.

MADRIGALISTS AND LUTENISTS

By SYLVIA TOWNSEND WARNER

The explorer of new country would seem to be the ideal person to write the guide-book of it. Yet the catalogue of guide-books contains few instances of this happy conjunction. Either he has the exploratory temperament too strongly developed to want to spend time describing the known when so much unknown yet stretches before him, or he has grown taciturn in his solitary wanderings and indifferent to those who by character or circumstance cannot be more than subsequent tourists, or he does not survive to complete his explorations or to recount them for the service of others. Every subject has its unknown lands, and there lie the bones of lost pioneers, their specimens scattered, their day-books obliterated, their charts blown to the winds.

There is no more distinguished living explorer of the music of the past than the Rev. E. H. Fellowes, Mus. D., and his recent book* should be welcomed, not only for its merit, but as a sign that his project of scoring the complete works of the English Madrigal and Lutenist composers is so near completion as to permit of the writing of the guide-book. The extent of Dr. Fellowes's work may be gauged from the fact that between 1588 and 1627 forty-three sets of Madrigals were published, the average number of Madrigals in a set being over twenty, besides the thirty odd sets of Lutenist Ayres. Its value can be appreciated only by those who know something of the music contained in these sets; and the more they know of it, the deeper will their appreciation be. And it is to be hoped that Dr. Fellowes's authoritative and delightful book, with its wealth of musical illustrations, will induce those readers to whom its subject is a new one to turn to his editions† of the Madrigalists and Lutenists, and profit by them.

I suppose few of us would admit to knowing nothing of the Madrigalists, who have long been a legend and are now becoming a fashion. Morley, Wilbye, Gibbons, are names quoted often enough when a defence of English music is called for. But how many of those who quote their names could whistle a phrase from one of their compositions? Even the legend of the Madrigalists is deficient. It commemorates but half their achievement, and that not the most significant half. A Madrigal, even if the technical peculiarities of independent part-writing, imitative development, and rhythmical freedom which distinguish it from the part-song are recognised, is commonly thought of as something light in style and in subject, dexterous, and pleasing to the ear, and little more. It does not seem to have occurred to the people who, only acknowledging our Madrigal school in this aspect, yet boast of it as one of the glories of the Elizabethan age, that no musicians really representative of that age when men essayed new worlds in deed and thought would have been content to expend their talent in the expression of an unvarying, complaisant gaiety. It is a curious comment on our self-effacing snobbishness in matters of art that this legendary definition of the Madrigal is far more applicable to Italian examples than to native; though even so it is inadequate. The etymology of the word has long been in dispute. In a very interesting chapter Dr. Fellowes deals with the various theories as to its origin, and cites as conclusive the opinion of Signor Leandro Biadene that the term is derived from the neo-latin matricialis. This adjective had the sense of maternal. Thus a Madrigal was a song in the mother-tongue, a song of the people, and became, in the hands of the poet and musician a song about the people. The burden of the song, as of most songs, was love; and rustic loves, refined by the fashionable respect for classical models into pastoral idylls, were the staple subject for the madrigalist, a subject whose slight artificiality, due to its refinement, forbade too serious a musical treatment.

This was the model, admirable in technical treatment, but a little shallow in import, which our composers worked from, and departed from in their search after greater variety and greater veracity. The finest examples of the Italianate Madrigal will be found among the Triumphs of Oriana, a collection of Madrigals in honour of Queen Elizabeth by leading composers of the day, the idea of which was taken from the Italian Il Trionfo di Dori. The circumstances that made them splendid also inclined them to be formal; and Dr. Fellowes suggests that their picturesque origin has made subsequent opinion attach undue importance to them, and that this may be one of the reasons for the popular misconception of the English Madrigal. Thomas Morley, the editor of this collection, edited also two books of selected Italian Madrigals fitted with English words, and testifies in his Plaine and Easie Introduction to his admiration for Italian writers.

Some of his works are cast in the traditional mould, and the general impression made by his writings is one of easy charm and lightheartedness. But he could be serious and moving when the occasion demanded it, and his music is specially noteworthy for that chequering of grave and gay which in his definition of the Madrigal he seizes upon as an essential characteristic:

'you must possess yourself with an amorous humor . . . in your musick be wavering like the wind, sometime wanton, sometime drooping, sometime grave and staide, othertime effeminat.'

A typical example of Morley's sensitiveness to the change of mood is the passage 'Alas, my dear, why weep she?' in Arise, get up, my dear. The whole thing is past in a moment. It has exactly the value of a chance inflection of condolence overheard in a tumult of merry voices, and yet, coming where it does, it makes the Madrigal memorable,

* The English Madrigal Composers. Edmund Horace Fellowes. (Clarendon Press.)

† The English Madrigal School. (Stainer & Bell.) The English School of Lutenist Song-Writers. (Winthrop Rogers.)

not only as a piece of brilliant vivacity, but as an expression of personality. Morley delights in the human touch. His shepherds and shepherdesses are very near the real thing, the shepherdesses especially, minxes sketched with an ambiguous cross-rhythm. He excels in crowds, country gatherings, bean-feasts, and in the alertness and raciness of his treatment of such subjects, and in his choice of them, he shows that sincerity and vivid sense of life which mark the English Madrigal.

There is a real difference between gay music, and music expressing gaiety. If the examples of gay music be considered, it will be found that they are instrumental, and that the better they are, the more purely instrumental they become, like the harpsichord exercises of Domenico Scarlatti. If the attempt be made to write this sort of music for voices, it generally defeats its own ends. The reason is not far to seek. Harpsichord, violin, bruiteurs, are made for the purpose of sounding. The voice, even in its early developments of grunt and squeak, is made to express, to convey. To disregard this is to disregard the one universal canon of all art, consideration of the medium, which ordains that stone should be treated as stone and not as butter or butter muslin; that horns should be treated as horns, and not as a kind of treacle to glue the orchestra together with; that bricks are unsuitable for Gothic pinnacles, and triplets for National Anthems. All canons, however, call for a little disrespect, and to write for voices in the instrumental manner is from its very difficulty a tempting adventure. The 16th century saw the development of every side of vocal writing. Nothing has been done since that was not foreshadowed then, and the instrumental manner of writing for voices was practised in the earlier decades of that century with extraordinary success. But the reason of this very success is that the nature of the medium was not forgotten. However instrumental it may be in its disregard of words and of what we now call vocal limitations, it is still vocal in being expressive, though what it expresses is no explicit emotion, but sonority, the moving joy of making a noise. This style had reached its culmination before the beginning of the Madrigal school. It bequeathed to it, though not directly, the legacy of every successful experiment—an increase in technical resources, but nothing else. From the first beginnings of that school, the sound is made for the sake of the sense. Its aim was to express, and to express as closely and variously as possible. The range is astonishing. It runs from the airy lightness of On the plains (Weelkes) to the nobility of What is this life? (Gibbons). Whatever the mood, for almost every shade in it we can find a corresponding Madrigal. Be it humour, there is the animal spirits of Come, follow me (Bateson), the wit of Though Amaryllis dance in green (Byrd), the downright satire of Ay me, alas, heigh-ho (Weelkes). Be it grief, there is the plaintive tenderness of Oh grief, even on the bud (Morley) or the Byrd Lullaby, the passion of Oft have I vowed (Wilbye), the pathos of Weep, Oh mine eyes (Wilbye), or Dainty fine bird (Gibbons); while the coupled Oh care, thou wilt despatch me and Hence, care! thou art too cruel (Weelkes) are an anatomy of melancholy. There are Madrigals about spring and nature, about hunting, morris-dancing, wedding festivities, about music and the wonders of foreign lands, and one, a magnificent example, about the flight of birds; there are ethical Madrigals and elegies,—all these, besides those dealing with the subject of the Madrigal proper, love and the 'amorous humor.'

This variety and interest of content is equalled by the variety and interest of workmanship. The madrigalists had at their disposal technical resources which had been accruing throughout the century. They inherited the tradition of the boldness and vitality which marked the earlier stages of English polyphony, and the feeling for purity and economy of means which later stages had added to it. Hitherto these resources had been chiefly employed and developed in the writing of Church music. Secular music exacted certain changes, the modification of some features, the accentuation of others: but the standard of workmanship was not lowered. In some ways it was enhanced. The personal nature of the Madrigal as opposed to the impersonality of Church music called for greater incisiveness of rhythm, greater variety of texture, and gave new opportunities for harmonic experiment—above all, the setting of secular words allowed for, even demanded a clearer and closer expressiveness. In this matter the madrigalists displayed an inexhaustible fertility and subtlety. Nothing escaped them. The triple measure which accompanies the mention of 'Trinacrian Ætna' in Thule, the period of Cosmography (Weelkes) 'borders upon the 'conceit' so dear to the Elizabethan mind. But the 'flying fishes' in the second half of this Madrigal are set to a rapid flickering phrase which is a perfect example of how far realistic representation should go in music, and the opening with its long-drawn, lonely semibreves is in its coldness and remoteness the response in music of an intensely sensitive imagination to the idea of Thule, the limit of exploration, the enigmatic frozen North. A similar response to another geographical suggestion, a response very characteristic of an age that fed on traveller's tales and witnessed the launching of the 'Golden Hind' and the 'Edward Bonaventure,' occurs in O fools, can ye not see a traffic? where the mention of the South Seas prompts Wilbye to introduce smooth overlapping phrases, rising and falling like lazy waves. The danger of detailing strokes such as these is that the reader who does not know the madrigalists may be misled into supposing that they spotted their work all over with dabs of realism. He should discover for himself how subtle, how briefly-touched and quitted these allusive passages are, and how discreetly and naturally they are woven into the texture of the whole. So much so, indeed, that there is a contrary danger that if they be not pointed out to him, this reader—whom I so hopefully assume will be sufficiently sceptical of my statements to verify them by referring to my subject-matter—may not notice them at all. I do not want to insult his intelligence. I know I am always finding new instances of this delicate ingenuity in Madrigals with which I had imagined myself fairly familiar. Nor is this feeling for illustrative treatment which is so significant a feature of the madrigalists' technique always confined to musical passages referring directly to the words. So surely was it used, so profoundly was it part of their idiom, that it enabled them by allusions to previous musical material and the ideas associated with it to achieve something that might be compared to the symphonic development of Beethoven, or, more nearly, to the symbolic development of Bach. Dr. Fellowes on page 216 of his book gives an example of this allusiveness from Wilbye's Oft have I vowed which shows how closely the texture of these works should be examined to appreciate to the full the care and reticent skill which made them. Equally subtle, and much further, removed is the allusion to the opening of O care, thou wilt despatch me in the opening of the second half of the Madrigal Hence, care! thou art too cruel, where the revolt against overwhelming sorrow implied in the words is illustrated by the thrusting up of the drooping E flat of the first opening into that unforgettable E natural which transforms the whole passage and gives rise to the amazing modulations which follow. Both passages are quoted by Dr. Fellowes, who gives a valuable analysis of the whole Madrigal, which even if it alone of his works had survived would suffice to stamp Weelkes as a composer of the greatest power and originality.

(To be continued.)

THE STRAVINSKY THEORIES

BY EDWARD MITCHELL

One of the most surprising features in connection with the recent Stravinsky offensive has been the singular inability of his chief protagonists to think right out the problem raised by his latest productions, and to see clearly whither the theories upon which they are based must inevitably lead him. Discussion, too, has centred largely round the Rite of Spring, and it does not seem to have been generally realised that Stravinsky's theories are better to be tested by reference to the Symphony for Wind Instruments. For one thing, it has no titular associations, and, secondly, it is a much later work. Embodying as it does those ideas which Stravinsky is said to have been evolving ever since he set out on his career as composer, it enables us to assess their value with some degree of certainty.

Before proceeding further, however, I feel impelled to express a doubt concerning the composer's intellectual honesty, judging from certain things he said in his recent interview with an Observer representative. For example, his conception of form as being conditioned entirely by materials is so far from the truth that it would be almost uncharitable to assume that this was the considered opinion of a thinking individual.

Mr. Percy Scholes is well worth quoting here. He says:

In all works of art there must be some measure of give and take, and form and material must, surely, sometimes bend to each other. A pencil sketch, an etching, a water-colour, and an oil-painting differ in their materials, but share a large measure of common form. There is such a thing as a general principle of form, apart from the materials used.

This, I think, is unanswerable.

Still more fantastic perhaps is his (Stravinsky's) idea of the painter employing a subject merely as an 'excuse' for painting. A painter dealing with purely abstract conceptions (the type of artist presumably in his mind) quite naturally does not bother about subjects or models. He is content to rely upon line and colour as media for expression. I cannot imagine any painter employing a subject without at the same time regarding it as an essential factor in the success of his scheme, whether the subject be one from nature, from human life, or from the world of material things. Enough has been said upon this point, however, and I must return to my main theme.

The Symphony for Wind Instruments, then, is avowedly an attempt to produce 'music itself';* that is, music entirely free from 'extra-musical emotion,'* 'uninhibited by extraneous intentions and architectonic formulæ.'† The composer's sole objective apparently is 'sonorous emotion,'‡ and he has endeavoured to achieve this by seeking 'relief from harmonic associations'‡ in a 'polyphony of timbres,'‡ and we are told that his extreme dissonance is used to assist this process. Unfortunately for the work and its composer, the Symphony comes perilously near to being a complete fulfilment of these principles, which, although they might have served for the music-making of primitive man, are not very creditable as mental products of a 20th century composer. Let us examine them.

First of all, as the end in view, we must take 'music itself,' music the sole content of which is to be 'sonorous emotion,' and we must begin our chain of argument with a restatement of some elementary facts. I do not think that anyone is in need of a reminder that sound, like colour, has emotion, and that different sounds produce in the listener different emotions. The simplest classification possible is, of course, that of sounds pleasant and unpleasant, albeit we must not forget that what is pleasant for one person is not necessarily so for another. But we notice that the pleasure derived from the pleasant sounds varies with the particular one we listen to. For many people, the noise of the sea is as delightful as that of a running stream. Some, although aware of a distinction, would find it perhaps too indefinite for clear expression. Others, capable in some degree of analysing their reactions, would suggest that the former exhilarated and the latter soothed. A few might go still further and attempt an association of ideas. The plashing of waves could be linked up with the idea of playfulness, and the stream's flow with that of contentment. It depends upon the degree to which the imagination has been stirred. In the same way the sounds of musical instruments can be basically divided into pleasant and unpleasant, according as the tone is good or bad.

* Stravinsky.

† Leigh Henry.

‡ Edwin Evans.

In the many differences of timbre we have of course a great variety of effect. Some distinctions are subtle, others almost violently obvious. The crux of the problem, however, is this: Granted that differences of timbre, as of the beautiful sounds in nature, produce varying reactions in the listener, what is the type and value of the emotion aroused by a single note played on any given instrument? * In fairness to Stravinsky, we must now presuppose that the listener is a sensitive and artistically-minded person, capable of fully appreciating tonal values. To such a person, oboe tone will perhaps appeal as wistful; flute tone as plaintive; upper register horn tone (pianissimo) as suggestive of things remote or visionary. Instances could be multiplied until the whole field of instrumental tone had been covered, but in every case the emotion would be of the same kind—vague, shadowy, and indefinite, and entirely subordinate to that which is the chief element in (the so-called) sonorous emotion, viz., the sensuous thrill of pleasure which one derives not only from beauty of sound, but also from beauty of taste and smell. In other words, sonorous emotion is primarily superficial, and has no power to call up but the palest reflections of a few of the more spiritual emotions which give life its true significance.

Another aspect of the problem has now to be considered, and I must return to my example from nature. The association of ideas with the noise of the sea and the stream becomes possible only by virtue of the rhythm with which the sound of both is invested. It is the quiet, steady rhythm of the stream's murmur, even more than the actual sound, which suggests soothing contentment; we have only to conceive a change of rhythm for a great alteration to be produced in the effect upon the listener. It is just at this point that Stravinsky becomes inconsistent, for he has always attached (and still attaches) great importance to rhythm. But the moment we admit rhythm as an essential factor in music, we can no longer have purely sonorous emotion. On the contrary, your emotional effects will depend much more upon the rhythms employed than upon the instruments used. The wistful tinge in oboe timbre, for example, will no longer be perceptible if the instrument be given a lively rhythm. It matters little, however, whether 'music' be limited to purely sonorous emotion or to emotion which is a compound of the sonorous and rhythmic. In either case, music becomes a thing entirely devoid of personality—in the spiritual sense of the word.* To carry the argument to its logical (but absurd) conclusion, we have only to allow the orchestra to tune up and a work of art will be produced. And we shall require new definitions of both 'art' and 'artist.' The expression of personal feeling will become the deadliest of artistic sins. If Stravinsky be correct, every one of his great predecessors and contemporaries must be wrong. Amongst the poets, too, only Marinetti and his foolish followers (whose lines consist apparently of disconnected vowels and consonants—pure poetry, this!), only these poor imbeciles will rank as true artists. Indeed, they fulfil Stravinsky's artistic ideals more completely than he himself does, although the opening phrase of the Symphony comes very near success in this respect. Various disjointed and strident notes appear in the brass with an effect so much akin to a donkey's bray as to make one sympathise with the laughter of the audience. The asinine effect is probably accidental (at least we hope so, as the work is dedicated to the memory of Debussy), but I think Stravinsky must, at this point, have committed a slight error of judgment in the balancing of his parts.

The composer, as I have already mentioned, has sought to achieve his end by seeking 'relief from harmonic associations' in a 'polyphony of timbres.' These polyphonic passages (in the Symphony) consist of four or five strands of orchestral colour proceeding quite independently, and in such dissonance as to (successfully) 'resist the tendency to harmonic fusion.' To gauge the significance of each strand we must listen 'horizontally.' Beyond the fact that the contrasting of colours heightens the intensity of each (provided that the contrasts be made judiciously) there is nothing of gain in all this. By deliberately denying fusion to his various strands, Stravinsky robs himself of that which is most beautiful in polyphonic writing, viz., the ever-present relation of each and every part to that co-ordinating and unifying idea which is always implied although sometimes not completely expressed. This is a high price to pay for 'relief from harmonic associations.' Indeed, one is again forced to the conclusion that disordered polyphony of this kind would be quite as well accomplished if left to the orchestral players themselves. Their individual melodic strands would probably lack significance, but this would be all to the good, as a significant theme must be abhorrent to a Stravinskist.

* It may be asked why I should take a single note. My answer is, that to form a true estimate of sonorous emotion every other emotional factor must be eliminated. It may be asked why, in order to make my analogy more exact, I did not take a single note from nature—a bird's note obviously suggests itself. The bird, however, sings or calls with an 'extraneous intention,' and is consequently barred. On the other hand, as we shall see in a few moments, Stravinsky admits rhythm as an essential factor in music, hence the example I selected is really the more appropriate.

* A composer may be 'personal' in his handling of rhythm, as in the way he walks, but obviously this is not the same thing as personality.

Even in his actual handling of colour I do not think Stravinsky has been conspicuously successful in the Symphony. In some of his earlier works I should be the first to admit that he has done some remarkable things in this way—for example, the music which accompanies the Chinese procession in The Nightingale. Here, however, we are in the domain of the ballet, and further comment upon its music would be irrelevant in a discussion concerning 'pure' music.

Enough has been said, I think, to indicate the retrogressive and anti-intellectual character of the Stravinsky theories. I find it difficult to reconcile Mr. Edwin Evans's approbation of them with his admission that art should reflect life, for the whole of life cannot be set within the limits of the merely sensuous. Indeed, the more important elements are found outside those limits. If we are to use our orchestral colours much in the same way as a child uses his box of paints; if our deeper emotions are to remain unawakened; if we are to give up the superb architecture of the symphonic form for disjunct utterances and aimless repetitions; if development (and therefore climax) is to go by the board, then, surely, music will be thrown back into a state of de-civilization, and will cease to be a language capable of expressing the vital forces lying unseen in the heart of man. The Symphony for Wind Instruments fails to stir me in the slightest degree; this is not surprising, for sound qua sound no longer interests me. What does surprise me is the fact that the composer of Petroushka and The Nightingale could bring himself to pen so fatuous a work in conformity with the theories which have formed the subject of this article.

MODERN HUNGARIAN COMPOSERS

BY PHILIP HESELTINE

It is indeed good news that Béla Bartók intends to visit England during the present month, bringing with him a new Sonata for violin and pianoforte and other chamber music for performance in London.

We have now considerable justification for regarding London as the centre of the musical world, so far as performances are concerned. Thanks to the initiative of our concert-givers we are on the whole better acquainted with contemporary music than any other city in the world. Our own composers can no longer complain of undue neglect; and we are more familiar with the work of the most important living composers than Vienna or any of the musical centres of Germany. We are ahead of America in the variety and quantity of new works that are presented to our audiences every year, and ahead of France in our knowledge of any but purely French music. Yet there are strange gaps in this knowledge of ours, of which one of the largest and strangest is our almost total ignorance of the contemporary music of Hungary.

As long ago as 1903 Richter performed an early Symphony of Bartók's at Manchester (one movement alone—a Funeral March—has survived in print), but between that time and the outbreak of war practically nothing of this composer's work was heard in England. In the summer of 1914 some pianoforte pieces by Bartók and Kodály were performed at a concert given by Mr. Liebich in London, and Sir Henry Wood introduced Bartók's first Suite* for orchestra (composed in 1905) at a Promenade Concert in the same year. The war of course prevented the possibility of extending our knowledge of his works very much further, but it is surprising that during the last three years we in England have heard hardly anything of Béla Bartók, Zoltán Kodály (pronounced Kodai, the 'l' resembling that of the French word mouillé), and Laszlo Laitha—Hungary's three most distinguished living composers—save an occasional mention of their names in a musical newspaper. For whatever views one may hold as to the respective merits of modern composers, no serious students of the music of Bartók can deny that the power and originality it displays entitle him to at least as much consideration and respect as any composer living.

[Photo by]

BÉLA BARTÓK [Irene Werner, Budapest.]

Last year's Promenade Concerts gave us only the rather immature Rhapsody for pianoforte and Orchestra which dates from 1904. But in the preceding season Sir Henry Wood revived the early but already, to some extent, characteristic Orchestral Suite with conspicuous success, and it is difficult to see why this virile and exhilarating work has never been repeated. Incidentally, there are few modern compositions that could be arranged for a military band with more brilliant effect than the opening movement of this Suite, with its long, march-like theme of a grandeur and sonority scarcely excelled in the Meistersinger Overture itself, with which it invites comparison.

* Published by Rózsavölgyi, Budapest.

The four volumes of *Children's Pieces (without octaves), which consist of simple arrangements of Hungarian and Czecho-Slovakian folk-tunes, have already proved a boon and a blessing to many teachers of the pianoforte in this country. But unlike many 'teaching pieces' they have a real musical value. Their technical simplicity is not factitious but essential. We do not feel that the folk-song and its attendant harmonies are two separate things artificially joined together; they seem inevitably one and indivisible, and each little piece has the appearance of a spontaneous composition:

Children's Pieces, vol. iv. (1908).

Ex. 1. Largo. BARTÓK.

f sonore. Ped. * Ped. * Ped. *

mf cres. f Ped. * Ped. * Ped. *

With them may be mentioned the more recent books of Hungarian and Rumanian folk-songs arranged for pianoforte (Universal Edition, Vienna):

Fifteen Hungarian Folk-Songs (1920).

Ex. 2. Allegretto. BARTÓK.

dolce. mf risoluto.

In these, as indeed in most of his other works, Bartók displays that rare power—which in these days seems to be growing rarer than ever—of writing 'exactly as many notes as are necessary':

* Published by Rózsnyai, Budapest.

neither fewer nor more. These pieces have a freshness and freedom of expression that remind us, strangely enough, of those very personal little pieces of Giles Farnaby—at least three centuries old—which are to be found in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book. Children's pieces do not as a rule figure in recital programmes, but the melodic beauty and delicacy of workmanship of these little pieces of Bartók's are by no means unworthy of fine playing; and those who have been privileged to hear the composer play them himself have had a memorable experience of the depths a real master can reveal in the simplest-seeming music. Pianists in search of novelties that will provide them with technical problems in addition to rich musical interest would do well to turn to the magnificent set of three Études (1920: Universal), the two Élégies (1910: Rózsnyai), and the four Dirges (1910: Rózsavölgyi).

It is, however in his two String Quartets (composed in 1908 and 1917 respectively) that Bartók's singular genius is revealed most clearly. Much fine chamber music has been written in the last few years, but Bartók appears to be the only composer who, working on the lines indicated by Beethoven in his last Quartets, has achieved the same technical perfection in the expression of original ideas in an idiom that is all his own. This is high praise; but that it is fully merited by these profound and arresting works most of those who have studied the scores—or, better still, heard them performed by the superb Waldbauer Quartet—would testify. They are certainly the most significant quartets that have been published since the death of Beethoven.

It must not be supposed from what has been said above that, if we have been somewhat backward in our appreciation of Bartók's genius, his own countrymen have been any less so. On the contrary Budapest is one of the last places to go to to hear his music—except at private gatherings. For many years his professional colleagues looked askance at him, and spoke of madness when his name was mentioned, and although this pedantic opposition has now to some extent given way, political disturbances have prevented Bartók from obtaining as much public recognition as he deserves. In Hungary, as in all countries where the struggle for independence is still continuing or has been but recently ended, it is almost impossible for anyone to remain outside the sphere of politics. Under the old regime the authorities of the State-supported School of Music at Budapest regarded Bartók with marked disfavour, and despite the efforts of his friend Dohnányi on his behalf, persistently refused him an official appointment. But the success achieved by his Ballet The Wooden Prince,* which was performed at the Budapest Opera under the direction of Egisto Tango (now conductor of the Rumanian national opera at Kolozsvár) in 1917, and of his opera *Bluebeard (an opera with a cast of two characters) produced in the following year, brought him into greater prominence than he had hitherto enjoyed; and when, in March, 1919, the government of the country passed for a brief spell into the hands of the Communist party, Bartók was appointed co-director of the School of Music together with Kodály and Dohnányi. But this regime was short-lived. A few months later the Christian Socialists came into power and consigned the Communists and all their works (including the excellent little review Ma ['To-day'] which represented all that is best in contemporary Hungarian art, literature, and music) to outer darkness. So Bartók's connection with the School of Music was abruptly terminated, although he had taken no part in the political activities of the Communists, whose opinions he is very far from sharing. His sole offence was to have accepted from them an appointment their predecessors ought to have given him long before.

* Both these works (published by Universal) are to be performed—for the first time outside Hungary—at Frankfurt-am-Main

The influence of Kodály will probably make itself felt not so much through his compositions as through his genius as a critic and as a teacher who is able to give sympathetic encouragement and sound instruction to the rising generation of composers and executants. But his recently-published chamber music is of very considerable interest. Like Bartók he has steeped himself in the folk-music of his country (the genuine traditional peasant-music, not the comparatively modern gipsy-music popularized in western Europe by Liszt and generally confused with the true folk-music), and its influence is clearly apparent in nearly all his works. Of the four chamber compositions recently issued in the Universal Edition—a Sonata for 'cello (unaccompanied), a Duo for violin and 'cello, a Trio for two violins and viola, and a String Quartet (No. 2)—the most remarkable is the 'Cello Sonata, a veritable tour de force of immense technical difficulty but of compensating musical interest which is wonderfully well sustained throughout its three movements. The composer directs that the two lower strings of the instrument be tuned a semitone lower than is customary. Their notes, however, are written as they are to be played, not as they are to sound; so the opening chord of B minor, for example, is notated thus:

The last movement contains a striking example of a pizzicato glissando, the strings being plucked, and the fingers shifted while they are still vibrating:

From the Duo for violin and 'cello the beautiful theme of the slow movement may be quoted:

Duo for violin and 'cello.

KODÁLY.

Ex. 5.

Laïtha's published works consist of a Pianoforte Sonata and two books of shorter pianoforte pieces*. He has been greatly influenced by Bartók, but he is by no means a mere imitator. His music is quite individual, occasionally arid and forbidding but never banal. Indeed, fear of the commonplace and lack of that touch of genius that can lend it distinction seem to have deprived Laïtha of the courage of simplicity. The Sonata in particular fails to convey that sense of inevitability which characterises the work of Bartók. But Laïtha has a fine gift of melody, and some of the shorter pieces are of very considerable beauty.

Soupir inquiet dans la nuit de printemps (Nine Fantasies, 1913).

* Publishers, Harmonia, Budapest, and Rózsavölgyi, Budapest.

De l'automne et du champ (Contes pour piano).
Ex. 7. poco allegretto. LAÏTHA
p poco sfz
p sub.

Some of his titles are peculiar. For instance: Maternité . . . Comme une lettre sur moi-même . . . Petit conte du calme, des ténèbres, de l'attente, et d'un grand fauteuil—Petit conte d'une allée de châtaigniers en fleurs, d'une écharpe de dentelle oubliée sur la terrasse et de l'Enorme. But unlike Satie's they make sense, and have a certain emotional suggestiveness.

Of these three composers, in whom modern Hungarian music is summed up, Bartók is by far the most important. As one of our best critics has said of him:

'He reveals new possibilities. He has cut a path through the selva oscura wherein so many of the modern composers have gone so hopelessly astray. Over and above his actual tangible donation, he gives us a sense of liberation, fresh hopes, and new energies with which to realise them.'

Already his influence has impressed itself on at least one young English composer of very considerable talent—W. T. Walton—and it cannot fail to have a beneficial effect; for Bartók is a 'modern' whose originality owes nothing to sensationalism, eccentricity, or 'revolutionary' ideas, and does not depend for its recognition upon the postulation of a world from which the great masters of the past are rigidly excluded. He is, moreover, singularly free from the influence of other contemporary composers; and those who make the acquaintance of his work in 1922 and observe therein that simplicity of texture, directness of expression, and freedom from conventional forms and formulæ—qualities which, though they are conspicuous alike in the work of the English virginalists in the 16th century and of Beethoven in the 19th, some critics would persuade us were introduced into music by Stravinsky—should bear in mind that much of Bartók's best and most characteristic work is already fourteen years old.

England's recognition of this master will not be without its effect upon the musicians and musical public of his own country. For Hungary, unlike Germany, has a very proper respect for England as a musical nation, and the expression of English appreciation of Bartók will go a long way towards breaking down the prejudice and apathy of his own countrymen and finally giving the lie, so far as he is concerned, to 'the aspersion of madness cast on the inspired by the tame high finisher of paltry blots, indefinite and paltry rhymes, and paltry harmonies.'

EDWARD ERNEST COOPER

FEBRUARY 5, 1848.—FEBRUARY 12, 1922

Music and musicians have lost a good friend by the death of Sir Edward Cooper. He was not only a life-long lover of the art, and an active and enthusiastic participant so far as his business ties allowed; he was also for many years a valuable member of various bodies concerned in the administrative side of music. Chairman of the Committee of the Royal Academy of Music, President of the Madrigal Society, Treasurer of the Abbey Glee Club, a Fellow and Trustee of the Philharmonic Society, Master of the Musicians' Company, a member of the Committee of the Mendelssohn Scholarship—it would be rare to find so many offices held even by a leisured amateur. When we see them combined in one who was also a Sheriff of the City of London, an ex-Lord Mayor, and head of a big business house, the fact is doubly impressive. He figured frequently, too, in important representative gatherings, attending the International Congress of Musicians at Berlin, Vienna, and London, and being appointed by the Foreign Office to represent Great Britain at the Congress at Paris, in 1914. Always keenly interested in Church music, it was fitting that at the time of his death he should have been parish clerk of St. Michael's, Cornhill, and a Vice-President of the Royal College of Organists.

He was born into a musical home, and as a boy was constantly hearing fine music at the houses of such friends of the family as Howell (the famous double-bass player), Weiss, Alfred Borwick (father of the well-known pianist), Reiss, Piatti, Rivière, &c. On the breaking of his voice his interests turned from chamber music to singing, and he took lessons from Pasquale-Goldberg, one of the earliest professors of the Royal Academy. His first regular post as a singer was at the Bavarian Chapel. He then sang for some time at the Pro-Cathedral until Stainer appointed him a deputy-tenor at St. Paul's Cathedral. In that capacity he did duty for over twenty years—a record period for a deputy. His fondness for part-singing led him to be a member of the old Round, Catch, and Canon Club and of the Madrigal Society, of which latter body he was a couple of years ago the oldest member save one.

Much as music owes to amateurs whose support lies in the direction of patronage and financial support, it probably owes even more in the long run to those whose enthusiasm leads them to take a place in the rank and file of performers. It is inconceivable, for instance, that a prominent business man and a Lord Mayor of London could show himself to be a keen, practical musician without doing much to convince others that the art is one of the best and most social of hobbies, not (as too many people still think) an exotic and somewhat effeminate affair to be exploited by a race of professionals for the occasional entertainment of the public. Add to his practical musicianship an unselfish zeal that showed itself in unwearied effort on behalf of such musical institutions as those mentioned above, and it is apparent that the indebtedness of the art to Sir Edward Cooper is not likely to be overestimated. His musical tastes were shared by his wife, a fine pianist, and a pupil of Sir Julius Benedict.

A few biographical details follow. He was born at Windsor, on February 5, 1848. In 1867 he entered the service of a firm of insurance brokers and underwriters in St. Peter's Alley, Cornhill, thus beginning a connection with the City Ward that was to last all his life. Seven years later he started a business of his own, and later joined the firm of James Hartley & Co., now known as James Hartley, Cooper & Co. In 1909 he was elected Alderman of his Ward, serving as a Sheriff in 1912-13, and becoming Lord Mayor in 1919. He was knighted in 1913 (on the occasion of the visit of the President of the French Republic), and was created a Baronet in 1920. He was also a Grand Officer of the Legion of Honour, and held the Orders of the Crown of Belgium and of St. Sava of Serbia.

The funeral took place at Overton on February 16. Among the large gathering of representatives from London institutions were Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Dr. H. W. Richards, Mr. J. A. Creighton, Mr. Alfred Waley, and Mr. Harold Craxton (Royal Academy of Music), Mr. J. Stainer (Madrigal Society), and Mr. Arthur F. Hill (Musicians' Company). Mr. Augustus Littleton was represented by Mr. Henry King.

An interview with Sir Edward Cooper and a portrait appeared in our issue of November, 1919.

We have received the following from Sir Alexander Mackenzie:

London's Music makers, their Societies and Institutions, may well lament the passing of one whose genial and vigorous support endeared him to them all: 'a singer who sings no more.'

The inadequate tribute which these few lines endeavour to convey is that of an intimate friend to whom, maybe, more of Sir Edward Cooper's eager devotion to our art is known than is likely to be generally understood or sufficiently appreciated. For one can hardly have, so to speak, lived with him during the twenty-three years of his successive services to the R.A.M. as its honorary treasurer and Chairman of the Committee of Management without having gained a deeper knowledge of that thoroughly genuine love of music and enduring desire to assist the progress of musical education which have earned the debt of gratitude we must ever owe. Although, by reason of the offices he held, more closely attached to his well-loved school, his sympathies were of no narrow limits—a fact to which my colleague of the G.S.M. will readily testify—and were of that wide and generous range which prompted him to make the most of his opportunities (and these were many and various) for encouraging every worthy scheme concerned with music.

Despite his many business and voluntary duties he habitually took a warm personal interest in the individual efforts of our past and present students, whom he befriended, to the last, by frequent attendance at their recitals and concerts. If it were necessary to point to any prominent trait which characterised his connection with us, I would single out his fellow-feeling with and attitude towards the musical profession, which could at all times rely upon an attentively sympathetic ear to its needs and aspirations. This feeling was clearly manifested during the—to us, particularly—memorable year of his Mayoralty, when music and its professors were honoured in such exceptional and large-hearted fashion at the Mansion House. And but a few short weeks ago, when we met for the last time, I was asked about the progress and chances of success of several societies, enterprises, and artists.

Truly the art which he did so much to help and cultivate was no mere pleasant pastime or recreation, but a seriously engrossing part of a long and useful life of national service.

I end with a personal note. During many past years the R.A.M. has indeed been fortunate in its Chairmen, and I have been happy in serving under two such enthusiasts and friends as Thomas Threlfall and Edward Cooper. Each of them had a wife who shared his love for music and aided his benevolent intentions and kindly projects, and who still continue the good work with which their husbands' honoured memories are linked.

A. C. M.

TRANSLATION AND TRANSCRIPTION

BY ALEXANDER BRENT-SMITH

The use of translations, like the performance of good deeds, is the better for being kept secret. School-boys have always known this truth, and when they intend to use a translation they retire to an inner-chamber and close the door. Even then, lest their deed should become manifest, they keep their book in close proximity to a table-drawer whither it can disappear at the twinkling of an eye. Translations, like good deeds, bring their reward quite openly. The boy who took such precautions to ensure secrecy wins golden words from his tutor; golden words which depreciate only a very little when he says: 'It is curious that you translate your Virgil so fluently and stylishly, and yet should have misconstrued that unprepared passage Post equitem sedit atra cura into "After horse-exercise the black woman sits down with care."' But let that pass. As we grow older the secret use of translations is forced upon us by the superiority of our friends who do not use—I do not say do not need—translations. If we wish to read a French novel, we buy a translation and enjoy it, but if we are wise we keep secret the translation part of our achievement. When we meet the superior being of whom we stand in awe, we say off-hand that we have been reading so-and-so, giving the original title as like Parisian French as our Bloomsbury tongues will permit. 'Ah!' he says, 'isn't it delicious? Such a light touch—I especially like that passage [here he reels off a list of words which sound to us like a list of nouns taking s in the plural when by all that is sensible they should have taken x], absolutely untranslatable isn't it?' We agree, and for a moment our conscience is lulled. 'But,' he continues, 'no translation ever does justice to the original. I miss the atmosphere, an indefinite something which is part of the language's charm.' This sort of thing goes on everywhere, and though we all agree that translations are impossible, still we feel it is a plucky thing to attempt the impossible.

Personally, I always use and continue to advocate translations to and from every language. Ridiculous though it may seem, I look forward to a day when we shall have a translation into English of The Amazing Marriage from the original double-Dutch of George Meredith.

And now to music. Although we do not feel that we must be secret in the use of translations (which are also called transcriptions), nevertheless we feel obliged to apologise for them, or to belittle the pleasure they give us, because of our friends who from force of habit either deplore transcriptions altogether or who tolerate them as being the next best thing. Transcriptions are frequently not the next best thing; but, if anything, just one better. Composers do not always write their music for the best medium. It may be that they write a solo Violin Sonata to please a friend, but the music they write may be better expressed as a Pianoforte Sonata; therefore transcribe it. One duty of the transcriber is to translate music from one language into another in which it will speak with greater force. Anyone who has heard Bach's A minor Organ Fugue played by a first-rate pianist will realise that the modern pianoforte was the instrument Bach required, but having no such instrument, he wrote for the organ. In this case the transcriber is but restoring the composer's thoughts.

Again, Beethoven in his latter String Quartets laboriously constricted his thoughts into a mould to which they were unsuited. Sometime when they have been cleverly scored for orchestra we may get their secret, but at present it is concealed beneath a wild growth of technical impossibilities. In transcribing, our object must not be to reproduce the original, but to give its equivalent in another medium. Busoni has been greatly praised for his Bach transcriptions, even by such a wise man as Schweitzer; but he has repeatedly made the mistake of trying to reproduce the manner of the original rather than revealing another spiritual aspect. Knowing that an organ is characterised by the use of 4-ft. and 16-ft. tone, he has doubled all his passage-work until the whole beauty of the contrapuntal pianoforte style has been swept away. Would he feel it necessary in transcribing a fiddle sonata for the pianoforte to put thin paper across the strings in order to reproduce the characteristic stringy tone of a fiddle?

Best, though not the musician that Busoni is, did some splendid transcriptions, including one of the Violin Chaconne of Bach. Here he made no attempt to reproduce the violin tone, but to translate violin idiom into organ idiom, and this he did quite admirably.

Another duty of transcribers is to bring more music into our homes. It would be a blessing to amateurs if transcribing were done more extensively. We allow transcriptions of Beethoven's Symphonies, why not transcriptions of Beethoven's Pianoforte Sonatas, Schumann's Symphonic Studies, or Liszt's Rhapsodies? Many people long to play these works, but they will never be able to play them as written. They might practice until they were dead, and even then they would not be able to play them.

Neither the gramophone nor the pianola solves the question of music in the home. We want to feel the music under our own fingers, just as we would rather play lawn tennis than have it played for us by hardy perennials. Many difficulties could be swept away without composers being any the worse, e.g., the absurdly difficult water-logged passage for the left hand in Brahms's Rhapsody in B minor.

When the transcriber has begun his ruthless task, where is he to stop? May he transcribe all Brahms's pianoforte works for the pianoforte and all Parry's symphonic works for the orchestra? In both cases his labour would be justified, and the result would astonish and gratify the respective composers.

MODERN THEME-TRANSFORMATION

BY HERBERT ANTCLIFFE

Since Liszt evolved the idea of theme-transformation in place of, or as a supplement to, the older methods of 'development' the method has moved away considerably from where it started, so that we seldom find it alluded to by present-day analysts or programme annotators in reference to contemporary works. Yet most composers of works of any serious length employ it, consciously or unconsciously, with definite intention or by coincidence, adapting it in a greater or less degree to suit their purposes.

The object of theme-transformation is to provide expression for a variety of emotion while yet retaining a union of identity in the general conception of certain important features of a work. Liszt certainly had this in mind when he worked out the system in his symphonic poems, but he did not always use the best material, and he frequently used it in a crude manner. Since then, and the almost equally crude following of Liszt by Smetana and Saint-Saëns, the system has been exploited and developed to achieve this object in a variety of ways, not only in itself but in combination and contrast with the older method of thematic development and the newer one of leading motives.

Elgar is one of those who is most constant and consistent in its employment. In his works it ranges from the slight but very suggestive manner of his first Symphony (where he merely alters the tempo and proportionate length of the notes of the theme of the second movement to make a theme for the third movement), to its very complete utilisation in his Cockaigne Overture.

It is somewhat remarkable that scarcely a single annotator or analyst of this work has pointed out how completely it is constructed on the basis of theme transformation. As a rule the official analyses issued by concert promoters point to a single case, that of the 'Citizen' theme transformed into the 'Ragamuffin' theme. As a matter of fact the bulk of this work is founded upon a single theme transformed in a variety of ways that makes it in a very definite sense a symphonic poem according to the implicit rules established by Liszt. The employment of other themes of secondary importance is strictly in accord with Lisztian principles, and does not affect the main outline of a single varied theme.

Of the original theme with which the work opens :

the composer gives four transformations in the course of its progress. Of these the first is the 'Citizen' theme, nobilmente legato :

which is followed by the 'Ragamuffin' theme :

For the third transformation he repeats the 'Citizen' theme, but in this case with varied harmony, orchestration, and expression, while a little later comes a variant of the main feature of the principal theme, which is more interesting in its technical aspect than in its emotional significance :

Elgar's idea of using harmony and orchestration as a means of transforming his theme was by no means a new one ; with a more purely technical and decorative intention, it had been employed by composers certainly as far back as the Haydns and the younger Bachs. Saint-Saëns provides a good example in his treatment of the first theme of La Jeunesse d'Hercule, in which he repeats the theme, in unison, on the lower notes of the clarinet, violas tremolando, and 'celli pizzicato. Employing three distinct themes in this short work he has little scope for transformation, but he manages to make it interesting. So far as notes and rhythm are concerned his first theme :

is varied only once, becoming :

A second theme :

however, has three variations :

slight in themselves, but effective in their significance, while the third theme retains its single form.

Of the three remaining symphonic poems of Saint-Saëns the thematic material and treatment are alike too well-known and too obvious to need more than mention, except in the case of Phaeton, where he seems to be moving towards an improved technique, particularly in the second theme, which is a good one for its purpose :

Ex. 9.

His first transformation of this is in canonic imitation ; the theme is scarcely altered in its melodic form :

Ex. 10.

Then follows a purely melodic alteration :

and again a canonic and sequential imitation, this time on a variation of the notes of the theme :

Simple as this is, and not particularly original or striking, it is a great advance on his treatment of the first theme of the work, with its slightly varied rhythm and altered codetta, and suggests that if only he had continued to work on these lines he might have added considerably to the technique of symphonic writing.

In his Romeo and Juliet Overture Tchaikovsky has treated the principal theme, that representing Friar Lawrence, in a way that technically is as simple as possible, and which yet attains its ends in a way that is effective if not subtle. A mere setting out of these will show the method employed :

Ex. 13. THEME.

Scriabin in the Poème de l'Extase does almost the same thing with a single phrase :

Ex. 14.

and even simpler is Josef Holbrooke's treatment of a melody in Utalume :

Ex. 15.

With different harmony and instrumentation :

Debussy in L'après-midi d'un Faun transforms his principal theme in no less than seven different ways, and the second theme in four different ways. These transformations are made only by slight alterations of the notes or rhythm, and their significance is rather that they maintain the original atmosphere without creating undue monotony than that they convey any emotional or pictorial development. As the object of theme transformation is the latter, it cannot be said that Debussy's efforts in this matter are of great influence or importance.

All the foregoing examples are from what may be termed modern classics ; they are typical rather than exhaustive, and no doubt many other examples of interest are to be found without going out of the regular repertory of orchestral works. They do, however, indicate the lines on which composers of the older generations have worked, and on which many are still working. Of those in the works of our younger contemporaries I have not yet made a collection suitable for useful illustration ; but I hope before long to be able to make the necessary analyses and place some of the results before readers who may be interested.

It will be observed that an omission of some importance is that of the works of Richard Strauss, but these require a whole discourse to themselves, not so much because of the manner of treatment as for the number of the themes. By his use of so many themes in each single work the composer has added little to the technique of thematic development, and has set a very bad example of lack of musical economy.

A MIDLAND CHORUS-MASTER

Mr. Joseph Lewis, conductor of the Wolverhampton Musical Society and chorus-master of the recently established City of Birmingham Choir, is rapidly making himself prominent in the choral world by reason of his excellent achievements and still more excellent promise. He has been connected with choral music in the Midlands for some ten years (Dudley, Birmingham, and Wolverhampton), after a preceding ten years of general work and study in music. Choral music is in his blood, his father having been a well-known Staffordshire chorus-master

Photo by)

(H. J. Whitlock & Sons, Birmingham.)

MR. JOSEPH LEWIS

for a couple of generations. As a boy, Mr. Joseph Lewis sang the solo parts in public performances of the standard oratorios by his father's societies. Solo singing he studied at the Midland Institute under Mr. G. A. Breeden, in the years when Mr. Frank Mullings and Miss Rosina Buckman were pupils of that teacher.

His various choirs have been the Dudley Ladies' Choir (1910), the Dudley Male-Voice Choir (1911), the Dudley Madrigal Society (1912), the Barfield Choir (Birmingham, 1915), the Wolverhampton Musical Society, a body of some three hundred singers (1919), and the City of Birmingham Choir (1921). The Barfield Choir gave Bantock's Vanity of Vanities, and the same work has been given several times by the Wolverhampton Choir—most conspicuously at the South Staffordshire Musical Festival of last October. The Dudley Madrigal Society raised a good deal of money for local charities during the war; the Barfield Choir fell to pieces, as did so many of the English choral bodies that depended largely upon men singers. In 1915, Mr. Lewis was in negotiation with regard to his taking over the Glasgow Choral Union (after Mr. Verbrugghen), but in the end he decided not to leave the Midlands.

Almost the finest feature in this conductor's work is the unusual mental confidence and technical stability of his choruses. These qualities result from the circumstance that he works from the mind of the chorister outwards. At the outset of learning a new composition, he helps the choir to grasp the general form of the piece and its larger proportions. By this means each singer becomes aware of the piece as of a picture within its frame, and is at once conscious of the function served by consecutive phrases and sections. It is this large grasp of a work as a whole which enables Mr. Lewis's choirs to develop good staying power in compositions like Vanity of Vanities and Israel in Egypt, and to build them up in performance with that ease and leisure which is the essential foundation of art. He next attends to the observation of notes and rhythmical motive, often as from the position of abstract music; the outcome is a natural flexibility in phrase-making and a confident firmness of 'touch.' Then comes observation of the verbal material of the piece, with constant thought for consonants and for the literal significance of the words. The final stage is a return to the first, but now with the mind centred upon the fundamental spirit of poem and music.

The guiding principle Mr. Lewis works to is that of a sense of corporate unity in the choir. Each part is to be an individuality, but only as a part of a whole. A choir is to be as a string quartet or as the fingers of pianist and organist playing polyphonic music. Circumstances are a trouble here, and tenors, for example, do not reach the point attained by contraltos.

I am not aware how far Mr. Lewis inclines personally to thorough modernism in music. His work with Bantock's compositions proves that he sympathises with advanced ideas of technique and 'effects,' and he has so finely entered into the spirit of Elgar as to have been warmly complimented by that composer—who, indeed, has attended his concerts at Dudley. I imagine he questions any modern composer solely on the points of practicability and commonsense. If a composer ignores the inevitable mental and physical limitations of choral singers, giving them harmonies to sing which they cannot form in mind as the basis on which to construct by imagination their particular note, I expect Mr. Lewis would say they are offering useless contribution to his department of music, and hindering the full development of their own desires and ideals.

Arrangements are in hand for the Wolverhampton Musical Society to give a concert in London during the present season, but particulars cannot yet be offered. The Society will probably bring with it Bantock's Vanity of Vanities and a new work by Graham Godfrey, The Forsaken Merman. S. G.

ARTHUR NIKISCH

BY ALFRED KALISCH

All lovers of music heard with lively regret the news that Arthur Nikisch died at Leipsic, of heart failure following influenza, on Monday, January 23, at the age of sixty-seven.

In a sense his biography is a history of his musical interpretations. He was born on October 12, 1855, at Lébényi St. Miklos, in Hungary, where his father was chief book-keeper to a landed proprietor. His was one of the many lives which refute the current theory that prodigies never develop into great musicians, for at the age of three he already showed great musical aptitude. He began his studies at the age of six, and at eleven was a student of the Vienna Conservatoire, and soon gained distinction among his fellows as violinist, pianist, and composer. In 1872 he was one of a deputation of three students—Mottl and Emil Paur were the other two—sent to greet Wagner, and he was selected as one of the first violins to play in the historic performance of Beethoven's ninth Symphony at the laying of the foundation-stone of the Bayreuth Festspielhaus. Then he joined the Vienna Opera Orchestra, and from there he went as chorus master to the Opera House at Leipsic.

AN EARLY SUCCESS

When he had an opportunity for conducting Tannhäuser the orchestra at first protested because he was so young. It was arranged, however, that they should play under him at one rehearsal and then decide. At the rehearsal he was enthusiastically cheered, and so the foundation-stone of his great career as a conductor was laid.

In 1879 he succeeded Carl Reinecke as conductor of the Gewandhaus Concerts, and changed them from the most conservative to the most progressive of institutions. Ten years later the news that he had accepted the conductorship of the Boston Symphony Orchestra came as something of a bombshell—for in those days journeys to the States were not so common as they are now. It was after his return from America to take up the Directorship of the Budapest Opera that he was first heard in London, in 1895. In 1902 he became the Director of the Leipsic Conservatoire, and marked his term of office by instituting his now famous class of conductors, of which Mr. Albert Coates and Dr. Adrian C. Boult are the best known products.

HIS ENGLISH APPEARANCES

Till the war broke out he frequently conducted in London, both at concerts of the London Symphony Orchestra and the Philharmonic Society, at Covent Garden, where his Wagnerian performances were brilliant and memorable, and in the provinces. He also conducted the Leeds Festival of 1913, and his performances of Verdi's Requiem were perhaps the most notable features of a brilliant week. Nor must his tour in the United States with the London Symphony Orchestra be overlooked in a survey of his connection with this country.

CHARACTERISTICS ON THE PLATFORM

He was born with a magnetic power over the players under his baton. His gestures were restrained in comparison with those of some conductors of a later generation, but always full of meaning, and had an almost feline grace of their own. No one ever got from an orchestra more sensuous beauty of tone in all departments. His climaxes, if they had not always the monumental power of those of Richter, had an intensity of nervous energy which was irresistible. He had the secret of combining tremendous power with wonderful flexibility to an extent which no one else has rivalled. A perfect example of this was in the Interlude in the Rheingold—at the point where the Nibelungs gather up their treasures in the caves below the earth—where he obtained an effect as new as it was legitimate. His Meistersinger performances were singularly lovely, but many preferred the Olympian repose and geniality of Richter. He represented

Walter's view of life, the older man that of Hans Sachs. His Tristan was a riot of brilliant colour and unbridled passion. The ideal performance of Tristan would be secured, it was said, if Richter conducted the first and third Acts and Nikisch the second.

SOME MEMORABLE PERFORMANCES

Few who were present will forget the electrical effect of his first London performance of Tchaikovsky's fifth Symphony. One specially remembers a certain clarinet passage in the slow movement, which he did in quite a new way, which nearly all subsequent conductors have adopted. Another performance which lives in the memory is that of Elgar's first Symphony, if only because it gave rise to such vehement differences of opinion. His reading of Tchaikovsky's Francesca da Rimini, on the other hand, was a thing about which no two opinions were possible. It swept audiences off their feet. It must not be supposed that his readings of the classics were arbitrary or ultra-modern. He was too good a musician and had too keen a sense of true beauty for that. They, however, had a vivacity sometimes a little disconcerting to those accustomed to more restrained playing. Perhaps Beethoven's Seventh showed him at his best, especially the last movement. It has been said that the special characteristics of his interpretation were due to the fact that he, so to speak, arrived at the classics through the Romantics.

It may not be out of place to digress for a moment and point out—an interesting fact—that the best orchestral interpreters of the North German classics have not been Teutons—Richter, who like Nikisch was Hungarian, Mottl who was Austrian, Weingartner who was born in Dalmatia, and Levi who was born in the Rhineland of Jewish parentage.

Nikisch had his little amiable peculiarities, like all great men. At one time 'hypnotic eye' and his shirt cuffs were the subject of a good deal of good-natured banter. But Gladstone had his shirt collars and Joseph Chamberlain his orchid, so why grudge a musician his linen?

TWO RECOLLECTIONS

For the present writer the most beautiful things that Nikisch did were two performances of the Siegfried Idyll given at two meetings of the Music Club with a picked orchestra of seventeen led by Mr. Albert Sammons. They were the very perfection of intimate charm and finish of detail. He himself confessed to me that he had been so moved that he could hardly keep going. He was generally supposed to trust more to the inspiration of the moment than to careful rehearsal, but on each of these occasions he rehearsed the piece for nearly two hours. At the second performance Richard Strauss was present, and said that he had seldom had such unalloyed pleasure. The only thing, he added, which marred it was a wild desire to get on to the platform and take the stick himself.

I have one other interesting recollection of Nikisch. It was at a little gathering where Weingartner was also present. The conversation turned on the Overture to Der Freischütz, which both had been conducting in London at the time. They argued for a long time whether the chief theme should be phrased :

My only regret is that I cannot recall their preferences, and at present I have no means of access to a note I made at the time. I only remember that both were for rejecting the usual way of binding the four quavers together. It was a most instructive discussion.

In conclusion, just one word as to his magical art as an accompanist. The way in which he used to play for Elena Gerhardt was unforgettable.

GRESHAM COLLEGE MUSIC LECTURES

The lectures by Sir Frederick Bridge given at Gresham College on February 7 to 10, had for subjects 'The Overture' and 'Pelham Humfrey.' The development of the overture was traced from Monteverde to Purcell, and for the second lecture to overtures by Gluck, Mozart, and Mendelssohn. The chief interest of the course was on February 11, when the whole of the music to Shadwell's opera, founded on Shakespeare's Tempest and produced in 1674, was given. The instrumental music by Locke and many of the songs by Banister and Humfrey were already known. But by a fortunate chance the missing music by Humfrey was discovered in the library of the Conservatoire at Paris a year or so ago, and with the aid of Mr. Barclay Squire the lecturer was able to produce the whole of this most interesting find. Humfrey set the long dialogue for Three Devils, and also a long masque. The music is full of interest, and has many dramatic points. Some of the short solos and choruses are very like Purcell. There is no stringed accompaniment to the vocal work, only a figured bass which Sir Frederick had taken as the foundation of the accompaniment. The instrumental movements were excellently played by Trinity College students, led by Miss Evelyn Moore, and the vocal work was well performed by Miss Peachy, Miss Margaret Champneys, Mr. Herbert Thompson, and Mr. Bertram Mills. The lecturer described the action of the play, reading some of the amusing dialogue, and the music was performed exactly as it occurs in the opera. After Act 2 a fine setting of Arise, ye subterranean winds (words so finely set by Purcell in his Tempest) was sung by the Principal Devil. The music is by Pietro Reggio, an Italian, who lived in England at the time the opera was produced. It was well sung by Mr. Mills. A large audience attended—between five hundred and six hundred—and many had to be refused admission. The second lecture on Humfrey was confined to his Church music and some isolated songs.

A NOTE ON 'BEST-SELLERS'

Not many days since I received a letter, the writer of which said, without periphrasis, preface, or appendix, 'My favourite record is —,' and he named a well known 'best-seller.' About that particular record it is beside my purpose to say more; besides, I might unwittingly be poaching on the preserves of 'Discus.' Nor will I delay to consider how enviable is the state of mind of the person who can say without hesitation what piece of music he likes best. It would cost a musician much anxious thought to draw up a list of twenty favourites, and give reasons for his preferences: but to plump for one—only a Lancashire man could do it.

The letter suggests several interesting and not unprofitable lines of thought. It would be wrong to say, as would many who are really artistic, that such things do not matter and are beneath notice. On the contrary, it is of no little importance to discover why some of these immensely popular airs catch the public fancy. I for one have never been able to probe the secret. I am free to confess that I suffer from a constitutional inability to tell one from another. I hardly know the differences between Daddy has a red, red nose and Johnny likes his whisky neat on the one hand, or Nebraska and Dakota or Aspodestris of my Soul and Daffodilly of my heart. (This, I think, exhausts the various types of million-sellers.) Why does one sell like hot cakes and the other lie neglected on dusty shelves? Any office-boy could plough me in an examination as to the first class, and any lady typist could bowl me over by questions as to the third. I presume that a connoisseur in these matters would be surprised to learn that some of us know the difference between Handel's Largo and Le Sacre du Printemps, and could distinguish between a Beethoven slow movement and an Adagio of Spohr, and what is more, account for our taste. Can anybody explain this problem of musical psychology?

One possible explanation has been suggested to me by various conversations with gentlemen connected with the manufacture and sale of such wares. 'Best-sellers,' one of them once said to me, 'do not make themselves. They have to be nursed.' He was not well pleased with me when I replied that I was glad to hear that the public taste was not naturally bad, that the public was only weak and gullible; still less did he like me when I told him I thought he could put his time and his money to better uses than spoiling public taste. It was not without some satisfaction that I learned from another purveyor that the making of a 'best-seller' often costs so much in the way of advertisement, open and camouflaged, that the profits are eaten up by the expenses. If that is so, there is some hope that the trade in this particular kind of poison gas will suffer a slump and the healthier, natural instincts of the community—in which I have firm faith—will be allowed freer play.

One of the most costly ways of advertising, next to paying singers to sing the songs, is the making of anecdotes concerning the songs. This is only just, for it takes more brains to invent such a story than to write such a song. One of these stories was circulated largely some time ago, and was interesting because it showed what sort of thing the traders think impresses the public. The composer in question had long waited for inspiration in vain. Then during a sleepless night it came to him—in the shape of an exotic name. He woke, dressed with care, and lunched with his publisher (the artistic importance of this is obvious). After lunch he imparted his discovery to the publisher, who was delighted. The composer there and then hummed the tune to 'his' writer of lyrics, and when the latter had done his part the accompaniment was written and the masterpiece was complete. The story is far more artistic than the song, but why should it be supposed to make people buy the song? It apparently did, however.

Be this as it may, I shall certainly seek enlightenment as soon as possible by listening as carefully as I can to the record which gave rise to these reflections.

A. K.

Occasional Notes

Readers who, as performers or hearers, are interested in the music of the picture-theatre, should note that the Musical News and Herald now gives weekly consideration to the subject. The articles are so practical and constructive that we wish they had appeared a few years ago, before cinema music had got into its present miserable rut. We recently paid several visits to picture-theatres of various types with a view to dealing with the matter in our own columns, but the experience left us with the melancholy conviction that in all but a very few cases the musical arrangements are hopelessly bad, and must be so while the film industry remains in the hands of people usually inartistic and frequently even illiterate. What other form of entertainment makes its announcements with such dubious grammar—even with shaky spelling, and capital S's and N's wrong side up? In what theatre are to be seen plays in which so little is left to the imagination that the action is stopped while all sorts of unimportant details are thrust on the spectator? For example, at the Stoll Theatre we recently saw a long drama, alleged to be lurid, but actually tame and soporific. The entry of a character into a house was preceded by a picture of a mammoth hand ringing a mammoth door-bell! We were not credited with intelligence sufficient to realise that before one goes into another person's house it is customary to ring the bell, save on the rare occasions when one enters by the aid of a jemmy. And all the way through a tediously involved story the characters grimaced and attitudinised as no sane human being ever yet did save when acting for the pictures. When we read Mr. St. John Ervine's denunciation of the cinema in the Observer a few weeks ago we breathed a 'hear! hear!' and wished the article could be issued in pamphlet form and sown broadcast throughout the country. The picture-theatre has immense possibilities—educational, artistic, and recreational, but as yet it is scarcely touching the fringe of either of them. As Mr. Ervine said, it 'seems at present to be designed chiefly for the entertainment of mental epileptics.' So long as this is so, music has everything to lose and nothing to gain from association with it.

A fatal weakness of the film is its inability to dispense with some kind of accompaniment. So long as a picture is absorbing, we are hardly conscious of the music, though we miss it if it is absent. But if the picture fails to grip, and we are thrown back on the music, the result is generally painful, because of the mistaken attempts to follow the film too closely. The effect is scrappy, and when the scraps consist of the mangled remains of standard compositions we feel like throwing things; when they are bits of conventional melodramatic 'agits' and 'hurries' they are tolerable only because they are not mutilated Beethoven or Wagner. There appear to be only four ways in which music at the cinema can be made a useful adjunct—eventually perhaps a thoroughly artistic experience. First, we may build a fine organ and engage a gifted improviser to supply a musical background. Second, we may dispense with all attempts to follow the screen, and use good orchestral works as interludes or as a kind of generalised accompaniment to the picture. Third, and best of all, we may engage a composer (a real composer, not a syndicate of jazz and ragtime merchants) to write a special accompaniment. This accompaniment should be available for various combinations from full orchestra to pianoforte solo or duet, and it should be regarded as an integral part of the film for which it was written. The fourth method is a compromise—brief, well-written interludes of a dramatic or humorous character—something of the type already being used, only far better qua music.

It is useless, however, to expect any marked improvement until the excellent musicians now being engaged are given a free hand. At present the unmusical managers and trade officials have too large an influence. We have heard of an admirable musical scheme being condemned on the ground that 'it did not play to the picture'—in other words, it did not dot the i's and cross the t's of all the insignificant details on the screen. Only a musician realises fully how much music loses by an attempt to do this kind of thing. A producer who sees fit to hold up a story in order to show us such unnecessary incidents as the ringing of the door-bell, is unlikely to approve of a musical setting that is not similarly fussy and incoherent.

The cinema appears to be reaching a critical moment. On all sides we hear of dwindling receipts and loss where formerly everything in the garden was lovely. A few weeks ago a newspaper placard came out with the announcement 'Cinemas May Close.' This seems too much to hope for, but we may at least rejoice in its implication that the public is becoming more critical, and that before long the industry will in self-defence be bound to serve up something better than the present crude melodrama and elementary humour.

Mr. Gordon Craig has been letting himself go on this subject. In the current English Review he discovers a fine vein of vituperation, calling the cinema 'the brat of yellow journalism,' and summing things up in a phrase that is hardly an exaggeration: 'All that it touches it smears.' So, after all, we musicians have no more cause for complaint than other artists. The cinema having laid its obscene paw on the drama and literature (giving us, for example, Shakespeare shorn of his poetry and Dickens minus his humour), we can hardly expect music to escape. All we can do is to back up anybody who is working for an improvement. We hope the Musical News and Herald will go ahead in its crusade, and we intend to weigh in with a few words ourselves from time to time. They will probably be less heated than those we have now written, but our recent experiences of the cinema and its music are such that we keep cool with difficulty.

The letter in our correspondence columns from Lord Stuart of Wortley draws attention to a point often overlooked by those of us who are disposed to quicken the pace of old music. No doubt such quickening is based on two sound general principles: (a) What the early composers intended to sound brilliant should be made to sound so to-day; and (b) the general pace of rapid music having increased, we can obtain this brilliance only by greater speed. Often the result justifies the step, but there are a good many cases in which the tonal balance devised by the composer can be maintained only by the adoption of a speed that may strike us as staid. For example, it is no infrequent experience to hear a body of strings playing so rapidly that there is a lack of tone, the sustained passages by the brass being delivered meanwhile without such loss. As a result, the sustained background is far too prominent. The Finale of the seventh Symphony, even at the pace marked by Beethoven, is apt to give us some annoying moments because of the prominence of brass parts against the rapid theme played by the strings. At a quicker speed the theme is lost altogether—in fact, we doubt if any of our readers have ever heard it, save in snatches. The question is one that has so far received nothing like the attention it deserves. In the Beethoven example much might be done by toning down the brass, but so far from doing this, conductors as a rule urge the players on to fresh excesses.

Mr. Ernest Newman laid his finger on the chief weakness in modern organ playing when he wrote in the Sunday Times of February 12 :

Myself when young did eagerly frequent organ recitals, but my enthusiasm for them could not survive the irremovable defects of the instrument. The organ is a jolly thing to play, but very often a tiresome thing to listen to. So much time is lost hunting for this stop or that, the music being held up meanwhile, that the hearer with a sense of rhythm feels his reason slipping from him.

The defects, however, are as a rule in the player rather than in the instrument, and they are not irremovable. They do not exist in organists who, realising that rhythm is the life of music, refuse to sacrifice it to variety of tone-colour, which is never more than an accessory when fine music is concerned. In theory the numerous mechanical contrivances of the modern organ enable us to effect registration changes without delay, and no doubt in the case of a player who realises the importance of rhythm and is content with a modest colour scheme they do all that is claimed for them. But their presence too often proves a fatal snare. Blest with a multitude of stops and an array of gadgets wherewith to ring the changes on them, many organists seem to be unable to play more than a few bars without a change of tone-colour. Some of these changes they manage without breaking the rhythm; some they don't. A few years—even months—of succumbing to temptations of the latter type are sufficient to blunt a player's sense of rhythm. He is unconscious of the awkward gaps, having the music before him, and being able to pick up the threads, but his hearers suffer as Mr. Newman says they do. No wonder organists have such a bad reputation where rhythm is concerned. It is no uncommon experience to hear a player (splendidly equipped on the technical side) hold up a work in a simple passage while he makes some change of stop—often one so unimportant that the result is hardly apparent to the average hearer. But the average hearer cannot help spotting the loss of rhythm, especially in fugues and other movements wherein continuity is the main feature. Organists who think that a Bach fugue is intolerable without frequent change of power and colour apparently forget that some of the biggest of Bach's organ works have long been popular transcribed for the pianoforte—an instrument of one colour. Thousands of people, indeed, have never heard these works save on the pianoforte, and yet have not found them dull. But then the pianists who play these transcriptions do not halt from time to time to adjust their seat or catch a fly. They attend to the business in hand, which is to let the music speak without interruption. If our remark about catching a fly seems an exaggeration, let us support it by referring to Mr. Newman's criticism of a performance of a transcription of L'Après-midi d'un Faune :

Oh! how arthritic Debussy's poor old faun had become! To bask languidly in the Sicilian sun is one thing; to creak in every bone when you move is another. It all came from that hunt for stops and combinations. . . . I had the curiosity to time the performance. The little Eclogue took exactly twice as long as it does on the orchestra [our italics].

What should we think of an orchestral performance in which frequent breaks in the rhythm occurred while the players picked up their instruments, adjusted their pince-nez, and otherwise made ready for an entry? But the equivalent of this happens in a greater or less degree at many organ recitals. Of course it could be avoided by the use of assistants to lend a hand at some of the more awkward changes, but many recitalists appear to regard help of the kind as being likely to damage their reputation for skill. Yet it is worth noting that when Dr. Schweitzer gave a Bach recital the other day on the well-equipped organ at Trinity College, Cambridge, he made no bones about asking for such help. The rule organists ought to make in this matter is a very simple one, though it will at first require strength of mind to keep: if we have to choose between rhythm and registration, registration must go.

Who is the London correspondent of Musical America? He seems to be sending some odd news to his paper lately. A few weeks ago it was an account of a symphonic work by John Ireland entitled New York, a Rhapsody 'inspired,' said a caption, by the American city—a discovery that must have startled the composer. Then, in the issue of January 28 appeared a portrait of Dr. R. R. Terry, with the news that he 'will play the Wedding March for Princess Mary and Viscount Lascelles.' Over here we were under the impression that the musical arrangements will be on the simple side, and we took it for granted that Mr. Nicholson would be in charge, but our M.A. writer tells us that the arrangements 'include plans for an elaborate musical programme in which Dr. R. R. Terry, organist of Westminster Cathedral, and one of the finest organists in the United Kingdom, will participate.' In the issue of the following week we read that London gave Strauss a 'demonstrative welcome,' which it certainly did not, and that Strauss was to conduct one more concert in London—another bad shot. We have heard it suggested that there is no London correspondent, and that the 'news' from this side is written up in li'l old New York from London papers, but we hesitate to believe it. Probably the unkind suggestion is due to the fact that by a printer's error the Ireland composition had been previously spoken of in a London paper as 'New York' instead of 'New work.' But this is a mere coincidence of a type that may happen frequently, though we are bound to admit that it doesn't.

Readers who have followed the discussion which has been going on in our correspondence columns between Mr. Charles Tree and Mr. A. Keay should note that the issue is to be decided in vocal and hortatory combat at Wigmore Hall on March 6, at 8 o'clock. Particulars will be found in Mr. Tree's announcement on page 149.

The following notice of Mr. Howard-Jones's recital at Paris appeared in Le Ménestrel of January 20. The views of foreign critics on modern British music are sufficiently rare to make this comment on Ireland's Pianoforte Sonata worth reprinting :

M. Howard-Jones est un artiste délicat et souvent subtil. Visiblement, l'effort d'interprétation est chez lui avant tout d'ordre intellectuel. Apercevoir en chaque œuvre un ensemble de problèmes, dont les solutions devront être découvertes selon un ordre très strict; puis, ces solutions atteintes faire disparaître toutes traces des démarches qui les préparèrent. Aucun pédantisme en effet, au milieu de cette incontestable réussite technique. Après avoir remarquablement exécuté deux Préludes et Fugues de Bach (la bémol, et si bémol), et la Sonate en ut dièse mineur, Op. 27, de Beethoven, M. Howard-Jones fit applaudir la très intéressante et vigoureuse Sonate d'un auteur Anglais contemporain, John Ireland. Par la première partie Allegro moderato, nous sommes mêlés, dès le début, à une sorte de ruissellement sonore. De toutes parts, des notes bondissantes—qui s'enchevêtrent—et jamais ne s'attardent. Mais voici qu'avec la seconde partie, non troppo lento, survient comme un scrupule en face d'un tel élan. C'est tout d'un coup, après la période de joie impersonnelle et presque inconsciente, une méditation dans la solitude. Et la troisième partie, con moto moderato, apporte la synthèse de ce qui jusque-là demeurait opposition pure. Retour, désormais, à la possibilité de la joie; mais cette joie sera maintenant individualisée et lucide. Les formes qui au commencement de l'œuvre n'étaient que de fuyantes ébauches, reparaissent isolées et distinctes. Le récital se termina par de brillantes interprétations de Debussy et de Chopin. M. Howard-Jones joua de façon particulièrement remarquable la Mazurka en la bémol.

Music in the Foreign Press

In the Zeitschrift für Musikwissenschaft (December) Karl Blessinger inquires into the symptoms of decadent tendencies in music :

Recent investigations show that when all is said and done, æsthetics as a science must fall back upon the ultima ratio of subjective appraisal. We cannot, therefore, arrive at an accurate estimate of the artistic value of 'atonal' music; but technical analysis may show us which elements of such music are to be considered as symptoms of decadence, and which as foundations of sound progress. It is not always easy to determine the symptoms of decadence. Attempts to shake off the yoke of tradition, to achieve absolute novelty, may be the natural consequence of an altogether healthy reaction—as, for instance, when the Florentine musicians of three hundred years ago substituted monody for the comparatively excessive complications of music as previously understood. But in to-day's endeavours we see no attempt to vitalise music by introducing a new spiritual principle, a principle of form: the battle is waged solely against traditional means of expression.

The writer proceeds to describe the 'narcotic' effects of many modern innovations, in which he sees the outcome of a decadent frame of mind. He considers that the growing tendency to resort to the data not of the conscious mind, but of the subconscious (what is called 'inner necessity'), is a return to primitive conditions, which must lead to artistic atony :

When we see that sensitiveness predominates over volition; and conscious will-power yields to subconscious impulse; that consciousness and subconsciousness, instead of co-operating, follow separate paths, or are at cross-purposes, then we are entitled to speak of decadence. Excess of nervous (aural) sensitiveness and extreme nicety of aural perception are two different things. Those who clamour for quarter-tones or thirds of tones, far from showing the great discriminating power of their sense of hearing, reveal its inadequacy. For the notion of dividing tones or semitones into equal portions rests upon that of temperament, which in itself is a compromise: there are no such things as equal quarter-tones and so forth in natural tones, although there exist plenty of lesser differentiations. To attempt to derive new resources from the exploitation of higher partials leads to sharper differentiations in timbres and colour-shades, with the result that the listener's attention is arrested by each single resonance and deflected from the general trend of the music. Another characteristic symptom which reveals the incapacity to think in broad, co-ordinated terms, is the lack of melodic structure, the fondness for short motives repeated or strung together in endless array. The symptoms of decadence are very much the same in most countries, and seem to herald an outbreak of musical internationalism.

THE FRENCH 'SIX'

In Le Temps (December 30) Emile Vuillermoz, in an article devoted to Honegger's Dramatic Psalm Le Roi David (which he describes as a fine, powerful, altogether genuine work), writes :

Honegger belongs, officially, to a little group which, despite its leaders' frantic efforts to secure notoriety, is very little known. Boundless audacity has enabled these young men to scare the majority of our critics and publishers, who live in fear of being found wanting in comprehension. They have made their trade-mark known, but at the expense of the products which it covers. We may not blame them for having attempted a short cut towards the advantages which greater musicians have not found so easily; or even for their ungratefulness towards the very artists who paved the way for them. What is neither straightforward nor decent is the complacency with which they allow the legend to which they owe their notoriety to subsist, knowing it altogether false. They have a nimble mahout, whom they carefully obey. They have a programme of reforms, which has been placed in their hands and seems never to have been read by them. It is incredible that we should be expected to believe that programme to have been inspired by the music which the half-dozen co-partners have written. But they raise no protest, they allow themselves to be described as apostles of a faith which they are not in the least entitled to stand for. We should like to see these young musicians, whom community of ambitions rather than community of artistic convictions has brought together, dispel the misunderstanding.

ARTHUR HONEGGER

In the Revue Musicale (January) René Chalupt studies the output of this active and versatile composer, in which he finds a great deal to admire. He specially praises Honegger's simplicity and earnestness of purpose, and considers that he remains far closer to classical tradition than the other members of his group.

SEM DRESDEN

In the same issue, Henry de Groot refers to Sem Dresden, a Dutch composer, born in 1881, who studied at Amsterdam and later at Berlin (with Pfitzner), praising his Sextets for wind instruments and pianoforte, and mentioning his other works.

GEORGIA'S MUSIC

Also in the same number, Vladimir Zederbaoum names a number of contemporary Georgian composers: Araktchief, Palief, Dolidse, Balanchiradse. Political events, he says, have interfered with promising attempts to organize musical education throughout the country.

MALIPIERO

In Die Musikwelt (January 1) Dr. H. R. Fleischmann has high praise for Malipiero's works:

He is essentially a symphonist, a composer who thinks and writes in terms of the orchestra. There is power in his Sinfonie del Silenzio e de la Morte, the only work of his first period which he has not destroyed. Those of the second period comprise Per una favola cavalleresca (1914-15), Impressioni dal Vero (1910-15), Pause del Silenzio, and Ditirambo Tragico (1917). He has written several dramatic scores: Sogno di un Tramonto d'Autunno; a trilogy, Orfeide; a set of three operas after comedies by Goldoni; a symphonic drama, Pantea; a Ballet, La Mascherata delle principesse prigioniere; and a mystery play, St. Francis of Assisi.

THE BALLET IN THE 19TH CENTURY

Such is the title of the special December issue of the Revue Musicale, which contains articles by Paul Valéry, Vuillermoz, Levinson, Boris de Schloezer, Cœuroy, Henry Prunières, and others, with many illustrations and reproductions of old documents. Particularly interesting is Prunières's article on Salvatore Vigano, the Neapolitan ballet-master.

OVERSTRUNG versus PARALLEL-STRUNG PIANOFORTEs

In Le Courrier Musical (February) Albert Bertelin writes that in overstrung pianofortes the volume of sound may be greater than in the parallel-strung, but the tone is less clear, less fine in quality. The lower register becomes heavy and blurred; even shades of colour are less easy to secure. In chamber music, the increased volume of tone is a disadvantage.

M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

The Musician's Bookshelf

DEBUSSY AS CRITIC

But, to start with, 'critic' is here the wrong word—as it always is. Less than anybody Debussy in his writings on music (now posthumously collected as Monsieur Croche, Antidilettante—Paris, Dorbon aîné, 25 fr.) cared to disguise his whim under a judicial cloak.

After all, he was Claude Debussy. He had only to indicate his purely personal reactions; it was enough, without a need of representing himself as the delegate of this or that community, this or that tradition. He had not to be complete, and hear and sum up—like a judge sitting in court all day—all sides of the case. The mere notation of C. D.'s whim was interesting enough. The ways of his whim will, through Mrs. Franz Liebich's translations* some years ago, be remembered. He could give a graceful or witty turn to his expression of like or dislike. He could drop a hint of the æsthetics which ruled his own exquisite art. Shrinkingly, as we feel, he even once now and then got up to move a perfunctory vote of thanks or vote of censure on matters which he could not have thought worth mentioning.

It is all perfect in manner and faintly bored, even when it rails; it is so slight in body that you get rather the echo of 'a good thing' than the actual sound of it; the excision, in this book, of some vivacious remarks (about Wagner and Franck, for instance) makes it slighter still; and irony 'which allows of suffering in public,' runs through it all. His whim is now and then on the verge of a negation of organized music even, and he puts on the lips of his alter ego 'Mr. Quaver' (Monsieur Croche):

'I would rather have the few notes of an Egyptian shepherd's flute; he collaborates with the landscape and hears harmonies unknown to your handbooks. Musicians listen only to music written by clever hands, never to music inscribed in nature. To see the sunrise is of more use than to hear the Pastoral Symphony. To what end your well-nigh incomprehensible art? Ought you not to suppress the parasitical complications which, in their ingenuity, suggest some burglar-proof lock of a safe? You shuffle about because you know nothing but music and obey barbarous, unknown laws. People hail you with sumptuous epithets, while you are merely clever. Something between a monkey and a footman!'

And here is no doubt an answer to requests for something tangible out of the visionary projects of the later year: '... to finish a work?—childish vanity—a need of getting rid at any price of an idea with which one has lived too long!'

The idea of glory fades to this: 'A man unknown for century after century, until one day his secret is all by chance deciphered!—To have been one of those men—there is the one form of glory worth having!'

The Paris opera house is the target for a few shafts. Its boxes are 'the last salons where the art of conversation is cultivated.' To the uninstructed passer-by 'it always looks like a railway station. Once inside you might take it for a Turkish bath. They go on making there a queer noise which the people who have paid for it call music.' The Prix de Rome is 'the most ridiculous' of all French institutions. The virtuoso's attraction for the public is 'rather like that which draws crowds to the circus. People always hope that something dangerous is going to happen.'

Debussy's kindest words are for Rameau and for Moussorgsky's Nursery song-cycle. Concerning Liszt, 'The undeniable beauty of his work comes, I believe, from his having loved Music to the exclusion of all other feeling. If sometimes he talks to her familiarly and frankly sets her on his knee, why, that is better than the starched manner of those who behave as though they were being introduced for the first time.'

But Berlioz was 'so fond of romantic colour that he sometimes forgets about music.' He is 'the favourite composer of those who do not know very much about music.'

Beethoven's Sonatas are 'very badly written for the pianoforte. They are more truly, especially the last ones, transcriptions from the orchestra. There is often lacking a part for a third hand which Beethoven certainly heard, or, at least, I hope so.'

The finest character in Parsifal belongs to Klingsor. 'He is marvellous in his rancorous hate. He knows what men are worth, and weighs their vows of chastity in the balance of scorn. He is the one human, the one moral personage of the drama.'

Debussy reproaches Massenet 'only with his infidelities to Manon. There (at the Opéra-Comique) he found the frame which suited his habits as a "flirt," and he ought not to have forced them to enter the Opéra. One does not flirt at the Opéra.'

(Continued on page 183)

* Musical Times, July, August, November, 1918; November, 1919.

PART-SONG FOR MIXED VOICES (UNACCOMPANIED).

Poem by Sir WALTER SCOTT, from "The Lady of the Lake."

Music by GERRARD WILLIAMS.
(Jan. 18, 1922.)

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED; NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

Andantino.

SOPRANO. p The toils are pitched, and the stakes are set,

ALTO. p Ev - er sing mer - ri - ly,

TENOR. p Ev - er sing mer - ri - ly,

BASS.

PIANO
(For practice only.) Andantino. p

The bows they bend, and the knives they whet,

mer - ri - ly; Hunt - ers live so . . cheer - i - ly.

mer - ri - ly; Hunt - ers live so . . cheer - i - ly.

Hunt - ers live so cheer - i - ly.

Copyright, 1922, by Novello and Company, Limited.

mf Bear-ing its branch - es stur - di - ly ;

mf It was a stag, a stag of ten, mf It was a stag, a stag of ten, . . . Bear-ing its branch - es stur - di - ly ;

mf It was a stag, a stag of ten, . . . Bear-ing its branch - es stur - di - ly ;

He came state - ly down the glen.

He came state - ly down the glen, . . . Ev - er sing hard - i - ly, hard - i - ly. pp

He came state - ly down the glen, . . . Ev - er sing hard - i - ly, hard - i - ly. It was

He came state - ly down the glen, Ev - er sing hard - i - ly, hard - i - ly. pp

pp She was bleed - ing death - ful - ly ;

pp She was bleed - ing death - ful - ly ;

there he met with a wound - ed doe, She

M-m, Oh, so faith - ful - ly, faith - ful - ly.

M-m, Oh, so faith - ful - ly, faith - ful - ly.

warned him of the toils be - low.

pp Oh, so faith - ful - ly, faith - ful - ly.

This system contains five staves. The first two staves are vocal parts with lyrics. The third staff continues the vocal line with the lyric 'warned him of the toils be - low.' The fourth staff is a piano accompaniment part starting with a pp dynamic. The fifth staff continues the piano accompaniment.

dim. He had an eye, and he could heed, dim. He had an eye, and he could heed, . . Ev - er sing war - i - ly, war - i - ly;

dim. He had an eye, and he could heed, . . Ev - er sing war - i - ly, war - i - ly;

f dim. He had an eye, and he could heed, . . Ev - er sing war - i - ly, war - i - ly;

This system contains five staves. The first four staves are vocal parts with lyrics. The first staff has a dim. dynamic. The second and third staves also have dim. dynamics. The fourth staff has a f dynamic followed by a dim. dynamic. The fifth staff is a piano accompaniment part starting with a f dynamic, followed by a dim. dynamic.

cres. dim.

He had a foot, and he could speed—

cres. dim.

He had a foot, and he could speed— Hunt - ers watch so . . nar - row - ly, . .

cres. dim.

He had a foot, and he . . could speed— Hunt - ers watch so . . nar - row - ly, . .

cres. dim.

He had a foot, and he could speed— Hunt - ers watch so nar - row - ly. . .

pp

Hunt - ers watch so . . nar - row - ly.

pp

Hunt - ers watch so . . nar - row - ly.

pp

Hunt - ers watch so . . nar - row - ly.

pp

Hunt - ers watch so . . nar - row - ly.

(Continued from page 178.)

One utters very loudly incomprehensible words, and if loving vows are exchanged it is only with the assent of the brass.' And again, 'Massenet was the most truly beloved of contemporary musicians. His fellow composers ill forgave him this gift of pleasing.'

C.

MOZART AND THE SONATA

F. Helena Marks's book, The Sonata; Its Form and Meaning as exemplified in the Pianoforte Sonatas of Mozart (William Reeves, 8s. 6d.), is an exhaustive and scholarly investigation not only of the Sonatas in question but of the divergent opinions and views of well known authorities who have written on the subject. In her Preface the author quotes a passage from Sir Hubert Parry's article on Mozart in Grove's Dictionary in which he calls attention to Mozart's extraordinary and hitherto unsurpassed instinct for formal perfection and to the perfect symmetry of his best works, as well as to the fact that these formal outlines were fresh enough to bear a great deal of use without losing their sweetness, and that Mozart used them with remarkable regularity. She quotes these remarks as an explanation of certain broad similarities of treatment which are to be found throughout Mozart's Sonatas, and makes a special point of the existence of a variety of detail in the movements which she says is worthy of the closest, the most careful study not only on account of its variety and inherent beauty, but also on account of the divergent views held with respect to many of the passages by various writers on musical form. Therefore throughout this descriptive analysis of Mozart's Sonatas the author is at pains to confront the student with the varying arguments of these widely differing authorities, and to impress upon him the necessity for comparing views and for computing the relative value of their different arguments. She believes that the idea of comparative analysis as extended in scope as that offered in her volume is quite new in a published work.

Throughout this closely-reasoned analysis of his Sonatas the winsome countenance of Mozart can be glimpsed. For in every bar of his music the mercurial personality of the composer is present, with his childlike love of glittering jewels and gleaming billiard balls, his simple delight in fairy-tales, in dancing, or in his travel from place to place. And the premonitory sadness of the tragic last years of his martyred life can be discerned also.

In her introductory chapter the author discusses the sonata as a work in the abstract, giving a general notion of its usual construction and form, while at the same time she wisely advises the student to bear in mind that there are a large number of cases in which the plan is varied, and in other instances (e.g., Mozart in A major, No. 11 in her volume) none of the movements is written in sonata form.

In a foot-note to a passage in her Preface, on the subject of the more rarely employed chords in these Sonatas, she adds:

'The student must realise that many of the laws which governed the methods of the great classical composers have gradually been relaxed, till to-day freedom is the key-note in composition, and to future generations must belong the task of forming the laws, if any, which underlie some of the works of our modern composers.'

The words 'if any' are inopportune. All evolution is subject to laws. Modern music is liberated from past conventions, but its present unceasing evolution is governed by laws as strict as any of those of the past. Mozart made completely free with the means at his disposal, and worked within the bounds of the harmonic discoveries of his own and of his time as unconstrainedly as any modern of our day.

There is an excellent bibliography in Mrs. Marks's volume. The pages and paragraphs from which the references are taken are tabulated side by side with their use within the pages of her own volume. Also, as her numbering of the Sonatas is after Ludwig von Köchel's chronology, she gives a comparative table of various editions of Mozart's Pianoforte Sonatas, with their different modes of numbering, so that the student can find at once any of the Sonatas in whatever edition he may happen to possess.

L. L.

A NEW BOOK ON ORGAN STOPS

'When will the organist arise who will gloat over the beauties of his glorious instrument as the violinist gloats over the wonders of his Stradivarius?' Dr. G. A. Audsley asks the question. Well, the truth is that so many of us are afflicted with inglorious instruments that all our powers of gloating have to be expended on some other fellow's organ, which at best affords but slender satisfaction and is bound to involve damage to the tenth commandment. To the attention of those who would gloat intelligently, whether over their own or another's instrument, we commend a new work by Dr. Audsley, 'Organ Stops and their Artistic Registration' (New York: The H. W. Gray Co. London: Novello. 12s. 6d.).

Dr. Audsley has a double purpose: to put a mass of information before the organ-student, who is usually woefully ignorant of the details of his own instrument; and to proffer advice to those whose duty it may be to design new organs.

The book comprises two sections. The first is concerned with the tonal build of the organ and with the art of registration. The author quite rightly points out that technique, though it is of great importance, is not the only problem to be considered in organ playing. Side by side with purely technical skill must be built up a thorough understanding of the tonal resources of the organ and of the best way to use them in the 'orchestration,' if we may use the term, of the music to be performed.

The second, and by far the more important section of the book, consists of a glossary of organ stops. In this connection it may be well to say that though the book is produced in America, this glossary is not by any means confined to the names of stops usual in that country. It is a very comprehensive affair, and includes not only English, but French, German, and even Spanish names. References, moreover, are frequently made to actual organs and individual organ-builders in this and other countries. Obviously the space devoted to each stop has to be limited, and in some of the less important stops a line or two suffices; but many of the articles run to considerable length and contain a great deal of information. In each case the equivalent of the name in other languages is given, followed by a description of the tonal characteristics, the formation of the pipe, often illustrated by diagrams or plates, and the possibilities of the stop in combination. Incidentally much is said about scales, wind-pressures, composition of Mixtures, and a host of other things.

In such a subject the question of personal taste is bound to arise, and though the author—who has spent a life-time in study and experiment—speaks with authority, many readers will doubtless disagree with him in some of his conclusions. Those, for instance, who favour leathery Diapasons, unenclosed Tubas, and the exclusion of Mixtures, will find Dr. Audsley in opposition. For ourselves, the chief grumble is that the author is not up-to-date in his references to English organ-building. The most recent organ he mentions seems to be that in Colston Hall, Bristol; but all sorts of interesting things have happened since 1905. The organ at St. Mary Redcliff, for example, has an enclosed 32-ft. Reed, a fact which should have been mentioned in connection with the remarks under 'Contra Bombarde'; and the same organ possesses a 16-ft. Clarinet on the Pedal, borrowed from the Solo, an expedient which the author advocates under 'Double Clarinet.' References might have been expected to the introduction of Viol Mixtures, the Horn Quint, to the schemes at Liverpool and Newcastle Cathedrals, and to many other developments of recent years in this country.

Readers whose knowledge of French and German is only rudimentary would have welcomed translations of the many quotations from treatises in those languages, and space could easily have been found without increasing the size of the volume if some unnecessary duplications had been avoided. But these objections do not alter the fact that in this book Dr. Audsley has made a very valuable contribution to organ literature, which every organist worthy the name should add to his library.

J. A. S.

RHYTHMIC MOVEMENT

The word 'eurhythm' is synonymous with symmetry, beauty, shapeliness, harmony of proportion. 'It is through the medium of the body,' wrote Plato, 'that eurhythm is instilled into the mind, and it is by means of gymnastic dances that eurhythm is taught.' In vol. ii. of M. Jaques-Dalcroze's Method of Eurhythmics: Rhythmic Movement (Novello, 7s. 6d.), his numerous exercises are almost as varied as the ramifications of a widely-branching tree, which is again synonymous of eurhythm in its balanced wealth of bough and twig and foliage.

These exercises strengthen the mental faculties as well as the limbs. By associating the movements of the body with music, and submitting the gestures to the rhythmic exigencies of the different melodies, the pupils' minds become alert and active, while the limbs are gradually converted into the obedient servants of the brain. The students are taught to phrase with the arms and feet, to walk six steps to the bar, clapping in syncopation, and then to clap the beats and walk the syncopation. Similar groups of notes are given with varying accents. Thus more and more independence of the limbs is brought about. The pupils learn to improvise a theme; a second pupil repeats it with a slight variation; a third repeats it with another variation.

There are also breathing exercises and aural exercises, division of long note-values into shorter values or into rhythms, exercises in interpreting an appoggiatura, and all these are again varied by being thought out in sextuple, septuple, octuple, and nonuple time. In chapter 9 there are suggestions for the composition of new exercises, such as realisation in canon, in counterpoint, in phrasing, and so on.

One of the best exercises consists in interpreting a melody. The pupils learn a melody by heart. One of them conducts it, using his own interpretation as to nuances and phrasing, while the others follow his lead, singing. The conductor must use such gestures or attitudes as will enable him to give an intelligent rendering of the melody. In such exercises this rhythmic gymnastic loses a good deal of its pedantic stiffness. It sets aside grammar, and becomes expression. Its prose is converted into poetry, and at the end of the volume thirty-six different melodies are provided to be conducted and interpreted by the body—the agogic and dynamic nuances to be manifested by gestures, step, and posture.

M. Jaques-Dalcroze devotes eighteen pages of this volume to eurhythmics applied to pianoforte technique. It is, he says, of first importance that the economic principle upon which so much stress is laid in the method, i.e., that every movement must be carried out with the minimum of muscular energy, should be applied to the technical study of the instrument.

So these exercises in dissociated or combined movements for the whole arm, forearm, hand, and fingers, may tend to tone down the excessive dynamic energy which is too often directed against the keyboard of that long-suffering instrument, the pianoforte, and if such is the case, the ranks of the noisy prosateurs among pianists may be lessened, and those of the poetic players augmented by M. Dalcroze's latest application of eurhythmics to pianoforte technique.

L. L.

INDIAN MUSIC

We have seen Mr. Herbert A. Popley's The Music of India (Association Press, Calcutta; Oxford University Press; and J. Curwen & Sons, 5s.) well reviewed, and need not spend more words here on its merits than to say that it is the work of a conscientious man, equipped with the necessary knowledge, writing on a subject he understands and cares for. We will rather use it as a peg for a short discourse on melodic music.

A great deal of wonderment has been expended over melodic, and especially the Indian, scales, by people who have seen them only tabulated on paper. The only true test is to hear them, and to listen not casually but carefully. As most of us have pressing engagements in our own land, and as the representatives of this music who come to visit us are seldom worthy or even adequate exponents of a subtle art, it is best to get an idea of the sound in another way. The bagpipe has two scales—from A, with a 'neutral' third and sixth, and from G, with a sharpish fourth and a flattish seventh. Listen to this long enough to forget what our own scale is like, learn the bagpipe airs in that scale, and then, when you play those airs in the European scale, you will find they are—as the Scotch sometimes say they are—out of tune. The Indian scales are very different in detail from those of the bagpipe, but the aural effect is, to us, much the same. One sentence in Parry's Art of Music (second chapter) draws the true conclusion:

'An ideally tuned scale is as much of a dream as the philosopher's stone, and no one who clearly understands the meaning of art wants it.'

The sixty scales in common use in India, and the hundred more which are rarely used, are not imperfect attempts at some ideal not yet understood; they were invented, and are retained, to answer another purpose than ours.

The difficulty in listening lies elsewhere. It is to get accustomed to, and to be able to take for granted, certain melodic figures which are unfamiliar to us. They sound, like the melismata of plainsong and folksong, quaint, or old-fashioned, or capricious, and we do not know what to make of them. There are queer jumps and long, monotonous movements by step, and both come where we do not expect them. There is much in India that strikes us as mere topsy-turveydom, but which, when we look closer, makes us ask ourselves if what we consider normal is based on anything more than accident. Hence, to become familiar with Indian melodies—enough to be able to tell at a glance whether this one before us is Indian or not—is to widen our conception of melody in general, and thereby of our own. There is a lightness of touch, a careless negligence, an irresponsibility in them from which we—who have on the whole worshipped in the past other musical gods—may learn.

We all have our own view of what music means to us, and that meaning ranges somewhere between two poles—the delight in the pattern of line and texture, and the satisfaction of having our feelings relieved and our passions purged; and, according as we incline one way or the other, we call it 'absolute' or 'programme.' The Indian feels the same. He will sing straight on end for twenty or thirty minutes; you will hardly notice his taking breath even, and not one of his variations will be exactly the same as another. And, on the other hand, he is full of tales of the wonders that music has worked in the relations of gods and men, and will draw pictures—often very beautiful works of art—to explain what he feels when he hears it. Only his music will not purge our passions, nor will ours weave patterns intelligible to his ear.

Yet when we listen to his best music—and nine-tenths of it is inferior, just as with us—we have those very things that we recognise as merits: pulsating life, appropriateness to its purpose, economy of resource, a swift cleanness, an inexhaustible fancy, a depth of vision. We have to earn these things, there as here, by long tracts of indifference or dullness, but when they come there is no mistaking them, they smite us with the sudden splendour of Plato's electron. Moreover, the Indian understands better than we do when and where to make music. We are capable of playing the B minor Mass in a local town hall and Heldenleben in a cathedral; he knows that there is a tune for winter and another for spring, one to greet the sun and another to see him to rest, and a third for the silences of the night, and that dreadful things will happen to body or soul (and both are divine) if the prescription is infringed. He receives it also in a different way. If it is of one kind he gets up and dances, if of another he sits cross-legged and weeps; another, and he trembles from head to foot, his pagri falls off and his chignon falls down. We sit in a plush chair, and when we think it has finished we give three claps as much as to say 'Thank you,' and add another three if the majority seem to be doing so; sometimes we clap before it has finished for fear we should seem to be impolite, and sometimes we clap as we come into the room the piece that we did not hear outside. The Indian does not read a paper, hot and hot, next morning, to tell him whether he ought to have liked it; he does not need that, because he has already breathed a deep achchha (good) during the performance at every salient structural point.

The one question that vexes the righteous soul of the Indian is about the purity and authenticity of his 'mode.' A conference has recently been held at Delhi to try to arrive at some definitive statement on this point. The purity we can understand, because our folk-singers feel the same about it, but the question of its authenticity puzzles us. We wonder what he would consider authentic—a thousand, or two thousand, or three thousand years?—and what he would gain by putting back the clock. The explanation is that he has no sense of history as we understand it. Things were not evolved but revealed for him, and revelation was 'heard' from the gods in the first instance and afterwards 'remembered' by inspired men. He has no inkling of the fact that the human intellect is continually groping its way through the data of Nature to a musical convention, or of the idea that the art, which can only begin after the convention is established, is far more important than any question that can be asked about the convention itself.

But there is another question which he does not ask himself, but which we may ask—Does he need a musical notation? Notation in India is only a century or two old: before that music was oral. If a notation, which shall it be? Tonic sol-fa, which he has, but in about ten different scripts (not mutually intelligible), or some form of staff notation? If or when he has it, the result will be to make composer and performer two persons instead of one. With staff notation—which is gaining ground concurrently with a little hand-blown harmonium of two octaves—he will add chords; short-circuiting our European experience he will adopt some form of equal temperament, and with that his 'modes' will go. The process may take a hundred years; it would be interesting to know how it will work out. The only precedents that spring to mind are some negro folk-songs (in four parts) just published by Schirmer, and the Maori singers who were here about ten years ago. Well, the European system is not final; very likely they have a different one in Mars.

GLOBE-TROTTER.

CHURCH CHOIR TRAINING

Much sound advice for the inexperienced young choirmaster is packed between the covers of Dr. H. W. Richards's little book Church Choir Training (Joseph Williams). It forms one of the Joseph Williams series of handbooks on music under the editorship of Stewart Macpherson, and is a reprint in extended form of three lectures given at the invitation of the Royal College of Organists in 1903. Questions relating to the function of the organist as an accompanist are not dealt with, and for this department of his work the reader is referred to the author's earlier work The Organ Accompaniment of the Church Services (No. 2 of the same series of books). Naturally, within the limits of a handbook such as this, we do not look for exhaustive treatment of every detail of either singing or choir training; but the author has endeavoured—and with a considerable amount of success—'to give so far as possible in a small space practical advice on general points too often overlooked or neglected, for the benefit of those who need it, viz., those choirmasters who have to do the best they can with poorly paid or voluntary choirs in small parish churches.'

Dr. Richards's recommendations in the chapter on 'Methods of Voice Production' are, we think—taking into consideration those for whom the book is primarily intended—sound and wise: at any rate, those who follow his advice will be on the safe side.

In dealing with the vowel sounds, some well-needed advice on the use and abuse of the sound oo is given. By the way, there are some misprints on page 20. In Ex. 20, ah should be oh, and three lines below this ei should be ee. The direction on this page that 'the lips only are to move for the change of vowel' is rather misleading, as of course the position of the tongue is not invariable. The little exercise on the word 'bright' on page 21 might with advantage have been expressed rather differently: as it stands, it brings the final sound of the diphthong into undue prominence.

It is impossible to do more than hint at the various points touched on by Dr. Richards. Besides the subjects already referred to, there are two chapters dealing specially with matters concerning a boy's training. Other chapters deal with Intonation and Expression—Balance, Ensemble, Men's Voices—Psalms and Responses—Hymns—Rehearsals and Church Music—Matters connected with the management of a Choir—Conducting and Teaching. On all these subjects the author gives much wise counsel.

For the benefit of the young organist who is inclined too exclusively to concentrate on solo playing we quote from the chapter on Choir Management:

'It will be found that the man most sought for nowadays is the one who can train a choir, understands boys, and is able to keep order. Such a one, even if an inferior player, need never fear being without a post.'

Dr. Richards's admirable little book may be cordially recommended to the notice of choir-trainers.

G. G.

A VOLUME OF ESSAYS

Music as a Humanity and other Essays, by D. G. Mason, forms vol. iv. of the Appreciation of Music series (H. W. Gray Co., New York). The writer has chosen a wide range of subjects. Starting with the rightful idea of placing music on an equality with letters, and tracing the attitude of the American college man to music, Mr. Mason devotes a whole essay to 'Harvard the Pioneer'—for Harvard was the first American college to introduce into its curriculum the study of music. Since then other American colleges have more or less followed Harvard's lead. In the first essay he launches out against the undue exploitation of personality among artists. It leads, he says, to the exaggeration of the importance of virtuosity and the silly idolising of soloists and opera singers, all of which, he considers, are as injurious to musical art as the star system is to dramatic art. The achievement of impersonal expression and beauty he regards as the aim of musical art. Yet Mr. Mason overlooks the fact that few and far between are the radiant minds which, like Meredith's skylark, can render

The song seraphically free
Of taint of personality.

From a consideration of American 'Music Festivals' and 'Patrons of Art' Mr. Mason passes on to Vernon Lee on 'Musical Aesthetics,' Bertrand Russell on 'Music and Mathematics,' and Vincent d'Indy on 'Composition.' The last essay but one, devoted to 'Psycho-analysis and the American Composer,' makes somewhat depressing reading, for Mr. Mason has convinced himself that most of the young American composers are imitating Ravel and Debussy, or Rimsky-Korsakov and Stravinsky, or Bloch and Ornstein, more or less cleverly. Few, he says, are trying to grope towards their own light, to find their own speech, to accept with courage the limitation of their own temperament. This sounds cheerless for the young American composer. But he can take consolation in the fact that he will find himself in good company at the pillory, for Mr. Mason sums up Ravel and Debussy, in another part of his essay, as 'over-refined and denuded of ideas,' and elsewhere Stravinsky's music is described as 'without attempt at specifically musical quality.' One therefore asks if this writer's judgment of his young compatriots may not, perhaps, be coloured by his distinctly prejudicial estimate of modern music and modern composers. All the same, the book is stimulating by reason of the author's enthusiasm and choice of diversified subjects all bearing on the art of music.

L. L.

One of the books few musicians can do without is The Musical Directory. We have just received the issue for 1922 (Rudall, Carte, & Co. 7s.).

New Music

STRING MUSIC AND CHAMBER MUSIC

Mr. Herbert Howells's Rhapsodic Quintet for clarinet, two violins, viola, and violoncello (Carnegie Collection of British music) shows a good deal of thought in the balancing of parts and unusual anxiety to keep the interest alive from start to finish. The combination of a clarinet and strings has its peculiar difficulties, none the less serious because there is the example and precedent of Brahms. The value of Brahms's work is seldom in the particularly effective use of an instrument. The opening of the slow movement in the Violin Concerto must always remain the typical example of careless orchestration. Berlioz found stimulus and inspiration in recalling the various timbres of the orchestral instruments. Brahms, with few exceptions, was singularly irresponsible in this respect, and probably held that good music must sound well on any instrument capable of performing it. The chamber works of his in which the clarinet is employed are excellent mainly on account of the interest, strength, and quality of the musical texture, and not because of any special effect obtained by the employment of a clarinet—apart, of course, from the inevitable effects of contrast. The main difficulty lies in the fascination the new combination exercises on the composer, and leads him to write something rather in the nature of a clarinet solo with the elaborate support of the strings than music in which every voice has equal value. Mr. Howells has not escaped the siren call of the clarinet, and allows it, perhaps too often, to give us the impression of the cockerel which in the familiar line

Stoutly struts his dames before.

There are moments when the strings assert their authority. But a reading of the score does give the impression that the peculiar colour of the clarinet will predominate throughout. Possibly this is the intention of the composer, in which case only the test of actual performance can decide whether it is the best of the possible uses of such a combination, or whether more telling effects would not have been possible if the wind instrument had been used with a more sparing hand.

Three short compositions by M. Oreste Ravanello (Zanibon, Padua) show unquestionable skill in the handling of the parts, but the Meditazione (for clarinet and string orchestra) may almost be described as for clarinet and string accompaniment. The Canto Mistico for strings and organ, and the Andante for organ and string quintet are able enough if somewhat unenterprising. Messrs. Metzler have added Mendelssohn's Spring Song, Nevin's Narcissus, Raff's Cavatina, and Rubinstein's Melody in F to their trio series. The musician accustomed to the highly-seasoned dishes of the modern school is apt to look askance at the homely charms of the Spring Song and the Melody in F. But, oddly enough, music was never written solely for the delectation of musicians. And the young idea still finds pleasure in simple fare. F. B.

In these days of prolific younglings whose opus numbers far exceed their years, it is refreshing to come across a mature composer with scarcely a dozen works in print, if those few works atone by quality of style and workmanship for the lack of their unwritten or discarded fellows. Zoltán Kodály's second String Quartet (Universal Edition)—Op. 10, composed in his thirty-sixth year—is particularly interesting, not only for its intrinsic merit, but also for the enormous advance it shows upon the first Quartet, written eight or nine years earlier—an advance not towards conformity with the current musical jargon which is summed up in the vague word 'modernity,' but, on the contrary, towards a more direct and personal style of expression. This music is of a deceptive simplicity which will yield more to prolonged study than much that is of far greater apparent complexity—for simplicity and complexity in music are not, as some seem still to think, a mere matter of texture, harmony, or form, but depend upon the internal significance of the work. A single line of melody may be more intensely charged with meaning than many pages of the most elaborately fashionable 'aural phenomena' with which it is surrounded. Such a melody occurs on page 12 of Alfredo Casella's Five Pieces for String Quartet (Preludio — Ninna-nanna — Valse ridicule — Notturmo — Fox-trot) (Universal Edition). Its incongruity with its setting leads us to suspect it of being a folk-song, but as its source is not stated, Signor Casella must be given the benefit of the doubt and the credit of having created a beautiful tune before he spoiled it. When we have said that the work opens with a hundred-and-eleven-fold repetition of a single chord, followed by a forty-six-fold oscillation between the component parts of another chord, leading (on page 6) to a seventy-two-fold reiteration of the original chord with the addition of an appoggiatura, it will be apparent that these pieces are à la manière de . . . Need we add the name?

P. H.

SONGS

Under the heading of 'Mayfair Classics,' Messrs. Murdoch have published twenty-five 'Standard and Traditional Songs,' with revisions and accompaniments by G. H. Clutsam. The charm of these old songs, and of their wistful, heart-felt sentiment, is maintained intact by Mr. Clutsam's discriminative welding of tune and accompaniment. He has done this with great economy of means, and has avoided monotony by skilfully varying his setting of the different verses, and yet preserving their simplicity. It is not surprising that these traditional songs should have a perennial existence when it is remembered that so many of the melodies are set to words that have also an evergreen existence. Such are Robert Burns's Robin Adair and Ye Banks and Braes, Walter Scott's Jock o' Hazeldean, Ben Jonson's Drink to me only with thine eyes, &c. The direct appeal also of the lovely old tune of The bonnie banks of Loch Lomond will outlast many a popular drawing-room ballad or favourite opera aria. To understand the folk-songs and traditional songs of a nation is a help to realising the psychology of a country. These examples of England's national treasury of song should be known to all music-lovers.

Martin Shaw's setting of Poe's ballad of Annabel Lee (Cramer) is also in its expressive simplicity well-suited to the swift, direct narrative poem whose underlying theme is passionate and faithful love. An ornate or descriptive setting would have been disfiguring.

From the Arabic, the first of an album of six songs (Elkin) by George Whitaker, is a song that will meet with a ready response from good vocalists and the best concert audiences. The Eastern manner of dwelling on one sound is responded to by the composer using but one chord in each of the first fourteen bars, varying it with one other for four bars, and then continuing with the first again to the end of Shelley's first stanza. For the second and more passionate stanza the composer elaborates the accompaniment to suit the vivid emotion of the words. Mr. Whitaker's direction that the first verse should be sung 'in a rather nasal tone without much expression,' has its dangers. The least exaggeration of the Eastern manner would be fatal. No better encore could be granted to this song than Mr. Whitaker's Seki in the same album: a delicate, sensitive arrangement of a Japanese lyric of Lafcadio Hearn.

Edgar Bainton's setting of Gordon Bottomley's beautiful Valley Moonlight (Winthrop Rogers) is worthy of the poem. Mr. Bainton has reflected the shadowy, serene atmosphere of the moonlit poem in the tranquil song, and given it an underlying feeling of enchantment and ecstasy.

Two songs by Henry G. Ley, Far in a Western Brookland and White in the moon the long road lies (Stainer & Bell), from A. E. Housman's Shropshire Lad, though without any special distinctive originality, will nevertheless meet with popularity because they are straightforward and pleasing. The same may be said of Autolycus's Song (Enoch), by Frederick Keel.

Pour Toi, by Victor Vreuls (Chester), is also quite agreeable and will meet with instant favour from a public that likes what is easily assimilated.

L. L.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Of Havergal Brian's delightful Four Miniatures (Augener) the second is perhaps the most attractive with its opening questioning chords, the motif of which is carried through the piece:

Oh, what is the land of Dreams?
What are its mountains and what are its streams?

But even without the composer's indication of its being after William Blake's poem The Land of Dreams, the piece is alluring as pure music by reason of the embroidery and beauty of its harmonic progressions. No. 3 is simple, and has a fascination of its own. No. 4 is after Blake's poem, The Birds, and being rather more obvious than The Land of Dreams, is less poetic.

William Baines's Coloured Leaves (Augener) are pleasant fancies, giving evidence of a distinctly original mind, while the same composer's Silverpoints (Elkin) show delicacy of perception and a clever handling of harmonic combinations.

C. Chaminade's tuneful Gavotte (Enoch) will be acceptable to teachers desirous of instructing their pupils in the phrasing and rhythm of the old French dance, and will serve in that way as an introduction to the older classics.

Three Pieces for pianoforte, by Marie Mildred Lacchesi (author's property) can be used in a similar way. They are easy and tuneful, and will be acceptable to children.

L. L.

ORGAN

Alec Rowley's Heroic Suite (Ashdown) consists of four movements, commencing, curiously enough, with a Postlude. It is better to review the work as four separate pieces, as even suites require the consideration of some of the principles of cyclic construction. The first movement, Heroic Postlude, is a very effective piece of processional music (sonata form, without development), the second subject possessing the love interest, à la Meistersinger Overture. No. 2, Lament, is a touching piece of soft writing, with a triumphant episode for the Great organ. Some of the harmonies, especially those of the final cadence, do not fully satisfy us. The Mood Fantasy (No. 3) is none the worse for owing something to Guilmant. In suite form, the final movement, Triumph Song, suffers from its use of the same devices as the first piece. Played separately, here are four soundly-written pieces which make a good bid for popularity.

The same composer's Rhapsody (Ashdown) is nothing like so good a piece of work as the Suite. It is rather breathlessly written, and is disfigured by a free use of the three well-worn sentimental chords of Rosary fame.

R. G. Hailing's Covenanters' March (Novello) is a sedate and effective march that loses nothing by its extreme simplicity. The unbroken hold of the tonic key of A minor apparently helps here rather than hinders. The introduction of the ancient Scottish psalm-tune, Culross, at first pianissimo, suggesting the Covenanters' worship on the hill-side, and then triumphantly as a Coda, is excellent, although the staccato treatment of the choral chords is a little questionable.

From Messrs. Schott come Ten Compositions (in two books), by Harvey Grace. Two difficulties here present themselves to the unfortunate reviewer. How is he to review the compositions of his editor? How is he to review a set of ten pieces in the usual space allotted to new additions to the organist's music-cupboard? The editor answers the first with, 'Just as you would treat anybody else's,' and leaves me to solve the second. I select three for special notice—the Scherzo (dedicated to that prince of church organists, Henry Ley), in the first volume of this very interesting set; the Plaint (vol. ii, No. 9); and the final piece, No. 10, Resurgam. These are really important contributions to organ literature, quite apart from their usefulness in church. They aim high, and they succeed in no small measure. The Scherzo is majestic, playful, virile, and tender by turns. There is, too, plenty of cleverness and resource. Depth and fineness of feeling and real strength of character come through the Plaint and the Resurgam in a most unusual way—to an extent perhaps only achieved by Reubke on these modern lines. One small blemish really hurts me. I am surprised to find a composer so masterly in his treatment of the instrument indulging in a long glissando. This tawdry device induces a wrong treatment of both organ-keys and organ-pipes. (Quite apart from the special requirements of the organ, does anyone who has heard a chromatic glissade on the new Duplex pianoforte ever again want to hear a diatonic glissando on any keyboard instrument whatsoever?) The set includes also a bright and clever Laus Deo, a pleasing little Cradle Song, a rather obvious Toccata (Saint-Saëns and Karg-Elert), a lovely little in-voluntary, a resourceful Ostinato (which keeps the pathetic stop out just a little bit too long), a really heavenly Meditation, and a Rêverie on the hymn-tune 'University Tune' (English Hymnal, No. 93), one of the loveliest tunes ever invented.

A. E. H.

London Concerts

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY—JANUARY 26

Those of us who know our Vaughan Williams hardly expected his Pastoral Symphony to remind us of Beethoven's No. 6 or of Mendelssohn's Spring Song. Nor did we expect it to get so far away from these examples as proved to be the case. Some jolly folk-songs would be found doing duty, we felt sure, and there would be lots of modal harmony and strings of fifths and common chords in root position. It would be rough and tart, perhaps a trifle uncouth, but it would be unmistakably pastoral. We were out, for there was no folk-song, jolly or otherwise, and the pastoral flavour (of the conventional kind, at least) was missing. Its four movements had a good deal in common—too much, perhaps, though the result was a lack of sharp contrast rather than of interest. The thematic material was of the slenderest description—little wisps of tune, most of them with a strong family likeness, and few that looked promising viewed in the nakedness of the programme-notes. But the composer did astonishing things with them, weaving a fine polyphonic texture and producing curiously impressive and sonorous mezzo-fortes. For the most part a work that seldom moved quickly or made a great noise—a rare thing to-day. It was short, too, for a symphony—another rare thing. It is not everybody's music. Either you liked it tremendously or you wondered at the enthusiasm with which the composer was brought back time after time. It should be heard again before it joins its neglected brother, the London Symphony. Dr. Adrian Boult obtained a fine performance. The other novelty was a Concerto-Fantasia for pianoforte and orchestra by Edgar Bainton, with Miss Winifred Christie brilliant at the keyboard, and the composer conducting. It proved to be an effective work, but it was spoilt for a good many of us by following the Vaughan Williams work. The Concerto's effectiveness depended largely upon externals, and after the brooding austerities of the Symphony much of it inevitably sounded superficial. And the composer got on the wrong side of us by opening with a cadenza, a desolating concerto-convention that has always hitherto been decently put off as long as possible. Not content with using it as an opening flourish, Mr. Bainton proceeded to make it a kind of connecting link between the various sections, so we had it four times—which was just four times too many. The programme was completed by the sixth Brandenburg Concerto, Wolf's brilliant Italian Serenade, and the Flying Dutchman Overture. There was a very large audience, despite (or because of?) the prospect of two new British works. H.G.

RALPH VAUGHAN WILLIAMS

[Photo by]

[S. J. Loeb]

MR. GEORGE PARKER AND WOLF

Æolian Hall ought to have been crowded on January 27 when this fine baritone gave a recital of songs by Hugo Wolf. The sparse attendance was a reproach to a public that is supposed to be fond of good singing. Mr. Parker set himself a hard task, singing about twenty songs in German, and from memory. His strong points vocally are his compass and his admirably controlled mezza-voce. He was brainy and musically rather than emotional, and at one or two moments this unusual merit perhaps became a slight defect. The recital gave us an engrossing hour, and we owed Mr. Parker thanks for something more than his excellent singing. He set some of us asking ourselves whether our long abstinence from the best songs of Schumann, Wolf, Brahms, and Strauss had not resulted in a lowering of our standards. Listening to the effects Wolf makes with a single chord, a modulation, a slight easing or tightening of the rhythm, we felt that there is after all a lot more in song-composing than some of our young composers seem to realise.

Mr. Parker gave a second recital on February 11, drawing on Wolf, Reger, and Schubert, and again proving himself to be in the front rank of our baritones. Mr. Arthur Alexander was a worthy accompanist on both occasions. A third recital, of English songs, was announced for February 24.

H. G.

FRANCK'S SYMPHONY: AND BUSONI

Franck's Symphony and, also in D minor, a Pianoforte Concerto, the famous K. 466 of Mozart, were the mainstays of the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert, under Sir Henry Wood, on January 28. But neither was the really indiscutable music of the afternoon so much as the B minor 'Overture' of Bach (the second, for flute and strings, of the Cöthen set of four).

Splendid and attaching merits it would be crass not to see in the Symphony of Franck, but is it resisting without a tremor the test of its nowadays very frequent performance? It is curious that the conductors can draw from it a fund of those showy, emotional effects which are very fine, but all the same go no way towards helping the legend of the 'austere,' the 'seraphic' Franck. The work is one that stands or falls by its subjects, so blunt is the manner of their statement and so scanty their disguises. But how soon in the first movement does the brave discourse drop to the flatness of and the jerky syncopation of the 'Faith' theme and of other themes in the Finale has frankly a vulgar association. The experiment it would be interesting to hear would be an execution of this Symphony on the organ. Franck, we often feel, allowed too little for the orchestra's sharpness of attack and accentuation, or for the clamorous voices of instruments which are not impersonal stops but assertive individuals. He must have meant of it more of a mystery, but the orchestration unveils his music in a rather garish light.

Ferruccio Busoni played the solo of the Concerto wonderfully and singularly, accepting not the lightest of its phrases at the face value. The tutti of course could not answer in any such elaborate manner. They sounded rather like school-boys repeating lines of Racine after a declamation by the French master.

Bach and Beethoven were played by Busoni at his recitals on February 4 and 11, together with some Chopin, Liszt, and pieces of his own, but his Bach (Goldberg Variations, Chromatic Fantasy and Fugue) and Beethoven (D minor Sonata from Op. 31 and Op. 111) were the interest. What, among the rest, cannot be too much prized of this man's distinctions is his sense, still undulled, of the grave adventure of such music. He would not know how to be the mere cool, competent guide. When, for instance, he started on the D minor Sonata, how could he see where the romantic path would lead him?

Bach he freely turns into pianoforte music. Chopin, already pianoforte music, seems to join issue less readily with Busoni's handling. The two giants wrestle gladly with him. As composer Busoni appears vaguely to lack something—the opponent who must complete the adventurous game. In default of another he challenges Bizet with a Carmen Fantasia, and the adventure is good.

C.

MISCHA ELMAN'S CONCERT

The return of Mischa Elman could not but arouse interest, for of all the prodigies we have heard in the past twenty years, he was certainly the most promising. The inevitable question we all had in our mind on the way to Queen's Hall was, of course, how far have those promises materialised, and has Mr. Elman attained those heights which once seemed so easily within his reach? His performances of three Concertos—by Vivaldi (in Nachèz's arrangement), the Brahms Concerto, and the Lalo Symphony—showed him a past-master of violin technique, but, as regards interpretation, still under the influence of the energies and impulses of youth. The admirable care and finish of the technique was not always matched by an equally finished conception of the music. Hence the simple psychology of Vivaldi and Lalo suited him much better than the profound music of Brahms. In the Brahms Concerto the keen zest of Mr. Elman's style added piquancy to the Finale, which went from start to finish with magnificent impetus, but the first and second movements suffered slightly through lack of repose and dignity. On the other hand, his sureness of touch, infallible intonation, and easy, flawless performance of the most intricate and thankless passages were a great delight.

In conclusion, I would like to add a note warning against a distressing practice which Mr. Elman has adopted, and which is becoming too common. I refer to the way in which violin players move about and sway to and fro on the platform. Some are like reeds in a storm, the motions of others are as painful to the eye as the flicker of the film on the screen. Mr. Elman walked about while playing, and at one moment appeared to perform for the exclusive benefit of Sir Henry Wood who conducted the orchestra; at another he gave the impression that he was going to have a few words with the trombones. The instinct to move about is natural and inevitable, but in the old days violinists were taught to resist it.

F. B.

THE LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The two concerts that have put Mr. Walter Damrosch in charge of this Orchestra have formed a corrective—greatly welcomed in some quarters—to the modern trend in programme making. 'No tricks in the music and no tricks in the performance' is a motto for which there is a good deal to be said. On January 23 Mr. Damrosch gave us two Symphonies, Beethoven's No. 7 and that of Saint-Saëns in C minor that employs pianoforte and organ, the French work of course being resuscitated to honour the composer's memory. Yet it was in a Haydn D major Violoncello Concerto that the concert rose to its height, for Madame Suggia was the violoncellist. On February 13 Busoni made the Emperor Concerto sound unexpectedly poetic, and Mr. Damrosch gave a vigorous reading of Brahms's first Symphony.

THE BOHEMIAN STRING QUARTET

This famous Quartet drew a large audience to Wigmore Hall on February 6, playing Beethoven's Op. 130, adding the Grand Fugue—surely one of the worst, as well as one of the longest, ever written; Dame Ethel Smyth's Quartet in E minor, a capital work that should often be heard; and Dvorák's Quintet, in which the Quartet was joined by Miss Fanny Davies with happy results. The quartet-playing was curiously unequal, the Beethoven work—especially the Fugue—giving us some bad patches. The performance of Dame Smyth's work, on the contrary, reached a high level at the start, and stayed there.

CHORAL CONCERTS

In the case of the Royal Choral Society we have with monotonous insistence to record large audiences and choral singing that is enjoyed from the first note to the last. The usual phenomena occurred when Hiawatha was performed at the Royal Albert Hall on February 4, under Sir Frederick Bridge. The soloists in this popular occasion were Miss Ruth Vincent, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Herbert Heyner.

People's Palace Choral Society gave The Dream of Gerontius on January 21, under Mr. Frank Idle, and the singers earned new respect for their powers. The choral music seemed to have no difficulties for these East Londoners, and they expressed it finely. The Dream of Gerontius was also performed at the Northern Polytechnic on February 11, with all the appeal and authority of the Alexandra Palace Choral Society under Mr. Allen Gill.

Other choral societies have been active—the Langham Choral Society (Mr. Hugh Marleyn) with Elijah; the Dulwich Philharmonic Society (Mr. Martin Kingslake) in The Martyr of Antioch; the London Choral Society, at Queen's Hall, on February 15, in unaccompanied music. This included Elgar's Death on the Hills, of which Mr. Arthur Fagge conducted a picturesque performance—clear, of good tone, and devoid of exaggeration. Lavender Hill Choral Society (Mr. George Lane) announced Brahms's Requiem and Leoni's The Gate of Life for January 25. We much regret our inability to report how so enterprising a programme was carried out.

The People's Palace Sunday afternoon concerts inaugurated by Dr. Adrian C. Boulton have been going from strength to strength. On January 22 the Bach Choir, under Dr. Vaughan Williams, joined the British Symphony Orchestra and gave three of Bach's Church cantatas—Bide with us, Jesus took unto Him the Twelve, and The Sages of Sheba. César Franck's Symphony and Ireland's The Forgotten Rite were played by the orchestra under Dr. Boulton on February 12. These concerts now take place weekly.

RECITALS

There are signs of weakness in the recital industry—not a matter for surprise in the case of an industry that lives on loose capital. There seem to be more recital-less afternoons and evenings than we expect even in the early months, and on a certain Thursday late in January there was no reputable concert at all in the West End.

Apart from those recital-givers who have claimed special mention above there are two who have done eclipsing work—one was Miss Isolde Menges, who played a long unaccompanied Bach Violin Fugue, at Wigmore Hall, on January 28. Her execution was unerring, and she kept her technical self-possession and mastery of style unimpaired to the end. The other was M. Brailovsky, who on February 7 showed himself one of the greatest of living Chopin players. Among our own pianists Mr. Norman Wilks the stylist and Mr. Edward Mitchell the propagandist have been busy.

There has been little good singing on the recital platform. For what there was we were indebted to Miss Tilly Koenen in January, to Mr. Parker, and of course to Mr. John Coates at Chelsea. Miss Helen Henschel accompanied herself at Wigmore Hall on January 31; even as a vocalist alone she is versatile. Miss Lucia Young, at Æolian Hall on January 20, not only sang well but chose her programme intelligently.

The outcome of Miss Marie Hall's researches among modern British works for the violin was revealed at Wigmore Hall on February 7. She had chosen a Sonata by Percy Sherwood, a Suite by Gordon Bryan in four movements, and a Sonata by Rutland Boughton, the last-named standing easily first in its clear purpose, individuality, and technical handling.

THE BRITISH NATIONAL OPERA COMPANY

The British National Opera Company, which inherits the good-will, properties, and traditions of the Beecham Company—and includes many of the same artists, so that it may almost be regarded as the same institution under a democratic instead of an absolute government—began its career at Bradford, where it entered upon a fortnight's season on February 6. Afterwards it is to appear at Liverpool, Edinburgh, and Leeds, and its fortunes will be followed with an eager interest by all who desire to see operatic productions in the provinces on a scale which may be described as adequate and complete. So far as all outward signs furnish a clue, it has made a most satisfactory beginning before crowded and enthusiastic audiences, and if it be a fact that it is the first step that counts, the auguries should be favourable for its future. Its repertory was discreetly chosen for a beginning. Most of the thirteen works given during the first fortnight were 'old staggers' whose popularity is ensured—Carmen, Faust, Cavalleria, Pagliacci, Aida, Samson and Delilah, Tannhäuser, and three Puccini operas, Madame Butterfly, La Bohème, and Tosca; but the occasion gained distinction by the inclusion of Die Zauberflöte, and two of Wagner's most important works, Die Meistersinger and Parsifal. Among the operas in prospect are Louise, Tristan, Rosenkavalier, and eventually the Ring.

Speaking generally, it was the completeness of the productions that was their most striking feature. There were no makeshifts in the scenery and properties, no cooking of the scores. For once (in a provincial company) we heard the hunting fanfares behind the scene in the first Act of Tannhäuser, and the processional trumpets in Aida had full effect given to them. Also there were constant evidences of the thought bestowed on small details, which may be ascribed to that most able stage-director, Mr. George King. Even the mute personages took an intelligent interest in their parts. Two instances occur to me: the child in Madame Butterfly, who for the first time in my experience was not a mere dummy, and the blinded Samson's youthful guide, who really acted the part and added to the pathos of the situation. There is no need to dwell upon the performances of the more familiar works. One or two artists who were conspicuously successful in their tasks may be mentioned: Edna Thornton, Walter Hyde, and Norman Allin in the first Act of Samson formed a trio which it would be difficult to surpass. Mignon Nevada's Marguerite and Mimi, Beatrice Miranda's Aida, Tosca, and Elizabeth, Gladys Ancrum's Venus and Santuzza, Sydney Russell and Edith Clegg in minor character parts, these occur to one, and might well be added to. To Carmen a special interest was given, since it was the occasion of the first stage appearance of Olga Haley, who took the part of the heroine. As might have been expected, her vocal performance was of first-rate quality, very much above the usual operatic standard; indeed, very rarely is the music so charmingly sung. Her acting showed the results of natural intelligence and careful coaching; if there was a certain lack of perfect ease it was attributable to the anxiety inevitable on such an occasion, and to say as much as this almost savours of hypercriticism, so generally satisfying was her performance. Her success was the more pronounced since her personality is not what one associates with the part, but it is easy to find fault on such a score, and she was not so much handicapped in this matter as was Anna Lindsey, whose intensely dramatic impersonation of Madame Butterfly was deprived of some of its illusion by a personality which was remote from any Japanese standard.

The production of Die Meistersinger was a very noteworthy achievement, and indicated the high standard set by the Company. It was given almost in its entirety, and though something like five hours at a stretch is likely to cool the ardour of all but enthusiasts, it was heard with interest and even enthusiasm by a packed audience. Among the outstanding features of the cast may be cited the Pogner of Robert Radford, who in voice, acting, and appearance was as fine a representative of the part as I can recollect since the introduction of the opera to this country in 1882. Andrew Shanks had all the thoughtfulness and geniality of Hans Sachs, and the only fault one could find with his impersonation was in the minor matter of make-up. Not only does he insist that he is 'too old for Eva,' but in 1560, which is the year of the action, he was actually sixty-four years old, so a few grey hairs would not have been out of place; yet he had the appearance of being anything between thirty and forty.

Sydney Russell as Beckmesser was a very carefully thought-out impersonation. In the first Act he inclined rather too much to grimace, but there was point and malice in his sayings, and he could sing better than many successful Beckmessers. Fred Davies was well suited as David, and that always satisfying artist, Edith Clegg, was a perfect Magdalena. As for the Eva of Sara Fischer, she had all the charm of youth on her side, and this gave her impersonation a delightful freshness and naïveté. Aylmer Buesst conducted, and if, as is reported, he had never before directed a performance of Die Meistersinger, the success with which he piloted his forces through this elaborate and difficult work was the more praiseworthy. The other conductors, it may be mentioned, were Percy Pitt (the artistic director), Eugène Goossens, Julius Harrison, and Herbert Withers.

The chief event of the season was the production (on the anniversary of Wagner's death, February 13) of Parsifal, for the first time in Yorkshire. It followed the lines of the Beecham Company's production at Manchester two years ago, but new scenery by Mr. Oliver Bernard was provided. This was decorative and in the right spirit of fantasy, but its effect was minimised by a stage too shallow to give space and distance, so that details seemed somewhat out of scale. In the circumstances Mr. George King, the producer, achieved his difficult task with consummate ability. Three of the principals—Gladys Ancrum (Kundry), Walter Hyde (Parsifal), and Norman Allin (Gurnemanz)—were the same as in the Manchester performances, and all were quite admirable. Herbert Heyner, as Amfortas, was a newcomer. He was highly successful, entering completely into the character, and singing his impassioned scenes with great emotional force yet with no loss of dignity. Frederic Collier (Klingsor) and Philip Bertram (Titurel) were thoroughly efficient, as was the chorus of Flower-maidens, though want of room handicapped them in their graceful dance. The orchestra was excellent, but the bells were even less effective than usual, which is saying a good deal. Mr. Percy Pitt conducted with care for every detail, and if the work failed to be as impressive as it can be, the fault lay in an impossible environment.

H. T.

OPERA AT CAMBRIDGE

DR. ROTHAM'S TWO SISTERS

With commendable courage the Operatic Society at Cambridge, which in the past has made a practice of giving an annual performance, this year took the bold step of producing a British example. Choice fell on the work of the conductor of the Society, Dr. Cyril Rootham, thus paying a special compliment to one who has worked very hard on uncultivated ground. In the process the Society helps to make history, for Dr. Rootham's work is on novel lines. Its story and its music are based on folk material, a plan that, so far as grand opera is concerned, has not been followed before. The result is effective enough, and the whole thing has greater significance than may at first seem apparent. The fact is that in this plan lies the way to that British National Opera of which we have heard so much and seen so little. I take the view that the words mean what they say, and that therefore British National Opera means something that is British, and something that is national. That being so, then Dr. Rootham's work is a British National Opera. The use of folk-story and folk-music is the only way in which, in my opinion, we shall get an expression of the operatic form that is national. The alternative is something that is a mere copy of the foreign article. Hence there is considerable significance in Dr. Rootham's work, and the Cambridge Operatic Society, made up of enthusiasts, inter- and extra-mural, has achieved something from which much will spring.

The work which was produced at the New Theatre on February 14-18 is based on the Ballad of The Two Sisters of Binnorie, which crystallises an idea which is to be found in print as early as in Wit Restored, published in 1658. On its most concise form, the Scottish, Mrs. Marjory Fausset has constructed her libretto, which simply, and without any theatrical guile, tells its story. Ellen, betrothed to Rainald, becomes jealous of her sister Annot and drowns her. The Harper strings his harp with the hair of the murdered girl, and at the wedding, when Rainald asks for Annot and receives no satisfactory reply, the harp utters the truth. Dr. Rootham makes use of two of the folk-airs associated with the ballad, the one Scottish and the other from Berkshire. By this means a satisfactory, because British, idiom is assured, for the tunes or their shapes permeate the whole. The design is modern and the music continuous. In his score the composer keeps matters moving with very considerable skill. I liked the idea of the original Ballad being sung at the beginning of things, for it unfolded the story and well impressed the chief tune on the ears of the audience. The story is told in four stages, all in contrast and all in an unconventional way. In the second section we move to the realms of the spirits of the trees and the river, both impersonated on the stage, while the music takes on a decidedly ethereal character. Then in the preparation for the wedding we have genuine English folk-dances, and hear the Berkshire tune in all its jovial possibilities. It is used more sedately to pave the way for the marriage scene, offering something novel in the way of a folk-song wedding-march. The music in its whole aspect is remarkable for its wealth of ideas and variety of device, and the instrumentation is full of colour which, if it clashes now and again, is still colour. I find the music less turgid and less monotonous than that of the majority of British operas I have heard of late years, and I ascribe the fact to the use of folk material which is inspiring stuff well calculated to spur on a composer who has ideas. The work shows in an unmistakable way that it is possible to build modern opera on folk material, and that British folk material serves its purpose quite as well as, and in fact rather better than, that of some other country. I think that if the design in general had been a little lighter it would have been better for a first example, since the whole thing breaks new ground for British opera. But as it is, it shows clearly that for music-drama in its severest form British national matter can serve its purpose, and serve it admirably. I must add for the purposes of record that special scenery and costumes were designed by Mr. Lionel Penrose, that both were made by members of the Company, and that Mr. Dennis Arundell acted as producer. The principals were Miss Gladys Moger as Ellen, Miss Dorothy Campbell Giles as Annot, Mr. Clive Carey as Rainald, and Mr. Steuart Wilson as the Harper, and all of them served the composer better than they did the librettist, whose words they failed to make articulate. The chorus and the orchestra were both excellent. Dr. Rootham conducted. Every one concerned achieved something of a feat, since the presentation of the unfamiliar is a task in which the most experienced do not always distinguish themselves. Bearing in mind that this is an amateur organization, and that it took upon itself the responsibility of breaking new ground, I consider it is entitled to both admiration and respect.

FRANCIS E. BARRETT.

Church and Organ Music

THE ENGLISH LITANY OF 1544-60

BY W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

Many strange views have been formulated as to the musical arrangement of the English Litany in 1544-60. Even in recent years, notwithstanding the researches of scholars who are interested in all appertaining to English Liturgy, some erroneous statements have been propagated as to the Litany. Hence a brief article based on first-hand sources of information may be helpful.

The phrase Kyrie Eleison (Lord, have mercy on us) sufficiently demonstrates the Eastern provenance of the Litany, but its adoption in the Western Church can be traced to the 4th century, and it was popular in parts of Gaul in the early years of the 5th century, as is evident from St. Patrick's acquaintance with it. From the 6th century it was almost invariably sung in procession; and this method was introduced into England by St. Augustine, who had it sung when entering Canterbury on commencing his great work for the conversion of England in April, 597. St. Bede records the singing of the Litany and the Antiphon, 'Deprecamur te, Domine,' as the monks walked two by two, headed by a cross-bearer. So connoted were the terms Procession and Litany in the pre-Reformation Church in England, that in 1540 the Litany was known as 'a Processionier,' while an order in Council of the year 1545, orders the Processions, or Litanies, 'to be kept on the accustomed days, and none otherwise, and to be sung or said, as the number of the choir shall serve for the same.'

As is well known, the present form of the English Litany dates from May, 1544; that is, of course, the English translation without music. Three weeks later, on June 16, another edition was published by R. Grafton, and this translation had the old Plainsong notation added. Cranmer's Prayers and Litany were presented to the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's Cathedral, London, on June 21, and on October 12 the Queen accepted a copy of 'A Litany with suffrages to be said or sung, in English, in the time of the said Processions,' printed by 'Thomas Petyt, at the sign of the Maydens, in St. Paul's Churchyard.'

Thus it is safe to conclude that even in 1545, although an English translation had been furnished for the Litany, the only music adapted was the Plainchant of the olden time. Some have alleged that Tallis composed a new setting of the Litany in 1544-45, but this is an error. Cranmer, in his celebrated letter to Henry VIII., dated October 7, 1545, asks the King to 'add some devout and solemn note [music]' to the Processionier or Litany in English, implying that no new music had been hitherto composed for it, an implication that is amply borne out by the further information that the Archbishop 'has travailed to make the Latin note to them.' This last sentence is of the highest importance in settling the question as to Cranmer's share in the Litany, and leaves no room for doubt that in 1545-46 the newly translated English Litany was roughly adapted to the old plainchant melody. Cranmer adds: 'Those who are cunning in singing can make a more solemn note thereto, as I have made them only for a proof to see how English would do in song.'

On January 9, 1546, Richard Grafton and Edward Whitchurch were granted renewal of letters patent (28 Jan. 34 Hen. VIII.) for printing the Mass-Book, the Grayl, the Antiphoner, the Hymnall [Hymnal], the Porthouse, and the Prymer, in Latin and English. Nothing as yet was done in regard to new music for the Litany, and even Cranmer's version 'to the ancient note' was left a dead letter. It is significant that on July 8, 1546, a proclamation was issued by the Privy Council 'that no one, after August 31, shall receive or keep Tyndale's or Coverdale's New Testament, nor any English books by Frith, Tyndale, Wickliff, Joye, Roy, Basile, Bale, Barnes, Coverdale, Turner, or Tracy.' This is also to be taken in connection with the recantation of Dr. Crome and Bishop Shaxton, of Salisbury (July 9).

The Rev. J. M. Duncan* says that there are 'fragments of a harmonized Litany believed to date from the years 1547-48 preserved in the British Museum' (MSS. Royal Appendix, 74-76), but this may be an early attempt of Robert Stone. Anyway, the first definite mention of the new English Litany is on Sunday, July 21, 1549,† under King Edward VI. From Wriothesley's Chronicle, quoted by Dr. James Gairdner in his monumental work on Lollardy and the Reformation (vol. iii., p. 89), we learn that on that memorable day Archbishop Cranmer came to St. Paul's Cathedral, vested in cope and alb, with deacon and sub-deacon, preceded by a cross-bearer, 'the Dean following him in his surplice,' and then in the choir, after Matins, 'the Litany was sung kneeling, according to the King's Book, with a special prayer for the occasion.'

However, it was not until January 25, 1550, that a Bill was passed 'for the defacing of images and bringing in of books of the old Service in the Church,' and it was not till November, 1552, that the new English Service was used for the first time in St. Paul's. A year later the old order was restored, and on St. Katharine's Day, November 25, 1553, the singing of the old Latin Litany to the plainchant setting was again heard in St. Paul's, being repeated on November 30, and December 1, 4, and 8. These Processions (singing of the Litany) were carried out with great éclat on January 14, 1553-54, when the Lord Mayor of London and Aldermen assisted in their robes.

Thus, in 1559, there was really no change in the pre-Reformation sung Litany, nor did Merbecke include the Litany in his Book of Common Prayer Noted (1550). At length, in 1560, there was issued by John Day a collection entitled Certain Notes set forth in four and three parts to be sung at the Morning Communion and Evening Prayer, containing the English Litany, set for four voices, by Robert Stone,* a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal. This composer had been in King Edward VI.'s Chapel in 1551, and was continued in Queen Mary's Chapel, and in that of Queen Elizabeth and James I. He remained a Gentleman of the Chapel Royal from 1551 till his death on July 2, 1613, aged ninety-seven—a record period of sixty-two years.

Not a few writers have stated that the Litany which is included in Day's Collection was by Tallis, but this is incorrect; the setting is certainly by Robert Stone, and a rather crude production it is. Those interested in this composer can see his signature in the British Museum (Stowe 571, f30b) as having received his fee as Gentleman of the Chapel in 1552. Tallis, however, did compose a Litany about the year 1558 or 1559, but it was not published till Barnard included it in Selected Church Music, in 1641, although a version of it is in Clifford's MS. of 1570. Strange to relate, Tallis's Litany was discarded in 1697, and was not restored to St. Paul's Cathedral till May 3, 1751, when it was sung at the instance of the Bishop of Oxford, on the occasion of the Festival of the Sons of the Clergy.

I take this opportunity for congratulating Mr. Duncan on his recent article (Musical Times, August, September, and October, 1920) on 'The Preces, Responses, and Litany of the English Church,' especially his excerpts from the Peterhouse MS.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF ORGANISTS

DISTRIBUTION OF DIPLOMAS

On Saturday, January 21, 1922, the president, Dr. Charles Macpherson, presented the diplomas to the recently-elected Fellows and Associates of the College. Among those present were the following members of the Council: Mr. H. L. Balfour, Mr. E. T. Cook, Dr. H. G. Ley, Dr. S. R. Marchant, Dr. C. W. Pearce (hon. treasurer), Dr. H. R. Richards, Mr. E. S. Roper, Dr. F. G. Shinn, and Dr. H. A. Harding (hon. secretary).

The following announcements were made by the president: For the Fellowship examination there were seventy candidates and nine passed. For the Associateship examination there were a hundred and forty-nine candidates and twenty-eight passed. The Fellowship Lafontaine Prize was awarded to Mr. B. J. Orsman, and the Fellowship Turpin Prize to Mr. H. E. West. The Associateship Lafontaine Prize was awarded to Mr. J. A. Mallinson, and the Associateship Sawyer Prize to Mr. T. A. Rushworth.

The president then presented the diplomas.†

The hon. secretary (Dr. H. A. Harding) read the reports of the Examining Boards:

FELLOWSHIP PAPER-WORK

Counterpoint (Strict).—There seemed to be evidence that the importance of careful study in this section had been realised, and the results were more satisfactory on the whole than they have been for some years past.

Modern Counterpoint.—Many of the examples were poor, with no apparent aim at musically device or artistic design.

Modal (Polyphonic Period) Counterpoint.—Very few workings were presented. The attention of candidates should be drawn towards this subject.

* Mr. Duncan gives the name as 'Stones.'

† A complete list of successful candidates was published in the Musical Times for February last.

* Musical Times, August, 1920.

† Heylin gives the date as September 18, 1547.

Fugue.—The old weakness was apparent, viz., the poor four-part writing at the last entry.

Questions.—Many of the answers were sketchy and inaccurate in detail; some of them furnished quite irrelevant information.

Orchestration.—On the whole the examples were too heavily scored.

Melody.—There was a tendency to attempt too much, producing rather a confusion of harmonies and progressions.

Ground Bass.—Several of the candidates failed to vary the harmony as well as the treatment in the repetitions.

Composition.—Some of the work was of the plainest hymn-tune style. Attempts to enforce the sentiments of the words were seldom successful.

WALTER PARRATT (Chairman).

J. F. BRIDGE.

E. J. READ.

FELLOWSHIP ORGAN-WORK

The pieces were poorly played on the whole, mostly through lack of courage and purpose, and many of the candidates, who evidently had quite an adequate technique, failed through lack of control.

Elgar's Prelude was not understood, and its mystic atmosphere and moments of climax were realised only by two or three candidates.

The Bach Passacaglia was phrased in a haphazard way, the attack and release being dictated rather by the position of the hands than by the sense of the phrase. As is so often the case with weak players, rallentandos were introduced in possible but not expedient places—such, for example, as the end of each variation.

As usual, in the tests, many failed because they were not in a calm enough state to read the time-words and metronome marks. This was particularly the case in the playing from the unfigured bass and the harmonization of the melody. The former was frequently rushed through at two, instead of six beats in a bar, and the latter dragged out at the rate of four slow beats instead of two.

The extemporization was better than usual, there being a satisfactory tendency to keep to the text. Unfortunately there were many candidates who played in 2-4 instead of 3-4 time, and a considerable number who misread the time-value of the notes in the given subject.

E. C. BAIRSTOW (Chairman).

ALAN GRAY.

CHARLES MACPHERSON.

ASSOCIATESHIP PAPER-WORK

Counterpoint (Strict).—In the florid counterpoint there was frequently a lack of variety in the rhythm, largely due to the over-employment of crotchets and the absence of tied notes. Some years ago it was the custom to regard the fifth Species chiefly as an ornamentation of the fourth Species, and the employment of a tied-note in nearly every bar was a feature of such teaching. In the reaction against a method which failed to realise the melodic freedom which is the special characteristic of the best examples of florid counterpoint candidates now have a tendency to omit altogether tied notes and suspensions, and thereby deprive themselves of a most valuable means of obtaining a varied rhythm and a rhythm which is specially characteristic of good florid counterpoint.

In the writing of the strict counterpoint test in the minor key there were frequent examples of the employment of the Diminished Triad and the Augmented Triad—both in root position. It is felt that the introduction of such chords is generally opposed to, and inconsistent with, the spirit of strict counterpoint.

Melody.—The harmonization of the melody was distinctly good.

Figured Bass.—The treatment of the suspensions, both with regard to the absence of suitable preparation and also as to the notes which should form the chord, revealed many errors. In the 7-6 suspension which came in the first bar, a large number included a 5th.

F. G. SHINN (Chairman).

S. R. MARCHANT.

G. J. BENNETT.

ASSOCIATESHIP ORGAN-WORK

The playing of the pieces was marred by inexcusable inaccuracies of notes and rests, wrong tempo, unsteady time, very indifferent phrasing, ineffective registering, and bad use of the Swell pedal. The performance of the tests was, in a large number of cases, very unsatisfactory—especially the Accompanying test, which is so important. The change of the key from A minor to A major seemed to be too trivial a matter to attract the attention of the candidates, and semi-quavers and quavers were, over and over again, played at exactly the same pace.

The score reading was evidently viewed perpendicularly instead of horizontally. By following the voice parts in the horizontal way we believe candidates would make fewer mistakes in this test.

On the whole candidates did not appear to realise the high standard of this examination.

H. L. BALFOUR (Chairman).

E. T. SWEETING.

E. T. COOK.

Dr. HARDING: I have a very gratifying announcement to make. You probably already know that one of the oldest and most distinguished of the City Companies, the Musicians' Company, gives its gold medal triennially to the most distinguished student at the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music, and it is my pleasure to tell you that the Musicians' Company has decided to give its medal once in three years to the most distinguished candidate at the Royal College of Organists' examinations, so that we may take our turn with the other chartered institutions. This decision was made a few months ago, when the Master of the Musicians' Company was a gentleman who by his munificence and sympathy has done a great deal for music and especially for this College. I refer to Mr. Cart de Lafontaine. He was Master of the Company at the time, and he saw the possibility of bestowing upon us this generous and graceful distinction. We are very much obliged to Mr. Cart de Lafontaine and to the Musicians' Company. The Council has decided to recommend as the recipient of this medal the Lafontaine Prize winner who has obtained the most marks for organ work during the three years. The next presentation will take place in July.

THE PRESIDENT: I think in view of this very important announcement by Dr. Harding you will agree with me that we should like to pass a very hearty vote of thanks to the Musicians' Company, coupled particularly with the name of Mr. Cart de Lafontaine.

Dr. F. G. SHINN: I have much pleasure in seconding the hearty vote of thanks to the Musicians' Company, coupled with the name of Mr. Cart de Lafontaine, for presenting this medal to the Royal College of Organists in turn with the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music. It will undoubtedly prove a great incentive to our candidates.

The Resolution was carried with acclamation.

Mr. CART DE LAFONTAINE: I am very glad to have the opportunity of expressing my very grateful acknowledgments of your vote of thanks, accorded really to the Musicians' Company, with which my name is coupled. I must say that I am delighted that I have been able to bring about this recognition of your distinguished candidates. I was rather timorous about approaching the Court of the Company, but I had no sooner pointed out the desirability of making this presentation than the Company at once fell in with the suggestion. It seemed to me only right that in this respect the Royal College of Organists should be placed on a level with the Royal Academy of Music and the Royal College of Music. I am afraid I am going to take the gilt off the gingerbread, because the medal has been referred to as being a gold one. May I say that it is a silver medal. But whether gold or silver it is worth having, and we esteem it the greatest honour that can be conferred on any musician. I believe that the gold medal of the Musicians' Company is only offered to His Majesty The King.

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS

THE PRESIDENT: On the two previous occasions that I have had the honour of addressing you I have spoken on the subject of criticism and some of its varied applications. Without being too introspective, perhaps a little further consideration of it as applied to our individual selves and our own particular activities may not be an unprofitable way of spending a few moments. Most of us here are presumably either choirmasters, accompanists, or recitalists, if not conductors and teachers as well. To carry out this five-fold duty, we must acquire a certain amount of business capacity to enable us to perform our work in such a way that the wheels of routine do not become clogged with the muddle of mental confusion. There is probably no profession in which versatility and mental balance are so essential as in that of a modern organist, and few callings in which, by reason of the great demands it makes upon the nervous system, there is a greater likelihood of the occasional breakdown of the higher intellectual requirements. Our somewhat Jack-of-all-trades vocation has its dangers, particularly when our leaning is not equal towards each required direction—and it has its advantages, in that we become broader-minded. The very fact that we are able to do one thing fairly well will often enable us to perform other duties that are less to our liking. But I think that the secret of keeping the ball rolling seems to be largely dependent upon our power of self-criticism. We may add to this the value of the criticism of others regarding ourselves. The kindly criticism from others is often a real help to us both as an instruction and an encouragement. A somewhat long experience has taught me that there is nearly always something to be learned from other people's criticism, whether it is wrapped up in the golden cloth of kindness or the rag of venom. Personally, I think there must be something wrong with a man when he is no longer able to profit by others' judgment of his work. It usually implies that he has ceased to learn—the worst fate that can befall an artist. I am not inferring that outside estimates of our activities are always correct or even just; but the bringing to our knowledge of the existence of views that we ourselves do not even suspect should help us to enlarge our outlook. Let us see, then, how far we can apply this wholesome medicine of criticism to our various activities without being too particular as to whether the dose is administered by ourselves or by others. Firstly, let us take ourselves as choirmasters. Very many underrate this office; they may be excellent in other ways, but if they neglect their choir-work they are doing everyone a great disservice. Brilliant playing does not cover up the defects of an indifferent choir; and, on the other hand, a good choir can get on quite well with an organist who has learned to know what is expected of him—and who will not fail to give it—even though his technical ability may not be of the highest order. The good choirmaster is a great asset, and his success is ensured by what he teaches his choir, by the way he teaches it, and by the manner in which the choir carries out his instructions. The choir usually gives an indication of the character of the choirmaster, and if you think of it, the choirmaster is perhaps the only member of a church whose work—rightly or wrongly—stands or falls by the loyalty or carelessness of people who are under his influence. This is a fact that should be borne in mind. There are times when a choirmaster is cross with his choir because it does not carry out his wishes, when, as a matter of fact, he has never clearly defined what he really requires. Insufficient instruction to the choir and want of enthusiasm will after a time cause a poor attendance of the members. If practices are made really interesting and instructive they will have a stimulating effect both on the choir and the choirmaster. Now, supposing we have been fortunate enough to gain the interest of our choir, the question is what to give them to sing. The most successful choirmaster will try to find out, first, what the special needs of his church are, and then lay his plans accordingly. We have heard of such a thing as an unsympathetic vicar. If there is any truth in the existence of one somewhere, he will not be made more sympathetic by being continually flouted. The safest plan is to do our duty by him, and see to it that what music we may still be allowed to perform is sung as well as possible. It may be chastening for a time, but we shall probably be able in the end to do what we like in the choice of music—always remembering that one of the safest indications of the state of a choir is the manner in which it sings an ordinary 'Amen.' Very few choirmasters ever practise this seriously, not realising that it is among the most difficult things to perform well. The same disregard of other so-called easy things leads to disaster in many other directions. How often, for example, do we hear really good monotoning? It is really in the attention to details such as these that one's imagination in the way of far-off possibilities is kept alive. In practising anthems make sure of the Amens first. If the congregation has no use for anthems, then it is possible to direct our energies towards such a thing as getting up a choir concert. I have known of places where this has been done successfully both in the way of keeping up the choir's interest in the work, and, incidentally, the congregation's interest in the choir. There is no branch of our work more in need of constant self-criticism than that of choir-training, nor is there anyone more musically in need of sympathetic encouragement than the conscientious choirmaster. Do not be unduly perplexed at the receipt of an anonymous letter saying that such-and-such a hymn 'was sung abominably,' and another letter by the next post saying that 'it never went better.' In such cases it is often best to treat both letters as their senders intended them to be treated—that is, as matters of 'burning' importance. I have purposely said a good deal about choir-training because there is so much bad singing still to be heard in many churches, and most of it is due to slovenly lack of interest. Our duties as accompanists are more generally realised perhaps than those of choir-training, but it is not every organist that realises the difference between playing for the choir—such, for example, as in an anthem—and playing a hymn in which the congregation is expected to join. In the latter case, of course, there must be no attempt at intimate expression. A large congregation hates a sudden drop from loud to soft, and will often resent any subsequent coaxing by the organist, in the fear that they will be caught napping again. There is far more to be made out of an ordinary hymn than some organists imagine. The use of faux-bourbons—particularly in churches which are attended by a fixed and resident congregation—add a zest to hymn-singing. An organist was once asked by a well-known divine, 'Don't you rather despise some of our hymn-tunes?' 'Yes,' was the reply, 'but I love to hear the people sing them.' It is often the organist's duty to make the people sing them, though in order to do so he may sometimes have to sacrifice finer artistic instincts such as he uses in accompanying a highly expressive anthem. In other words, he has to use a mop instead of a sable brush. The mop may be charged lightly at times—for example, after a climax; but still, it has to remain a mop. The perspective of our true place in the picture can be perceived only by the constant application of self-criticism. Regarding this question of congregational accompaniments, it is a good plan to allow some one else occasionally to play a hymn for us while we listen from the back of the church. We shall soon hear what is and what is not wanted. Last week I was listening to a number of candidates in this room, and I think that the faults which stood out most were those connected with time. This uneven time was not all due to nerves, as in many cases it cropped up in each test. One sometimes wished it were possible to place the candidate alongside a loud metronome with a bell sounding the first beat in a bar. This rhythmless kind of playing is far too common, and is the direct cause of much bad church singing throughout the country. Whether we take ourselves as choirmasters or organists, or both, it is impossible to place too high a value on rhythm, as it is the thing that shows the shape of the music; in fact, without it music assumes the grotesque forms of ogres, imps, and goblins. The sense of rhythm and a feeling for balance will carry most organists through everything, whether in accompanying or in playing voluntaries. Just one word about voluntaries. There is probably no composer who suffers more than Bach at the hands of organists. I remember someone remarking that he was able to play a certain Fugue at some enormously high metronomic speed. Just think of it! Bach being used as the helpless partner in a gymnastic display! The greatest works ever written for the organ only show us the composer's intention when performed in the proper way and at the proper speed. As for conducting, it is superfluous to urge the necessity for having a strong feeling for rhythm. If we have the uncomfortable feeling when conducting a big choir that it seems rather like taking a jelly-fish for a walk on an elastic lead, it is due to one or a combination of three causes. Either the choir does not know the music or it does not understand our beat, or we have not taught the choir to watch the conductor. The first is cured by more rehearsing, the second is often a weak point. Many conductors do not in the least know what they look like when at work. A good plan is to take advantage of our wife's absence from the house, and practise various rhythms in front of her long looking-glass. If we do this we shall perhaps rid ourselves of many of the superfluous movements which are dear to no one so much as to the conductor. I always remember with gratitude the remark of an old orchestral player to me, 'A decided first beat is what we look for.' Too many conductors count as many first beats as there are notes in a bar, when, as a matter of fact, it is often only the first beat that is important in ordinary straightforward music—certainly only the accented beats in any kind of music. After the piece is really going, the vigour of the beat may be reduced with advantage, so that there may be a reserve of power for a climax. Note the last words of the remark, 'what we look for.' It is the neglect of the looking that we have to prevent. This third cause of 'wobbling' must be continually pointed out to the members of large choirs, because individuals often take the time from those next to them instead of looking at the conductor's beat. Here again, as in the other branches of our calling, we shall not succeed as conductors unless we turn the purifying stream of self-criticism upon our attempts. Now, as teachers, we occupy a very important position in the country. The authorities seem to be slowly realising that music is of real educational value. This fact has been much more appreciated on the Continent than in this country, and what has been done here is due almost entirely to the unselfish work of men in our own profession, of whom perhaps a large percentage are organists: and even if only in a small village, it is quite likely that there is no one to whom the people look to for a lead more than to them. We really have an enormous power in our hands for educating the taste of our neighbours—not that our neighbours are crying out to be educated, but the mere fact of the possession of high ideals is bound to tell on others in process of time. In places where the standard of taste is not very high, it is not possible to bring about any rapid change for the better; but by the judicious placing of the unexpected good among the expected bad there is bound to be an eventual desire for the good. Most bad music is obvious to the hearer the first time he hears it; all good music is not so by a long way. There was a letter in The Times recently urging the desirability of repeating new works at the same concert. There is a lot to be said for this. People usually dislike good music simply because they do not know it. In nine cases out of ten when they know it they love it, and if they love it they understand it each in his own capacity. We can do a good deal towards raising the standard of taste in the way of voluntaries. We have seen those dubious words 'by desire,' so often made use of in programmes as an excuse for playing something quite unworthy of the occasion. There is one danger that should be guarded against, and it is one that may affect our whole conduct of work. We may use our critical faculties to such an extent, that certain portions of our labours become, as we imagine, standardized. We begin to think that such-and-such things can be done only in the way we have ourselves evolved. It is quite possible, for instance, that there are more wrong ways than right of performing a piece of music—if anyone doubts the truth of this he would soon be convinced if he heard the same piece played in this room at intervals during the four days of the Fellowship examination. It is hard for some to believe that there may be more than one good reading of a composition. A good antidote for this not uncommon complaint is to go and hear a fine player give a rendering of one of your show pieces. Young Bach took the trouble to walk fifty miles—not to teach old Reinken, but to see what he himself could learn. That seems to me the right spirit in which to approach our own varied and important duties.

I do not pretend that these discursive remarks have more than touched the fringe of my subject, and I am, moreover, fully conscious of the fact that to many here they will be of no practical value whatever. On the other hand, should there be in them but one helpful sentence, then please remember it—and forget the rest.

Dr. RICHARDS: I have a very pleasant task. It is to propose a vote of thanks to our president. We all know that we have a president who is a great performer, and a composer of the front rank. He is a literary enthusiast, he has a great sense of humour, he is a sympathetic companion, and a loyal friend to all students and to his colleagues. Above all, he is a perfect president. His great ability seems to me to be equalled only by his great humility. When we hear his playing of the organ at his Cathedral we know that behind it there is no ordinary person, and we realise his great capabilities when we hear his instructive and helpful addresses as we have done this morning. We feel that he is entitled to speak with great authority on these matters. We wish to express our great gratitude to him for giving us all the benefit of his work and his extraordinary gifts. I will ask you to accord a very hearty vote of thanks to Dr. Macpherson. We learn a great deal from what he says, because he speaks as one with authority and as one who knows.

The Resolution was carried with great applause.

The PRESIDENT: Of Dr. Richards's very kind remarks I think I value most of all what he said about my being a loyal friend. I am extremely obliged to you for the way in which you have received this Resolution. I appreciate your goodwill and friendliness more than I am able to express. Before we bring this meeting to a close I should like to say that this is the first public occasion at which our esteemed treasurer, Dr. C. W. Pearce, has been able to be present since the great distinction of an Arts degree was conferred upon him. We take this opportunity for congratulating him personally on the fact that the University of Durham has honoured him, and itself, by making him a Master of Arts. I have known Dr. Pearce's work for very many years, and I think the honour is fully deserved; incidentally we feel honoured ourselves that the degree has been bestowed upon one of our important officials.

Dr. C. W. PEARCE: I had no idea I was to be honoured in this way. I am indeed very proud of the degree, and I greatly appreciate being congratulated by our president and by my fellow members of this College.

The proceedings then terminated.

THE ORGANS OF LAMBETH PARISH CHURCH.

We regret that owing to the loss of a proof the Rev. Andrew Freeman's article in our February issue was printed without his corrections. Chief amongst these were the following:

- (1) convex in the fourth foot-note should be concave.
- (2) Since the rebuild of 1879 the couplers have been—Swell to Great, Swell to Pedals, Great to Pedals, Octave Great to Pedals, and Choir to Pedals.
- (3) Richard Brown was organist of St. Lawrence Jewry from 1685 till his death.
- (4) Charles Lockhart, blind from infancy, was also a pluralist, holding, amongst other posts, the organistship of the Lock Chapel, St. Katharine Cree, and Orange Street Chapel. He was composer of the well-known S.M. tune Carlisle, so named, in all probability, after Carlisle Chapel (now Holy Trinity Church), Lambeth. The drawing of the Harris case was made by Mr. H. T. Lilley from a water-colour sketch preserved in the Minet Library at Camberwell.

CHARLES HARFORD LLOYD MEMORIAL

On January 31 the window placed in the Lady Chapel of Gloucester Cathedral in memory of Charles Harford Lloyd was unveiled by Sir Henry Hadow. The music used at the service was drawn entirely from Lloyd's works. The window is opposite to that which commemorates S. S. Wesley, Lloyd's predecessor at Gloucester. The balance of the money collected for the memorial is to be used for the founding of a scholarship for Gloucester choristers who intend adopting music as a profession.

BACH JUBILEE FESTIVAL AT ST. ANNE'S, SOHO

Fifty years ago Bach's Passion Music (St. John) was first sung at St. Anne's Church, Soho, in Lent, under the direction of Sir (then Mr.) Joseph Barnby. It was the first time it had been sung in a church in England. This jubilee year is being marked at St. Anne's Church by a Bach Festival. On three Wednesday evenings in February the following Bach cantatas have been sung with orchestra and organ: God's Own Time; Jesu, Joy of man's desiring; Bide with us; My spirit was in heaviness; O Light Everlasting; and Praise our God. During Lent, Bach's Passion music (St. John) will be sung as usual, and on Saturday, March 25, at 3.30 p.m., the Novello Choir will sing Bach's Jesu, Priceless Treasure.

The Barnsley Chronicle of February 4 contained a well-deserved tribute to the educational value of the series of organ recitals given at St. George's Church since 1903 by Mr. B. Langdale. The recitals have been the means of affording Barnsleyites a chance of hearing a good deal of modern music that otherwise might not have come their way. On at least one occasion Mr. Langdale was in front of our leading orchestral conductors—on December 14, 1913, when, with the aid of the strings of the Barnsley Symphony Orchestra, he gave the first performance in England of Sibelius's Rakastava Suite. When the recitals were started, in 1903, the attendances were so meagre that Mr. Langdale was advised to discontinue them, but he refused to be discouraged. 'Tis dogged as does it,' and the first Sunday afternoon in each month now finds St. George's filled. The scope of the scheme is shown by a glance at the programmes of the two most recent, when the items included the Valhalla scene from Rhinegold, three of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, Saint-Saëns's Marche Héroïque and one of the Breton Rhapsodies, Finlandia, Lyon's first Suite, Rowley's Heroic Suite, and violin solos by Elgar, Svensden, Couperin, MacDowell, and Dvorák.

Programmes of a Choir Festival and of a series of five organ recitals that have taken place recently at Christ Church, South Yarra, Victoria, show Church music to be in a healthy condition in that part of the Antipodes. The recital programmes are of first-rate interest, with such items as Harwood's first Sonata, ten pieces by Karg-Elert, Guilman's first Sonata, Finlandia, and a Bach programme—Passacaglia and Fugue, a Trio-Sonata movement, the Sleepers, wake! Prelude, the Toccata in F, and a vocal item from the Christmas Oratorio. At the Choir Festival (an annual event) the Communion Service was sung to Stanford in B flat, with Gounod's Ave Verum, and at Evensong the anthem was Worthy is the Lamb, with Stanford in B flat for the Canticles. In the afternoon a fine programme of organ, vocal, and violin music was given. The Last Judgment was sung a week or two later. Attendances were very large. The whole testifies to the enthusiasm and enterprise of the organist and choirmaster, Mr. Leslie Curnow.

Excellent Church music was a feature of the Choir Anniversary services at Richmond Road Congregational Church, Cardiff, on January 15. A newspaper report says that 'the results achieved might put to shame not a few choirs of the Anglican Church.' Seeing that the anthems were by Farrant (three), Orlando Gibbons, Purcell, S. S. Wesley, and Battishill, with vocal solos by Bach, Haydn, and Vaughan Williams (two of the Mystical Songs), our contemporary might have put the case even more strongly. Fine hymn-tunes and some Bach organ music—Trio-Sonata No. 1 and the Toccata and Fugue in C—completed the scheme, which was spread over three services. Dr. Vaughan Williams gave addresses in the afternoon and evening on 'Hymn-tunes and their History,' and 'Hymns and their place in our Services.' The vocal soloist was Mr. Glanville Davies, and Mr. W. J. J. Robins, the organist and choirmaster, was in charge.

Dr. Harold Darke is in the midst of a series of recitals at St. Michael's, Cornhill, on Mondays, at 1 o'clock, until April 10. On March 6 he promises a Bach programme, on the 13th a batch of modern English works, on the 20th a programme of Chorale Preludes, and on the 27th a set of arrangements.

We have received a copy of the report of a Committee on Church Music appointed by a Conference of the Rural Deanery of Weldon, in the Diocese of Peterborough. The Committee consisted of clergy and organists, and its findings are therefore based both on liturgical and musical considerations—the only practical way of getting to work, though it has taken Church folk a long while to grasp the fact. The report contains a great deal of matter that should be useful to those in charge of parochial church music, especially in villages and small towns. No doubt the secretary of the Committee (Mr. S. J. Loasby, 103, Regent Street, Kettering), will be able to supply a copy to any of our readers who may be interested. We understand that as an outcome of the Committee's work a branch of the Church Music Society is being formed in the district.

A recital of Church music (mostly of early date) will be given at St. Mary's, Primrose Hill, on March 25, at 3.0 p.m., under the direction of Mr. Geoffrey Shaw. The items will include some plainsong, Tallis's Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in the Dorian Mode, Boyce's Save me, O God, Gibbons's fauxbourdon to the Evening Canticles, a couple of Bach Chorales, with violin obbligato, and Holst's Of one that is so fair and bright. The recital will be preceded by the Office of the Artists' Guild, and a short address by the Bishop of Willesden.

During March the following events in connection with Church music will take place at King's College, Strand; 6th, a hymn practice, tunes by Bach; 13th, lecture on 'Quality in Hymn Tunes,' by Mr. H. C. Colles; 20th, hymn practice, Welsh tunes; 27th, lecture on 'Goudimel and the Genevan Psalter of 1562,' by the Rev. G. R. Woodward. The hour on each occasion is 5.30. Books are provided.

The Rev. H. E. C. Lewis, Chaplain to the National Institute for the Blind, and himself blind, gave as many as sixteen organ recitals at different towns in Devonshire during the month of February. His programme included numbers from the 'National Institute Edition of Music by British Blind Composers,' and other music by sightless musicians.

The St. John Passion will be sung at St. Michael's, Cornhill, on March 31 and April 7 at 8 o'clock, conducted by Dr. Harold Darke.

ORGAN RECITALS

Mr. Cyril S. Christopher, Wollaston Parish Church—Sonata No. 1, Mendelssohn; Concert Scherzo in F, P. J. Mansfield. Wesley Church, Dudley (two recitals)—Concert Overture in C minor, Hollins; Concert Fantasia on a Welsh March, Best; Variations on an American Air, Flagler; The Pilgrim's Progress, Parts 1 and 2, Ernest Austin.

Mr. Allan Brown, Tooting Central Hall (two recitals)—Fantasia on two Christmas Carols, West; 'New World' Symphony; Casse-Noisette Suite, Tchaikovsky.

Recitals at Immanuel Church, Streatham: Mr. Eric A. Seymour—Sonata No. 2, Mendelssohn; Gothic Suite, Boelmann. Mr. Arthur Saunders—Symphony in D minor, Guilmant; Suite, Borowski; Festival Toccata, Fletcher. Mr. N. Victor Edwards—Sonata No. 1, Mendelssohn; Étude Symphonique, Bossi; Cantilène, Wolstenholme. Mr. E. Stanley Roper—Imperial March, Elgar; Sonata, Rheinberger; Choral No. 3, Franck. Mr. C. F. Waters—Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Bach; Sonata, Rheinberger; Fantasia in E flat, Saint-Saëns.

Mr. Arthur Meale, Central Hall (twelve recitals)—'Cuckoo and Nightingale' Concerto; Coronach, Barrett; Suite, J. H. Rogers; Prelude on 'St. Michael,' John E. West; Fantasia and Fugue on BACH, Liszt; Fantasia on two Christmas Carols, John E. West; Triumph Song, Raymon. Queen's Park Congregational Church, Harrow Road—Fugue in G minor, Bach; Theme and Variations in A minor, Faulkes; Three Nuptial Pieces, Dubois; Sonatas Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, and 6, Guilmant; Fugue in E flat, Bach; 'Finlandia'; Cantilène, Wolstenholme; Triumphal March, Hollins; Festal Commemoration, West; Canto Religioso, Meale.

- Mr. George Pritchard, Victoria Road Wesleyan Church, Widnes—Finale, Sonata No. 4, Mendelssohn; Fugue in D, Bach; The Curfew, Horsman. St. Mary's, Widnes—Scherzo in F, Haigh; Fanfare, Lemmens. St. Mary's, Widnes (four recitals)—Toccata in C, Bach; Fantasy on two Carols, West; Rhapsody No. 1, Saint-Saëns; Toccata (Gothic Suite), Boëllmann; Allegretto, Wolstenholme; 'Finlandia'.
- Mr. Frederick Richens, Lutheran Church of the Redeemer, Kingston, New York, U.S.A.—Cantilène, Salomé; Fugue in C, Bach; Salut d'Amour, Elgar; Concert Rondo, Hollins.
- Mr. W. Greenhouse Allt, St. John the Evangelist, Edinburgh (seven recitals)—Choral No. 3 and Andantino, Frank; Madrigal and Postlude, Vierne; Rhapsody No. 3, Howells; Noël, Wolstenholme; 'The Holy Boy,' Ireland; Prelude on the 'Old 104th,' Parry; Petite Pastorale, Ravel; Dithyramb, Harwood; Arabesque, Debussy; Pax Vobiscum, Karg-Elert.
- Mr. C. St. Ervan Johns, Maindee Parish Church (two recitals)—Chorale No. 3, Frank; April Song, Wolstenholme; Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Fantaisie Dialoguée, Boëllmann. Great Central Hall, Newport, Mon.—Gothic Suite, Boëllmann; Variations de Concert, Bonnet.
- Mr. F. Douglas Bull, St. Giles's Presbyterian Church, Winnipeg—'Finlandia'; Elégie, Massenet; Harvest Song, West. All Saints', Winnipeg—Prière et Berceuse, Guilmant; Pastorale, Hollins.
- Mr. A. M. Gifford, United Methodist Church, Hunstanton—Offertoire on two Christmas themes, Guilmant; Cantilène and Offertoire in E flat, Salomé; Toccata, d'Eury. (Mrs. A. M. Gifford sang six Christmas Songs, Cornelius; 'Hear my prayer,' and 'Sing ye a joyful song,' Deorák.)
- Mr. Alex. B. Garrard, All Hallows', Gospel Oak—Sonata in C minor, Lyon; Andante, Frank Bridge; Prelude and Fugue in F minor, Bach; Evening Song, Bairstow.
- Mr. E. Emyln Davies, Immanuel Church, Streatham Common—Pastel No. 3, Karg-Elert; Concerto in B flat, Handel; Toccata in C minor, Halsey.
- Mr. Herbert E. Knott, St. Paul's, Balsall Heath—Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach; Recessional, Alan Gray; Psalm Prelude, Howells.
- Mr. S. Wallbank, Hexham Abbey (two recitals)—Funeral March and Hymn of Seraphs, Guilmant; Andante Cantabile, S. S. Wesley; Toccata and Fugue in D minor and Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; Londonderry Air; Symphony No. 5, Widor. Selby Abbey—Fantasia in F minor, Mozart; Symphony No. 5, Widor.
- Mr. Stanley E. Lucas, Harecourt Congregational Church, Highbury—Prelude and Fugue in G minor and Pastoral Symphony, Bach; Fantasy on two Christmas carols, West.
- Mr. C. H. Trevor, St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta (five recitals)—Three Preludes on 'In dulci júbilo' and Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach; Prelude and Fugue in A minor and Trio in F, Krebs; Prelude on 'The people that in darkness sat,' Parry; Marcia Religiosa and Fugue, Rheinberger; Pastorale in E, Frank.
- Mr. F. W. Brock, St. John the Evangelist, Clapham Rise—Prelude, Hamand; Two Chorales, Reger; Allegro (Sonata No. 6), Guilmant; Scherzo in A flat, Bairstow.
- Mr. Wallace G. Breach, St. John the Evangelist, Clapham Rise—Gothic Suite, Boëllmann; Toccata, Holloway; Legend, Harvey Grace.
- Mr. G. Bernard Gilbert, Town Hall, Stratford—Offertoire No. 2, Guilmant; Preludes on 'The holly and the ivy' and 'In dulci júbilo,' Buck; Christmas Fantasy, Best.
- Mr. E. Roberts West, St. Paul's, Leamington Spa—Overture to 'The Messiah'; Fantasy on two carols, West.
- Mr. Leitch Owen, Edge Hill Parish Church—Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; Triumphal March, Kinross.
- Mr. John Pullein, St. Mary's Cathedral, Glasgow—Prelude and Fugue in F minor, Bach; Pavane, Byrd; Air, Blow; Menuet, Purcell; Psalm Prelude No. 3, Howells; Noël, Dubois.
- Mr. H. C. Tomlin, Park Hall, Cardiff—March on a Theme of Handel, Guilmant; Christmas Fantasy, Best.
- Mr. Harold M. Dawber, St. George's, Stockport—Choral Fantasia on the Old Hundredth, Parry; Pastoral Symphony, Bach. Worsley Road Congregational Church, Swinton—Overture to 'Otho'; Fantasia and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Preludes on 'St. Mary's,' Chas. Wood, and 'Rhosymedre,' Vaughan Williams; Introduction and Fugue, Reubke; Berceuse, Vierne.
- Mr. F. J. Livesey, St. Bees Priory Church—'In dulci júbilo,' Buxtehude; Pastorale, Best; Carillon, Boëllmann.
- Mr. Norman Collie, St. Stephen's Walbrook—Festal Prelude, Dunhill; 'The Holy Boy' and Villanella, Ireland; Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach. Stoke Newington Parish Church—Marche Héroïque, Saint-Saëns; Variations on an Original Air, Archer; Sonata No. 2, Mendelssohn.
- Mr. James Tomlinson, Preston Parish Church—Angelus, Tomlinson; Theme in E varied, Faulkes; 'Le Cygne,' Saint-Saëns.
- Mr. Hugh W. Wood, Ebenezer Congregational Church, Uppermill—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Overture 'William Tell.'
- Mr. W. J. Lancaster, Bolton Parish Church—Fantasia in E flat, Saint-Saëns; Symphony No. 5, Widor.
- Mr. W. Hunt, St. George's, Belfast—Prelude and Fugue in B minor, Bach; Pastorale, Recitativo, et Corale, Karg-Elert; Postlude in D minor, Stanford; Idyll, Alan Gray. Loughbrickland Parish Church, Co. Down (two recitals)—Sonata in F minor, Rheinberger; Spring Song, Hollins; Londonderry Air; Allegro Marziale, Frank Bridge.
- Mr. Burton G. Pennock, St. Matthew's, Ponders End—Gothic Suite, Boëllmann; Grand Chœur No. 2, Hollins; Allegro con brio, Holloway.
- Mr. Francis W. Sutton, St. James's, Croydon—Occasional Overture; 'Sleepers, wake,' Bach; Choral Song and Fugue, S. S. Wesley; Rhapsody, Harvey Grace.
- Mr. Fred Gostelow, Ilford Baptist Church—Toccata (Doric), Bach; Sonata in A minor, Borowski; The Answer, Wolstenholme. Luton Parish Church—Imperial March, Elgar; Symphony in E minor, Holloway; Toccata (Symphony No. 5), Widor.
- Mr. C. F. Waters, St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Sonata No. 1, Harwood; Morning Greeting, Waters; Finale (Sonata No. 1), Guilmant.
- Mr. C. H. Moody, Selby Abbey—Concerto in G minor, Camidge; Largo from 'New World' Symphony.
- Mr. J. E. R. Senior, Art Gallery, Kelvingrove Park, Glasgow—Berceuse, Arensky; Finale in G minor (Sonata), Elgar; 'Slumber Song,' Senior.
- Mr. Herbert Hodge, St. Nicholas Cole Abbey (seven recitals)—Prelude on Darwell's 148th, Darke; Rhapsodie, Saint-Saëns; First movement (Sonata No. 2), Rheinberger; Fugue in G, S. Wesley; Postlude, 'Martyrs,' Harvey Grace; Fugue, Reubke; Postlude in D minor, Stanford; Air with Variations, in A, Hesse; Andante in G minor, Silas; and two Bach programmes.
- Mr. Herbert Hill, Selby Abbey (two recitals)—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Theme and Variations, Bossi; Epilogue, Healey Willan; Overture in C minor, Hollins.
- Mr. A. E. Jones, Town Hall, Bolton—March on a Theme of Handel, Guilmant; Toccata Concertante, Claussmann; 'Finlandia'; Prelude in D minor, Mendelssohn; 'Pomp and Circumstance' No. 1.
- Mr. Harry Wall, St. Clement Danes, Strand—First Suite, Lyon; Psalm Prelude No. 2, Howells; Gaudete, W. G. Ross.
- Mr. Ernest Biltcliffe, St. Mary Magdalene's, Bradford—Fantasia in C, Handel; Toccata and Fugue in C, Bach; Allegretto Scherzando, Stuart Archer; Fantasia and Fugue in E minor, Best.
- Mr. G. W. Harris Sellick, Macfadyen Memorial Congregational Church, Chorlton-cum-Hardy—Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; March of the Magi, Dubois; 'Unfinished' Symphony; Fugue in G minor, Bach; Concerto in F, Handel; Finale (Sonata No. 1), Mendelssohn.

Mr. Laurence M. Ager, Hellingly Parish Church—First movement (Sonata No. 1), Mendelssohn; March for a Church Festival, Best; Allegretto, Wolstenholme.

Mr. F. de G. English, Halifax Parish Church—Sonata in E flat minor, Rheinberger; Prelude and Fugue in B minor, Bach; Meditation and Finale, Klein.

Mr. Albert Orton, Parish Church, Harrow-on-the-Hill—Dithyramb, Harwood; Andante in F, S. Wesley; Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Air and Variations, in G, Rheinberger.

Mr. S. Maurice Popplestone, Primitive Methodist Church, Salisbury—Toccata (Symphony No. 5), Widor; Meditation-Elegie, Borowski; 'Finlandia.'

Mr. Alban Hamer, Bloemfontein Cathedral—Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach; Prelude to 'Parsifal'; Prean, Harwood.

APPOINTMENTS

Mr. G. C. Gray, organist and choirmaster, St. Martin's, Potternewton, Leeds.

Mr. A. G. Hazeldine, organist and choirmaster, St. Andrew's, Whitehall Park, N.

Letters to the Editor

'MISDIRECTION IN ORATORIO SINGING'

SIR,—In the Musical Times for January, 1922 (pages 23-27), Archdeacon Gardner enters a timely protest against (among other things) 'the undue hurrying of familiar choruses [of oratorios] in order that they may sound fresh and exciting.' May I be allowed to give my humble support to this protest, and even to show that there is need for it in respect of many other performances than those of oratorio choruses?

Having sat next to Hubert Parry in a back row of second basses in the Bach Choir for the first ten years (1875-85) of its history, I may be allowed to call to mind that though our then conductor's (Otto Goldschmidt's) tempi may by some have been thought too slow, he did nevertheless get such tone from his instruments and such vocal quality from his singers that on three occasions he actually won encores from St. James's Hall audiences: twice (1876 and 1879) for the Cum Sancto Spiritu in the Mass in B minor, and again for the Fecit Potentiam in the Magnificat of Bach.

But in subsequent years it has been my fate to hear Cum Sancto Spiritu taken so fast, even under very distinguished conductorship, that all the force of the great ascending and descending sequential ladders of phrases was completely lost. Owing to forced speed, there was no breath in the singers and no tone in the strings; and all that a first hearer could get was a succession of crude patches of orchestral colour with small suggestion in them of either line or shape.

I remember too, how, when I wished to repeat the pleasing experience of a performance of Phæbus and Pan under Mr. Julius Harrison, I went again to Covent Garden, to find enthroned another conductor who thought he could get more vivacity into Momus's song Patron, Patron, and more boisterous fun into Midas's Pan ist Meister, by taking both at much faster tempi. The only result of the higher speed was that both songs became long and tedious instead of crisp and short as before. Let me try and show why there is no paradox here, and why the performance that takes the shorter time seems longer in effect. Surely all undue accelerations are achieved at the expense of instrumental tone and timbre, of the clarity of decorative figures, and of the breaths and voices of singers. Composers must be supposed to choose their instruments and write their choral parts so as to get the best tone to be had at the given pace. In other words, speed, tone, and clarity all act and react upon each other. At forced speeds graceful or brilliant string passages may well degenerate into mere unmusical scratchings. In such cases your gay movement, losing the effect of its humorous or exhilarating figures, becomes not more 'jolly' but less so, and may indeed become ineffective to the point of tedium.

Conductors are usually tempted into 'speedings-up' by one or other of the following lures:

- (1.) The desire, as in the above case of Phæbus and Pan, to get more joviality or humour out of the music;
- (2.) There is the delusion, in the case of established classics, that their familiarity makes audiences the more ready to get quickly to the end.

Here let me say that it is a mistake to suppose that in the case of classical compositions of past centuries it is their duration that makes for impatience in the hearers. Modern audiences may be exacting towards performances of classical works; but it is not higher speeds that they want so much as higher standards of execution. The more familiar the style and matter of a composition the more does the audience demand of the executant. Speeding-up lowers the quality of the execution without giving anything (not even seemingly shorter duration) in its place. Those who had the luck, as I did, to hear Richard Strauss, in London, somewhere about 1912, conduct a performance of Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, will bear me out in the recollection that with tempi far more moderate than usual he got a reading in which almost every bar was a revelation. And how much too soon it was over!

- (3.) Then there is the desire (in Scherzos and the like) to get record speeds and so outdo competitors. (Have not some of us heard the Scherzo and Trio of Beethoven's ninth Symphony murdered that way?) Lastly, and basest of all, there is the managerial need to sacrifice the music—as, e.g., in the case of Parsifal in London two or three years ago—to the catching of late 'buses and suburban trains.

So far I have dealt only with objective considerations: let me mention others. Music, most jealous of mistresses, brooks neither competitors nor distractions. You cannot listen, certainly you cannot listen with appreciation, to fine music amid the babel of a social gathering crowded with acquaintances. Nor can a hungry man listen, nor a man who is anxious about a train to be caught. Good music must be supreme, or it is nothing. The moment that music ceases to be the one preoccupation of the hour, its magic vanishes with its lost supremacy. Conductors who aim at excessive speeds are doing the very thing that must deprive music of its ascendancy over our attention. How can you listen with attention to music of which its chief executant makes it seem his one desire to get to the end? Music played thus seems presented as unimportant. The performance of what sounds unimportant soon comes to sound perfunctory, the perfunctory soon degenerates into the trivial, and the end is that we lose interest and find the piece long because it has been made dull.

So it is that conductors who force speeds beyond what the character of the music will bear are in truth defeating their own chief objects.—Yours, &c., STUART OF WORTLEY.

7, Cheyne Walk, Chelsea.

February 15, 1922.

SIX-STOP ORGAN: UNIQUE SPECIFICATION

SIR,—I regret troubling you with this again, but noticing discrepancies in your February number, I thought if you agree it would be as well to correct the same. It should read:

Upper—GREAT

- | | | | | |
|--|-----|-----|-------|--------------|
| 1. Stopped flute | ... | ... | 4-ft. | } All Metal. |
| 2. Fifteenth | ... | ... | 4-ft. | |
| 3. Mixture (two ranks, 19th and 22nd bass; 12th and 17th treble) | ... | ... | | |

Lower—CHOIR

- | | | | | |
|---------------------|-----|-----|-------|-------------------|
| 4. Open diapason | ... | ... | 8-ft. | } All Wood (Oak). |
| 5. Stopped diapason | ... | ... | 8-ft. | |
| 6. Principal | ... | ... | 4-ft. | |

Yours, &c.,

R. H. GATES.

The Mindens, Paignton, S. Devon.

February 6, 1922.

'MUSIC IN LONDON'

SIR,—In your issue for January, 1922, you characterise an 'article' (interview) of mine in Musical America, on 'Music in London,' as 'ludicrously inaccurate.' In the course of the last twenty-five years I have made a number of visits to London in the summer—eight or ten, perhaps—and, being a professional singer, feel justified in asserting that I have some knowledge of what might be called 'normal' musical conditions at that season in London. This last summer I was in London for three-quarters of the period limited by my arrival and my departure—June 28 and August 3. You show that I was in error in implying that Sir Henry Wood's orchestra could never have been heard in July; but certainly there was no opera during July at either Covent Garden or Drury Lane; there was no orchestral music of a serious nature in any music-hall; there were no concerts by artists of high standing, if I may be permitted to except from this category one or two Albert Hall programmes of a popular shade. Am I too sweeping in these assertions? I think not. In the course of my visit I was able to locate and enjoy just two fine performances by English musicians—The Beggar's Opera, and a song-recital by Mr. John Coates in Chelsea Town Hall. Mr. Coates's programme was so wholly delightful that I borrowed a large part of it for my own programmes here. If there was anything comparable in merit with these two performances my detective qualities were surely at fault. If I thought there was any chance of your granting a request of mine, I should ask you to print or send me a list of last July's musical performances that escaped my notice.—Yours, &c.,

FRANCIS ROGERS.

144, East 62nd Street,
New York City.
January 15, 1922.

[Mr. Rogers has shifted his ground. In the interview he expressed the opinion that so far as music was concerned there was 'nothing doing' in London, and he seemed to base this view on the fact that there was no 'grand opera' season with 'star' performers. Now he wishes us to understand that his remarks applied to the few weeks at midsummer. Our complaint, like that of Mr. Sorabji quoted in our 'Occasional Note,' was called forth by the fact that Mr. Rogers made sweeping assertions on the general lack of musical life in London, with no better evidence than the experiences gained during a brief visit at the fag end of the season. Had he told his American readers that he happened to find London concert-givers packing up and going off for their holidays he would have been right. But his remarks certainly appeared to refer to the whole of 1921—a year during which, as we pointed out, London was visited by practically all the outstanding contemporary musicians, and made acquaintance with new works by all but a very few of the leading composers of to-day, many of whom conducted or took part in the performances.]

Mr. Rogers is unduly pessimistic as to the chance of our granting a request of his. On the contrary we gladly produce the lists he asks for. First, however, we may be allowed to point out that we never contended that there was feverish musical activity in London during July. Nevertheless, there were a few good concerts in the early part of the month. We do not know the exact dates of Mr. Rogers's arrival in London, so we will deal with the period he mentions—June 28 to August 3. We find that concerts and recitals were given by the following: John Coates, Clara Butt and Kennerley Rumford, Dorothy Moulton (first performance of a batch of songs by Bax, with the composer at the pianoforte), Guild of Singers and Players, Gabrilowitsch, Boris Hambourg, Una Trueman, Louise Aussenac, Ticerti, the Chamber Music Players (a combination second to none), Patron's Fund (first performance of the Ballet from Holst's The Perfect Fool), Oriana Choir (a concert of a type unknown in New York, we believe: so much the worse for New York), and the League of Arts (Purcell's Mask of Proclesian in Hyde Park, under the greenwood tree). There were also a performance of the same work by a company got together and directed by Gustav Holst, a six days' Festival of the English Folk-Dance Society (a prominent feature of which was some delightful singing by the Oriana Choir, the Northern Singers, Miss Gwenn Frangcon Davies, and Clive Carey), a performance of Holst's Opera Savitri; a week of 'opera intime' given by Rosing (June 25-July 2); and the Russian Ballet at the Princes Theatre (Stravinsky's Rite of Spring, Pulcinella, Firebird, and Enchanted Princess, and the rest of the repertory), with fine playing under Ansermet of orchestral interludes by Stravinsky, Prokofief, Goossens, Berners, Bliss, Bax, Quilter, Ravel, and overtures and extracts from Russian Opera. We could add a good deal to the above list, but we think it better to mention only concerts given by well-known performers, though it may well be that some of the remainder were quite as enjoyable. We think Mr. Rogers must admit that although he came at the beginning of the 'off' season there were still a fair number of concerts worth his attention. And their discovery called for no 'detective quality.' They were well advertised in the chief daily papers, and, had Mr. Rogers glanced at our weekly contemporary, the Musical News and Herald, he would have seen plainly set forth, so that he who read might run to the booking-office, a complete list of the concerts for the ensuing seven days, with full particulars, including the titles of the chief works down for performance.

Finally, we may revert to the point made by Mr. Sorabji in the letter we quoted. So called 'grand' opera was never a reliable test of the musical life of this country, especially during the past few years, when this most expensive form of music has suffered from the post-war hard-uppishness of the class most willing to support it. Happily, these financial difficulties appear to have benefited the art by increasing the number of chamber music concerts and other performances calling for a modest number of performers. The best concerts of this type are musically more important than many a 'grand' opera whose main interest is centred in the vocal fireworks of a puffed-up and over-paid prima donna.—Ed., M.T.]

THE MUSIC OF DAME ETHEL SMYTH

SIR,—Ever since my Memoirs were published I have been in the habit of receiving letters from all parts of the country, even America, expressing a wish that my readers could hear some of my music. An article recently published in the Daily Mail has brought me too many such letters to answer personally; but may I suggest to these kind sympathisers (especially to women concert-goers) that it would be a good plan to express their wishes to the conductors and committees of their local orchestras and choral societies? For in nine cases out of ten it is merely that one gets forgotten in the crowd of male composers.

I may add that the London and Continental Music Publishing Company, 40, Great Marlborough Street, London, W., has a timed catalogue of all my concert works, and, together with Messrs. Novello, hold most of my music, either on hire or for sale.—Yours, &c., Woking.

January, 1922.

ETHEL SMYTH

(D.B.E., Mus. Doc.).

THE WRONG COPY WAS SENT FOR REVIEW

SIR,—I have much sympathy with your reviewer when he says in your February issue that my valse Moods has 'a little too much repetition.' In fact he puts it very mildly. I therefore feel that I must explain that this repetition is caused by the fact that in the pianoforte solo edition I was compelled, in the interests of simplicity for the home-pianist, unmercifully to lop off all kinds of fresh counterpoint and to substitute therefor bald restatements of what had gone before. The valse appears as I wrote it in the 'piano-conductor' copy, and it was specially arranged that only the latter should be sent out for review. Unfortunately, however, through somebody's blunder, this has not been kept to, with the result that my poor effort in the 'popular style' is being given an extra handicap even beyond its true deserts.—Yours, &c.,

GERRARD WILLIAMS.

February, 1922.

'JERUSALEM MY HAPPY HOME'

SIR,—Hymns and their tunes seem to have an extraordinary fascination for English people, and at the time of writing (January 20) a correspondence is still proceeding in The Times Literary Supplement as to the original tune of this well-known hymn. It has brought to light some interesting facts about both hymn and tune into which I need not enter, but since The Times Literary Supplement does not use music-type, many readers have been left unsatisfied on the one point that matters to them, viz., What sort of a tune is it that is under discussion? My name was several times drawn into the correspondence, with the result that I had numerous inquiries as to the nature of the music. May I therefore satisfy further inquirers through the hospitality of your columns?

With regard to the hymn itself, Julian was unable to identify the author, and merely headed the hymn 'A Song made by F. B. P.' Mr. Joseph Gillow (Publications of the Catholic Record Society, vol. xvi., pp. 421-2) was able to show that the initials should be 'J. B. P.' i.e., John Brerely Priest, one of the pseudonyms of the Rev. Laurence Anderton, S.J. (1574 to 1643), whose identity with Brerely Mr. Gillow also establishes.

In 1918 Miss E. M. Brougham published Corn from Olde Fieldes, a fascinating anthology of poems from the 14th to the 17th centuries, and included the hymn in its usual form of twenty-six verses (the original has fifty-nine). But the interesting thing about her book is that the frontispiece reproduces in facsimile the page from British Museum Add. MSS. 38,599 which contains the hymn. The MS. is 'the commonplace book of the Shann family of Methley, Co. York, chiefly written by Richard Shann (1591-1627)'. The page in question is headed 'The Querister's Song of Yorke in praise of Heaven'; this is followed by a line of music, to which is prefixed 'this is the tune'; then follow the words.

In 1919 Mr. J. Britten (who opened the correspondence in The Times Literary Supplement) copied this tune, and sent it to me for identification. I had to reply that it was unknown to me, and looked more like a bass part than a melody. I have since shown it to a number of musicians, and with only one exception they incline to the belief that it is a bass and not a melody. Here is the 'tune':

The deeper we dive into 16th century music the less dogmatic are we inclined to become. I am not prepared to assert that the 'tune' must be a bass part, but I have attempted a conjectural reconstruction of the music (in 16th century style) on that assumption, and leave the result with your readers:

THE QUERISTER'S SONG OF YORKE

Treated as a bass C.F.

(Treble, Alto, and Tenor parts supplied by R. R. T.)

2

N.B.—(1) The above reconstruction contains more passing-notes than would be found in the old psalters—Ravenscroft, Day, &c.
(2) The fifths in bars 2 and 3 are characteristic of the period: fifths and octaves were always 'saved' by the intervention of a passing-note or a rest.

There is this further probability in favour of my assumption that Richard Shann has not given us the real melody: (1) 16th century psalm-tunes (like other part-music) had their several parts written in different books; (2) The melodies of these psalm-tunes were almost invariably sung by the tenor; (3) The part-books were not always labelled with the name of the voice they represented; (4) In the present day a tenor clef implies music for a tenor voice; in the 16th century the clef had little relation to the voice; tenor parts constantly bore an alto clef, and bass parts were just as often as not written with a tenor clef (i.e., if their range were high). The rule was to employ (irrespective of the voice) whatever clef involved the least use of ledger lines.

It is just possible that Richard Shann—knowing that psalm-tune melodies were always to be looked for in the tenor part, and seeing an unlabelled part-book bearing a tenor clef—was hastily misled into thinking that this was the part-book of the tenor voice. Such hurried or superficial examination of part-books is not unknown in later times. Some years ago I scored a Mass from a set of part-books from which the tenor one was missing. In another library was 'A Tenor Part-book' with the same Mass in its list of contents. Overjoyed at this discovery of the missing tenor, I visited the library in question, only to find that the 'missing tenor' was nothing more than the first bass part (which I already possessed) written in the tenor clef. If modern librarians can make the mistake of labelling bass part-books as 'tenor' ones, merely because they bear a tenor clef, it is not outside the bounds of possibility that Richard Shann might have fallen into the same error, and got hold of the bass part-book instead of the tenor one. But again I disclaim any intention of dogmatizing. I merely put forward a theory, and am open to correction.—Yours, &c.,

R. R. TERRY.

'SIMPLICITY VERSUS INSIGNIFICANCE'

SIR,—I note that in your February issue the writer of your 'Occasional Notes' is inclined to dispute Mr. Scholes's contention that 'had the theme [of Beethoven's fifth Symphony, first movement] been changed to:

it would have been so weakened that even Beethoven could have made nothing great out of it.' The strange thing, however, is that apparently neither of these gentlemen has noticed that the theme has been changed to precisely what Mr. Scholes suggests—by Beethoven himself, in bars 14, 15.

The actual fact, it seems to me, is that the essential theme of the movement does not lie either in the exact notes as written by Beethoven in the first two bars, or in the suggested alteration of Mr. Scholes; or in any possible modification as regards pitch. It subsists in the underlying rhythmic theme, and is best represented by without pitch. I agree with Mr. Scholes, however, that if the opening had been altered as he suggests (so as to make it as quoted above), the movement would have been almost immeasurably weakened.—Yours, &c., Worthing.

A. R. C.

February 7, 1922.

THE FEDERATION OF BRITISH MUSIC INDUSTRIES

SIR,—I have, not for the first time, to express my thanks to you for your kind reference in the February number of the Musical Times to the propaganda work of this Federation.

One of the main objects of the Federation is to effect a more complete union than has hitherto existed between the art and the craft sides of music; and to this end it would be a good thing if your readers would realise what the Federation is doing for the professional musician.

The three main objects of the Federation's propaganda work are to get music recognised in the Press of the country; to establish its claims to a recognised position in education; and to get it taken up more and more widely by employers of labour and others interested in welfare work.

The exact value of newspaper propaganda is hard to determine, but in the last twelve months we have got our articles accepted by more than fifty newspapers; and it would appear obvious that the more music is talked about, the more people will get interested in it, and a percentage at least (we hope a large percentage) of those whose interest is thus awakened will take up the study of music in one form or another.

This last result has been attained in several cases as the direct result of our Music in Industry campaign. Here we endeavour to induce employers to form choirs, bands, or orchestras among their employees. Many employers have followed our lead, and the choirs or other organizations that they have formed are being trained by local musicians. It has also been found that in very many instances employees who have joined a choir or similar body have got so interested that they have immediately begun private lessons with one or other of the local musicians available.

In our Education campaign we have actually induced sundry local Education Authorities to appoint a musical adviser; and, quite apart from that, we have achieved less tangible but no less important results in proving through our lecturers how music may be made a fascinating and inexpensive ingredient in school curricula. There are many other ways in which the Federation can and does help professional musicians. Some of these are set forth in a booklet, Making the Most of Music, which any musician who has not yet received it can obtain on application to these offices.

I should be glad if you could spare me a little more space to put forward the other side of the case, i.e., how the professional musician can help the Federation. It is not hard to understand that it is difficult to find subjects for weekly articles which can be treated in a popular and non-technical manner, at the same time being kept free from direct propaganda of any sort or description. I personally should be very grateful for any suggestion which any of your readers would kindly send me, stipulating only that in no case can I deal with a suggestion which boosts a particular individual. For instance, I could not deal with a new system of sight-reading any more than I could advertise the merits of such a thing as the new duplex pianoforte.

Whatever the articles may be, they must not be advertisements. Secondly, the Press of the country is full of false or misleading statements about the Music Industries—statements which are often calculated to exalt foreign at the expense of British musical instruments. If any of your readers, meeting with such statements in the columns of their local papers, would forward them instantly to the Federation, steps would immediately be taken to contradict them to the benefit of the music trades and also to the benefit of the profession, whose interests are practically identical with those of the Music Industries.

Apologising for trespassing at such length on your valuable space.—Yours, &c.,

H. B. DICKIN.

The Federation of British Music Industries,

117-123, Great Portland Street, W. 1.

February 7, 1922.

FATHER HOWE

SIR,—Some of your readers may care to have a few additional particulars concerning the Howe family which have only lately come to my notice. I extract them from the article on 'The Organs at St. Stephen's Walbrook' in the January issue of The Organ, but give them in abbreviated form.

Father Howe was churchwarden of St. Stephen's in 1535-36, an office held by his father (also an organ-builder) in 1519 and by his one-time partner, John Clymhoo, in 1534-35. His residence, distinguished by 'the sign of the Organe Pype,' was bought by the parish in 1551, but he continued to rent it till his decease in 1571. His widow, whose name was Ann, kept the house on till she, too, died. That was in 1585. Both Howe and his wife were generously treated by the parish during their declining years, when, through no fault of their own, but through the almost entire disease of Church organs, the old man's business was ruined and his circumstances considerably reduced. To the very end they were treated with the courtesy and consideration due to a family of repute and long-standing.

Amongst the many references to work done by Howe—too numerous to be quoted here—are several which speak of his membership of the Skinners' Company.—Yours, &c.,

January 23, 1922.

ANDREW FREEMAN.

THE DEARTH OF ACCOMPANISTS

SIR,—They say a good accompanist is born and not made. In modern songs and chamber music the pianist often gets the lion's share of the work, but does he get a corresponding share of the credit or the fee? Oh dear, no. He gets more kicks than ha'pence, and if anything goes wrong he is the first to be blamed. Sometimes he is not even mentioned in a concert notice! He is taken for granted.

Some few years ago Miss Kathleen Peck and I sought to draw attention to this anomaly by giving a 'Song and Accompaniment' recital in London. In this case I chose the songs and played the whole programme of about twenty numbers by heart—a feat of memory that surely is not common—and yet not a single critic (and there were many present) noticed it or thought it worth recording!—Yours, &c.,

JOHN IVIMEY.

We are asked to state that the rehearsals of the Philharmonic Choir are now open to visitors on payment of 7s. 6d. for the season, which sum entitles them to become honorary members. Choirmasters, singers, and others should make the most of this opportunity for hearing fine music, and of gaining valuable instruction in voice-production, interpretation, &c. The rehearsals are held at the Guildhouse, Belgrave Road, Eccleston Square, on Wednesdays, from 5.45 to 7.45 p.m. The nearest station is Victoria. The hon. secretary is Miss R. Philpott, 8, Hatherley Grove, W.2.

A programme of works by Mr. J. Gerrard Williams will be given at Æolian Hall on March 27 by Miss Phyllis Carey-Foster (oprano), Mr. Osmond Davis (tenor), and Mrs. Norman O'Neill (pianoforte).

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of March, 1862:

PHILHARMONIC ROOMS, NEWMAN STREET.—A concert was given at these rooms on February 5, by Mlle. Renée Holbut, who is both a pianist and vocalist. In the former capacity she played Thalberg's Home, sweet home; her experiments in the latter were confined to simplicities of the ballad school. . . . A horn band of some rifle regiment was unfortunately let into the room, and contrived to make a most distressing noise.

WANTED, a Young Lady, with good Soprano Voice, who is capable of leading choruses, to take the charge of children, and to make herself generally useful.—Apply to W. H. Birch, Professor of Music, Caversham, Reading.

THOMAS CROGER'S NEW PATENT IMPROVED ÆOLIAN HARP

Will produce music in the garden, conservatory, summer-house, on the balcony or window ledge of the nursery, or on board any vessel on the water, or on the branches of a tree, &c., without a performer. It merely requires placing on a table or stand, or laying across the branches of a tree, or it may be suspended from one, or from any convenient place. It does not signify whether it is placed perpendicular, horizontal, or diagonally; the object is to cause the draught to pass through where the strings are, which will set them in vibration, and bring forth the most melodious sounds ever heard. At a distance the tones are truly delightful; and what renders it so amusing is, that anyone not being aware of its position cannot trace from whence it proceeds; the effect is so peculiar, it seems to be in every direction at once. All persons are sure to be surprised and delighted at the romantic effect; it may be used by anyone totally unacquainted with music; and will produce an endless source of amusement by its various sounds. Full instruction is attached to each one in such a way that it cannot be damaged or removed. Prices 14s., 16s., 18s., 20s., 22s., 24s., 28s., 32s., and 36s., according to the number of strings and finish.

Sharps and Flats

Nothing could be more dangerous to the true understanding and enjoyment of Don Quixote than any idea that the value of the music ended with its detailed explanation. The programme is the beginning, not the end, of programme music. Its use is to quicken the musical imagination of the composer, and to guide to some beginnings of perception the imagination of the listener.—Samuel Langford.

These East-Enders enjoy, too, a privilege that ordinary concert-goers never get: the works are analysed for them before the performance by Mr. Boulton with as little technicality as possible, and the leading themes, instead of being printed in a programme, are played over by the band. I wish we could have some arrangement of this sort in the West End when new works are produced.—Ernest Newman.

Beauty is ultimately the only thing of value.—C. H. R. Newinson.

I get cloyed with pure beauty.—Percy A. Scholes.

The value of the æsthetic state, which it is the most evolved function of art to produce, is to make us realise, not merely understand, in terms of abstract concepts.—Leigh Henry.

I have studied music all my life . . . and I am always willing to learn. . . . Would Mr. A. Corbett-Smith take pity on my ignorance and mention the name of a British violinist whose genius is within a hundred miles of Kreisler's, and of a composer whose genius is within a hundred miles of Strauss's?—Frederick A. Romyn.

We have not the pleasure of Mr. Romyn's acquaintance, but we surmise from his phrases that, if not elderly, he is at least old enough for his most impressionable years to have been steeped in the once-prevailing superstition that all good music came from Germany. He has not even the caution of that rural centenarian who, when asked whether he had lived all his life in his native village, replied, 'Not yet.'—Edwin Evans.

We must have an entirely new art for the cinema.—M. Diaghileff.

Those damned films.—Arthur Bliss.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players.

[This department has now grown to such an extent that it occupies more space than can conveniently be spared. In future, therefore, announcements will be inserted twice, instead of three times as hitherto. Although the column was started for the benefit of string quartet and similar chamber music combinations, it has gradually developed into an exchange for amateur musicians of other kinds. We do not regret this, believing as we do that the cause of music cannot be better served than by bringing amateurs together for the mutual study and enjoyment of music; and after all, such combinations as voice and pianoforte, or vocal quartet, belong to the chamber music family, though the conventional use of the term has become narrowed down to a few instrumental groups. We are sorry to have to emphasise the fact that the department is for the use of amateurs only. One or two cases have occurred in which professionals have tried to obtain engagements through its agency. Two other points: (a) As the Musical Times willingly bears the small cost of forwarding letters, readers are asked to refrain from sending stamps in advance; (b) Correspondence referring to the column should be addressed to the Editor, not to the Advertisement Manager or to the Publishers.

We take this opportunity for expressing our pleasure that, judging from the numerous letters of thanks we receive, the column has been of service to a large number of amateur musicians.—ED., M. T.]

South Hampstead and St. John's Wood, N.W. There are vacancies for good amateur instrumentalists in the Amateur Orchestral Society. Meetings on Thursday evenings in the Lecture Hall of the New College Chapel, Adelaide Road entrance. Low fees. Music provided.—Apply, WATSON HARDING, 6A, Upper Park Road, N.W. 3.

Accompanist (lady) will give services to a teacher or choral society for (say) two evenings a week in return for use of room (preferably in West End) for pianoforte practice twice weekly. Afternoons or evenings.—M. B., c/o Musical Times.

Orchestra (Stockwell Philharmonic Society). There are vacancies for good string and wood-wind players.—Write, Hon.-Secretary, 153, Clapham Road, S.W.9.

A lady (amateur vocalist) would like a good accompanist for practice one or two evenings a week, and offers instruction in singing in exchange. Moseley or Edgbaston district preferred.—141, Stratford Road, Birmingham.

Vacancies for players of violin, viola, violoncello, and clarinet, in good orchestra. Practice room near Oxford Street.—CONDUCTOR, 15, Eleanor Road, E.15.

Violinist desires to join quartet or trio for practice of classical and modern chamber music. Manchester district.—Apply, 'GAMMA,' c/o Musical Times.

Gentleman, tenor vocalist, well-trained amateur, desires to meet a good pianist for mutual practice. Fond of the classics.—D. G. T., 83, Uplands Road, N.8.

Amateur instrumentalists, all parts, required in the formation of an orchestra at St. Philip's Church, Kennington Road, S.E., in connection with monthly recitals and service accompaniments. Fine modern organ.—F. A. EUSTACE, 42, Dawnay Road, Wandsworth, S.W.18.

Young enthusiast in chamber-ballet would like to hear from others interested in order to form party. Croydon and South London.—C. B., c/o Musical Times.

South London Philharmonic Society.—There are vacancies in the orchestral section for violas, wood-wind, and brass players. Rehearsals, Friday evenings, at Lewisham. Works under rehearsal, Spectre's Bride (Dvorák), fifth Symphony (Beethoven), &c. Conductor, William H. Kerridge.—Apply, JOHN W. WATERER, 19, Adelaide Road, Brockley, S.E. 4.

Wanted.—North London Amateur wind and string players to collaborate in introducing good orchestral music at monthly services at an Islington Free Church. Alternate services are devoted to a specific composer (February—Haydn), whose life and works were appropriately discussed from pulpit. Rehearsals on Thursdays.—Write, WILL F. JAHNOW, Unity Orchestra, Unity Church, Upper Street, N. 1.

Tenor and baritone required to join really good alto and bass to complete male quartet. Objects: The mutual study, enjoyment, and performance of the best vocal quartet works. Only enthusiasts for this type of music need apply. West London district.—E. H., c/o Musical Times.

Amateur string quartet would like to meet tenor vocalist in order to study Vaughan Williams's Wenlock Edge and similar works for voice and strings.—'KEEN,' c/o Musical Times.

Two ladies, violoncellist and pianist, would be glad to meet violinist, for trio practice, classical and modern.—Mrs. MATHEWS, 21, Ladbroke Gardens, 3, Ladbroke Court, W. 11., where practices would take place.

Mezzo-soprano wishes to join party or meet accompanist for mutual study.—M. A. A., c/o Musical Times.

Viola player (gentleman) wishes to join string quartet, meeting preferably in S.E. London district.—A. J., c/o Musical Times.

Gentleman flautist, pianist, theorist, would like to meet accomplished pianist (either sex) who would be interested in the mutual study of works for flute and pianoforte, sonatas, concertos, &c., from Bach to modern times.—J. T., 46, Manor Park, Lee, S.E. 13.

Young gentleman, experienced, would like to join good male-voice quartet or small concert party requiring a 2nd bass; Kensington district preferred.—Write, H. S. H., c/o Musical Times.

Young pianist (gentleman) wishes to meet a young tenor or soprano for mutual morning practice. S.W. or W. districts preferred.—H. J. T., 1a, Adeney Road, Hammersmith, W. 6.

Bass, who is in London alternate week-ends, would give services to Church choir. Also would like to hear of accompanist for mutual practice. West London.—B. A. S. S., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (lady) wishes to practise oratorios and songs of Tchaikovsky, Schubert, &c., with first-class baritone.—Write, T. J., c/o Hadson, 238, Brixton Road, S.W. 9.

Gentleman (23), with well-trained tenor voice, desires to meet a pianist for mutual practice, for two or three evenings a week. London, S.W. district.—H. G., c/o Musical Times.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

An interesting recital of organ music was given at the Duke's Hall on January 30. The programme included works by Bach, Rheinberger, Widor, Franck, Elgar, and Baintow. Among the most noteworthy of many excellent performances may be mentioned Bach's Toccata in F (Mr. William Veitch), the first movement of Widor's fifth Symphony (Mr. Bertram Orsman), and Baintow's Pange Lingua (Mr. Malcolm Boyle). In addition to the organ music the programme also included the first movement of Bach's Concerto in E for violin (Miss Norah Stevenson), two MSS. songs by Dorothy Hogben (Mr. Roy G. Henderson), and Basser's Pièce de Concert for harp (Miss Florence Edgcombe).

A course of four historical lectures has been given by Dr. H. W. Richards on Wednesday afternoons. The special composers whose lives and works were dealt with were Mendelssohn (the R.A.M. Choir singing the 42nd Psalm), Schumann (songs by Mr. Howard Fry and the Pianoforte Quintet led by Miss Chester, pianoforte Mr. Russell Chester), Chopin (illustrations by Miss Humby), and Liszt (with illustrations by Miss MacEwan and Mr. Reginald Paul).

The annual meeting of the R.A.M. Club was held on Saturday evening, January 28. As the Club will take an important part in the forthcoming Centenary celebrations it was unanimously decided to re-elect Dr. H. W. Richards as president for a second year, and a special resolution enabling the Club to adopt this exceptional course was proposed and carried. The largely increased membership and the great success which has attended the gatherings of the past year have placed the Club in an exceptionally strong position. The first musical and social meeting of the Club for the present year was held on Saturday evening, February 11, and was probably one of the most brilliantly successful meetings which the Club has ever held, the Duke's Hall being crowded to its fullest extent. The programme was of exceptional interest and excellence. The first part included a delightful performance of Beethoven's Sonata in A major for violin and pianoforte, by M. Thibaut and Mr. Harold Craxton, and a dramatic presentation of the last scene of Coriolanus by Dame Genevieve Ward, who also very kindly contributed some recitations after the interval. It is possible that the most memorable performance of the evening was that of the César Franck Violin and Pianoforte Sonata, the refined and musicianly interpretation of which, given by M. Thibaut and Mr. Craxton, will live long in the memory of all present. The enthusiastic ovation which they received at the close was a well-deserved tribute to these great artists. The president, Dr. Richards, in a few well-chosen words, thanked on behalf of the members those who had contributed to the programme, and said it was the desire of the committee to make the meetings of the Centenary year specially notable, and he felt it would be difficult to improve upon the present one.

The Emma Levy Scholarship (pianoforte) has been awarded to Sara Krein, Macia G. Goldberg being highly commended. The adjudicators were Messrs. Oscar Beringer, Frederick Corder, and Sir A. C. Mackenzie (chairman).

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The alternate professors' and students' concerts continue to hold the attention of the outside public as well as of the students themselves, in spite of the inconvenience caused by the external and internal alterations to the fabric—alterations that will eventually provide for the College an imposing structure corresponding to the important world-wide position that it holds to-day.

Thirty-one Exhibitions, valued at from three to nine guineas each, have just been awarded on the results of the College Local Examinations in instrumental and vocal music, and in elocution and the theory of music, held in the British Isles during the past year. These Exhibitions provide for the further musical education of the successful candidates for twelve months, under the teachers who have helped them to achieve their outstanding efficiency.

In connection with these local examinations, emphasis was recently laid on their real value as a guide and test from the teachers' point of view, to which Dr. Creser on his return from a tour of India and the Malay Straits (where the College examinations are accorded State recognition) now adds the testimony that 'there are young ladies in India who have passed our [Trinity College] examinations, who play the music of the great masters with intelligence and brilliance'—a condition contrasting remarkably with that obtaining on his first visit there in 1898, when there were nothing but the lower (elementary) grades to examine.

Successful distributions of certificates were held at the Southend and Croydon centres, when Sir Frederick Bridge attended on behalf of the College; also at Brixton, St. Ives, and Ryde centres, with Dr. E. F. Horner acting as the College representative.

Mr. Alick Maclean's The Annunciation, recently performed at Bolton, is also to be given at Sunderland and Sheffield during March.

EARLY CHARTERS OF INCORPORATION GRANTED TO MUSICIANS

BY MURIEL SILBURN

The interest displayed at the present time in the question of the Registration of Music Teachers suggests a certain appositeness in the subject of Musicians' Charters: a subject which divides itself naturally into two divisions, viz., Charters of Minstrelsy, which had only a local significance, and Royal Charters, which incorporated with few exceptions the musicians of the entire kingdom. (It is evident that the term 'minstrel' in its later meaning was equivalent to 'musician,' but that word now being capable of so wide a construction, it would be advisable to consider the original term of 'minstrel' as indicating the artist or executant of modern phrase.)

One of the earliest records of a body of musicians forming a corporation and enjoying special privileges is found in that of the Cheshire Minstrels, an association possessed of great interest for the historian owing to the fact that, in almost all the laws affecting musicians passed since the foundation of the Cheshire Minstrels, their rights have been acknowledged and supported by special exemption. Their incorporation dates from King John's reign, and the laws in which their rights are acknowledged by exemption embrace charters and statutes enacted in the reigns of Edward IV., Elizabeth, James I., Charles I. and II., and George II. A corporate body of musicians whose existence covers a period of six hundred years furnishes an excellent example of Charters of Minstrelsy. A history of the origin of the Cheshire Minstrels may be found in Hawkins's History of Music. A more detailed account was published in the Musical Gazette for June, 1819, from which the following passage is taken:

'During the sanguinary feuds on the Welsh Borders, which succeeded the Conquest and which continued during more than two centuries, Randle Blundeville, the celebrated Earl Palatine of Chester, 1181, and founder of the then impregnable castle of Beeston, was besieged in the castle of Rhuddlan by a numerous army of Cambro-Britons. He immediately despatched a messenger to his constable, Roger Lacy, Baron of Halton, who in the exigency of the moment, assembled at Chester—it being the time of the fair—a great body of idle and dissolute persons, including all the fiddlers, minstrels, and players then present. . . . With these he marched to the Earl's relief. The appearance of this motley multitude operated so strong on the Welsh that they fled in all directions, and Randle returned to his capital in triumph. As a reward for the signal service thus rendered, the Earl gave to Roger Lacy "power over all the fiddlers and shoemakers in Cheshire." The Constable, however, presented his steward, Piers Dutton, with the authority over all the fiddlers and players, reserving to himself only the right over the shoemakers.'

The Musical Gazette article proceeds to mention an occasion upon which the minstrels of Chester officiated at the marriage of two daughters of Sir Piers Gaveston, but unfortunately gives no date, stating only that the ceremony took place on June 24. The writer next describes the minstrels' court held annually at Chester, on St. John's Day, by the heir or Lord of Dutton, or his steward:

'A banner, emblazoned with the Dutton arms, was hung out of the window of the inn where the court was held, and a drummer proclaimed in the streets the important sitting, summoning all persons concerned to appear in the court. At eleven o'clock a procession was formed, and moved from the inn as follows:

A Band of Music.

Two Trumpeters.

Licensed Musicians, with their white napkins across their shoulders.

The Banner, borne by one of the principal Musicians.

The Steward.

A Tabarder (with the Dutton Arms).

The Lord or Heir of Dutton, attended by the Gentry of the City and County.'

Then follows the proclamation heralded by the usual 'Oyez! Oyez!' after which the procession proceeds to St. John's Church, 'on entering the chancel of which, on notice from the Steward, the musicians played several pieces of sacred music upon their knees.' Another proclamation followed, then a feast, and in the afternoon the work and duties of the court were executed. These appear to have been to hear the Steward's charge, and to report unlicensed musicians, and any treason against the King or the Lords of Dutton. The musicians were then sworn, and licenses were issued to 'such as were adjudged worthy, empowering them to play for one year.' A lengthy proclamation is quoted in the Musical Gazette, taken from the Tabley MSS., but again no date is given; the document is merely pronounced to be 'very ancient.' It appears that the rights of the Lords of Dutton had descended through marriage to Viscount Kilmurrie, this document being simply a mandamus for the musicians to appear and play before the said Robert Viscount Kilmurrie, under the dire threat:

'This omit you nott, as you will at yo'r p'ills aboyde the displeasure of the aforesaid Robert Viscount Kilmurrie, the rebuke of the court's forfeiture of your instruments and imprisonment of your bodies.'

'The last court [we are told] was held in 1756, R. Lauls, Esq., being then Lord of Dutton, and possessing the advowry of the minstrels by purchase, previous to which they were not held annually, as had been their custom, but every two or three years. The fee for a license was half-a-crown; but it does not appear that much attention was paid to the mandate of the Lord of Dutton, for in 1754 only twenty-one licenses were granted.'

The writer goes into considerable detail with regard to Mr. Lauls's charge to the Minstrels in 1756, in which he insists that:

'... none shall exercise the employment of a musician for gain without a license from him or his steward . . . and if you know or are particularly informed of such, you are to present them to this court that they may be proceeded against and punished according to law, which the lord and steward thereof are determined to do with the utmost severity.'

Allusion having been made to the exemption which the Cheshire Minstrels enjoyed in all laws and charters made since their foundation, before leaving this subject the proviso in favour of these minstrels from the Statute 17, George II., cap. 5, may be quoted:

'Provided always that this Act, or anything therein contained, or any authority thereby given, shall not in any wise extend to disinherit, prejudice, or hinder the heirs or assigns of John Dutton of Dutton, late of the County of Chester, esquire, for touching, or concerning the liberty, privilege, pre-eminence or authority, jurisdiction or inheritance, which they, their heirs and assigns, now lawfully use, or have, or lawfully may or ought to use, within the County Palatine of Chester and County of Chester, or either of them, by reason of any ancient charters of any Kings of this land, or by reason of any prescription or lawful usage or title whatsoever.'

(To be continued.)

Music in the Provinces

BARNSTABLE.—The Parish Church Choir gave Dr. H. J. Edwards's The Epiphany on January 19, with the composer (who is organist of the church) at the organ, and Mr. Sydney Harper conducting.

BIRMINGHAM.—Elgar's Violin Concerto (with Mr. Alexander Cohen as soloist), Ireland's The Forgotten Rite, Stravinsky's Fireworks, Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade, and Ravel's Mother Goose ('slightly decapitated')—these were all in one programme of the City Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Eugène Goossens in January.—The same Orchestra supported the Festival Choral Society in Elijah on January 21, Mr. Blackall conducting.—On January 28 the Choral Union had an easy-going evening with Merrie England.—Recitals have been given by Mr. Leslie Bennett in modern songs, backed by Mr. Paul Beard and Mr. Michael Mullinar in Ireland's A minor Violin Sonata; M. Arthur de Greef, with Mr. Arthur Cranmer (vocalist); Miss Margery Strömberg and Miss Ida Clement on two pianofortes, with Mr. Geoffrey Dams adding songs and Miss Grace O'Brien in pianoforte solos.

BLACKBURN.—Holst's Choral Hymns from the Rig Veda (Op. 26) were sung on February 6, by the Blackburn Ladies' Choir, for whom they were originally written. Mr. F. Duckworth conducted.

BOLTON.—Mr. Alick Maclean's Cantata The Annunciation made a strong impression when performed by the Bolton Choral Union on February 1. An excellent performance was given under Mr. Thomas Booth. The Hallé Orchestra assisted, and the solo parts were taken by Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Rachel Hunt, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. William Hayle.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Miss Evelyn Hunter played Holbrooke's Violin Concerto in F at one of the Winter Gardens concerts in January. It is more than usually pleasing for music from Mr. Holbrooke's pen. Glazounov's sixth Symphony was in the same programme.

BRADFORD.—Mr. Julius Harrison conducted the Bradford Permanent Orchestra in Franck's Symphonic Variations (with Mr. Maurice Cole as pianist) and Elgar's second Wand of Youth Suite on January 21.—The Bohemian Quartet played on January 27 at the second subscription chamber concert.—The opera season is dealt with in another column.

BRISTOL.—At the reunion of the Bristol Folk Festival school on January 21, Miss Ursula Greville gave a recital of modern British songs, accompanied by Mr. Percival Garratt.—At the Philharmonic Society's concert on February 11 British music was well-represented by Holst's The Planets, conducted by the composer, and Gerrard Williams's Pot-Pourri, under Mr. Barter, the Society's conductor.

CHATHAM.—Liszt's Les Préludes was recently introduced to the neighbourhood by the Royal Marines band.—Mr. John Coates has given recitals of British songs from Purcell to the moderns.—On January 31, at the Town Hall, the Gillingham String Quartet gave its first concert, and played with encouraging ability in Schubert's Quartet (Op. 29) and Schumann's E flat Pianoforte Quintet (with Mr. W. Petchey). Miss Elsie Dudding, leader of the Quartet, gave violin solos.—Mr. Mark Hambourg played an eclectic pianoforte programme on February 2.

DUBLIN.—The Mater Concert Committee has now given fifty of its Sunday afternoon concerts. The standard has remained high, and for this the chief credit is due to Mr. Vincent O'Brien and his orchestra. On January 29 the programme was Italian, and Mr. Lauritz Melchior and Signor Finzi the vocal exponents. Miss Molly Keegan and Mr. Mostyn Thomas sang on February 5; and on the following Sunday, Miss Lena Munro and Mr. Jackson Potter.—Chamber music has been well represented. The Royal Dublin Society offered the Brodsky Quartet, on January 23, in Mozart, Brahms, and Beethoven; and the Catterall Quartet a fortnight later in Mozart, Schubert, and Debussy. A new series of Thursday chamber concerts, in aid of charity, was opened at Engineers' Hall on February 2, the players being Mr. Arthur Darley, Miss T. O'Connor, Mr. George Brett, and Mr. Joseph Schofield.

DUNDER.—The Amateur Choral Union sang The Song of Hiawatha on February 8, before a large audience, with the assistance of the Scottish Orchestra. Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducted.

EDINBURGH.—The R.A. String Band gave the first of two concerts at Usher Hall on January 22, and played Fould's Keltic Suite under Lieut. E. C. Stretton.—The Paterson Concerts provided a Tchaikovsky programme under Sir Landon Ronald on January 23 and a Wagner programme on January 30, under Mr. Julius Harrison. The season of these concerts closed on February 6, when Sir Landon Ronald conducted the C minor Symphony and the Bach-Elgar Fugue, and Mr. Philip Halstead and Mr. John Petrie Dunn played a C major double Pianoforte Concerto of Bach.—The first Reid Concert of the season was given at Usher Hall on February 4. Prof. D. F. Tovey conducted the Reid Orchestra in Schumann's D minor Symphony, and Mr. Leonard Borwick played the Brahms B flat minor Pianoforte Concerto.—The third of Mr. Mossel's series, on January 21, was a recital by M. Moiseiwitsch.

EXETER.—The Philharmonic concerts, though only in their first season—being the enterprise of Mr. W. F. Crabb and Miss Mabel Bleby—have established a high standard of music and performance, and so far have attracted record houses for high-class music at Exeter. On January 31, two vocal recitals, given by Mr. George Parker, brought forward a number of beautiful modern songs, including three gems by Dr. Ernest Bullock (who played the accompaniments). Brittany, I love my God as He loves me, and To take the air a bonny lass. Mr. Parker's singing of these—and other songs by Hugo Wolf, John Ireland, Martin Shaw, Geoffrey Shaw, George Butterworth, Arnold Bax, E. C. Bairstow, Stanford, L. S. Collingwood, and John Ireland—was a revelation of sincerity and power of interpretation, of resource and control. Brahms's D minor Sonata for violin and pianoforte was played by Miss Vivien Hughes and Mr. H. T. Depree. Mr. Arnold Trowell, Madame Delines, and Mr. Frederick Kiddle will be the artists at the next concert, on March 15.

GLASGOW.—On January 21 the Saturday night popular concert of the Scottish Orchestra provided an excellent programme under Sir Landon Ronald, that included Butterworth's Shropshire Lad and the Beethoven Violin Concerto played by Miss May Harrison.—On January 28 the Glasgow Choral Union joined forces with the Orchestra and gave the first performance of David Stephen's Sir Patrick Spens. Ernest Austin's Hymn of Apollo was also sung, and the orchestral numbers included The Good-humoured Ladies (Scarlati), Goossens's Tam o' Shanter, and Beethoven's Rondino in E flat for eight wind instruments. Mr. Wilfrid Senior conducted the choral and Mr. Julius Harrison the orchestral music.—In response to numerous requests the programme of February 4 was adjusted to include Elgar's second Symphony, which was finely played under Sir Landon Ronald. Miss Isabel Gray played the Schumann Pianoforte Concerto.

LEEDS.—The Choral Union sang Palestrina's Surge, illumine and Bach's Sing ye to the Lord, under Dr. Coward, on January 18. The bulk of the programme was given up to the brilliant organ playing of M. Dupré.—Elgar's Quartet was played on January 25 by a party led by Mr. Bensley Ghent.—At the Saturday orchestral concert of February 3, Mr. Goossens conducted Glazounov's fourth Symphony and his own By the Tarn.

LIVERPOOL.—The British Music Society recently organized an evening of compositions by Mr. Norman Peterkin, a Liverpool musician. His four Dreamer's Tales for pianoforte and a large selection of songs gave a distinct impression of wayward and pleasing fancy.—The annual Festival on behalf of West Lancashire Masonic charities, held at the Philharmonic Hall on January 25 and 26, brought together a male-voice choir of about two hundred voices under Mr. J. T. Jones and an orchestra under Mr. Percival H. Ingram.—Ethel Smyth's Overture to The Boatwain's Mate and Scriabin's second Symphony were conducted by Sir Henry Wood at the Philharmonic concert of January 31.—The Welsh Choral Union gave Brahms's Song of Destiny under Mr. Hopkin Evans on February 11, and the programme included first performances at Liverpool of Scriabin's Rêveries and Cyril Jenkins's Celtic Fantasia.—Recitals have been given by M. Dupré, Miss Ellen Watson (vocalist), and Miss Marguerite Stilwell and Mr. Joseph Greene (pianoforte).

MANCHESTER.—The most resounding of recent events has of course been the visit of Strauss, who was more cordially welcomed here than in London. The Manchester Guardian spared no pains or space to do him justice as an artist. At the Brand Lane concert of January 21 he conducted Don Juan and Till Eulenspiegel, and a group of his songs was sung by Miss Ethel Frank. The reception was cordial. Sir Henry Wood conducted the Beethoven Violin Concerto for Toscha Seidel.—At the Hallé concerts Mr. Hamilton Harty has also been attentive to Strauss—first the music to Enoch Arden (recited by Mr. Milton Rosmer) and, three weeks later, Don Quixote. This last occasion (February 11) also provided the Delius C minor Pianoforte Concerto, played by Mr. Frederick Dawson, and the delicate Pot-pourri of Gerrard Williams. Other Hallé concerts have given a Wagner programme; Bach's Mass in B minor, with solo singing by Miss Caroline Hatchard, Miss Dilys Jones, Mr. Hubert Eisdell, and Mr. Robert Radford; an operatic evening; and a programme including Elgar's Introduction and Allegro, Harty's Wild Geese, and Cyril Jenkins's Celtic Rhapsody.—The C.W.S. Choir gave a miscellaneous concert in January, with John Coates as one of the items. The choral music included Bantock's arrangement of Down among the dead men and an excerpt from Dvorák's Stabat Mater.—The recital list includes Mr. Clyde Twelvetrees (violin), Mr. Charles Neville in Strauss songs, accompanied by Mr. Samuel Langford; and Mr. Catterall and Mr. Hamilton Harty in Violin and Pianoforte Sonatas.

MOUSEHOLE.—A big event was the performance of Elijah on January 21 by Mousehole and District Choral Society, conducted by Mr. J. Irving Thomas. Miss M. B. Cotton was at the organ and Miss Waters at the pianoforte.

NEWCASTLE.—The Newcastle Bach Choir, under Dr. W. G. Whittaker, gave a selection of Tudor and modern British music on January 27, and the same programme included Violin Sonatas by Eugene Goossens (Op. 21) and Alfred M. Wall.—The Bach Choir's chamber concert on February 1 brought the Catterall Quartet and an excellent performance of César Franck in D.

NEWPORT.—At the second of the chamber music series on January 23 Prof. Walford Davies gave an explanatory talk on Beethoven's Trio, Op. 97, before taking part in its performance as pianist with Mr. Hubert Davies and Mr. Arthur Williams.

NORWICH.—The Festival chorus sang The Revenge under Mr. Maddern Williams on January 21.—César Franck's Symphony was played by the Philharmonic Society at St. Andrew's Hall on January 26, Dr. Frank Bates conducting.

NOTTINGHAM.—Trios by Haydn and Brahms were played at University College recently by Mr. Arthur Catterall (violin), Mr. J. C. Hock (violin), and Miss Cantelo (pianoforte).

OXFORD.—Until Dr. Adrian C. Boult came with his British Symphony Orchestra on February 2, Oxford had not made the acquaintance of Butterworth's A Shropshire Lad, a little masterpiece that stands firm in the reputation it made at Leeds years ago. Elgar's second Symphony was added to the debt which Oxford owes to Dr. Boult.—For three days the Town Hall has been the scene of a 'Grand Divertissement,' by members of the Russian Ballet.

PAIGNTON.—The Musical Association gave Hiawatha's Departure on January 18, the choir singing remarkably well in spite of numerical weakness of male voices.

Mr. H. W. Rushton conducted, and the principals were Madame Fiffine de la Côte, Mr. Cameron Alexander, and Mr. Walter Belgrove. Two-part songs, The Voice of Spring (for ladies' voices) and I would I were the glow-worm, conducted by their composer, Mr. Harold Rhodes, were an enjoyable feature.

PORTSMOUTH.—At the Philharmonic concert on February 9, Mr. Hugh Burry gave a little explanatory lecture, with help from the orchestra, before plunging into the Bach-Elgar Fugue. Arthur Bliss's tone-poems Night and Day were well received.—The Municipal Concerts are a success. Usually, it appears, over fifteen hundred people come and listen keenly.

ROCHESTER.—The Choral Society, under Mr. C. Hylton Stewart, is building up a reputation for enterprise by such programmes as that of January 25, which included two of Parry's unaccompanied Motets—Never weather-beaten sail and There is an old Belief—and Vaughan Williams's five English folk-song arrangements. Chamber music was played by the Pennington String Quartet.

ST. AUSTELL.—On January 26 the Philharmonic Society gave Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast and The Death of Minnehaha, and the orchestra played movements from Haydn's Symphony in B flat. Mr. W. Brennand Smith conducted.

SHEFFIELD.—The subscription concert of January 24 consisted of an hour's pianoforte recital by Mr. Harold Samuel and a Bantock song recital by Miss Vera Horton and Mr. Augustus Milner.

SITTINGBOURNE.—Elgar's The Banner of St. George was the feature of the Sittingbourne and District Musical Society's programme on January 25, given under Mr. W. J. Keech.

SWANSEA.—The Albert Hall is being converted into a cinema theatre, and Swansea thereby loses its best concert-hall.

WINCHESTER.—The Musical Society gave Elijah under Mr. J. A. Sowerbutts on February 9.

WORCESTER.—Mr. George Austin, jun., a musician not yet of age, conducted the first concert of the Worcester Symphony Orchestra on Sunday, February 12. The programme included Finlandia and the Unfinished Symphony.

YORK.—Bach's Blessed is the man and Holst's Hymn of Jesus were performed in the Minster on January 29, by the augmented choir of the Cathedral and a full orchestra, Dr. Bairstow conducting.—Violin Sonatas by Elgar, Grieg, and John Ireland were played on February 11 by Mr. W. Baines and Mr. H. Dunstone.

We are unfortunately obliged to hold over our notes from abroad, owing to late arrival of the 'copy.'

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

RALPH H. BAKER, founder and hon. secretary of the Liverpool Church Choir Association, whose important annual Festivals he had arranged since 1900. An amateur of music, he found time in the midst of a busy commercial life to do useful service to the community in organizing the great choir for the Liverpool Pageant, and the choirs which sang at the foundation-stone laying of the new Cathedral and at the opening of the Gladstone Dock, on the occasions of Royal visits. His rare blend of business and musical qualities also found further scope as a member of the Philharmonic Society's committee. His regretted death is an especially heavy blow to the Church Choir Association.

W. A. R.

CHÉVALIER LUIGI DENZA, aged seventy-five, the well-known composer whose songs enjoyed great popularity a generation ago. He took up residence in England in the early 'eighties and established himself as a teacher of singing. He was appointed Professor at the Royal Academy of Music in 1898.

Miscellaneous

A new string orchestra to be known as the 'Euterpe String Players' is being formed. The opening practices will be conducted by Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott. A fine list of works, ranging from Byrd to Vaughan Williams, is down for study. A prospectus may be had from Miss M. M. Hills, 80, West Cromwell Road, S.W. 5.

The South London Philharmonic Society is busy 'decentralising' London music. The present season's activities include a performance of Dvorák's The Spectre's Bride, under Mr. W. H. Kerridge (arranged for February 11), Mozart's Requiem, Beethoven's fifth Symphony, and some valuable lectures.

'Gramophone Notes' are unavoidably held over.

CONTENTS

Page

British Players and Singers III.—Lionel Tertis. By Edwin Evans (with Special Portrait)...	157
Madrigalists and Lutenists. By Sylvia Townsend Warner	160
The Stravinsky Theoria. By Edward Mitchell	162
Modern Hungarian Composers. By Philip Heseltine (with Portrait)	164
Edward Ernest Cooper	167
Translation and Transcription. By Alexander Brent-Smith	169
Modern Theme-Transformations. By Herbert Antcliffe	169
A Midland Chorus Master (with Portrait)	172
Arthur Nikisch. By Alfred Kalisch	173
Gresham College Music Lectures	174
A Note on 'Best-Sellers'	174
Occasional Notes	175
Music in the Foreign Press. By M.-D. Calvocoressi	177
The Musician's Bookshelf	178
New Music	186
London Concerts	188
The British National Opera Company	191
Opera at Cambridge: Dr. Rootham's Two Sisters	192
Church and Organ Music	192
The English Litany of 1544-60. By W. H. Grattan Flood	192
Royal College of Organists	193
Letters to the Editor	199
Sixty Years Ago	203
Sharps and Flats	203
Chamber Music for Amateurs	203
Royal Academy of Music	204
Trinity College of Music	204
Early Charters of Incorporation granted to Musicians. By Muriel Silburn	205
Music in the Provinces	206
Obituary	207

MUSIC:

Lowland Lay . Part-Song for mixed voices (unaccompanied). By GERRARD WILLIAMS	179
--	-----

THREE EXTRA SUPPLEMENTS are given with this Number:

1. Portrait of Lionel Tertis.
2. Jesu, meek and lowly. Anthem. By Edward Elgar.
3. Competition Festival Record.

DURING THE LAST MONTH.

Published by NOVELLO & CO., LIMITED.

BACH, J. S.—"Whoso doth offer thanks." Cantata for the 14th Sunday after Trinity. Edited by JOHN E. WEST. English Version by W. G. ROTHERY. 2s.

BISSLEY, J. G.—"Content thyself with patience." Anthem. 3d.

CARSE, ADAM—"The tide rises, the tide falls." Four-part Song. Arranged for Men's Voices. (No. 577, The Orpheus.) 3d.

DOUGLAS, H.—"Meditation." For Organ. 2s.

DUNHILL, T. F.—The Chiddingfold Suite. For String Orchestra. 1st Violin, 2s. 3d.; 2nd Violin, 2s. 3d.; Viola, 2s. 3d.; Violoncello, 1s. 6d.; Basso, 1s. 6d.

JOZE, T. R. G.—Two Vesper Hymns. 2d.

MATTHEWS, J. H.—A Short Musical Service. Arranged for use with "The Story of the Passion." 3s. 6d. per 100.

MOTE, A. R.—Collect for the First Sunday after Easter. Anthem. 4d.

MOZART—"Qui Tollis" (12th Mass). Latin Words. (No. 199, Novello's Octavo Choruses.) 1½d.

NICHOLSON, S. H.—"Beloved, let us love one another." Wedding Anthem. 6d.

DURING THE LAST MONTH—(continued).

PENNINGTON-BICKFORD, W.—Hymn of the Passion. No. 1 ("Come unto Me"). Id., or 2s. 6d. per 50.

—Hymn of the Passion. No. 2 ("Jesu! Saviour!"). Id., or 2s. 6d. per 50.

PONSONBY, NOEL.—Te Deum and Jubilate Chant, in B flat. For Boys' Voices and Organ. 6d.

QUADRUPLE CHANTS, EIGHT. By Various Composers. (No. 1067, Novello's Parish Choir Book.) 2d.

SADLER, G. H.—Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis, in D. 4d.

SCEATS, GODFREY—"Missa Fidelium." A Plain Mass in English, mostly for Voices in Unison. 1s.

SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW, No. 357, contains the following music in both notations—"A Sad Story." Unison Song. By GEORGE RATHBONE. 2d.

SCHOOL SONGS. Published in two forms. A. Voice Parts in Staff and Tonic Sol-fa Notations, with Piano-forte Accompaniment (8vo). B. Voice Parts only, in Tonic Sol-fa Notation. A. B.

No. 1310. "Our Trees." Unison Song. ETHEL BOYCK 2d. —

No. 1311. "The Magic Door." Unison Song. ETHEL BOYCK 2d. —

No. 1312. "The little brown horse." Unison Song ETHEL BOYCK 2d. —

No. 1313. "A Rhyme of Overseas." Unison Song ETHEL BOYCK 2d. —

STRINGER, E. A.—Office for the Holy Communion, in A flat. 9d.

TONIC SOL-FA SERIES:

No. 2378. "Come, Holy Ghost." Unaccompanied Anthem. PALESTRINA 2d.

WILLIAMS, C. LEE.—"Farmer Brown." A Cotswold Joke. Part-Song. For Men's Voices. T.T.B.B. 3d.

WILLIAMS, GERRARD—"Lowland Lay." Four-part Song. (No. 949, The Musical Times.) 2d.

PUBLISHED FOR

THE H. W. GRAY CO., NEW YORK.

CANDLYN, T. F. H.—Te Deum, in D flat. 20 cents (10d.).

CLOKEY, J. W.—"Legende." For the Organ.

DICKINSON, CLARENCE—"The Technique and Art of Organ Playing."

ELKUS, A.—"I am the Reaper." For T.T.B.B. and Pianoforte. 15 cents (8d.).

FERRARI, GUSTAVE (Harmonized by).—Twelve French Ballads. 2½ (9s.).

FORSYTH, CECIL.—"Highland Love." Part-song for S.A.T.B. 10 cents (4d.).

—"The new Dawn." Choral Poem for S.A.T.B. 12 cents (6d.).

HAILING, R. G.—"Summer Song." For Organ.

HYDE, HERBERT E.—"O praise the Lord of Heaven." Anthem. 25 cents (1s.).

LAWRENCE, F. L.—"Nightfall." Evening Anthem. 12 cents (6d.).

—"The Beatitudes." For Voices and Organ. 10 cents (4d.).

—"God that madest." For S.A.T.B. 10 cents (4d.).

LUTKIN, P. C.—"Awake! the day is dawning." Easter Carol-Anthem. 20 cents (10d.).

STOESSEL, A.—"Beat! beat! drums." For Chorus. 20 cents (10d.).

SYKES, H. A.—Canzonetta. For Organ.

ARTHUR ELLARSHAW, L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M., Pianist, Concerts, Recitals. (solo Pianist only). 497, Coventry Road, Birmingham.

APR 13 1922
THE POSTAGE OF THIS NUMBER IS TWOPENCE

No. 950

Price 6d.

THE

MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED 1844

APRIL 1, 1922

Directors—
W. BERRIDGE
C. R. CALLARD

THE WIGMORE HALL & PIANO GALLERIES LTD.

are resuming possession of their former premises

36-40, WIGMORE STREET (ADJOINING WIGMORE HALL)

OVER 20 ADDITIONAL MUSIC STUDIOS

will be available for next term.

Electric Lift. Central Heating. Lavatories and Comfortable Lounges on each floor.

GRAND PIANO IN EVERY ROOM

WIGMORE HALL STUDIOS, WIGMORE STREET, W. 1.

The Name of
J. & J. HOPKINSON
*Stands for the HIGHEST ATTAINMENTS
in THE WORLD OF MUSIC*
REMARKABLE FOR THE EXQUISITE QUALITY OF TONE

J. & J. HOPKINSON, LTD.,

44, FITZROY ROAD, PRIMROSE HILL,
LONDON, N.W. 1

(ONLY ADDRESS).

Registered

Trade-Mark.

An Indispensable Text Book for School and Music Teachers
“Learning to Listen”
by means of the Gramophone.

By Percy A. Scholes.

With an Introduction by Dr. John Adams,
Professor of Education in the University of London.

Price 3/- nett.

Obtainable from all “His Master's Voice” accredited dealers.

This book is unique in that it is the first Text Book to set out a progressive study of music with the aid of the Gramophone. The vital importance of the part that the Gramophone is destined to play in the teaching of music—especially in the study of Appreciation—has long occupied the attention of the manufacturers of “His Master's Voice” Instruments and Records. “Learning to Listen” is the fruition of intensive and specialised research on all phases of musical study.

SYNOPSIS.

Introduction	Subject 5—Bach	Subject 13—Classical Music
Author's Preface	“ 6—Haydn	and Romantic
Subject 1—Folk Music	“ 7—Mozart	Music
“ 2—The English Composers of Queen Elizabeth's Reign	“ 8—The Orchestra	“ 14—Grieg
“ 3—Purcell	“ 9—Beethoven	“ 15—Elgar
“ 4—Handel	“ 10—Mendelssohn	Hints on the Use of “ 11—Schumann	the Gramophone
	“ 12—Chopin

“His Master's Voice”

A cordial invitation is extended to all School and Music Teachers to the demonstrations on the Educational use of the Gramophone, which are held at 367 Oxford Street, W. 1, every Saturday morning from 10.30 to 12 o'clock. Kindly notify the Education Dept. of your intention to be present.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO., LTD., 363-7 Oxford Street, London, W. 1

“His Master's Voice”
School Model,
Price £25.

Reproduced from a Photograph by Claude Harris, Regent Street, W

DOROTHY SILK

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

APRIL 1 1922

BRITISH PLAYERS AND SINGERS :

IV.—DOROTHY SILK

It is just two years since the name of Dorothy Silk became really generally known in the musical world. Miss Silk sang soprano solos at the Festival given in the spring of 1920 by the London Bach Choir under Sir Hugh Allen, at Westminster, and since then she has had a place of her own in English music. Jealous, exclusive barriers tumbled down at the sound of this dainty, fine singing. Miss Silk has sung at great functions; but also at what a proportion of the interesting little functions, where beats the pulse of the body musical! Without much baffled striving or heart-breaking rebuffs, Miss Silk sang her way into the inmost courts.

The fact is, that once you have heard this singer, you can be sure of certain things. For instance, that the things sung are what the singer cares about; that taste here is a much bigger factor than vanity. You come to count on this singing, whether it is at a cathedral festival or at some out-of-the-way little celebration of the poetæ minores, for just expression, fitness of degree, beauty in humility, a good rare thing, anyhow.

The warnings, so frequent and so justified, against this profession of singing are that it is the cruellest, the most risky, most overcrowded—just like, of course, every other profession. Still, after all it does depend on the singer, and there is the agreeable reflection in this case of Miss Silk that the harsh world's heart can have a tender spot even for a singer who is not a perfect physical prodigy.

THE COLORATURA SCHOOLING

To ask Miss Silk to talk about herself, about how and why she does this or that, about the catalogue of her acclaimed appearances and so on, savours really of brutality. She has, even to excess, the musicianly point of view that there is so little to 'say' about these things. She shrinks:

'You see, it is so natural that I should sing as I do. And my choice of what to sing is not a learned scholar's choice. The Purcell and Schütz and Rutland Boughton and Armstrong Gibbs music that I have chosen to sing is just the choice of my natural inclination among things that chance has put in my way. I make for what appears to me to be beautiful, and if other folk find it beautiful too, why, that is a stroke of luck, and I can go on.'

But as for going on talking, Miss Silk is to be persuaded only on high disinterested grounds—on the ground of increasing appreciation of her favoured 17th century composers, and on the ground of encouraging newer singers on their path by some account of her own advancement:

'My family (a Birmingham family) was not musical, but I have sung since I was a babe, and I first sang in public at the age of four. It was on the advice of Dr. Lierhammer that I went to Vienna to take lessons from Röss. Röss disappointed me. I wanted, then, nothing so much as to be coached in German lyrics, in the interpretation of Hugo Wolf and Brahms. Röss, who was Selma Kurz's teacher, believed in a coloratura training. I would get him to hear me interpret a song of Wolf. He would listen without interest or comment, and then turn me back again to "Una Voce poco fa." Now I can understand better the force of his method, and appreciate the benefit of a schooling in coloratura. My two years at Vienna were just before the war, and they were wonderful, for I was saturated there in music—such days and nights of concert and opera, and, among the best things, the afternoons at Busoni's, when he played on and on!

'When I came back to London I paid to be heard in public—I was naïve. It may possibly be the best thing to do in the circumstances—but I dislike the idea, something seems wrong about it. Whatever benefit that might have come, anyhow, was dashed by the war, and I went to the Highbury Hospital at Birmingham to serve as a housemaid.

'Singing in the provinces was the rest of my training. Perhaps this will make a little hint for others. Do not singers often make a mistake by singing prematurely in London? It occurs to me that singing oratorio with the less ambitious country choral societies, and songs at all sorts of variegated little concerts, is a real training in bearing up before an audience, and in all manner of other ways. Isn't it the English singer's equivalent for the foreign singer's drill in a small opera-house? Of course, at the same time, I don't want—it is the very last thing to want—to hear of anyone's private little ideal being drowned in a long routine of being all things to all audiences. But this surely doesn't necessarily follow.'

PURCELL AND HIS AGE

The talk veered, as it was bound to do, to the 17th century music which, after these two winters of Miss Silk's 'Concerts of Old Music,' she must forgive us for regarding as her particular realm. She is almost anxious lest overmuch credit go to her for the inception of those memorable afternoons:

'The credit goes first to a dead lover of music, Edward Amphlett. He was killed in the war. He had a passion for the old things, and spent much time collecting scores of Tunder and Schütz and such-like. He was killed, and his scores were left to my very good friend Miss Constance Layton. It was she who inveigled me into delving there, so the second credit goes to her. And there are other people to be credited. Some friends had mentioned my name to Sir Hugh Allen, and he sent for me to sing to him at Oxford. I expected little enough then that anything would come of it, but the next thing was that I was asked to sing at the Bach Choir's Festival in London [1920].

'Well, I confess I have always been unenterprising and diffident. The Festival was my tonic. Sir Hugh's encouragement spurred me on. Then that summer I sang at Wigmore Hall with Mr. Murray Davey, and after Schütz's Quando se claudunt, Mr. Ernest Newman asked why such beautiful old things hardly ever came to light. I reached the point of writing to all the members of the Bach Choir asking for their interest in four concerts of old music during the next winter. I had most wonderfully kind letters back, and the concerts were given, and people came, and, thanks to the good artists who helped me for the least possible fees, the concerts escaped a loss. Now this winter there have been four more, and the guarantors were not called on—in fact, I think we were a pound or two to the good! Many people came, and the kindest things were said—I suppose because the concerts were not of a hotch-potch sort, they had one thread running through them. And then perhaps because there has been a great deal heard of a later sort of music which one gets to feel strained, inflated, artificial. People said they found a new freshness in such music as Purcell's Expostulation of the Blessed Virgin and his Evening Hymn.'

The talk lingered round Purcell and the sweet water of his well of song, and round the editions of Purcell, the inadequacy of some and the desirability of the Purcell Society's majestic volumes. Then the mention of a dark little Bloomsbury shop into which actually volumes of the Purcell Society had been known to drift made a drastic interruption of mere talk in favour of action. Immediate excursion was indicated, and so (the reader is asked to excuse the irrelevancy) the dark shop was straightway sought out, and did indeed yield up three volumes of the majestic edition! Such was the reward fate held stored for Miss Silk, an offset to the distaste of half-an-hour's talk mainly about herself.

LATTER-DAY MUSIC

Miss Silk does not live wholly in the 17th century, and she does not intend to be restricted, as some artists have been restricted within barriers set up by their very excellence in a special activity. Alongside her singing of old music she has done as much in the field of modern English work which can fairly be compared to the old music in single-hearted feeling and freshness. She pays homage to Vaughan Williams, Gustav Holst, Rutland Boughton, and Armstrong Gibbs:

'Holst's Savitri and Rutland Boughton's Bethlehem were experiences as thrilling as I have ever had. Bethlehem is so wonderful because it shows that quite new original music can still be "simply beautiful." Every Christmastime Bethlehem ought to be sung everywhere, all over the country, instead of those atrocious, stupid pantomimes. Are not The Immortal Hour and Savitri two of the most beautiful operas ever written? When people complain that there are no English operas they have, I suppose, eyes only for something like The Ring or else Pagliacci. They look for something that naturally isn't here, and so miss the good things that are.'

Then Miss Silk speaks with warm feeling of other English musical leaders, notably of Dr. Harold Darke, of St. Michael's, Cornhill, and of Dr. W. G. Whittaker, of Newcastle. Asked for a word on the technics of singing, she says:

'I know, after all, only my own difficulties, and they are not likely to be another's. I have a natural voice, I suppose, and I sing now much as I have always instinctively sung. But my tongue has been an unruly member—I mean it has wanted a deal of discipline. Beginners perhaps might usefully exercise themselves more than is common in tongue-control. I know the inclination I have to resist when singing—it is an inclination to an excess of tautness all over the body, and I have to order myself to relax, to loosen, tongue and all.'

We attach for documentary interest a summary of the programmes of Miss Silk's 'Ancient' concerts in London:

1. Schütz, Trio, Sanguis, Jesu Christi. Tunder, cantata, Ah, Lord, let Thy dear Angels. Christian Ritter, cantata, O Amantissime Sponse. Bach, cantata No. 32, Blessed Jesu.
2. Bach, Organ Preludes. Tunder, cantata, O Jesu dulcissimi. Bach, aria, Come, make my heart Thy throne (cantata No. 80). Schütz, solo, O sweetest, O loving Jesu. Bach, cantata No. 51, Praise God in all Lands.
3. Purcell, two Fantasias (string quartet). Schütz, cantata, Lord our Ruler. Bach, four songs from Schemelli Hymn-Book. Bach, cantata No. 55, I, wretched man. Bach, aria, Comfort sweet, my Jesu comes (cantata No. 151).
4. Bach, duet, O Righteous God (cantata No. 23). Tunder, three short cantatas, By the waters of Babylon, Our little Baby King, Sleepers, wake. J. C. Bach, cantata, Ah, of water. Purcell, aria, The Blessed Virgin's Expostulation. Schütz, Trio, Anima Christi. Bach, cantata, Blessed Jesu.
5. Schütz, duet, Give to me, O Lord, a pure heart. Hammerschmidt, duet, Now wherefore beholdest. Bach, aria, The soul in Jesu's hand (cantata No. 127).

Schütz, tenor solo, I will praise the Lord. Fasch, String Quartet. Purcell, The Blessed Virgin's Expostulation. Bach, aria, What God's splendour (cantata No. 194). Bach, cantata No. 155, My God, how long.

6. Dowland, duet, Lachrymæ Pavan. Purcell, duet, Shepherd, leave decoying. Henry Lawes, songs. Pepusch, cantata, Alexis. Padre Martini, three Italian catches. Bach, B flat Partita (harpsichord). Bach, Peasant Cantata.

7. Bach, Organ Prelude and Fugue. Tunder, cantata, O Lord, let Thy dear Angels. Schütz, duet, Hearken to me. Bach, aria, Fulfil, O Heavenly (cantata No. 1). Bach, aria, Fall asleep, ye cares (cantata No. 199). Bach, cantata No. 57, Blessed is the man.

8. Purcell, duet, Upon a quiet conscience ('By Charles I. of Blessed Memory'). Tunder, three cantatas (see fourth programme). Bach, aria, It is finished (cantata No. 150). Purcell, An Evening Hymn. Bach, Motet, The Spirit also helpeth us. Bach, songs from Schemelli Hymn-Book. Bach, cantata No. 115, Soul, make ready.

Miss Silk's collaborators were Miss Helen Anderton, Miss Margaret Champneys, Miss Norah Dawnay, Miss Flora Mann, Mrs. Gordon Woodhouse, Mr. John Adams, Mr. John Bateman, Mr. Clive Carey, Dr. Harold Darke, Mr. Albert Fransella, Dr. Goodey, Mr. John Goss, Mr. Hinchliff, Mr. Alfred Hobday, Mr. John Huntingdon, the Pennington String Quartet, Mr. Steuart Wilson, Mr. Frederick Woodhouse, and Dr. W. G. Whittaker and the Newcastle Bach Choir.

C.

MODERN MUSIC: AND A WAY OUT

BY RUTLAND BOUGHTON

[One or two details discussed below apply only to Great Britain; the main trend of the article has to do with modern musical tendencies throughout the world.]

We must look to the village organist to save us from the evil thing that is called modern music.

Sound of all kinds, from the love-notes and alarm-notes of birds to the music of human beings, has been so intimately and habitually associated with emotion that there has arisen in the minds of many people an entirely false idea of the real relationship between emotion and musical art. From that false idea have developed most of the evils that trouble us in modern music.

Let us put aside the cant of modernism and (those of us who have been moved to reaction) the cant of mediævalism, and consider what have been the elements of great musical art—what music has gained, what it has lost, from the time of the Elizabethan Renaissance until to-day; then we shall know what it were well for us to keep, what to give up, what try to recapture, and so readjust our musical studies for the future. Let it always be remembered that the attitude of the non-professional music-lover is the thing that counts: it will be found at one end of the mental scale in the tunes preserved by uncultured people, at the other end in the formulated opinions of people enjoying a general, balanced culture.

In folk-music the conscious thing is the outline, the impression, the thing that is taken for granted.

The shape rather than the mood of the tune is what ensures its permanence. Words of varying and contrary feeling will be sung to the same melody, which lives by virtue of its formal beauty rather than by its expressional power and associations with verse. The tunes of folk-songs have often outlived the words, but I believe there are very few examples of verses surviving their music, except in collectors' books. However primitive an example may be chosen, it is the relationship and balance of phrases that make of melody a work of art: it may be the mere repetition of a puerile phrase, but the need to repeat the phrase is the outstanding consideration for the creator rather than the mood the tune evokes. Or it may be so lovely a melody as the Londonderry Air—it is still the inter-relationship of phrases that makes it great of its kind: the power of the finest moment in this tune is due less to its emotion than to the craftsmanship which has so exquisitely intensified its beauty by dovetailing its phrases. The musical mentality of even comparatively unintellectual but strongly-feeling people preserves tunes of just such quality—tunes in which construction counts for more than emotion.

Folk-art is of all kinds of art obviously freest from the personal equation, inasmuch as in it the arbitrary will of the individual counts for less than a general though non-deliberate sense of fitness.

Passing to the conscious art of the Elizabethan composers we find that their works are largely folk-tunes, decorated or otherwise exploited; but the tunes are an excuse rather than a necessity, and it was intellectual rather than emotional excitement that the composers counted on. Byrd and his fellows spoke of 'the science of music,' and the fact that it was associated with emotional and spiritual conditions of mind was simply taken for granted. The chief joys of Elizabethan music are the deliberate adjustment of woven threads, economy of material, and richness of effect. The skill of the musical craftsman is always equal to a clear statement of whatever inwardness there may be in his subject. He is never in the slightest danger of emotional floods. Even the austerity of Gibbons and the power of Bull are severely workmanlike, and in the humour of Weelkes and the tenderness of Giles Farnaby there is no undue freedom of the expressional element. There are, indeed, very few examples of early English music in which the discharge of an emotional current deprives one of the sense that the composers sought their pleasure almost entirely in a consciousness of intellectual beauty.

Nor is there any radical change until the time of Beethoven. Scarlatti, Couperin, and Purcell develop a more specialised sense of harmony, and lose something of polyphonic intricacy and beauty, corresponding to the decline of Gothic and the rise of Palladian in architecture; but the major beauties of the three composers mentioned are those of conscious design and balance plus an equally conscious kind of musical wit—rarely are they concerned with a need for emotional relief or expression; that remains the inevitable but subconscious element of the art.

Bach carried out with greater complication and mastery the principles which guided the Elizabethans; Haydn, Gluck, and Mozart more powerfully the suggestions at work in Purcell. An emotional undercurrent in the work of the great 18th century German composers is certainly more evident than in the English music of the 17th century; but the scientific element is proportionately developed. There is a stronger discharge of feeling in a Bach fugue and a Haydn symphony than in a madrigal of Byrd or an overture of Purcell; but the conscious control of the means of expression remains the paramount joy of the musician.

The pressure of emotion begins with Beethoven, continually increases in volume and intensity out of all proportion to the power to shape it to fine art, grows more 'romantic,' personal, and extravagant, until a sense of the beauty of achievement and a knowledge of the achievement of beauty are displaced by a morbid desire to pour out personal feelings irrespective of beauty and decency.

Now all the considerable composers of music previous to the time of Beethoven lived ordered lives—lives not merely as musical craftsmen, but craftsmen responsible in some degree to municipal or ecclesiastical organizations, royal courts, or aristocratic households; they had to make music for definite purposes—civic ceremonies, church services, royal home-comings, or for the fuller life of an aristocracy which sported in art and music rather than in cards and pheasants. Such routine work not only kept the craftsmanship of composers in good order, but the discipline of their lives correlated their sense and feeling with that of their fellows: from such a relationship inevitably resulted a fellowship of pride in art as between creator and recreator, ordinate technical demands, and a similarity of emotional range.

Beethoven lived a disordered not to say disorderly life, deprived of the discipline of ordinary duties, civic or domestic, and it is very significant for an understanding of the value of proportioned intellect and emotion as the focus of an art-work to realise that the anchored masters concentrated on the former, Beethoven and the drifting composers on the latter.

Unsuitable and ungoverned expressional elements entered (as in the history of Greek sculpture, Gothic architecture, and all art) at the moment of fullest perfection. The unreined tides of Beethoven have precedent in the Chromatic Fantasia of Bach and certain movements of Haydn, where feeling outruns the means of technique, and floods the music with intellectually vacuous passages consisting, for example, of the long drawn use of a single chord, generally the diminished seventh. But it was left to later composers to show the full neurosis of a deintellectualised music. We have most of us experienced and enjoyed the sensation of being lost in a whirl of emotion, but few would actually choose the fleeting joys of such experience rather than the enduring joys of intellectual beauty with their strange power to become augmented in retrospection. So, despite the deliberately fostered passions of 19th century music, culminating in the unreserved soul-exposures of Wagner (in his music—not his autobiography, though one is literally on all fours with the other), there was at the same time an attempt to save music from complete nakedness, or at least hide its ill-manners, by wrapping it in the cloak of an intellectual idea. Putting aside the mild reactions of Mendelssohn and Brahms, we see in the works of Schubert, Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, Berlioz, Tchaikovsky, and Wagner a steady loss of music's natural self-formative principle, accompanied by an increasing use of the said cloak. Most of these composers could fashion a small thing well, and leave it standing in its own purely musical strength, but their larger works are either (like the Symphonies of Schumann) naked, unshapely, and shamed, or (like the Symphonic Poems of Liszt) hiding their passion-feeble frames in a cloak borrowed from another art. The earlier, healthier, and more competent composers seldom attempted passionate, emotional expression, never unless they were satisfied that their technical equipment was equal to the preservation of their music as an art-work; they seemed to realise that if an intellectual quality were not inherent in the structure of music, were not its first and outstanding requisite, the essential laws of musical art would be broken, and the appeal to mankind become morbid and nervous rather than spiritual and astringent.

From the non-recognition of this we see before our eyes to-day the degenerate and deintellectualised offspring of 'pure emotion' in music committing suicide. Expression rather than control having become the motor-power of musical activity, it is open to the passions to whirl us in whatever direction they may happen to get blown. So long as feeling is governed, only certain feelings are allowed expression. Once feeling runs its own race it discovers a whole realm of trivial moods and wild insanities such as intellectualised art disdains to touch; and the spirits of ugliness and destruction abolish the final intellectual bondage of euphony itself. It was no merely coincident phenomenon that synchronous with the Great War we reached the period of deepest musical degradation, hinted in certain devil-may-care passages of Strauss, accepted as fair development by the middle-class experiments of Scriabin, shamelessly avowed in cretinous babble by Schönberg and Stravinsky (it is curious how sibilants enter into the names of these musical dissolutes!), and shamefacedly echoed by the small sinners who have followed them.

The earthquake has happened. Civilisation has to be built anew in music as in human amity. It was no irrelevant reaction that made so many of us feel on returning to civil life that almost the only clean and uncloying music was that of an earlier age. But Byrd and Bach do not answer all the musical questions of our time, and it is now for us to find a way to fresh, lovely, and self-standing forms of art no less than to new, noble, and rational conditions of world-citizenship.

Electing chiefly to follow the lead of the servants of intellectual beauty and the masters of art, we must not fail to learn many things from those artistic philanderers who have been in a measure slaves of their moods; for, just as during the decadent period of Greek art and civilisation a more spiritual philosophy and the Christian atmosphere evolved, so the music of the 19th century (still sputtering to-day like dregs in a burnt-out cauldron) gives many hints of subtle spiritual qualities little known to the deep-cutting but straightforward workmanship of the 17th, and beyond the conception of the elegant planes of the later 18th century musicians. It was those possibilities flaming out now and again that made possible works like Beethoven's Mass in D and Elgar's The Dream of Gerontius. And, whatever our relations to the creed that inspired those works, we must admit that spiritual tendencies without a basis of accepted religion are the most futile and treacherous material for art—as we may realise if we observe the increasing association of the worst kind of music with the shadiest kind of spiritualistic solemnity.

However, a remedy for modernism in music and all its attendant evils is very easily to be found. To save musicians from all the chances of vagueness and absurdity there is nothing better than a public appointment.

Now the only musical appointments to-day which are public and sufficiently numerous to serve our purpose are the ill-paid church organists' posts. Municipal appointments as orchestral conductors at holiday places are too few to count, and because they have to cater for the special appetites of idle and irresponsible people they do not serve any real and permanent musical need. To dish up a salad of symphony and rag-time, shop-ballad and comic song, so that no possible loafer can complain that his requirements have not been considered, contributes practically nothing to the musical development of the country. Much more to the purpose is it to provide by arrangement or composition the necessary stuff to suit the continuous musical needs of a village or small town. The country organist is the man who has to do this, he being the only music-maker with an acknowledged standing; but he has to do most of it free, and look to a teaching connection to provide him with the means of livelihood. And so the more important part of his work—the provision and preparation of pieces for the local brass band, choral society, and possible party of fiddlers—is scamped. And because of the poor reward for his service to God and the lack of payment for his chief services to man, only the feeblest among musicians drift into these jobs, though they are the first line of our musical communications, and should be given to the very pick of the students of our musical colleges. The 'most promising young composers' should in the natural order of things spend the first years of their professional employment in small centres of population, arranging and composing pieces for small choirs and bands, providing bits of tunes for amateur theatricals, and so on. The most promising of young musicians would soon find that practical experience of small things will add at least as much to his education as he can learn from the united wisdom of his teachers and predecessors. At present the best of our musical students are allowed to spend too much time on big works for combinations (and involving a proficiency of technique and even a peculiarity of idiom) such as are to be found only in the biggest cities. Therefore the poor things naturally stay in the big cities afterwards, eat their heads off for livelihood, and their hearts out with hope of recognition deferred. Recognition is waiting for them in every small place in the country. The livelihood is a more difficult problem, but not so impossible as it was a year or two ago, when for the first time permission was given to the local authorities to show their appreciation of the educational (and politically sedative) values of music by means of a halfpenny rate. But the butcher, baker, and candlestick-maker will never agree to the payment of that halfpenny while the pretence continues of getting the job done by ill-trained or even untrained blacklegs. Some kind of trade union may have to be developed to ensure the material welfare of the people who make music in country places, so that it may cease to be regarded as a decent thing to ask a musician to play an organ for a few pence an hour, or train a choir for nothing on the chance of getting a few paying pupils for pianoforte or singing. Such posts once placed on a secure economic basis would attract many of the clever young men and women now getting in one another's way in London. Once settled in small places and required to provide a certain amount of original music or music arranged for special local limitations (and the greatest composers were all arrangers at times, sometimes in larger measure than is generally realised), then there will be a speedy end to the tomfoolery of modernism; then once again the primary importance of good craftsmanship will be apparent, and it will be accounted a more decent life to help a dozen people to sing a Madrigal of Wilbye or a chorus especially written for the occasion, than to mystify a dozen fools by pretending to genius by clapping together counterpoints which, owing to an absence of intellectual discipline, are unable to encounter each other at any point without snarling and spitting. The dissonances of Weelkes, Bach, and Wagner serve to emphasise a prevalent euphony which is the sure sign of mastery, and the truest acknowledgment of beauty in music. Many of the dissonances of modern music are either a measure of the feebleness of the modern composer's equipment or the feebleness of his wit. The pilloried critics in Heldenleben make material for a good enough joke; but such a joke has only to be underlined often enough to become very dull. Similarly the lady-like harmonic growth so carefully fostered by the followers of Debussy is charming enough in its place; but that place is certainly not the greater world of music-lovers. Spicy overtones and sour counterpoints have no very distinguished future in the general world of music: that was proved by the reception given by the Coliseum audiences to a silly thing of M. Milhaud a few months ago. The public will have intelligible music—superficial music if left to its own resources, better music if given the chance of learning the more enduring pleasures of the fruit of a finer discipline. But musical education cannot be given to masses. The real hope remains with the small places; and if our cleverest youngsters are too superior to take on so obscure and limited a task, they may yet see more old-fashioned musicians pass them by while they continue to amuse themselves with the senile grimaces of modernism; for the greater part of modern music has not enough youthfulness and endurance to become old-fashioned.

MADRIGALISTS AND LUTENISTS

BY SYLVIA TOWNSEND WARNER

(Continued from March number, page 162.)

Despite that unfortunately equivocal phrase—too often quoted—‘apt for viols and voices,’ the importance of the words in the structure of the Madrigal can hardly be too much emphasised. The words supplied the composer with the equivalent of the subjects and second subjects which came later. He chose out salient features of his lyric, and having matched them with musical phrases, developed those phrases into his polyphonic texture. The result of this development might from its (secondary) purely musical value be ‘apt for viols,’ but the original subject-matter was based upon the words, and the entire Madrigal was vocally conceived to the end of expressing them. This is not in any way invalidated by the fact that the madrigalists in expressing their words happened to reiterate them. This reiteration was an established part of the Madrigal idiom, but it was not merely a convention. Farmer, in Fair Phyllis I saw sitting all alone, devotes an important imitative passage of ten bars’ length to setting five words, ‘up and down he wandered.’ He may have had many reasons for doing this. It can be assumed with tolerable certainty that he had two: he wished to convey the extent of the wandering, how often and how patiently up and down the shepherd sought for his lass ‘whilst she was missing’; he knew, or felt, that the structure of this particular Madrigal called for some such steadying passage of sustained interest at that point. Further reasons he may have had; but that he was interested in his imitation and indifferent to his text was not one of them.

I have tried to show already how sensitive a response to what psychologists call marginal suggestion the madrigalists displayed in their choice of what we might term motifs in the lyric; how readily and how variously their fancy caught up an allusion or recalled a memory, how widely its net was cast. That choice was made with an equal sensitiveness to the question of balance, which in a free form like the Madrigal is a peculiarly subtle matter. This is harder to illustrate by examples, but a study of any Madrigal by one of the great men should show what I mean. ‘Load every rift with ore’ is rather a perilous injunction to the craftsman gifted with a fertile imagination. The rifts may be overloaded, or unnecessary incisions made for the insertion of precious metals. Given a high standard of technique, a lively invention, a form singularly free from restrictions, and a strong contemporary feeling for ‘points’ and ‘conceits,’ there is bound to be a risk of over-elaboration. No Elizabethan craftsmen were more exposed to this risk than the madrigalists, and none avoided it with more signal discretion than they. Either by handling their motifs with extreme lightness and delicacy or by enlarging the proportions of the whole Madrigal to allow for a more prolonged and profound exposition of them, and by a judicious variation in the kind of point they made, balancing an allusive one by a simpler piece of representative writing, a rhythmical figure by a touch of harmonic colouring, they respected laws of form which were none the less binding for being uncoded and mutable.

The name of Madrigal is now employed to cover all the forms of secular music for combined voices practised in the 16th century, and this looseness of nomenclature has been without doubt a contributory cause to the misunderstanding of the nature of the Madrigal. Nomenclature was loose enough in those days. Morley and others frequently employ the term Canzonet for their slighter madrigalian writings, and Gibbons calls his one volume, whose contents are all of a grave nature, Madrigals or Motets. But they did feel a certain difference between the true Madrigal and the infinitely entertaining smaller fry which was afterwards lost sight of. The Ballet was sharply differentiated by the introduction of Fa-la passages between the regular clauses of the lyrics chosen for setting in this style; and apart from the Ballet, the treatment of the words is generally a touchstone. In the Madrigal they are, as I have said, reiterated, often at considerable length, and moreover closely studied and made much of. In the lesser forms they are set more straightforwardly, and the texts chosen do not as a rule allow for the same intentness of expression which is a feature of the Madrigal. ‘These,’ says Morley, arduously defining Canzonets, Neapolitans, Villanelles, and Ballets,* ‘and all other kinds of light musick

* He is hard pressed for it at times. ‘There is likewise a kind of songs . . . called Iustinianas . . . a wanton and rude kind of musick it is, and like enough to carrie the name of some notable Curtizan . . . for no man will deny that Iustiniana is the name of a woman.’—Plaine and Easie Introduction.

saving the Madrigal are by a general term called aires.'

The Air of the lutenists was a different matter from these, but it has something in common with them besides its name. The true Air was intended for performance by a solo voice to the accompaniment of the lute. But the form in which many (not all) volumes of these aires were published allows also for their performance by combined voices, the Air itself being treated as the top line of a simple part-song, based upon the harmonies of the lute-part. The simplicity is very far from that of the simple part-song as we understand it. The vocal writing has a clarity and distinction which mark it as a product of the greatest age of polyphony; indeed, some of these four-voice settings approach the madrigalian standard of interest. But their texture is slighter, there is less rhythmic independence, and the words are set straightforwardly. Altogether, these four-voice versions have just that degree of value that befits a subsidiary alternative, skilfully and honestly constructed, and the Morleian use of the term Air fits them well enough. It is in the Air as a solo song that we must look for what is significant in this genre. Thus considered, they are of the highest importance—an importance that has, until Dr. Fellowes drew attention to it, been completely disregarded.

The first book of Lutenist Aires was published in 1597 by John Dowland. It bears this title: The First Book of Songs or Ayres of Four Parts, with Tablature for the Lute. So made that the parts together, or either of them severally, may be sung to the Lute, Orpherian, or Viol de gambo. The amount of innovation involved is scarcely conveyed by the title, which suggests at first sight that these Aires were little more than an accommodating variety of combined vocal writing with an instrumental accompaniment ad libitum. Some allowance must be made for the fact that many contemporary title-pages showed this tendency to oblige (witness the 'viols and voices' formula), a tendency due, not to the indifference of composers as to the way their works would be performed, so much as to a realisation that those works, if successful, might sometimes be performed under conditions involving some degree of substitution about which it would be desirable to give friendly advice. This, however, is a small factor in a misunderstanding which arises almost inevitably in the 20th century mind confronted with the 16th century. For the last fifty years the commonest form of domestic music has been the song. I do not refer only to the domestic music of the cultivated: there its relative preponderance is less marked. But if every strata of society be considered the song is an easy first in popularity. In 1597 this was not so. Though the possibilities of the single voice in art-music had already begun to attract the attention of musicians, their experiments (such as the verse-anthem) were tentative. If the single voice was a new element in their music, still newer was the quality which we now insensibly connect with it. I mean that particular variety of vocal curve which we call Tune. The musical idiom of the day was polyphony; and the material of that polyphony was Figure, not Tune.* Composers were of course perfectly aware of the existence of Tune. In their instrumental writings they frequently took folk-songs as the basis of a fantasia or set of variations. But this very borrowing of ready-made tunes seems to indicate fairly clearly that they were not sufficiently interested in Tune per se to think it worth their while to spend time making them up for themselves.

The composer of Aires, with his vocal interest concentrated in a single line and within the limits of a single stanza, was bound to take this question of tune into consideration. It was not his highest aim; it was seldom his direct one. But it was often incidentally his happy end. His aim was, as the aim of the madrigalists, the expression of his text, or as Dowland puts it in his first Preface, 'that kind of Musicke, which to the sweetness of instrument applies the lively voice of man, expressing some worthy sentence or excellent Poeme.'

Not all the means of the madrigalist would suit his purpose. Their rhythmic variety, based upon the true declamation of the text, he retained: and the construction of his lute-part showed that ingenuity of figure and beauty of ornamented cadence which adorned the Madrigal. But ingenuity of figure is not fitted to the single voice, since half its value is dependent upon the imitation of the voice that replies to it, one catching fire, as it were, from another. And the devices of representative and allusive suggestion which are so striking a feature of the Madrigal, legitimate there, become of doubtful legitimacy when they do not fit into a texture. Moreover, they were forbidden by the lutenists' custom of setting but the first stanza of a lyric that usually contained several, it being unlikely, say, that a sting in one verse would be exactly balanced by a thorn in the next; and also by the manner in which that stanza was set, the words being closely followed with very little reiteration. This last consideration, this hand-in-glove alliance of the word and the note, did more than anything else to determine the general character of the Air, and of the melodic development which the Air represented. Shut up with his rhythmic and melodic invention in a small form comparable to the sonnet in the capacities of its 'narrow room,' the lutenist had to apply himself to that proportioning of part to part, that balancing of curve, that exact fitting of the pint into the pint bottle, which is essential to the making of the good tune.

Yet to over-insist upon the tunefulness of the Aires is to risk giving an inadequate impression of their significance. Write good tunes the lutenists did, tunes so singable, so complete in themselves, that two of them, Dowland's Now, O now, I needs must part and Ford's Since first I saw your face, have had the honour of passing into our stock of common music as some quotations have passed into the stock of our common speech—an honour not without its price, since, with the last line of Lycidas and other mutilated classics, they are generally quoted wrong. But the scope of the lute Airs is wider than this, the attempts and achievements of their composers more varied. Especially is this the case when we come to consider the work of John Dowland. 'Dowland,' says Dr. Fellowes, 'may reasonably be regarded as the greatest song-writer that this country has yet produced, not excepting even Purcell.' The claim is a just one, and it is not only on the score of his greatness as a song-writer that he challenges this comparison. A study of his methods, especially in the later songs, shows that they had many striking points of resemblance to those of the man whom, leaving the palm of greatness out of the question, we must certainly hereafter speak of as Dowland's successor. Like Purcell he has the gift of writing convincing tunes and founding them upon splendid basses. Like Purcell he has a mastery of true and moving declamation and expressive verbal phrasing. And, as with Purcell, one almost forgets these trivial merits in the contemplation of his daring as an innovator, as an original thinker. For myself I agree with Dr. Fellowes, and rank him above Purcell as a song-writer. When his work is completely published, as I hope it soon will be,* others must make this decision for themselves. Even the most determined Purcellian may forgive me for mentioning two things which help to weigh down the scales in Dowland's favour, since neither of them is the merit of the one man nor the fault of the other. I mean the period when Dowland wrote, and the beauty of the lyrics he set.

* It hardly seems necessary (even in a foot-note) to state that the absence of Tune does not in any way compromise the question of Melody. But I do it as a safeguard for those who are not acquainted with the melodic beauty of 16th century polyphony.

However great one's veneration for Purcell's songs, it can hardly be extended to their words. 'Europe scarce can parallel,' even with the Bach cantatas, the frigid balderdash which was too commonly his portion. Yet even if one did not like the Airs of the Lutenists, one might still sing them for the sake of their lyrics. The beauty of these lyrics is proverbial: they are the treasure of the critic, the delight of the anthologist, the hopeless marvel of the poet—one might almost add the envy of the lark and the despair of the nightingale. I am writing for musicians, not men of letters. Yet how many of those who are conversant with these lyrics and acknowledge them as one of the glories of the Elizabethan age know the music that matches them in the song-books whence they were drawn? The one has been taken, the other left. The tradition of Elizabethan literature has never been lost. It weathered the Augustan period, not only through the good offices of the connoisseur, but as a living thing upon the stage—especially, it is noteworthy, upon the provincial stage. Elizabethan music, no less genuine, no less valuable a part of our national heritage, had not this fortune. And the completest oblivion of all descended, not upon the Madrigal, which was a specifically 16th century form, but upon the Air, the youngest-born product of that age and the one by nature most closely related to the subsequent development of music. It is curious.

Those who account for every little deficiency in the history of English music upon the principles of the Protectionist will find in the sudden death and burial of the lutenist Air a clinching example in their favour; for it was a purely English development, and as such, they will say, doomed to extinction the moment an untaxed alien or damned foreigner (New and Old School) set foot upon our shores. It seems, however, certain that the decline of the lute had a great deal to do with it. The lute has long passed into the Wardour Street emporium of bygone instruments with picturesque names; its tablature presents the student of musical notation with the starkest hieroglyphics; its repertory, though interesting, is a small one; and while I believe that anyone taking the trouble to get a lute and learn how to play it would find it repay his trouble and expense quite as well as a tiger, I do not expect many to do so. Dr. Fellowes in his edition gives him every encouragement, for he reproduces the tablature of the original lute-parts with an exact transcription underneath. He supplies further for each song a pianoforte accompaniment based exclusively upon the composer's own material, but so arranged as to be suited to the keyboard idiom. These arrangements, made with the minimum of alteration, show admirable sympathy and discretion. From the practical point of view they are absolutely justifiable, and from the critical point of view notably so. The lute is a plucked instrument of six strings with no power of sustaining a note, and thus a harmonic rather than a polyphonic instrument. But it was the instrument of a polyphonic age, and the lutenists' accompaniments, especially those of Dowland, are extremely contrapuntal in import, even when the exigencies of lute tablature thwart the full indication of this. The principle followed by Dr. Fellowes in his alternative accompaniments has been to complete the texture sketched in the tablature, which is certainly more representative of the composer's intention than any mere filling out of block chords could be.

The debt which we owe to Dr. Fellowes for the enthusiasm, industry, and good sense by which he has restored to us so much of our national heritage is incalculable. It is thanks to him that the Madrigal, so long condemned to languish in a glass case as a praiseworthy antiquity, is now once more established as a living thing. Of his work in the realm of 16th century Church music this is not the place to speak nor yet the full time. But no aspect of his activities should ensure him more and more grateful debtors than his publication of the lutenist song-writers. For here is music of freshness and beauty, of exquisite workmanship, of the most authentically national idiom, and of a very wide range of mood, demanding no more for its performance than a voice and a pianoforte. Here are songs which should do much to rehabilitate the rather disreputable popularity of the song, for they are not difficult when once the singer has adjusted his mind to their rhythmic freedom, a rhythmic freedom which is the natural outcome of a proper accentuation of the words, with just a further touch of delight in rhythmical ingenuity which, so far as my experience goes, is only felt as a stumbling-block by those who have prudishly hardened their faces against all knowledge of rag-time; and withal they are so lovely and sincere as to be proof against the tarnishing of familiarity as against the moth and rust of three centuries' neglect.

* 'The English School of Lutenist Song-writers.' Edited by Edmund Horace Fellowes. Winthrop Rogers. 1, 2, and 5.

THE LURE OF FOREIGN NAMES

BY ALEXANDER BRENT-SMITH

There are many strange things in the world of music, but none so strange as the fact that the man most likely to win the approval of the populace is the man whose name no one can either pronounce or remember. In every other art, profession, or business, an easily remembered name is indispensable—but not so in music. Should a man be called Brooke or Green he cannot hope for a friendly hearing, but let him baffle the public with a name such as Xaver Stravagansky (or, for short, X. Stravagansky) or Modeste Glazowsky, he will have an adoring and inarticulate crowd flinging their gold and silver in his triumphal way. So that in spite of Juliet's suggestion to the contrary, there is a good deal in a name. Of course it is true that a rose would smell as sweet whatever it were called, but it is fortunate for that flower that its name is both euphonious and rhymable. As it is, the rose on the strength of its name alone has been the maker of marriages ('It was not in the spring-time our loving lot was cast, it was the time of roses,' &c.); but, stranger still, it has been the intensifier of filial affection—'the roses round the door make me love mother more.' There is something pathetic in the fact that the mother is helpless to inspire affection in her children, and depends entirely upon the fortuitous circumstance that roses grow beside the door.

Even the association and appearance of names are capable of controlling our judgment. Suppose, for instance, an advertisement announced that there would be a lecture in Hyde Park by Aristotle, all the London trains from Oxford (and perhaps Cambridge) would be jammed with intellectuality, whereas the Upper Tooting trains would be comparatively empty. But suppose the advertisement announced a lecture in Hyde Park by 'Arry Stottle, the trains from Oxford (and perhaps Cambridge) would be empty, whereas the Upper Tooting trains would be bulging with bourgeoisie. Aristotle, so thoughtful, so dignified, becomes by a spelling change an empty-headed, loudly-dressed vulgarian, a card-sharper, a book-maker. Very different from the world we live in, the world of fiction demands names indicative of character because we have so short a time in which to appreciate the secondary characters in the story. In real life, on the other hand, a week, a month, or a year, will accustom us to any name, however unsuitable it might seem at first; it is possible that a Mr. Pumblechook might slowly pass from second lieutenant to field-marshal, by which time he would stand for all we hold most beautiful and brave, adorning alike the maiden's dreams at dawn and our tiny darling's night-cap tales at dusk.

In fiction, then, having so short a time to squander with our friends, we need all the help that a significant name can offer. Sir Francis Darwin has written a delightful essay upon this subject, examining the nomenclature of Dickens, Thackeray, Trollope, Scott, and Jane Austen, and giving the prize to Thackeray. I must say, in passing, that I cannot sympathise with his dislike of the Marquis of Auldrechie, which seems to me as good as the Marquis of Edinburgh.

In public affairs almost all, except habitually disagreeable persons, are hypnotised by a great name. It is right up to a point that the sayings and doings of a great name should be praised uncritically, because the owners have striven hard and honourably to make themselves these glorious names, and (Oh, struggling man, take heart!) nearly everyone has sometime been unhonoured and unknown. But there comes a time when we must free ourselves from their hypnotic power, and ask ourselves what we should think of this or that if it appeared under a name unknown to us. Who would tolerate that derangement by Brahms of a folk-song, In Silent Night, with its mouth-organic harmonies, if it appeared by John Muggins? What would be our opinion of the Finale of Beethoven's fifth Symphony if it was presented to us as the work of a forgotten Kapellmeister of that period? We should agree that it possessed undeniable vitality and real genius in the triplet theme, but that on the whole it was vulgar and wearisome.

Now that the foreign invasion has been resumed, it would be a good thing if our audiences set themselves against the hypnotic power of romantic names. Mr. Arthur Beak may play as well as Herr Arthur Schnabel, Mr. Green's operas may be as dramatic as Signor Verdi's, John Brooke's Mass in G major may be as stupendous as Johann Bach's Mass in B minor. At any rate, let us do justice to ourselves and give tribute to whom tribute is due.

Saint-Saëns's La Terre Promise (The Promised Land) is to be performed at the Trocadéro, Paris, on Sunday, April 9, by a choir of three hundred, conducted by M. Victor Charpentier. The concert is in aid of the French Red Cross.

CHARLES GOUNOD ON MOZART'S DON JUAN

BY CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

(Authorised translation by Fred Rothwell)

Is it simply the memory of a dream when I see myself, in those far-away days of my sixth year, gravely accompanying a beautiful cantatrice as she sings a romance I had composed for her? I had written it down in pencil, the whole of it, and my great-aunt, who was also my god-mother and my music teacher—a lady belonging to an aristocratic family ruined by the Revolution, through which she herself had passed—had piously gone over it in ink. Naturally, at that age, I would never have tolerated anyone giving me the slightest help in the composition! The masterpiece was twelve bars in length, four of them consisting of a ritornelle. Such as it was, it had astonished the singer's father, an old soldier who was very fond of music; the result being that he presented me with the orchestral score, in two handsome red volumes, of Mozart's Don Juan, with French and Italian text.

When I think of it, such a present to so young a child appears somewhat audacious; assuredly very few would have made it. All the same, the donor could not have been better inspired. Daily in my Don Juan, unconsciously though with that wonderful ease of assimilation which is the great characteristic of childhood, I lived in the music, reading the score and acquainting myself with both the vocal and the instrumental parts. What a delight it was, some years later, to listen to this opera at the Italiens, sung by Grisi, Mario, and Lablache; and when, later still, being intimate with Gounod, I had the pleasure of hearing him interpret and comment on the work, every page of which I knew by heart!

No wonder, then, that I discovered nothing very new to me on opening Gounod's book on Mozart's masterpiece. Still, how few readers would find themselves in so exceptional a situation? Not one. I will even add that most of those who think they know Don Juan, from having gone through it rapidly or heard it at the Opéra, split up into five Acts, spoiled by the translation and the sacrilegious alterations and additions of Castil-Blaze, in that vast building so unsuited both to the dainty orchestral music and to the subject-matter, are in reality completely ignorant of it. Consequently, I make one request of those interested in music: to forget for the time being their usual preferences and transcendental theories, and, instead, read this short though substantial book, so attractive and yet profound beneath its apparent slightness. They will learn much of which they had previously no idea, and the reading will enable them to see that in art there is something more precious than conviction, viz., artistic probity—that quality inherent in the fine works of the past—surrounding Don Juan with a sacred halo, and which Gounod, in his panegyric of the masterpiece, brings out so brilliantly.

Let us open the famous score. At once we are conscious that the criticism is of a superior kind:

From the beginning of the Overture Mozart flings himself completely into the spirit of the drama, the Overture itself being an epitome of it. After the first four bars, rendered yet more terrible by the pause which completes the second and fourth . . .

It is unusual to attach such importance to pauses, a thing calculated to astonish many, for the eloquence of the pause in music is a comparatively modern conquest. Whether we take the Roman style of Palestrina or the monumental artistry of Bach, the whole of past art has entirely, or almost entirely, misinterpreted it. Nowadays we appear to scorn this valuable aid, preoccupied as we are with stretching too tightly the warp and woof of the musical fabric and covering it with rich embroidery. All the same, the effect of the pause is one of rare potency which nothing else can supply. To such as would think slightly of Mozart, I recommend the pauses that interrupt the first few bars of the Prelude of Tristan. Let them endeavour to suppress these in thought, and they will discover how important they are.

To continue:

Everything in this tremendous introduction breathes and inspires terror: the monotonous and inexorable rhythm of the strings, the sepulchral timbre of the wind instruments, where the octave intervals, from bar to bar, resemble the very trappings of a stone giant, the minister of Death; the syncopations of the first violins which, from the eleventh bar onwards, probe the innermost recesses of that sombre consciousness, the creation of the second violins entwining like a huge reptile round the culprit, the stubborn resistance of this condemned victim who blindly struggles on to the end; those frightful scales, ascending and descending, which swell like the billows of a stormy sea; in a word, the menace suspended over the head of the criminal by the solemnity of this impressive opening; everything in this wonderful page is of the loftiest tragical inspiration; the power of fearsome terror could go no further.

This picture is a true one, and yet, on close inspection, how paltry the details seem! Mere octave intervals, basses representing a very simple rhythm for a few bars, syncopations—where do we not find these? A trifling arrangement on the fourth string of the second violins, and those scales, ces effroyables gammes, moderate in tempo and not more than one octave in range: can such things be wonderful? It is true that the details of themselves appear little or nothing; they acquire all their importance from being timely or appropriate, from their reciprocal harmonies, their contrasts, and a sense of general balance. Here is style; here is the secret of genius. It may be invented, studied, and analysed, though with great difficulty; it cannot be imitated. It also disappears in ordinary average playing; a piece of music may be played apparently quite well and yet produce no impression whatsoever.

Nothing, unfortunately, is more difficult to interpret than this exquisite music whose every note and pause has a value of its own and where the slightest negligence, whether in letter or in spirit, may be catastrophic. Great musical spectacles have a virility of another kind; the Overture of Tannhäuser, and that of Guillaume Tell, survive second-rate interpretations; however one murders the notes, there are so many of them that there are always some to spare. This constitutes the triumph of the big guns! The tree with its thousands of leaves may weather the storm, but what is left of a flower—of a butterfly's wing—once it has been bruised or crushed?

* * * * *

The drama begins. In vivid colours the author has depicted the famous Introduction, where, epitomised so to speak, so many apparent incongruities easily find room: the comic scene of Leporello awaiting his master, the flight of Don Juan stopped by Donna Anna, the appearance of the Commander, the duel and its fatal issue. Attention might have been drawn to the extraordinary facility with which, at each step, Mozart modifies the character of the music, passing from comic to tragic without breaking the unity of style. I have purposely used the word 'facility' instead of 'skill' since it is very likely that the miracle was effected unconsciously. In this scene, as in that of the supper which concludes the opera, Mozart certainly realised the impossible without being aware of the fact. The musical language he used, consisting of a happily proportioned blend of the Italian and the German style, sustained by universally accepted tradition, was extremely supple, though how many, employing the same medium of expression, lack his eloquence!

The minutely detailed analysis of the well-known air of Leporello, Madamina, il catalogo è questo, is particularly to be noted. When we find Gounod seeking meanings and intentions in each note, we might conclude that he had given free scope to his imagination. Nothing of the kind; everything he says is true, and yet the morceau flows smoothly along, each detail appearing to be required by musical necessities alone. Here is the difficulty in the ever-recurring question of music with literary pretensions; on condition the style does not suffer, we may put into music as many intentions as we please. Those who do not like them need not notice them.

With regard to this air and the eloquent details of its instrumentation, Gounod remarks:

Here we have the orchestra in the theatre filling its proper rôle, which is complementary rather than invading, not saying too much, and yet saying all. How far removed we are from dull, pretentious pomposity which aims at moving us by loud effects, which looks upon mere padding as real worth and upon pathos as greatness!

In these words we have the clash of weapons before the battle; but the fight does not come on, the author not considering it necessary to insist on his point. Apparently the artistic epoch in which Mozart lived, analogous to our 17th century French literature, enters largely into the qualities Gounod admires—true balance and perfection of taste. He is quite right to protest against striving after effect; the absence of such striving is common to all fine periods in art, its presence a characteristic sign of decadence.

I am greatly inclined to find fault with the unguarded encomiums Gounod lavishes on Don Juan's 'Ball,' with his three orchestras on the stage, each, as we know, playing a different air. 'All this,' he says, 'is carried through without confusion, but with consummate ease and skill.'

That may be true when reading the opera, but when listening to this portion of it I have always been quite bewildered. The sun may have spots on its surface: Gounod cannot see them. But though I see the spot, I do not find fault with the composer; I merely declare that I do not understand what he meant. Considering that during the supper of the second Act he introduced wind instruments on to the stage, he might also have introduced some during the Ball instead of increasing the numbers of violins and basses, the result of which was an inextricable jumble of instruments of like timbre. What reasons had he for doing so? Probably under his interpretation the morceau assumed a different meaning from that which it has for us. In any case there is but one thing for us to do: play the piece just as it was written.

Nothing is more dangerous than to make alterations in such a work. I remember, on the occasion of a reprise of Don Juan at the Opéra, Vaucorbeil, who was then director, was astonished at the lack of effect produced by the famous Trio of Masks. As is well known, this Trio is preceded by a conversation between the three Masks, in admirably tragic vein. A window opens, the orchestra suddenly stops, and through the open window are wafted strains of the small orchestra of the Ball, accompanying Leporello's invitation. When the window is shut, the orchestra resumes and the admirable Trio begins. On the occasion of the reprise in question, the small stage orchestra had been suppressed and the theatre orchestra played everything itself, with the result that the entire picturesque passage became impossible to understand and most pitifully commonplace.

The instrumentation of the magnificent air of Donna Anna, Or sai chi l'onore, contains another puzzle, Gounod makes no mention of it whatsoever, he even praises the full, sonorous orchestra 'which never goes beyond what is necessary.' I am not wholly of this opinion. In this morceau, where the vocal part shows such grandeur and spirit, my opinion is that the orchestra does not attain 'what is necessary.' Berlioz was fond of ridiculing it. Doubtless, after the grandiose singing of Donna Anna, oboes and bassoons seem inadequate, almost comical. The puzzle may be solved by supposing that the singer who created the rôle may have been vocally unequal to the occasion. Mozart was always very careful not to drown the singing beneath heavy instrumentation; he might be called a voice-setter just as a jeweller might be called a diamond-setter.

I have been rather—perhaps even immoderately—abusive towards Gounod, so it is time to begin praising and admiring him again. I will not undertake to make a list of his sayings, his trouvailles, the pearls in his casket. Open it; you will be surprised and dazzled. Listen to what he says of the famous balcony Trio:

It is in the very phrases of Donna Elvira that Don Juan seeks the insolent expression of a false tenderness. This borrowing is an abuse of confidence, a musical forgery perpetrated by Don Juan, speaking with his own lips the very language of sincerity uttered by his wife, the better to deceive her.

Is not this way of speaking music both delightful and unexpected? In another place, he talks of the 'involuntary scruples with which the disinterested innocence of genius swarms.' We are continually receiving flashes of light, opening up hitherto unknown depths, well calculated to amaze those who seek in music nothing but vague sensations and drugged voluptuousness.

Read this little book, more especially the appendix, in which, leaving his subject, the author deals with general matters in a few clear-cut sentences. Reflect on what he says of singing and diction, of pronunciation and style, learning from him what the conductor of an orchestra ought to be. Among other things he says:

It is a mistake to think that the conductor can make himself fully understood by means of the baton which he holds in his hand. His entire demeanour must instruct and impart life to those who obey him. His attitude, his physiognomy, his glance, should prepare the singers for what he is about to demand of them; his expression should enable them to anticipate his intentions; it should guide the intelligence of the performers.

How few conductors reach this standard! For one worthy of the name, how many time-beaters! Some look as though they were cutting up a cake, others leading a regiment to the drill-ground; others again might be engaged in the hurried preparation of an omelette. I have even seen some twirling the baton above their heads! The public sets up a claim to judge of the merits of conductors, a disastrous claim which has frequently brought bad musicians to the front because they happened to have cultivated a leonine head of hair or an elegant figure, or simply because they had established a bond of sympathy with the listeners, without the latter really knowing why! Composers and performers are alone capable of judging in such matters. The chief quality of a conductor, apart from a thorough acquaintance with the work, should be, as Gounod says, a power of suggestion, of such a nature as to elicit from the performer an obedience of which he is not aware. These, as everyone will agree, are matters with which the public has nothing to do; still, the public likes to judge everything, and its tastes are at times odd enough—especially in music. Formerly it expected music to be of a rousing nature; now it wants to be lulled to sleep. What will it expect music to do next?

The noble Muse is little concerned with all this; all she cares for is to remain beautiful and to lavish smiles on her elect. These are few, as they have always been and probably always will be. 'What a lot of notes!' was said in complimentary tones to Mozart by the Emperor of Austria, who had understood nothing of the wonderful music to which he had been listening. 'Sire, there is not one too many,' replied Mozart, with a pride equal to his genius.

So great a character but seldom attains to fortune. The author of Don Juan died in poverty, to the everlasting shame of his contemporaries.

Occasional Notes

We have received from Messrs. Stainer & Bell a booklet containing descriptions of the works issued by the Carnegie Trust. In the Introduction Mr. Percy Scholes, the author, explaining the origin of the booklet, says:

'The Trustees, and those who act with them as their business agents, have felt, I gather, that there was some danger of publication becoming such merely in name, or, at all events, being not so widespread as the merits of the pieces chosen demand—and this through lack of public knowledge.'

The plaint leaves us unsympathetic, even a trifle amused. It does not seem to have occurred to the Trust or to its agents that the musical press of this country devotes a good deal of space to reviews of new music, especially when the new music happens to be of native origin, and of the type published by the Trust. Of the sixteen compositions dealt with in the booklet only one has been sent to this office for review, and that exception was due to the initiative of the composer. So far as we can ascertain at short notice this masterly inactivity has been observed in regard to our contemporaries, both musical and lay.

Every publisher save the Trust and its agents knows that a good review in a journal circulating entirely amongst musicians (many of whom are conductors of local choral societies) is often more fruitful than an expensive advertisement. We recommend our readers to get hold of Mr. Scholes's very useful booklet. They will thus obtain for sixpence information that, had the Trust not been dozing in the matter of publicity, would have been obtainable, free of charge, months ago.

So much is now done for the native composer by the Carnegie Trust and the Palmer Fund that we almost hesitate to express an opinion that there is yet an opening for another millionaire. The Trust sees to the publication of works—good. The Fund gives first, even second, performances of MS. compositions—good again. Yet these generous efforts do not bring the chosen works into direct contact with the great musical public. Few people are in the habit of buying scores to read through silently, and not many are able to go to the Royal College of Music of a morning to hear the public rehearsals given by the Fund. But they may be counted on to turn up in crowds at a concert the programme of which includes at least one of their pet works—the fifth Symphony, the Nut-cracker Suite, the Emperor Concerto, &c., or on an occasion when a famous soloist of any kind is to be heard.

That's the time to catch 'em. Millionaires don't read such journals as this; their millions keep them too busy. But if we thought we had the ear of one, we should hang on to it until he had heard of a useful way of spending the interest on a hundred thousand of those pounds that give him so much trouble. If he rose to the occasion he would form a small board of advisers who would each year select a dozen or twenty large works, and a much greater number of small works of all kinds. Performances of these would be subsidised in various parts of the country. We all know the heart-breaking experience of composers who see their work given a first performance which is also the last—or anyhow the last for so long a period that the second becomes another first performance, so to speak. So futile is this isolated first hearing that we feel disposed to venture the Hibernian suggestion that a new work should make its débüt with its third performance. Our millionaire would solve the difficulty by arranging always that the chosen work should be performed three times in a short period. The proposition would be a business one: the orchestra or choral society or soloist concerned would receive a sum in return for which would be guaranteed three performances during the season. It should be understood that the work would be included in a programme containing at least one work of a powerfully attractive character. The people who wished to hear the Fifth Symphony would not stay away from a concert because the scheme included also an item by a comparatively unknown composer.

This is the propaganda that new native works need—public performance side by side with works from which the average man can't keep away. Entire programmes of new music are merely a form of preaching to the converted. This is so obvious that we blush to mention it. But the people who have long since grasped the fact apparently fail to go on farther and realise the importance of insinuating the powder of new music into the jam of popular programmes.

Returning to our millionaire, we suggest that he should get some of his money back in order that his fund may be to some extent self-supporting and so able to operate as widely as possible. A small percentage of the takings should be handed to his executive, when the profit-line has been passed. As we said above, these subsidised performances should take place in as many centres as possible. In regard to the smaller forms, new unaccompanied choral works—even part-songs—could be introduced to small centres of population. Many a good village glee class would jump at the chance of working up a new part-song on receipt of a set of copies and a donation of a couple of guineas towards its funds. Propaganda work in regard to new music is apt to concern itself too much with big works. The small ones—the part-song, pianoforte solo, string quartet, &c.—often reach a larger public in the long run, because they are more easily negotiated. But if they are really original, or by an unknown composer, they need a push-off as much as big works.

We hear a reader say, 'Pooh! a wild, impossible scheme!' But it is merely an adaptation of the royalty system, and nobody ever thinks of that as wild or impossible. Used (as it has been) almost exclusively for the propagation of the baser types of music it has proved itself to be only too practicable—so much so as to be one of the greatest hindrances to musical progress. A fine stroke to turn the system round and make it help things along instead! Meanwhile, until that willing millionaire arrives, perhaps the Carnegie Trust and the Palmer Fund executives might lay their heads together and see if it is possible to make a modest beginning at a scheme that will ensure the attainment of the object toward which they are so generously working—an object (as we have said) that can hardly be reached by mere publication, or by rehearsal-performances that are necessarily held in the mornings in a hall rather off the beaten track of the average music-lover.

Elgar's Violoncello Concerto was played at Budapest, on February 14, by Béla de Csuka, principal violoncellist of the Budapest Royal Opera House. The National Gazette of February 16 said: 'Csuka could not present himself from a new side, but we must give special mention to the novelty of his concert—the Violoncello Concerto of Edward Elgar. This English composer is to-day, at any rate, the most prominent musical artist of his country.' The Pest Gazette (February 15) said: 'Csuka fully justified expectations, mainly by his performance of Elgar's Violoncello Concerto and Bach's G major Suite.' And The World of the same date spoke of 'the fine performance of this interesting and delicately-coloured modern composition.'

We are glad to hear that Dr. Vaughan Williams has received an invitation to visit the United States. Mr. Carl Stoekel, the president of the Litchfield County Musical Association, has asked him to come to the Association's next Festival to conduct the first performance in America of his Pastoral Symphony. The Festival will take place in June, at Norfolk, Connecticut. The New York Symphony Orchestra has been engaged, and there will be a large choir drawn from five choral societies of neighbouring towns.

Our composers seem to be getting their foot in abroad to an encouraging extent. We are informed that the arrangements for this year's Salzburg Musical Festival include a series of international chamber concerts, immediately preceding the performances of the Vienna Opera. Bax, Bliss and Goossens have agreed to contribute works, and Miss Dorothy Moulton is to sing modern English songs. English music will thus be prominently represented at a Continental Festival for the first time since 1914.

We have long since realised that the best headlines come from America; the art of caption is hardly cultivated anywhere else. The most we can do on this side is to turn out a statement that is merely bald and brief. We have a good way to go before we can compete with a genius on the New York Evening Sun, who in seven words tells his readers of: (1) A famous musician who has been ill; (2) the nature of his illness; (3) the operation that set him on his legs again; (4) the discarded portion of his anatomy; (5) his return to the operatic stage; and (6) the work in which he reappeared. Here is the Compleat Caption:

MURATORE, MINUS APPENDIX, RETURNS IN MONNA L'ANNA.

Our March issue contained an announcement that a new amateur orchestra was being formed, to be known as 'The Euterpe String Players.' In response to inquiries we now give some particulars. The orchestra will, it is hoped, serve a double purpose. It will endeavour to give performances of works, old and new, which for various reasons are passed over by large professional orchestras, and it will aim at providing the instrumental part in choral works, chiefly those of the small and intimate type, such as Bach's Cantatas. In the present state of economics, a choral society is unable to give properly balanced performances of such works without incurring expenses that can rarely be met from the sale of tickets, as such concerts are usually given in a small hall. The solution of the difficulty seems to lie in the formation of a small body of highly skilled amateurs. Mr. Charles Kennedy Scott is the moving spirit of the enterprise, so we may hope to see the instrumental equivalent of the Oriana Choir. Players who wish to join, or who are interested in any way, should write to the hon. secretary, Miss M. M. Hills, 80, West Cromwell Road, S.W. 5.

A very attractive programme has been put forth by the committee of the Oxford Musical Festival (May 8-13). There will be five concerts, besides performances of English folk-dances and historical ballets. Special organ recitals will be given at New College and Christ Church, and there will be the usual Sunday evening concert at Balliol College. The Festival concerts will take place at the Town Hall, the Corn Exchange, and the Sheldonian Theatre, and the folk-dancing in New College gardens. The chief choral works to be performed are the B minor Mass, Parry's De Profundis, and Vaughan Williams's Sea Symphony. The orchestral items include the Enigma Variations, Butterworth's two Folk-song Idylls, and Stravinsky's L'Oiseau de Feu. The Festival is inaugurated by the Oxford Bach Choir, under the general direction of Sir Hugh Allen. Messrs. Sydney Acott & Co., High Street, Oxford, are in charge of the box-office side of affairs.

With sincere regret we read in The Lute that a critic has described a singer at a fashionable concert as 'scantly clad, all except her breath, which came in thick pants.'

Music in the Foreign Press

BERLIOZ VINDICATED

In the Revue Musicale (February) Charles Kœchlin examines point by point the current denunciations of Berlioz's musicianship, and attempts to show that when they are not altogether groundless, they rest upon narrow, rule-of-thumb conceptions of what music should be.

GLUCK IN PARODIES

In the same periodical (March) Georges Cucuel describes the various parodies that have been made of Gluck's operas. The list comprises a curious burlesque of Iphigénie en Aulide, by Despréaux; Monie, produced in 1778; three of Orphée, including Paisiello's Socrate Immaginario (Naples, 1775); four of Alceste; and only one of Armide.

IN MEMORY OF ARTHUR NIKISCH

Among the many tributes to Nikisch that have recently appeared, the special number of Die Musikwelt (February) deserves mention. It contains articles by, among others, Ferdinand Pfohl, Eugen Segnitz, Gustav Brecher, Adolf Weissmann, Julius Korngold.

AN OPINION ON SRIABIN

In the January issue of the Musikblätter des Anbruch (now edited by Dr. Paul Stefan, and improved in several respects), Rudolf Réti writes:

The value of Scriabin's music is surprisingly uneven. His output comprises glowing things such as the Poème vers la Flamme, and cold, colourless drawing-room stuff. The latter, it is true, is adorned with the typical Scriabinian medley of chords, but a medley devoid of movement and contrasts. Not one of those chords emerges to assert itself, to reach a climax and thence to merge into another, so that the general impression is one of monotony and purposelessness.

PIERROT LUNAIRE

In the Courrier Musical (February) Robert Desormière writes:

Pierrot Lunaire is written in an idiom whose appearance constitutes the greatest of revolutions in musical history, an 'atonal' idiom towards which Schönberg has painstakingly worked his way, and which he has now completely mastered, expressing himself in it to the full and without a shadow of self-consciousness. During his experimental stages, his sensitiveness remained in the background, and sheer will-power predominated: in Pierrot Lunaire the new idiom is no longer an end, but a docile vehicle of expression. Pierrot Lunaire is instinct with a romanticism inherited from the 19th century Germans. Very often Schönberg harks back to the blue moonlight and spectres and other 'properties' of a bygone age. But the terseness and simplicity of his style, his sense of proportion and fitness, are so exquisite, that we sometimes fail to notice, except as an afterthought, the thinness of the substance.

In the Monde Musical (February), Charles Kœchlin writes:

The initiated have long since described Pierrot Lunaire as a work which opens unsuspected vistas, and rings the death-knell of all musical laws. Others have inveighed against Schönberg as a mere charlatan, and a musical Bolshevik. Now that we have heard the work (and it is impossible to appraise it merely by studying the score), we can say that it is surprisingly novel indeed, wonderfully bold, but remarkable for its charm, for the very logic and sweetness of the very things which from the point of view of theoretical conventions ought to be described as loose and harsh. This music is instinct with imagination, and teems with innovations in melody, rhythm, and colour. But the most remarkable points are its conciseness and the sense of fitness which it reveals. Pierrot Lunaire is a genuine artistic creation.

ON VARIOUS COMPOSERS OF TO-DAY

In the Musikblätter des Anbruch (February) Dr. Wilhelm Grosz considers the output of Aloys Hába (born 1893, at Wizowitz), and Feliz Petyrek (born 1892, at Vienna), both disciples of Franz Schreker. He praises the former's Overture, Op. 5, and his String Quartet, Op. 4. As for the Quartet in quarter-tones, he believes that it is impossible of performance with any degree of accuracy. Petyrek was at first strongly influenced by Reger, but owes many of the rhythmic peculiarities of his style to his study of Slavonic musical lore. He has been described as 'a musical acrobat, an imitator of Stravinsky, and the Edgar Poe of music.' The writer speaks well of his Grotesques for pianoforte, his Pianoforte Sextet, and a Sinfonietta.

Hugo Kauder expresses the opinion that in Schönberg's Quartet and Kammer-sinfonie the influence of the past is preponderant. In harmony Schönberg is a pioneer, but his working-out remains in strict accordance with tradition. The writer describes Bartók's second Quartet as genuine and powerful, but harsh and crude. If that work and the Violin Sonata were as inspired as they are lusty, they would be masterpieces.

A POINT OF VIOLIN TECHNIQUE

In the Zeitschrift für Musik (February 15) Prof. Robert Reitz, referring to various books on the technique of violin playing by Siegfried Eberhardt, emphasises the advantages of doing away with the practice of inserting a pad between the violin and the shoulder. If the violin be tightly held by the chin, the collar-bone, and the shoulder, the left hand will work more efficiently and the bowing will be better.

M.-D. CALVOĆRESSI.

MUSIC AND LETTERS

The April number of Mr. A. H. Fox-Strangways's distinguished quarterly, Musical and Letters (published at 22, Essex Street, W.C., 5s.) is even richer than usual in good things. Dr. Adrian C. Boulton commemorates Nikisch. There are articles on three latter-day composers. The Bishop of Ripon and Mr. Steuart Wilson discuss different points of liturgical music. Seven public schoolmasters write on 'Music in Public Schools.' Mr. J. D. M. Rorke, author of 'A Musical Pilgrim's Progress,' pleads for 'The Personal Note in Musical Criticism.' Miss Muriel Silburn remembers the short, flashing career of an infant prodigy of the past, George Aspull, of Manchester, 'the most extraordinary creature in Europe,' in Rossini's pronouncement, famous at the age of nine, dead at nineteen. It is Schumann's turn under the rubric of Song Translations, and there are fourteen translations added to the anthology which Music and Letters is offering to English singers, to persuade them to the sensible course of singing the classic German lyrics in the language of their audience.

On Nikisch, Dr. Boulton says :

'I would almost go so far as to say that there were few works that I would not have felt could have been better given by other conductors, in spite of the marvellous fascination of Nikisch's art. But whatever he touched was alive and warm, and vitality is the alpha and omega of executive music.'

He puts first Nikisch's Wagner (except perhaps Die Meistersinger), his Mozart and Haydn (often), and his Weber (always) :

'Even when we felt we must disagree, there was such poetry and beauty, not to mention technical mastery, that we were held spell-bound.'

Mr. Herbert Howells gives an attractive study of Vaughan Williams's Pastoral Symphony :

'You may not like the Symphony's frame of mind ; but there it is, strong and courageous. It is the truth of the work, and out of it would naturally arise whatever risk it has run of being publicly cold-shouldered.'

Mr. J. B. Trend puts us on still more friendly terms with the admired Spaniard, Manuel de Falla, and Déodat de Séverac's delicate art is celebrated with enthusiasm by Mr. W. W. Roberts.

The Bishop of Ripon :

'Cathedral organists surely ought to be recognised as expert authorities in their own line, and should control the musical side of the services much more fully than they do.'

Mr. Steuart Wilson :

'The surpliced choir in the chancel is the root of all the difficulties. The music is at the wrong end of the church to promote good congregational singing. The congregation must be driven to sing, in fact, not led. Again, in a village, women's voices must be used if the choir is to succeed.'

Miss Lucia Young's four Schumann translations are charming, and we venture to quote in full this recommended version of Heine for the song Op. 142, No. 2, signed F. S. :

Here, eye to eye, our falling tears
Shall mingle with one another ;
Here, heart to heart, our hopes and fears
Shall break into flame together.

The flame of hope shall dry away
The mounting tears of sorrow ;
And here to my heart I'll hold you to-day
Though I should die to-morrow.

C.

The Musician's Bookshelf

NATIONALISM IN MUSIC

M. Jean Chantavoine has in De Couperin à Debussy (Paris : Félix Alcan, 7fr. 50c.), collected eight essays, the most substantial of which is 'The General Characteristics of French Music.'

Is there a music with a peculiarly French character? That 'art knows no frontiers,' that 'music is a lingua franca, an international speech,' has been said so often that we have become unable to believe it. And the prevailing passions of the day are all for more and more frontiers. We were always conscious of the difference between French novels and our own, and of the different table manners of the Germans. But consciousness of differences has been extraordinarily sharpened everywhere of late. To be interested to-day, the world must see the national interest, and in music there is this new quivering susceptibility just as everywhere else. If European music ever has been really a lingua franca, the nations are now so busy forming each their own dialect that analogy is suggested with the degeneration of Latin in the dark ages. It was inevitable, too, for we come to the end of generalisations, but not of particularisations. Grant that Palestrina or Bach spoke a universal tongue, that tongue must take on local peculiarities in its use by generations of men for whom frontiers are more actual than day and night.

Of course nothing of the sort can be granted about Palestrina or Bach. But for those German words which are like bricks, German hymn-tunes would not be what they are, and but for German hymn-tunes Bach were not what we know him. And German feet—so different from Italian feet! Do not they have something to say in the difference between Bach's dancing rhythms and Scarlatti's?

Nevertheless the national interest is somehow harder to define in the European music of three or four hundred years than in last year's novels or even in the just allocation of war indemnities. M. Chantavoine makes a readable essay in defining what is French in music, and when we say readable we mean that his nationalism is not extravagant. (Really high-spirited nationalism is insufferable to the reader across a frontier. The stiffer the tone the more does the other fellow bristle. And Europe is far from having tired of the game, even now.) In his moderation he has not reprinted a newspaper article on Beethoven we remember (in Le Temps), which went to show that Beethoven was pretty nearly all French. It is true that he appears to allot something to France out of the 'French Suites' of Bach, without even mentioning any claim here to a share in the 'English Suites'!

M. Chantavoine's best point in defining the notion of the national character of a given music is the influence of language. Music to begin with is song and dance rhythm. The national physique and temperament (a matter of climate, these) dictate the dance forms. In early song the music is ancillary to the words.

'The first characteristic to strike us in French music is one noticed by Jean-Jacques Rousseau, I mean the weak "vocality" of the French language and a resultant inferiority for our singing music. The French language, so little accentuated, with the weak sounds of its mute e's, with the platitude of its nasal sounds, with the uniformity and lack of rhythm of its poetry, which is measured instead of being cadenced—the French language is not very apt to arouse melody or to sustain it, whereas the sonorous vowels and balanced rhythm of the Italian phrase are already an embryo or a sketch of melody in themselves.'

M. Chantavoine interestingly pursues this obviously just notion of the influence of speech and prosody on music, a suggestive notion which we should like to see applied comparatively to the whole of European music.

If the French has not the amplitude of Italian melody, neither has France vied with Germany in pure musical (wordless) development. This, according to M. Chantavoine, is due to the special origins of French music in the ballads and ditties of mediæval minstrels and troubadours—songs the verbal sense of which possibly counted three parts to one of the music. Hence the impregnation of French music with a verbal element and with an ensuing 'intellectuality.' 'In purely instrumental music the understanding loses foothold, and a Frenchman hates not being able to understand.' So that Couperin and Rameau adorn their harpsichord pieces with alluring little poetic titles, and in the 19th century Berlioz and Liszt (Liszt, from his environment, is considered French enough for the argument) create the symphonic poem.

Again a point which our author argues with elegance; but here we want to know why the lays of the minstrels so specially had this effect in France, while their German contemporaries did not succeed in doing anything to frustrate the coming of the German symphonic school.

After these admissions, courageous indeed in a nationalist age, M. Chantavoine readjusts the balance with the tale of the French musical qualities we all esteem—mobility, inventive curiosity, precision, vividness, elegance, and liveliness—with especial mention of the science of Rameau and the orchestral imagination, never enough to be admired, of Berlioz. The later essays treat of the Couperins (largely based on Bouvet), Rameau, Gluck, Berlioz, Chabrier, Massenet, and Debussy. M. Chantavoine, himself no disparager of Gluck, allows himself a touch of malice in telling of the remarkable outburst of Rameau-worship (involving the disparagement of Gluck) at Paris some twenty years ago. It was perhaps a shade more theoretical than practical, so at least those who saw the revival of Castor and Pollux of three years ago can only conclude. C.

GROVE—WITH A DIFFERENCE

The American Supplement to Grove's History of Music (Macmillan) is in two parts. We have first a section giving us a kind of history of music in America, broken up from time to time with a chronological register. This portion fills about a hundred pages. The remainder of the volume is on the lines of Grove, the bulk of the articles being devoted to musicians and musical matters in America, plus a bringing up to date of Grove references to living European musicians. (But where is Vaughan Williams?) The Supplement breaks away from the Grove tradition in one important respect. We have always regarded admission to the pages of the famous volumes as a kind of honourable cachet. To be noted in Grove, however briefly, was to have arrived. But the net has been thrown very wide in the Supplement, and the haul contains as many minnows as big fish. If you would realise how inclusive the scheme is, make a list of all the tenth-rate English composers known to you—organists who have delivered themselves of invertebrate Evening Meditations, Andantes, and cantatas, composers of songs and ballads we could very well do without, and the like. Having made the list, imagine the bulk of them in Grove—but no! it can't be done. Yet the American equivalent of such small fry have somehow got into the Supplement. This is Grove with a difference—a difference so big that it lowers the status of the book very considerably. It gives a misleading impression of musical life in America—at least we hope it is misleading, for if America regards all these nobodies as somebodies she has still a lot of leeway to make up in the musical race. This view is based on an examination of no small amount of recent American composition. The perpetrators of similar music in this country would no doubt make money—lots of it, in fact,—but they would make nothing else, and they would always be well outside our standard works of reference and musical journals. Apropos of the latter, the references to English musical journalists are curiously inadequate. This country is rich in excellent workers of the kind, but the only ones honoured by inclusion in the Supplement are Eaglefield Hull, Ernest Newman, and Percy Scholes. The omission of Edwin Evans is strange, seeing that his Musical Times articles on British composers have been liberally drawn on by the editors of the Supplement. This book will be useful, of course, especially across the water, but in manner and matter it falls so short of the real Grove that we on this side must needs have some difficulty in regarding it as The Sixth Volume of the Complete Work (vide title-page). H. G.

PLAYER-PIANO PROSODY

Mr. Sydney Grew's The Art of the Player-Piano (Kegan Paul, 12s. 6d.) is an important work if only for the fact that it is the first of its kind in the field. In comparison with it Mr. Ernest Newman's book is a mere jeu d'esprit, the leisured musings of a man-about-town—and all the more delightful for that. Mr. Grew takes things very seriously, and has certainly provided an exhaustive treatise, though I am doubtful as to the value of a good deal of it. See this (italics mine):

The intellectual effort required in chh. xxv.-xxxix. is slightly less than that required in the study of instrumentation, canon, building construction, algebra, and so on; but it requires the same qualities and similar determination.

This forbidding prospect is calculated to knock nine-tenths of player-piano humanity out of the race to start with.

The book may be roughly divided into four parts: (1) Some sound practical matter which lies well within the reach of the human playerist (as one has to call them now)—ch. i.-xiii.; (2) Some transitional matter that is on the borders of common-sense and moonshine—ch. xiv.-xvii.; (3) A full flood of the latter—ch. xviii.-xxiv.; (4) Some very irritating instances of the worst form of pedantry.

Ch. iii. gives a list of suitable works to start on. The Federation of British Music Industries will rejoice to see that it opens with Ancliffe's Night of Gladness Waltz, but will be less enthusiastic over the third item, Böhm's Attaque des Uhlans.

Ch. xiv.-xvii., which deal with 'metrical counting,' take a lot of the edge off our determination, and at the end of ch. xvi. we are a little surprised to read:

And here I imagine many of us will part company after what has probably been an acquaintance of two or more years. Player-pianism beyond the point we have now reached appertains to the finely-instructed mind; it escapes sensation and the stimulus of excitement, and so it is not for all of us. Moreover, the course of study I now outline may not in the minds of some of us seem adequately related to music, and so we shall not see the profit of following it out. Therefore we shake hands as necessary.

Alive as I am to the rapid passage of time—well, anyhow, I felt instinctively that I belonged to the 'some,' and having shaken hands somewhat hastily with the author, forgot all about him, leapt on to the box-seat, and drove my old 'bus with Chopin's Op. 10, No. 10, as never before.

Mr. Grew's plan is, he believes, original:

The non-musical material which I use for the purpose is poetry, though battles have been fought in the past on the problem of how to reconcile poetic and musical rhythms, and much futile labour gone in the task of applying prosodical terms to musical cadences. Being original, it may be that my plan will not be clearly worked out or expressed intelligibly.

The proof of the pudding is in the eating (p. 155):

The first short of the anapest may be anacrusic to the second short, if that second short is weighty enough to be spondaised with the long of the figure:

3-4	1-2	3-4	1-2	3-4	1-2
I am	out of	hu-	man-	ity's	reach	[Chorus of
II.	I.	II.	I.	II.	I.	'Hear, hear!']

This sort of thing goes gaily on for about five chapters, after which we come to a series of most lucid prosodical guides to accepted musical masterpieces. I quote the following gem from an analysis of Chopin's Prelude in D flat, Op. 28, No. 15:

The acatalectic ditrochee may be set out in the cadency of this amphibrach. . . . Thus in this one phrase we have three manifestations of the trochee, the poetic equivalent of the eight counts being a dimeter catalectic trochaic (a verse of four feet, incomplete to the degree that its final foot is empty), and the musical value being an expanding of the third foot to the full quantity of the measure (see page 255).

Occasionally the style becomes a little more complicated—as, for instance, in a description of the relation of triple to duple time:

Three counts may stand for two, in the sense that a certain couple of the three counts represents a doubling of the quantity of a certain one count of the two. This statement, read quickly, sounds like a conundrum; but it means that if two pieces of elastic substance, each an inch long, are placed end to end, and the half of one piece stretched out to the length of a full inch, and fixed in that position, the result will be as the conversion of duple-time music into triple-time (see page 245).

But, like everything else in life, the book is leavened with touches of conscious and unconscious humour. Here is an example of the former:

The shrieks in which the stressed weak counts culminate are depictions of the sounds made by Peer Gynt as he becomes more sore on the one hand (hand of course is used here as a figure of speech only) from the repeated kickings of the gnomes, and as they, on the other hand, perfect the power and direction of their kicks.

As for the latter, here is a sample from ch. xxx.:

To show the average taste of the player-pianist, I give a list of compositions made by a girl during the first two years she used the instrument. [A list of works played is then given.] . . . those marked with an asterisk being especially pleasing, and those set up in capitals the most pleasing of all.

The fact that amongst the 'most pleasing of all' is Strauss's Heldenleben (Corder's Prelude No. 2 is also included in this category) is clear proof that the girl in question looked on her instrument—largely as I do on mine—as a means of ploughing through a mass of otherwise inaccessible music, quite regardless of whether the latter is particularly suited to the player-piano. Had she any other end in view she could not possibly have included Heldenleben, which, whatever its merits as a composition, provides a revolting din on the player-piano quite in a class by itself.

Mr. Grew's book is a mass of erudition—but erudition is emphatically one of the things that should be rationed. Had the author limited himself to the erudition that was strictly to the purpose, and cut out all the pedantry, his book would have been treble its present value.

Mr. Harry Drake's booklet, The Piano-Player Explained (Musical Opinion Office, 2s.), calls for little comment and certainly no criticism. The author goes about his job in a quiet, workmanlike way which at once inspires confidence in anyone who wants to know how the wheels go round. It contains, amongst other things, a short history of the player-piano, which might very well have been treated a little more extensively. Mr. Drake's descriptions are as straightforward as Mr. Grew's are involved. The book is amply illustrated, and should prove useful to incipient tuners. R. L.

A BATCH OF BOOKLETS

The youngster of to-morrow will be encouraged to do his little bit of creative work in music, as he is to-day in letters. Why not? If we teach him that music is a kind of language, we must be consistent, and teach him to think it and speak it. Here are two little works that should be read by those who are teaching the young idea how to shoot in this particular way—First Steps in Melody-Making, by Ernest Read (Joseph Williams, 2s.), and Improvising: A simple method of teaching the subject to children of average ability, by Ethel Home (Kegan Paul, 2s.).—Organists and others who are holding congregational practices with a view to improving the standard of taste in hymnody will be helped by a fourpenny book of Hymns selected from the English Hymnal as suitable for occasional use (Humphrey Milford). There are twenty-four of them, and the tunes cover a wide range, including as they do the beautiful mediæval Rosy Sequence, Randall's 'University,' Orlando Gibbons's 'Song' (set to noble words by J. W. Chadwick), the rugged 'Martyrs,' Carey's 'Surrey,' the Coln melody, now so well-known in this country through arrangements by Frank Bridge, Holst, and others, and Vaughan Williams's 'Sine Nomine.'—Nonconformist Church Music is a re-issue of a series of addresses given by the Rev. Joseph Wood at Oxford in 1920 (The Lindsey Press, 2s. 6d.). The style of the book is refreshingly informal, and the matter thoroughly practical. The author joins hands with the reform party in the Church of England in his condemnation of the weak and shoddy. Occasionally he trips over a matter of detail, as, for instance, when he says that "Ein feste Burg" is made up of phrases from several secular sources.' It is undoubtedly a skilful piecing together of melodic fragments, but the component parts are to be found in the plain-song of the Roman Gradual, and especially in the Credo of the Missa de Angelis. The book contains some good illustrations of how not to do things. Thus, speaking of voluntaries, the author says, 'I once preached a sermon on "Peace," and the organist, a Mus. Bac. of Durham, followed with "The Lord is a Man of War," from Israel in Egypt. He was a candidate on trial. At the evening service he gave us the "Habañera" from Carmen. That decided his candidature.' As well it might.—The interest in hymns and hymn-tunes is perennial, so there should be no lack of readers for Frederick John Gillman's The Story of our Hymns, being an Historical Companion to the Fellowship Hymn Book (The Swarthmore Press; George Allen & Unwin, 2s. 6d. paper; 3s. 6d. cloth). About a hundred and fifty hymns are discussed, some old friends, and some that deserve to be. An index of authors and translators gives dates of birth and death. Lecturers and others will find this volume full of useful powder and shot.—Training in Music (Pitman, 2s. 6d.) is a collection of the musical articles in the Encyclopædia and Dictionary of Education. It was a happy thought to issue them in this way. There are twenty-one articles, and the names of the authors are a guarantee of soundness—Parry, Yorke Trotter, Martin and Geoffrey Shaw, Borland, Kidson, Dunhill, Yeomans, the late Dr. McNaught, &c. The subjects range over Musical Appreciation in Schools, Training a School Band, The Gramophone in Education, Voice Culture, The Tonic Sol-fa System, Student Songs, The Teaching of the Violin, &c. The book is of a handy pocket size, well bound and clearly printed—a remarkably well-produced and meaty little work.

H. G.

New Music

ORCHESTRAL FULL SCORES

A gratifying feature of to-day is the comparative promptness with which the full scores of important orchestral works follow their first performance. Twenty years ago the student had few opportunities of examining the orchestration of scores of contemporary composers; to-day he can obtain beautifully printed copies of pretty well every important new work. The ideal state of things will be reached when publication precedes first performance, so that reviewers and critics may be able to help the public by quoting themes and giving some information about the general character of a new work. The three scores received for review call for no more than brief notice, as the music has recently been heard in London and elsewhere. The Bach-Elgar Fugue has already taken its place as one of the most immediately popular orchestral works of recent years, and the publication of the score should be a boon to students. Those who wish to see the complete orchestral bag of tricks employed in the most telling fashion in a brief space will see it here. Moreover, the score supplies us with an exposition of the principle of transcription as opposed to mere arrangement. The recent discussion on the subject, brought about by this example, showed that a good many musicians confuse the two things. Thus we had the futile complaint that the orchestral version sounded very different from the original. Of course it did, because the material had to be translated into the terms of the new medium.

The result was that instead of being reminded of the organ we had the effect of a work composed for the modern orchestra. Had Elgar transcribed the work for string quartet it would have sounded like a piece of chamber music, and the less it recalled the organ the better the job would have been done. It is worth notice that musicians are now expressing the view that the best pianoforte transcriptions of Bach's organ works are those which give us the music in the idiom of the pianoforte instead of attempting to reproduce the purely organ effects of the original. And organists, in transcribing orchestral works, have mostly made the mistake of trying to give us as much instrumental detail as possible, instead of following the example of the best French transcribers, who aim rather at the production of an effective and practicable piece of organ music. The fact is, in music as in literature, transcription is to no small extent creative work, and a first-rate transcriber is really a composer at second hand. This digression calls for no apology; the subject is one that seems likely to be more and more in the air, and the sooner the widely varying views are laid on the table the sooner we shall arrive at some working principles. Anyway, here is the full score of the Bach-Elgar Fugue—not a miniature, by the by, but a full-sized copy, ready for the conductor's desk or the student's library.

Full-size too is the score of Bax's November Woods (Murdoch). Of the work itself there is no need to speak, save to express the opinion that another performance is long overdue. Those who wish to read a detailed review of November Woods will find one by Mr. Edwin Evans in the February issue of the Sackbut. By the way, my review copy has a blue pencil mark on the cover drawing attention to the words 'Printed in England.' We have heard so much lately about the art of music engraving being more or less a German affair, that we are glad to be able to speak in high terms of these full scores, not only in regard to engraving and printing, but in the hardly less important matters of binding and quality of paper. Nothing better could be wished for, and if superior work is done abroad it hasn't met my eyes so far.

From Durand, Paris, comes a miniature score of Ravel's La Valse, a work not for every palate, but an amazingly brilliant piece of orchestration. The size is rather larger than that of our old friends the Donajowski miniature scores, but not too big for a sensible jacket pocket. The student who has these three widely different examples of modern orchestration before him may give his text-books a rest.

H. G.

SONGS

Out of a parcel containing between thirty and forty songs a few are easily selected as being distinctly above the average. To some of these can be applied Benedetto and Croce's definition of beauty as successful expression. Prominent among them are Eric Fogg's Songs of Love and Life (Elkin). The words are from a volume of poems by Rabindranath Tagore, entitled The Gardener. The composer has assimilated the different moods of the poet, and has committed to music his own sympathetic response to them. Applied to these songs, the term 'set to music' seems a little stiff and conventional. The inornate accompaniment to Peace suits the tranquil cadences of the music and the prose poet's resonances of thought, which would be dispelled by any overloading of harmonies. The words of Free me from the bonds of your sweetness are of a more exotic character, and the composer expresses himself correspondingly with more colour and fantasy. In The dusky path of a dream the underlying motif is the tenuity of the insubstantial vision, which is well expressed in the delicate tracery of the melody and in the harmonies and arabesques of the accompaniment. Tagore's shadowy flight of fancy is finely sensed in this song. Though quite personal and original it is, together with It was in May, in direct line of succession from Debussy's Chansons de Bilitis. One morning in the garden is not equal to the others, but is a simple and direct rendering of the theme of the blind girl who offered the poet a flower chain and knew not how beautiful was her gift.

John Ireland's Album of Six Songs, The Land of Lost Content (Augener) draws on A. E. Housman's A Shropshire Lad. The Lost Lily evokes at once the English dells and hedgerows of almost any county, while the fitful rhythm of its setting recalls very especially the Westmorland poet's fluttering daffodils. The melody is joyous and lively to suit the 'spring's array' of primrose and wind-flower. The Encounter is more realistic with its march accompaniment in the bass. Syncopated harmonies are elaborated in the treble, and sustain a martial melody. The poignancy of Lad's Love and The Vain Desire is achieved by what seems simple means. But it is just this economy of treatment which is so difficult, and denotes the experienced hand.

Herbert Hughes's Parodies (Books 1 and 2): Nursery Rhymes reset for Voice and Piano-forte (Metzler) throw one's mind into the state depicted by the late Coquelin ainé in the French song he was wont to sing describing a man haunted by a tune. All his activities were set to its persistent rhythm. Finally he threw himself into the Seine, and in the act of drowning the water gurgled in and out of his mouth to the accompaniment of the same obsessing tune. In Parodies phrases from all sorts of well-known compositions are turned topsy-turvy, and are used as leitmotifs or accompaniments or melodies. A frog he would a-wooing go, so he sets off on his amorous pilgrimage to the accompaniment of an inverted and demoralised Fugue of Bach, and Old King Cole is described as 'a merry old soul' on a shatter-pated phrase from Isolda's Liebsteod which persists at intervals through the song. In Hey, diddle diddle, cat, fiddle, cow, dog, dish, and spoon execute their several antics, in moto perpetuo, to a burlesque of Weber's Il moto continuo. A bar from Beethoven, scraps of an Italian opera or German lied are fitted in here and there to these musical jig-saw puzzles, along with many another too familiar phrase which however sometimes refuses to allow itself to be 'spotted' until one's mind is in a worse state than Coquelin's drowning man, because instead of being obsessed by one tune, half-a-dozen or more are jazzing unnamed in one's brain. Three Satirical Songs (Enoch), by the same composer, are equally clever and amusing, and A Cradle Hymn (Enoch), from a poem by Isaac Watts, is a charming and soothing lullaby.

Two Songs for Children: A Mystery and From a Bedroom Window, by H. V. Jervis Read (Elkin), are certain to delight the kiddies, for whom they are intended, as well as the grown-ups who will sing them to the youngsters. Gabriel Setown's words expressing the child's wonder at the mystery of the clean, always well-washed flowers, and the longing of the invalid boy for the coming Spring and the open air are well reproduced by the composer. His sea-song or shanty of Linehouse Wharf (Elkin) is equally successful. In his Caprice (Elkin) he gives an artistic rendering of Francis Thompson's words.

Huit Chansons by E. Jaques-Dalcroze (Société Anonyme des Editions Genève) do not reveal any special distinction. They are settings of poems by Henry Spiess. There is in some of them a good deal of striving for effect, and the effects are often realised for the pleasure of those to whom they will appeal. Summer Holidays, also by Jaques-Dalcroze (Augener), is a cantata for children's voices. There are songs for all the little performers in this summer masque. The songs are tuneful, and will be easily learnt.

Cinq Poèmes de Ronsard, by C. Saint-Saëns (Durand, Paris), will not add greatly to this composer's posthumous fame. Some are facile, like Graisselette and Maigrelette and A Saint Blaise. None of them give evidence of any particular inspiration or originality.

Six songs of C. Villiers Stanford (Cramer), severally named The Monkey's Carol, Drop me a Flower, The Winds of Bethlehem, Lullaby, The Unknown Sea, and A Song of the Bow, will be acceptable to the admirers of this composer's music. They are easy both for singer and accompanist. Soliloquy, by George Oldroyd (Elkin), will meet with popularity. The reiterated arpeggios in the accompaniment are a trifle monotonous. It is published in three keys.

An Eastern Lover, by John H. Foulds (Enoch), from a text selected from The Song of Songs, is not of any marked originality but is suitable to those who like a distinct melody in voice and accompaniment.

Very melodious and facile are S. Coleridge-Taylor's The Gift Rose, She rested by the Broken Brook, and Until (Winthrop Rogers). L. L.

A PIANOFORTE AND VIOLA SONATA

Miss Rebecca Clarke's Sonata for viola (or violoncello) has already been heard in public, and on the whole the comments it excited were favourable. It is now published by Messrs. Chester, and the reading of the score justifies both the praise we gave and the misgivings we felt while the Sonata was being played. Throughout the work there appears an admirable determination to do something new and striking, to avoid all that is 'crooked and awry'—to quote from the play of the hour—and to make boldly for new paths, new ventures, and new goals. Now it would hardly be fair to suggest that Miss Clarke has achieved this giant's task. Clearly her strength is not quite equal to the intention, as she will undoubtedly perceive when her own powers of criticism and observation have ripened. At the same time, it is but too easy to do less than justice to a work of this kind. A Sonata for viola and pianoforte has its own problems, and they are problems which apparently more experienced composers than Miss Clarke have found little to their liking, for the literature of the instrument is exceedingly limited. Miss Clarke undoubtedly deserves much credit for balancing her parts well, and, more particularly, for showing the resources of her instrument in the best light. She possesses many of the qualities that qualify for composition; but she must acquire the art of skilful and drastic curtailment. Much that is good in the Sonata is less effective because it is preceded and followed by indifferent matter. This will come in time, for the Sonata is very promising in some ways. But composition, like husbandry, implies a knowledge of pruning as well as of planting, although the subject does not appear in the curricula of music schools.

B. V.

ORGAN MUSIC

Eugène Gigout's One Hundred Short Pieces for Organ or Harmonium (Chester) are on the lines in which this admirable composer has long since worked with success. In some respects they are more useful than his previous sets of short pieces. For one thing they are longer as a whole, and there is a larger proportion of movements suitable for in- and out-voluntaries as well as for interlude purposes. Another good point is the addition of an optional pedal part in many of the pieces. The degree of difficulty is perhaps a trifle higher, but as the difficulties are purely manual, instead of being concerned with pedals or with independence of hands and feet—the knottiest point of all—any pianist or organist with a fair technique in polyphonic playing will find little that will give him trouble. As in his former albums of this kind, Gigout writes about half the pieces in the ecclesiastical modes. Players and composers who wish for guidance in the free handling of ancient tonality will learn much from Gigout's delightful examples. The collection is published in the handy form of three books, each containing about thirty pieces.

Alan Gray's Twelve Short Preludes, in one book (Augener), are also for the benefit of players who cannot improvise or who wish to avoid the necessity. There is an obligatory pedal part, though only two staves are employed. These well-written pieces are as English as Gigout's are French. As they occupy on an average from two to two and a half minutes in performance, they will serve well for in- and out-voluntaries.

Further admirable specimens of this useful kind of work are C. H. Kitson's Three Voluntaries (Augener).

No doubt many of us have tried our hand at playing Ravel's Pavane pour une Infante Défunte on the organ from the pianoforte score, feeling that there was much in the grave beauty of the music that would be well brought out by our instrument. A real organ transcription is at last available, made by A. Seutin (Demets, Paris). Although there are some excellent points in this version, the composer has retained some purely pianistic features that will not 'come off' on the organ, e.g., the demisemiquaver rapide whips-up, which can be made delicate on the pianoforte, but which on the organ must be of the same power as the sustained part played with them. Mr. Seutin might with advantage have given us fewer notes here and there, seeing that we have 4-ft. and 16-ft. stops for duplicating purposes. Some of the wide stretches, too, are easy on the pianoforte, where they may be spread and the sustaining pedal used, whereas on the organ they must be taken cleanly and held. Organists will find this arrangement useful as a version which they can easily modify and make workable. No doubt they will decide, too, that the directions for ff are ill-advised, especially the example at the end, following pp. The fortissimo of a big modern organ is bound to be noisy, whereas that of a pianoforte and even of an orchestra is not necessarily so. Faulty as this transcription is, we are glad to have it. By its aid the Pavane can be made into a very impressive organ solo.

The ground-bass is a form that has long been associated with the organ, and no instrument is so well able to give it due effect, so there is room for Reginald Goss-Custard's transcription of Dohnányi's March on a Ground-Bass (Lengnick). This effective treatment of the first four notes of the descending scale was written for pianoforte, but gains in every way from its transference to the organ. It is only moderately difficult, but care and taste are needed in the matter of registration in order that the steady persistence of the ostinato be not broken. This March should be a popular recital piece, its skill and musicianship pleasing the player, and its picturesque character appealing to the average hearer.

Two numbers of Paxton's Organ Library show a very wide difference in quality. J. Sturges Archer's Five Short Variations on a Scots Air are not only well written but poetic. Mr. Archer has a neat hand for this kind of work. The air is that beautiful specimen 'Gala Water,' and it should make many new friends through these charming Variations. The other piece is J. A. Meale's Fountain Melody, the commonplace character of which is not disguised by such directions as 'with grandeur,' 'intensify,' 'somewhat languid,' and a glowing descriptive paragraph at the beginning. If such labels could be heard they might help things along, but as they are only seen . . .

H. G.

BACH ARIAS

A second set of solos from the sacred cantatas of Bach has just been issued by Novello. The album for soprano contains four songs: the tenderly-simple 'Open wide, my heart' (Come, Redeemer), 'Father, what I proffer' (Give the hungry man thy bread), 'I have waited for the Lord' (How brightly shines), and 'Come, visit, ye glowing, ye God-given ardours,' a splendid, swinging air from If thou but sufferest. Of the four contralto numbers, the palm is divided between the long and flowing 'The Lord hath heard' (Lord, rebuke me not) and the poignant 'Jesus sleeps,' from the cantata of the same name. The four tenor airs are all of the florid type, but they are florid in widely different ways. The example from Come, Redeemer, flows along in pastoral measure; 'What voice is in the tempest' is a trying test in rhythm and intonation; 'Tuneful harps and voices' and 'Thou art my God' have the jubilant swing of a Handel song. The bass set contains the recitative, 'Ah, when on that great day,' from Watch ye, pray ye, leading into the noble air, 'Blessed Resurrection Day,' with its interrupting presto section, 'Clash now, crash now, Judgment Day.' The harmonization of the well-known Luther's hymn in the accompaniment to the recitative is worth studying. A dramatic bass with a big voice will find splendid scope in this number. Of the remaining three songs, 'With Jesus will I go' (Wailing, crying) is perhaps the finest. These handy albums are important additions to the vocal repertory. For both singer and accompanist the task set is never light, and is often heavy; but long and hard as they may work they are not likely to exhaust the beauty and interest of the music.

H. G.

SOME ELEMENTARY PIANOFORTE MUSIC

A batch of pianoforte albums and pieces, ranging from very easy to moderately difficult, and providing an attractive and varied selection for young pianists, can be dealt with only briefly. Particularly useful for developing lightness of touch are Felix Swinstead's Five Caprices (Bosworth). Although not difficult, these admirably-written little pieces require neat handling. From the same publishers are two pleasantly-written albums for quite elementary players—Herbert Fryer's Tunes for Totola (seven in number), and Una Bourne's Days of Old (three short dances); and for more advanced players, A Little English Suite, well-written and straightforward in style, by Felix Corbett.

Edith Alford's Five Sketches from Grimm's Fairy-Tales (Elkin) provide useful practice, and are calculated to stimulate the youthful imagination. Little Prelude, four expressive movements—by H. V. Jer. Re. d., and H. Scott-Baker's lively Dance of the Dominoes, issue from the same firm.

Three Western Dances by Gustave Lind (Augener) are characteristic examples of this popular composer's work, and are published in separate numbers in both solo and duet form. For beginners Geoffrey Shaw has provided A Medley (Winthrop Rogers)—eight tuneful pieces in the five-finger position.

In First Adventures on the Keyboard (J. H. Larway, two books) Ernest Austin, who has written much charming music for young players, has endeavoured, he tells us, to make the beginner's pianoforte lessons 'easy and jolly.' Book 1 is a course of easy lessons, carefully graduated, in which duet-playing with the teacher forms a big part. Book 2 is a series of supplementary solo pieces with the compass of five notes for each hand, in easy keys. These make a really capital selection of pieces, and may be recommended for use in conjunction with any other 'First Course.'

Elementary players will find useful recreation in Ernest Newton's Romany Life (Novello), a suite of four short pieces. More difficult, and requiring a full-sized hand, are a Minuet, a Little Waltz, and a Rondo, under one cover, by Gustave Robert (Goodwin & Tabb).

Twelve Studies in Style and Expression, by B. Burrows (Augener) are gracefully written, and will afford pleasure as well as profit to the young pianist. They are moderately easy. H. Baynton-Power has provided light recreative fare in The Enchanted Garden (J. H. Larway)—six melodiously-written Impressions of only moderate difficulty.

Finally, from Anton Benjamin (Hamburg) come a set of seven books of graded studies, and six Sonatina Albums edited by Edmund Parlow. Interspersed with the sonatina movements are pieces by modern composers—Tchaikovsky, Raff, Jensen, &c. Both sets are for elementary and middle stages.

G. G.

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

With a month's arrears to overtake and an editorial threat as to space, this batch of records—all H.M.V.—must be run over briefly. Pride of place among the vocal examples must go to a couple of Chaliapin's—Moussorgsky's fine song, The Prophet, and Schumann's The Two Grenadiers (12-in.). The latter has the great pull in being familiar, otherwise I fancy most of us would decide that The Prophet was the better song. The Schumann record is perhaps an improvement on the platform performance. During his recent visit Chaliapin was a bit inclined to play to the gallery in the last verse, acting rather than singing. There is no call for acting before the recorder, so he seems to have been content to sing—with the best results.

A 12-in. d.-s. record gives us Peter Dawson in everybody's old friend 'Non più andrai' and 'Credo' from Verdi's Otello. Both are sung in English. This ought to be another way of indicating that you will hear what Mr. Dawson is singing about, but I am sorry to have to say that you will do so only in snatches. Evidently there is a special technique required in articulation for gramophone purposes, and very few singers have acquired it so far. This same excellent singer is heard also on a 10-in. d.-s. in a couple of new songs, The Smuggler's Song, by Kernochan, and The Pauper's Drive, by Homer—not he who 'smote his bloomin' lyre,' but an American descendant. In both these songs the words are far clearer, so we have another example of the capricious results I have frequently mentioned. Why should there be so much difference, or, indeed, any difference at all?

Of the other vocal records Santa Lucia luntana by Mario is a poorish song well sung by Beniamino Gigli (10-in.); Rosina Buckman is heard to advantage in Mendelssohn's On wings of Song and 'Thou art flown' (Tales of Hoffmann) (12-in.); Emmy Destinn rather less so in 'Morrò, ma prima in grazia,' from Un Ballo in Maschera (12-in.); that amazing veteran Battistini sings Carissimi's Vittoria! Vittoria! (10-in.)—with rather too violently contrasted tempi, I venture to say; and Edna Thornton gives us the music but not many of the words of Barbara Allen and Sachan's One perfect night (10-in. d.-s.).

Among the chamber music records my choice is a 12-in. d.-s. of the Catterall Quartet in the Allegro of Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 76, No. 1), and the Agitato of Brahms in B flat (Op. 67). Both are unusually clear, the jolly Haydn being especially telling. The same players are heard in the Andante from Schumann's Quartet in F (Op. 41, No. 2), and the Scherzo of Tchaikovsky's (Op. 22) (12-in. d.-s.). This record is hardly so good, some of the soft passages being a trifle too much so. Some happy day the gramophone will be induced to shed the last vestage of surface noises, and then chamber music players may go to work as delicately as they like without loss.

A good 12-in. record is that of the Flonzaley party in the Allegro moderato à la Polka from Smetana's E minor Quartet.

Heifetz is recorded with the usual success in Sarasate's Zigeunerweisen (12-in.), and Mischa Elman plays Mendelssohn's Song without Words in E (No. 36 in the complete set). On the label it is called Cradle Song, but it hardly suggests a lullaby. It makes a good violin solo, though as recorded here the pianoforte accompaniment is so faint at times that we don't get the harmonic basis as clearly as we should like.

The most satisfying pianoforte record is Lamond's in Liszt's Ronde des Lutins and the second movement of Beethoven's Sonata in F, Op. 10, No. 2 (10-in. d.s.). The 10-in. d.s. of Cortot—a couple of Chopin Études (Op. 10, No. 5 and Op. 25, No. 9)—suffers from some faint patches, at all events on my engine. A showy affair is Mark Hambourg's performance of d'Albert's version of Bach's Organ Prelude and Fugue in D major. To those who have not been brought up on the original form of this brilliant work I suppose the result is fine—it must be, judging from its popularity. But organists will miss all sorts of effects that only their instrument can give—the sustained bass, the suspensions, and especially the polyphony of the dramatic minor passage at the end of the Prelude. All the feeling and nobility goes with the sostenuto. The Fugue is played at a tremendous rate—too much so for clearness, in places—and the emphatic pulling-up at the cadences is opposed to the spirit of a piece that is nothing if not a moto perpetuo. The Alla Breve section of the Prelude, however, is made interesting by the good round pace. On the organ it is usually played so slowly that we cannot help being made aware of the poverty of a good deal of its material. But I should like to take Hambourg and all the other players of this pianoforte version of the work and make them hear it played by one of our best organists. They would either want to study the organ (as Liszt wanted to after hearing Best play) or they would decide to keep their hands off Bach's organ music and give the '48' and the clavier works a show instead. The Samuel recitals have shown that there is a big public ready for the latter.

London Concerts

ORIANA MADRIGAL SOCIETY

This versatile choir sang even better than usual on March 7. What is the supreme test of a choir? The ability to sing superlatively well one work diligently prepared for competitive purposes, or the showing of its mettle in music of diverse styles? The question (which surely answers itself) is called forth by Mr. Ernest Newman's Sunday Times comment on the fact that he had, a few days before, heard a working-class choir at a competition in Scotland sing Morley's Arise, Awake better than the Oriana Society sang it on this occasion. That may be so, but a comparison of the kind has little value, because with the competitive choir the Madrigal had been a kind of obsession for months; it was sung to Mr. Newman after unlimited rehearsal, and aided by the stimulus of the arena. With the London singers Arise, Awake was merely one item in an exacting programme the whole of which was sung from memory after—how many rehearsals? Seven! Is it daring to suggest that the Oriana might have reached the working-class choir standard in the Morley had the singers really set themselves to that task and let the rest go? Let us be glad they did nothing of the sort. The three Oriana concerts per season are among the choicest of London's music-makings, and we wouldn't lose one of them for the sake of that little bit of super-choralism which seems to be obtainable only north of the Trent, and then only in single works at competitions or similar special occasions. However . . .

An audience so crowded that the late-arriving members thereof had to sit on the floor had a feast of old and new in Madrigals by Morley, John Ward (the splendid Hope of my Heart), Pilkington, rounds by Byrd and the inexhaustible Anon., chansons by Jannequin, sung in French (the delightful Ce mois de may, and La Bataille de Marignan, a famous old piece of programme music of small musical value, but of great historic interest and fiendishly difficult), part-songs by Parry and Stanford, settings of North Country Folk-songs by W. G. Whittaker, and Bax's Carol for small choir, harp, 'cello, and double-bass, Of a Rose I sing a Song—this last-named heard for the first time and so much enjoyed that its second performance followed immediately. Midway through these good things a party of members of the English Folk-Dance Society gave a half-dozen of old dances with great success. It is good news that Mr. Kennedy Scott and his singers, finding Æolian Hall too small to house their audiences, are repeating this concert elsewhere—at the Guildhouse, Eccleston Square (March 14), Sevenoaks (March 25), and at King Edward Hall, Finchley, on April 4. H. G.

THE NEWCASTLE BACH CHOIR: LONDON FESTIVAL

Here is another choir whose excellence lies rather in the quantity and quality of the things it sings than in the way it sings them. It would be easy to name a good many choral bodies (even in the despised and voiceless South) who on purely technical grounds could give our Newcastle friends a start and a beating. But it would be hard to find three to approach them in enterprise and enthusiasm. Their chorism is far more than a recreation; it is a high adventure, a crusade. The choir is a babe in years (b. 1915), but it is a veteran in repertory, as this tale shows: both the Bach Passions, the Christmas Oratorio, all the Motets, forty Cantatas, a number of instrumental works, Byrd's five-part Mass, Holst's Hymn of Jesus, and works by Vaughan Williams, Bantock, Walford Davies, Bax, Dale, Goossens, Delius, Balfour Gardiner, Howells, Boughton, and Bainton. Its visit to London was a great success, large audiences attending the two concerts at Æolian Hall (February 22 and 23) and St. Michael's, Cornhill (February 24). We heard some Cantatas that have almost certainly not been heard in London before—There arose a great strife; O God, how many pains of heart; Comfort sweet; and O fire everlasting—besides Motets, songs, and instrumental items. The soloists were Misses Dorothy Silk and Margaret Champneys, and Messrs. Steuart Wilson and Clive Carey, with Mr. Harold Darke in charge of the continuo and Mr. Gerald Cooper at the harpsichord. Mrs. Gordon Woodhouse delighted us with harpsichord solos—Partita in G, &c. Dr. W. G. Whittaker conducted. He and his singers are to be thanked for many things, but perhaps the most valuable result of their efforts is the proof that these works of Bach, hitherto regarded as forbiddingly difficult and unvocal, are well within the powers of a choir of moderate size and average material. (There is a compliment rather than a slight in those last two words.) On the question of the rightness of performing Bach's choral works with a small choir in preference to a large one there is a good deal more to be said than purists appear to realise. Take one point only: Bach used a small force not from choice, but necessity. Had the result of his limitations been music suited only for a small choir there would have been one Bach problem the less. But we are hit in the face by the fact that most of his choral music is of a character that can not only carry a large body of tone; it even demands such resources. Nobody suggests that the B minor Mass should be sung by a small choir, yet it is certain that Bach never heard any of it sung by a large one. Are we therefore to attempt it with a handful of picked singers? Although much of the music of the Cantatas is of an intimate character, many of their choruses are on too big a scale for a small choir—e.g., the tremendous opening number of Ein feste Burg. But the most convincing argument is to be found in the Motets. What sized choir sang them under Bach? Just a little group of boys and men. Should we care to hear (say) Sing ye to the Lord performed by a choir of thirty? A few exceptional singers to a part might get through it flawlessly, but only a big choir can give us all there is in the music, and (what is even more important) do it without the sense of effort that is always present in a performance by a choir of less than a hundred and fifty to two hundred voices. Now that Bach's smaller choral works are coming into their own, there are a good many questions calling for early discussion. Meanwhile our hats are off to Dr. Whittaker and his fellow enthusiasts. H. G.

THE HYMN OF JESUS AT THE ALBERT HALL

When first it was reported that the Royal Choral Society had decided to perform The Hymn of Jesus there were many who inclined to doubt the authenticity of the information. It was said, on the one hand, that the Royal Choral Society had never shown much partiality for modern music, and that the rather complex texture of Mr. Holst's Hymn would act as a deterrent. On the other hand, the most desirable things are those which, as a rule, do not happen, and it was desirable in every way that The Hymn of Jesus should be tried in the Albert Hall by a choral organization not inferior in numbers to the Royal Society's chorus. The composer has obviously thought of the innumerable legions of heaven rather than of sopranos and altos, tenors and basses of an earthly choir when he was writing his monumental work, and if the Albert Hall is not exactly the musician's idea of heaven, it is spacious and it lends itself to all kind of effects of distance, including those which occur in the Hymn of Mr. Holst. On the whole, our expectations were not disappointed. Sir Hugh Allen, who conducted the Hymn, secured some fine effects of sonority and majesty. There was also unusual clearness in the choral singing, and conductor and choir well deserved the congratulations of the numerous audience. The only fly in the ointment was represented by the orchestra, which was, or seemed, numerically not quite adequate. The majestic figure in the bass which follows upon the choral outburst, Glory to Thee, Father, was dwarfed by the very fulness and gorgeous sonority of the choral tone. But of course this was inevitable in the circumstances, and the experience was, otherwise, memorable. In the first place, it showed in a new light certain sections of one of the most remarkable works of recent years. In the second, it proved beyond doubt that the Royal Choral Society is quite capable of appreciating and performing in a most satisfactory manner a work both modern and certainly not easy. The remainder of the programme was overburdened with solos of mediocre interest. An excellent performance was given (under the conductorship of the composer) of Sir Frederick Bridge's The Forging of the Anchor—a good work, but typical of a fashion that is no longer ours. Brahms's Song of Destiny was also sung at the beginning of the concert, with, however, less general finish and less spirit. B. V.

MR. FRANK BRIDGE AND THE PHILHARMONIC

The Royal Philharmonic Society had promised nothing out of the way for February 23, and during the day or two before the concert there had been argument among the gods whether even so ordinary a promise should be allowed fulfilment. Some ungracious god, enemy to Apollo, smote with sickness first one conductor, Sir Landon Ronald, then another, Mr. Eugène Goossens. Apollo won, however, having in reserve a faithful servant, Mr. Frank Bridge, one who, for all his long faithfulness, had not been rewarded with full generosity by the Olympian powers. Still he sallied forth, saved the precarious situation, and after this will surely come into richer honours. For though there cannot have been much rehearsing even for Strauss's Don Juan, the C minor Fugue of Bach-cum-Elgar, and the Concerto (Lalo-cum-Thibaud), and probably still less for Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the concert was not to be denied real brilliance, and the reflection was made that once in a while a precarious situation is not so very unwelcome. No one of the Philharmonic musicians, for all their experience, could dare to be anything but alert in these circumstances—even in 'the C minor' they had to 'look out.' Danger was where danger had never been before. A slip or two was actually made, and it was very exhilarating. It was a night that Mr. Frank Bridge will remember; one also for which he deserves to be held in remembrance. The touching Shropshire Lad Rhapsody of George Butterworth was the purely native piece on the programme. C.

SIR HENRY WOOD'S CONCERTS

Sir Henry Wood's symphony concert at Queen's Hall, on March 11, began with a Suite of three Fantastic Dances, by the Spaniard Joaquín Turina—a name not unknown already either here or in the smaller concert rooms. These dances beguiled us in moderation with their hints of swaying bodies and of clear and coloured southern nights. This 'moderation' is perhaps less a reproach to Turina's pleasant art than to ourselves, but somehow it is not easy to be lightly beguiled at a Saturday afternoon symphony concert in London. If our heads are to be turned the brew must be strong. The proud art of M. Thibaud took up with the Concerto in B minor of Saint-Saëns. It is interesting to have been presented to royalty, even though royalty said nothing to you of much note. The Symphony that afternoon was Beethoven's Second. At the previous concert (February 25) it had been Schubert's in B minor, and M. Moiseiwitsch played Tchaikovsky—nimblest of jockeys on a Derby winner (the B flat minor Concerto). C.

A SET-BACK IN THE MILE END ROAD

The best that can be said about it is that it did not come a week before, so that at least a sadly and singularly beautiful performance of the London Symphony of Ralph Vaughan Williams was saved from the wreck. The premature end of the symphony concerts of the British Symphony Orchestra under Dr. Adrian C. Boult at the People's Palace, Mile End, occurred on March 5. They were the best Sunday concerts in London, but the hall could be only one-third filled, so the deficit was crushing. The programmes were of purely orchestral music—not an irresistible lure for people of the locality, who possibly might have been more engaged with a little of the personal and dramatic interest of solo singing and concerto playing; while people of other localities did not appreciate exactly where Mile End is, or how easy of access. The set-back is sad, but it may be made good next autumn. Meanwhile there is the best performance yet heard of Vaughan Williams's Symphony to the credit of orchestra and conductor. Or at any rate the fresh winds and tides of the music seemed this time to sing a more direct appeal. We were helped to hear the composer's recent Pastoral Symphony by this forerunner, and now the forerunner gives up more secrets in the new work's light. Rare music!

C.

THE BIRMINGHAM QUARTET

The Birmingham Quartet, which has been winning high praise on its recent tour, gave a concert at a private house on March 18. The combination represents Mr. Percival Hodgson (first violin), Mr. Frank Venton (second violin), Miss Grace Burrows (viola), and Miss Joan Willis (violincello). The balance is very satisfactory, and the players have achieved a good deal of unanimity. They first played Mozart's Quartet in G, K. 387 and it was at once evident that they are very careful as to detail, and that their phrasing is musical. Their danger is over-attention to minutiae, which obscures the general outline. They are almost too much afraid of exaggeration, and are apt to fall into the opposite fault—lack of robustness; but their chief merit is that they resist the temptation of getting scratchy in strenuous passages. Some want of vigour was perhaps more noticeable in the Variations from Haydn's Emperor Concerto, which were if anything too elegantly played, and had not quite the breadth which can be given to them. Luckily we can now enjoy the beauty of the melody without thinking of the sinister associations which gathered round it. The performance of Ravel's Quartet was imaginative and flexible, and Mr. Hodgson and Miss Willis played solos.

A. K.

THE LENER QUARTET

The Lener Quartet from Budapest came to London heralded by not a few nor over-temperate 'advance notices.' But, on the whole, its performance on March 15 did not disappoint the expectations of the wise. The Quartet consists of Messrs. Jeňo Lener (leader), Joseph Smilovits (second violin), Sandor Roth (viola), and Jmre Hartman ('cello), who form a group of well-balanced and exceedingly well-drilled players. Common aims and sympathies give to their performances a unanimity of colour and expression which are, of course, most valuable. If the leader tends at times to assert his authority he evidently does so with the full consent of his colleagues. Balance and quality of tone are for them of supreme importance. Even the passionate eloquence of Brahms cannot induce them to overstep the self-imposed limits. When they have agreed to a climax their tone will be robust and sonorous. But they do not allow tone to wait on sentiment, but rather feeling on tone. Thus the impression the listener derives is one of extraordinary smoothness and finish, qualities which added much to the charm of Ravel's Quartet in F, although they made Brahms's Quartet in A minor perhaps more severely beautiful and less human than it is wont to be. Haydn's Quartet in D major suited to perfection the reticence of the leader, who in Haydn got more of the lion's share of honour and responsibility than his devoted partners.

B. V.

MISS DOROTHY SILK'S 'ANCIENT' CONCERTS

Miss Dorothy Silk gave at Steinway Hall the last of her 'Concerts of Old Music,' with the collaboration of a number of excellent musicians, including the Pennington String Quartet, Dr. Harold Darke, Miss Norah Dawney, and a contingent of the Newcastle Bach Choir under Dr. Whittaker. It was the occasion of congratulations to the delightful singer who so happily cultivates the field of 17th century and early 18th century music, for her out-of-the-way concerts have not meant a pecuniary loss. She had a well-filled hall, and the series is likely to be continued. To hear Miss Silk sing the Evening Hymn of Purcell on this afternoon was to drop the carping habit of analysis in the feeling that the sweet music had quite simply found its natural outlet in this singer's accents. There were also some numbers of Bach from the Schemelli Hymn Book as touchingly sung, and the Church cantata, No. 115, came at the end.

C.

CHALIAPIN

Bowled over by a cold immediately on his arrival here from America, Chaliapin had to postpone his recital from the date fixed (February 16) to February 24. A crowded Albert Hall greeted him. He had not fully recovered, and his three groups of songs, without the glamour of that wonderful voice to transfigure them, seemed in most cases poor stuff. Miss Isolde Menges and Mr. H. L. Balfour played violin and organ solos. On the following Monday—February 27—Chaliapin gave an extra recital at Queen's Hall, where a big audience heard him to far greater advantage. He brought down the house with his final group—'comique songs,' he called them—that included the Moussorgsky Flea, and one or two songs in which the joke was concerned with mild inebriation. Here he carried realism, especially in the matter of gesture, a trifle beyond the limits generally allowed to the concert singer,—for example, in the Moussorgsky song, the little wriggle of the shoulders at 'To scratch they were forbidden' (we could see the bitten courtiers longing for a convenient post) and the fruity voice and hint of a stagger in 'One night the old miller came home drunk.' Acting rather than singing, this; but so far from complaining, the audience was insatiable, and gave up asking for more only when Chaliapin, after a lot of recalls, stood pointing pathetically to his Adam's apple.

H. G.

(Continued on page 260.)

I weigh not Fortune's frown

MADRIGAL FOR FIVE VOICES

BY

ORLANDO GIBBONS

Transcribed by H. ELLIOT BUTTON

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED; NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

1st SOPRANO. $\text{♩} = \text{about } 116.$ mf

I weigh not, I weigh not For - - tune's frown'..

2nd SOPRANO.

ALTO. mf

I . . . weigh . . . not . . . For-tune's frown

TENOR. mf

I . . . weigh not For tune's

BASS.

PIANO (For practice only) $\text{♩} = \text{about } 116.$ mf

nor smile, nor smile, I weigh

I . . . weigh . . . not For - tune's frown nor nor smile, not For - - tune's frown nor smile, I weigh frown nor smile, not Fortune's frown nor smile, I

I weigh not For - - - tune's frown not For - - tune's frown nor smile, I weigh not For - - tune's frown nor

. . . not For - - tune's frown nor smile, I weigh not For - tune's frown, I . .

. . . weigh not For - tune's frown, not For - tune's frown nor nor smile, frown nor smile, I

The first system of the musical score consists of six staves. The first five staves are vocal parts (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass, and a fifth voice part), and the sixth staff is the piano accompaniment. The lyrics are written below the vocal staves, with hyphens indicating syllables spanning across notes. The key signature is one sharp (F#), and the time signature is common time (C).

smile, I joy not much in . . earth - ly joys, smile, I

. . weigh not For - tune's frown nor smile, I joy not much in earth - ly joys, . .

smile, I joy not much in earth - ly joys, earth .

joy not much in earth - - ly joys, I joy . . not

The second system of the musical score continues the vocal and piano parts. It consists of six staves. The lyrics continue below the vocal staves. The musical notation includes various note values, rests, and dynamic markings. The piano accompaniment features a steady rhythmic pattern in the left hand and more melodic lines in the right hand.

cres.
I joy not much in earth - ly joys, in earth - ly cres.
joy not much in earth - ly joys, . . . in earth - ly
cres.
. . . not much in earth - ly joys, I joy not much, not cres.
- ly joys, . . . I joy not much, not much in earth - much in earth - ly joys, joys, I joy not much in earth - ly joys, . . . in joys, I joy not much in earth - ly joys, . .

much in earth - ly joys, I joy not
- ly joys, I joy not much in earth - ly mf cres.
I joy not much in earth - ly joys, . . . in earth - ly joys, I seek not state, I reake not style, I

 . . . in - earth - ly joys, I seek not much, not much in . . . earth - ly joys, I seek . . . not state, . . .
 joys, I seek not state, I reake not style, I seek not earth - ly joys, seek not state, I reake not style, I seek not state, I reake not style, not state, I reake not style, not state, I reake not style, I seek

 . . . I reake . . . not style, I . . . reake not style, I . . . seek not state, I reake not style, not style, I seek not state, I reake not I seek not state, I reake not style, I style, I am not fond of Fan-cy's toys, I . . not state, I reake not style, I am not fond of state, I reake not style, I am not fond of Fan-cy's toys, I style, I am not fond of Fan - - cy's seek not state, I reake not style, I am not

. . . am . . not fond . . of Fan-cy's toys, Fan-cy's toys, I am not fond . . . of Fan-cy's toys, of . . .
 am not fond of Fan-cy's toys, I . . . am not fond of Fan-cy's toys, of Fan-cy's toys, I am not fond . . . of Fan-cy's fond of Fan-cy's toys, I am not fond of Fan-cy's toys, not

p
I rest so pleased . . with what . . . I have,
p
Fan - cy's toys, I rest so pleased with what I have,
p toys, I rest so pleased with what . . I have,
p toys, Fan - cy's toys, I rest so . . pleased with what . . I have,
p fond of Fan - cy's toys, I rest so pleased with what I have,

The first system of the musical score for 'I Weigh Not Fortune's Frown'. It consists of five vocal staves and a piano accompaniment. The vocal parts are in treble clef with a key signature of one sharp (F#). The piano part is in bass clef with the same key signature. The lyrics are written below the vocal staves. The first vocal staff begins with a piano (p) dynamic marking. The piano accompaniment also begins with a piano (p) dynamic marking. The system concludes with a repeat sign.

mf
I wish no more, no more . . I crave, I wish no more,
mf
I wish no more, no more . . I crave, I wish no more,
mf
I wish no more, no more . . I crave, I wish no . .
mf
I wish no more, no more . . I . . crave, . . . I wish no
mf
I wish no more,

The second system of the musical score. It continues the vocal and piano parts from the first system. The vocal parts are in treble clef, and the piano part is in bass clef. The lyrics are written below the vocal staves. The system begins with a mezzo-forte (mf) dynamic marking. The piano accompaniment also begins with a mezzo-forte (mf) dynamic marking. The system concludes with a repeat sign.

[illegible] more, no more I crave, I wish no more, no more . . . I crave.

I wish no more, no more . . . I crave, no . . . more I crave.

I wish no more, I wish no more, no more I crave.

more I crave, I . . . wish no more, no more . . . I crave.

. . . no more I crave, I wish no more, no more . . . I crave.

(Continued from page 252.)

MADAME NIKITINA

No singer who has appeared in London during the past few weeks has made a deeper appeal than Madame Nikitina, who sang at Steinway Hall on March 2. The statement is made in the full knowledge that Chaliapin, Gerhardt, and John Coates are in the count. Unfortunately Madame Nikitina is not well known, and only a few were present to appreciate her qualities. By subtle ways—and the extreme skill which is concealed in them—she gives her interpretations an imaginative beauty that is rarely attained by the singers we are accustomed to hear nowadays. Her programme on this occasion included songs by Bantock, Borodin, Stravinsky (Printemps au Monastère), Debussy (La Chevelure—wonderfully sung), Strauss, Sibelius, Schubert, and Moussorgsky. M.

COATES AND PARKER

The evening of the royal wedding offered a solitary musical side-show. This, happily enough, was Mr. Coates in Shakespearean song at Chelsea. Here was yet another experiment in 'juxtaposition'—old and new settings of the same lyric. The hall was not very full. At the next concert, on March 14, the audience encroached on the platform, having come to hear Mr. Coates sing of love as interpreted by British composers. In the same paragraph with Mr. Coates it is proper to put Mr. George Parker, who sang nothing but home-grown songs at Æolian Hall on February 24. There is no need always to write at length about such concerts as these, which we enjoy like an occasional breath of fresh air. M.

MISCHA ELMAN

The second concert of Mischa Elman was awaited with no less interest than the first, for the programme included the Mendelssohn Concerto—one of Mr. Elman's most popular successes in pre-war days. His recent performance was neither more nor less remarkable than were his performances of ten years ago. His tone is perhaps a little more urgent, and his grip of the music possibly stronger. On the whole, his reading was essentially what it used to be—admirably clear, warm, and full of energy. The general impression of the concert confirmed the opinion formed a few days before, namely, that if technically Elman has nothing to learn from the interpretative point of view, he appears to be somewhat immature, and rather inclined to place flawless execution before a faithful interpretation of the composer's individuality. The Handel Sonata, for instance, with which the concert began, was a capital exhibition of good violin playing, but it was not Handel. There are certain features of Handel's music which cannot be ignored without altering substantially the very character of his music. The judicious addition of a little brandy may add to the merits of a plum-pudding, but a work of art is not a kitchen confection which can be seasoned 'to taste.' If you find Handel 'stodgy,' then it is best to leave Handel alone. Bach's Chaconne, on the other hand, showed to perfection the player's complete mastery of solid violin technique and unexceptionable taste. B. V.

LOUIS GODOWSKI

It were easy to do Mr. Godowski a serious injustice either by praising too highly his facile talent for violin playing or by placing too much stress on the present lack of any intellectual quality in his readings. The truth is that he has reached the 'awkward age' of players. His hand can do more than his intelligence can control; especially the left hand, whose task is of a more material kind and can be trusted to do almost any trick and do it well. His bowing is in a less advanced stage, for the obvious reason that the bow produces tone, and tone is to the fiddler what style is to the writer—the quintessence of personality. It may all come in time, and it probably will, but at present Mr. Godowski seems fascinated by the lure of a big tone—as are most young violinists at some time or other of their career. This gives to his performances an inevitable monotony relieved, however, by the ease and brilliance of the left-hand work. The programme told us that the recital was 'previous to a Continental tour.' The decision to send this promising player on a Continental tour at his present stage of development is surely unwise. In all probability, a year or two hence he will have improved beyond recognition. His best effort at Steinway Hall was in Lalo's Spanish Suite. B. V.

MR. HOWARD-JONES'S RECITALS

Mr. Howard-Jones, at three pianoforte recitals at Wigmore Hall, played first some Bach and Brahms, then four Sonatas of Beethoven, including Op. 109, and lastly John Ireland's Sonata, along with some Chopin and Ravel. If 'eurhythm' be the flashing response of almost unerring action to flashing thought, then we saw in many of these performances eurhythm in all its beauty. Images of fitness, cleanness, eagerness, and expertness crossed the mind. The Sonata of Mr. Ireland, it was made clear, had not previously been dealt its due. This time we saw the silver lining of some of its clouds. C.

WILLIAM MURDOCH

Apart from a not unusual classical programme—does not the Chopin Sonata hold the record for yearly number of performances?—Mr. William Murdoch played on March 11 a number of fairly short, characteristic pieces of the Spanish school—de Falla, Granados, Turina, &c. He played them exceedingly well, with point and grace; above all, with that alertness and zest that are to this music as salt and pepper are to meat. And yet he did not quite succeed in completely hiding the inherent weakness of the music—a weakness that is inevitable if picturesque daintiness and refinement are the main goal of composition. Indeed, if musical idiom continues to develop along present lines we shall all have no 'language but a cry.' Taken apart these pieces are pleasing enough; their taste and texture impeccable. A succession of them, however, is bound to surfeit the appetite as an overdose of the best sauces is apt to do. No one wishes to deny that, at least in the case of Granados and Turina, we do get occasionally something more substantial than tasteful cleverness. But in music that endures the proportion of substantial elements and dainty trifles is usually reversed. B. V.

HAROLD SAMUEL

Mr. Harold Samuel gave the first of a series of recitals at Æolian Hall on March 18. He realises that he was in danger of being considered exclusively a Bach player—a sort of 'single-speech Hamilton' in music—consequently he has not put any Bach music into his present programme. The chief items of his list on this occasion were two Sonatas of Mozart and the C minor Fantasia and Sonata. Mozart's Pianoforte Sonatas are very seldom heard now, and it is the fashion to say that they are undeservedly neglected; but the reasons for their rare appearance are not far to seek. The C minor Sonata, however, is a work which deserves to live, and a good many of those who heard it were probably surprised at the amount of fine music and strong drama that it contains. Mr. Samuel's programme also included the Essex Rhapsody of Armstrong Gibbs, in which he showed that he can play modern music with the best of them, and Sir Charles Stanford's Four Rhapsodies for pianoforte are music with which we can desire better acquaintance. They are not only good music, but effectively written for the instrument. A. K.

M. EGON PETRI AND OP. 106

M. Egon Petri, the Hungarian pianist and pupil of Busoni, played at Wigmore Hall on February 26 to the scantiest handful of listeners, so short apparently are the memories of those Londoners who crowded to hear him in 1913 or 1914. But for those present he won back his deserved fame. The formidable Sonata in B flat, Op. 106, of Beethoven was played. Petri's relation to Busoni was too well-known for comparisons to be avoided. The pupil is proudly tempered, like the master. He is more self-contained. There is an iron will, but little enough of the older man's personal assertion, expansiveness, and not infrequent caprice. Such judicious grading of tone was to be achieved only by the coolest head and a finger control which one is tempted to call unsurpassable. The performance of the great Sonata, then, made something of the effect of a masterpiece thoroughly wrought well previously, and now for good or ill exhibited in every way definitive. C.

CHOIRS IN THE SUBURBS

Alexandra Palace Choral and Orchestral Society gave the B minor Mass at the Northern Polytechnic on March 18, under Mr. Allen Gill. The choir was at its best in the more vigorous and majestic choruses. From the Resurrexit to the end these singers seemed exempt from the ordinary processes of fatigue.

In February, Dvorák's The Spectre's Bride was part of the programme given by the South London Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. William H. Kerridge; and Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast was the work of the Loughton Choral Society and Orchestra, under Mr. Henry Riding.

The South-West Choral Society showed how far it has progressed by singing The Dream of Gerontius on March 1, under Mr. Arthur Saunders, and singing it well.

Mr. J. C. Clarke is conductor of the recently-formed Wandsworth Male-Voice Choir, which gave a successful concert at Battersea Town Hall on March 8, singing Elgar's Feasting I watch, Schumann's Battle Song, MacDowell's As the gloaming, and West's Fill the bowl with rosy wine.

On Good Friday the Crystal Palace and Dulwich Philharmonic Societies amalgamate for Rossini's Stabat Mater (with the London Symphony Orchestra), Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock conducting.

The Audrey Chapman Orchestra brought an excellent series of concerts to an end at the Northern Polytechnic on March 11. The lady string players have a professional technique and, joined by well-known wind players they gave a first-rate performance of the New World Symphony under Mr. Frank Bridge. The concerts are to be resumed in the autumn.

Mr. Gerald Cooper opened a new series of concerts of old music at Æolian Hall on March 15. Miss Dorothy Helmrich sang Dowland, Mr. Godfrey Ludlow played Bach and Corelli on the violin, and Mr. Cooper was at the harpsichord. An evening well spent. M.

ST. MARTIN'S PAGEANT

St. Martin's Pageant, first produced in November last year, was performed by two hundred members and friends of St. Martin-in-the-Fields at Church House, Westminster, on March 6 and on following evenings for a fortnight. Unfolded in some twenty scenes (passing of the Roman empire, mediæval episodes, then post-Reformation and modern developments) the pageant, the work of Mr. Lawrence Housman, aimed at depicting the struggle of the Christian ideal of fellowship through the ages. It was not hard to pick holes in the author's share in the show. (For instance, his exaggerated insistence on 'women's wrongs.' Read the Paston Letters if you conceive mediæval woman to have been something between a serf and a beast of burden.) Still he evolved a coherent, moving spectacle which was performed in a spirit of devotion. These modern Church-folk are determined that the devil shall not have all the best stage shows! Some scenes were extremely beautiful. Memory of the Joan of Arc tableau lingers, and the acting of the crowds, especially in the processions up and down the hall, was spontaneous and remarkable in effect.

Most of the action was accompanied by vocal and instrumental music, arranged by Mr. Gustav Holst, who conducted. The choir and orchestra (of more than a hundred Morley College students) were in a gallery at the back of the hall. The splendid old Irish hymn-tune 'St. Patrick's Breastplate' struck the right note to begin with. The pageant wound up with the 'Old 124th' from the Genevan Psalter. Between there was solemn and joyful music by Vittoria, Tallis, and Bach. The Latin hymn 'Personent Hodie' (from a Swedish book of carols) gave the fine theme for a Crusaders' March, most stirring in rhythm. So present-day devotion does not scorn colour and stage action, and the devil is far from having all the best tunes either! One grumble must be allowed (since the pageant will assuredly be again revived): the final episode, a contemporary street scene, was an artistic blunder. P. W.

W. G. ROTHERY, M.V.O.

As a Member of the Victorian Order, Mr. W. G. Rothery is awarded due recognition for valuable services performed in the background of our musical life. All the widespread work of the Professional Classes War Relief Council and the body into which it was afterwards merged—the Music in War-Time Committee—was administered by Mr. Rothery as the able lieutenant of Sir Hubert Parry and Dr. W. G. McNaught. Since 1910 he has been a popular secretary to the Royal Choral Society, and the success of the Society's recent Jubilee celebration was largely due to his activities.

Opera in London

DAVID GARRICK

With commendable courage, Mr. Reginald Somerville has taken his opera David Garrick out of the hands of the Carl Rosa Company and mounted it for a run at the Queen's Theatre. For this purpose Mr. Somerville has made sundry changes in his work, its original form being that of grand opera. That it met with a very cordial reception when presented at the Queen's Theatre on March 2 was a satisfactory sign that the public is ready to listen to British music in the lighter forms in spite of the fact that on this occasion it did not quite turn out to be the 'comedy' opera it was described as being. But Mr. Somerville's genuinely melodious score carried the day, and his flow of real melody completely won the goodwill of his listeners. The opera is founded, by Mr. Somerville himself, on the Robertson comedy, which it follows fairly closely. Personally I think it follows it too closely. There was not all the fun the public looks for in the lighter musical entertainments. The mounting was extremely good, and it was quite refreshing to see a British production so well put on the stage. Mr. Paul Shelving, of the Birmingham Repertory Theatre, was responsible for the designs of dresses and scenery, and he did his work well. Mr. Nigel Playfair was the producer. The representation introduced an uncommonly good tenor in Mr. Leonard Ceiley, who appeared as David Garrick. His work showed great promise and his singing was excellent. Miss Madeleine Collins as Ada Ingot, Mr. Herbert Cameron as Ingot, and Mr. Miles Malleon as Squire Chivvy were among those who served the composer best. It was very satisfactory to find such care bestowed upon a British work, for every detail had been carefully considered, not forgetting the orchestra, which is a particularly fine body, directed by the composer himself.

F. E. B.

THE PEER GYNT MUSIC AT THE OLD VIC.

By utilising the whole of Grieg's incidental music to Ibsen's moral drama, Peer Gynt, the attraction of the production at the Old Vic., which took place on March 6 and onwards, was increased considerably. I do not propose to speak of the dramatic merits of the play, for it was written for a definite purpose as a national warning. I do not remember that the music was given when the play was performed some sixteen years ago, but in this instance it was of immense service in keeping alive the interest of a wonderfully interested audience at the Old Vic. In its form of a suite or suites the music is well-known, but it assumed a different and no less pleasing complexion when heard with the literary context. The whole had been arranged and got together by Mr. Charles Corri, the conductor, whose task cannot have been an easy one. But everything went smoothly, and the music itself was beautifully played in just the right mood of intensity, and it received the great compliment of being listened to eagerly.

F. E. B.

COWEN'S INCIDENTAL MUSIC TO PINERO'S THE ENCHANTED COTTAGE

Once again Sir Frederic Cowen acts as musician-in-ordinary to Sir Arthur Pinero. He has provided the incidental music to Sir Arthur's new play The Enchanted Cottage, produced at the Duke of York's Theatre at the end of February. The musician's opportunity comes when the piece takes on its fantastic garb and deals either with the ghosts of those who have inhabited the cottage or with the imaginings of the leading female character, Laura. Needless to say that Sir Frederic Cowen, with his vast experience and his large resources, supplies all that is wanted. And I note with satisfaction that he does not rely solely on weird harmonies for an emotional appeal, but frankly writes melody. The lovers of the various periods and the dream are all illustrated by melodic passages of great charm and effect, with becoming characterisation suitable to the dates represented. The music is to be issued as an orchestral suite, and I think there will be as much approval for it in the concert room as there is in the theatre, where it is so well played—first under the composer, and afterwards under Mr. Edward Clarke.

F. E. B.

THE LONDON HIPPODROME

Like most entertainments of the kind, the new show at the Hippodrome, Round in 50, will give musicians some uncomfortable moments. We wonder at the small—almost negligible—amount of good singing, both solo and choral. Perhaps, however, the singing is better than we think, for the orchestral playing is so uniformly on the loud side that the singers are generally submerged, coming to the surface only on an occasional high note. Some day an enterprising management will prove that good singing and original light music are hardly less of an asset than good low comedy work, and far more so (and much less expensive) than lavish mounting. The strength of Round in 50 lies in its having a story (an adaptation of Verne's Round the World in Eighty Days), some gorgeous production, an effective use of the cinema, and some very droll work by George Robey, Renée Reel, and two of the Lupinos. Thanks to these constituents the show is far above the average, and should make the Hippodrome slump-proof for the rest of the year.

H. G.

Church and Organ Music

SAMUEL SEBASTIAN WESLEY'S TOMB

BY H. T. GILBERTHORPE

It needs no great daring to affirm that Samuel Sebastian Wesley was one of the brightest stars that ever shone in the English musical firmament. His music is known and loved wherever English speaking people are gathered together 'in quires and places where they sing.'

Wesley died at Gloucester on April 19, 1876, at the age of sixty-five, and by his own wish was buried at Exeter by the side of his only daughter. These facts are recorded by Mr. John E. West in his valuable book 'Cathedral Organists, Past and Present,' and also in other works of reference. Nevertheless, many people, otherwise well informed upon matters connected with the career of Wesley, have, to say the least, a very hazy idea as to where he was buried.

During the recent Congress of the National Union of Organists' Associations, when the members met at Messrs. Novello's rooms in Wardour Street, Mr. John E. West related the great difficulty he had had in finding Wesley's grave. He told how he spent over an hour, in the broiling heat of a summer afternoon, wandering around the Old Cemetery at Exeter before he could find the spot that he was seeking. Dr. Ferris Tozer drew attention to the fact that many people do not know that Wesley was brought to Exeter for burial, supporting this assertion by quoting the words of the Very Rev. Henry Gee, Dean of Gloucester, who, on page 32 of a book entitled 'Gloucester Cathedral, its Organs and Organists' (recently published by the Chiswick Press) says that S. S. Wesley was buried at Winchester.

Wesley's grave is in the upper part of the Old Cemetery at Exeter, under the shadow of a portion of the old city wall. Its flat granite slab has nothing about it to attract the casual visitor's attention, and shows many signs of neglect. The metal letters forming the inscription have become corroded, and the stone round about them is very worn and discoloured. Some years ago the grave presented such a dilapidated appearance that the late Dr. W. B. Gilbert (composer of the well-known tune 'Maidstone,' usually sung to 'Pleasant are Thy courts above'), who saw it 1840, aged 9 weeks. Also of the above named Samuel Sebastian Wesley, who died at Gloucester, April 19th, 1876. Aged 65 years. Doctor of Music, Oxford. Organist and Succentor of Exeter Cathedral, 1835-1841.

As will be seen by the accompanying photograph, the lettering is now very bad, and it is not easy to decipher the inscription from a distance of a few yards. The whole appearance of the grave is such as to convey the impression that it is utterly forgotten and uncared for. Surely there must be some amongst the lovers of the priceless heritage which Samuel Sebastian Wesley has bequeathed to English Church music for all time in such works as The Wilderness, Blessed be the God and Father, Ascribe unto the Lord, and many other equally beautiful anthems and services, who would be willing to bear their part in defraying the cost of placing a suitable and permanent memorial over the last resting place of this great man. There is a memorial tablet to Wesley's memory in the north aisle of the nave of Exeter Cathedral, and to the right of it is a tablet (not shown above) which has

THE TOMB OF S. S. WESLEY IN THE OLD CEMETERY, EXETER

whilst on a visit to Exeter, raised a fund to defray the cost of re-cutting the inscription. Probably the metal letters were supplied at the same time.

The inscription on the stone is as follows :

In memory of Mary, daughter of Samuel Sebastian Wesley of this City, who died February 13th, recently been put up in memory of the late Dr. D. J. Wood. A memorial in the Cathedral is, however, not the same thing as one which marks the actual burial place, and judging from the present appearance of the grave, if nothing is done there, and wind and weather are allowed to work their will upon the present stone, in a few years' time the inscription will have been practically obliterated, and the place will become unrecognisable as that where lies, awaiting the Resurrection, one of the greatest of English Church musicians.

THE ORGAN IN THE CHURCH OF ST. LAWRENCE JEWRY

BY SIDNEY J. AMBLER

The fine Church situated at the south-east corner of the court-yard of the Guildhall, London, ranks as one of Wren's happiest inspirations, and is dedicated to the Saint and Martyr born at Huesca, in the kingdom of Arragon, Spain. St. Lawrence was a Deacon of Bishop Sixtus, and a Treasurer of the Church of Rome, A.D. 259, and was martyred by being laid on a gridiron and roasted alive under the persecutions of the Emperor Valerian.

The Church of St. Lawrence Jewry is the Parish Church of the united parishes of St. Lawrence Jewry, St. Mary Magdalene, Milk Street, and St. Michael Bassishaw. The last-named parish was united with the other two more than twenty years ago, and since then the patronage of the benefice has been in the hands of the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's and the master and scholars of Balliol College alternately.

The only noteworthy object rescued from the old Church in the Great Fire of 1666 is the picture of the martyrdom of St. Lawrence, which was hastily cut from its frame over the altar before the conflagration reached the Church, and was thus saved from destruction. It now occupies a position in the vestry. The dimensions of Wren's fabric are approximately 80-ft. in length and 65-ft. in breadth, with a height of roof of 40-ft., flat and panelled. The acoustic properties of the building are perfect, there being resonance without undue echo.

The earliest records of an organ appear to be in a Vestry Minute of 1683:

'The Committee having seen drafts and proposals of Mr. Harris and Mr. Smith for the Organ, and how it should be made, and being satisfied that they were both good workmen, it was put to the vote whether of them should make the organ, and it was speedily carried that Mr. Harris should make the same, which is ordered to be done by Mr. Harris accordingly. After Mr. Harris was ordered to be the maker of the organ as by the order above, it was agreed by Mr. Harris that he would make the same according to his proposals, and that he would not expect any money till the organ is finished and approved by the Parish. If the same was not approved he would take it away; and he would finish the organ within three months after the joiner and carver should finish their work.'

The carver here referred to was no less than the great artist, Grinling Gibbons, whose craftsmanship is here seen to this day in its perfection. Volumes could be written of the wealth of carved woodwork to be found in the Church and vestries, but it must suffice to say that it is doubtful if a finer example of an organ-case can be found anywhere, whether judged from the standpoint of craftsmanship or good taste in design.

A later Vestry Minute states that Harris was given £100 to go on with, and had to find security for repayment if the work was not approved of. Harris was afterwards paid £300. The carver and joiner received £285 for their work, but the Vestry considered this price was excessive.

A further extract reads:

'It is ordered that Mr. Browne shall proceed in playing the organ [1685] in the Parish Church, and be organist for one year from the time he begin [began] to play the same, he having for his satisfaction left himself to the goodwill of the Parish.'

He was later given a salary of £20.

There appears to be no authentic record of the names of the stops of the original Harris organ as it left that builder's hands in or about the year 1685. For the earliest reliable specification of an organ at St. Lawrence, we have, however, a manuscript of a Mr. Henry Leffler, at one time organist of St. Katharine Cree and an official of the Bank of England, whose descendants are at present members of this institution, and personally known to the writer. Mr. Henry Leffler, writing in 1800, gives the list of stops as follows:

Three sets of keys from GG—C, short octaves. Swell from Fiddle G to D, by Byfield. Great (10 stops): Open Diapason, Stopped Diapason, Principal, Twelfth, Fifteenth, Tierce, Larigot, Sesquialtera (four ranks). Cornet to C sharp (five ranks). Trumpet. Swell (seven stops): Stopped Diapason, Principal, Cornet (three ranks), Trumpet, Hautboy, Vox Humana. Choir (three stops): Stopped Diapason, Principal, Flute.

The Choir (Chayre) organ, as customary, was placed behind the organ-stool, and this old Choir case with the Harris pipes—or some of them, at least—is to be seen now in the same relative position.

I have recently taken out some of these pipes and examined them. From the composition of the metal they are undoubtedly of Harris's make, and voiced on about 1½-in. wind.

About 1856 Russell rebuilt and enlarged the organ and some more case-work was added; and later still Henry Jones, of Brompton, made further extensions.

In the year 1875 Gray & Davison totally rebuilt the organ, retaining all the old case-work, extending the perimeter of the loft, and providing new screens and panels, mainly confined to the south side. This work is much inferior both in workmanship and material. The following is the list of stops of the Gray & Davison organ:

Great (ten stops): Double Diapason, Open Diapason, Open Diapason, Clarabella, Octave Flute, Octavante, Quint, Super-Octave, Mixture (five ranks), Trumpets.

Swell (ten stops): Lieblich Bourdon, Open Diapason, Keraulophon, Rohr Flöte, Voix Celeste, Geigen Principal, Mixture (three ranks), Cornopean, Oboe, Clarion.

Choir (seven stops): Lieblich Bourdon, Salicional, Lieblich Gedacht, Viol d'Amour, Suabe Flute, Flageolet Harmonic, Corno di Bassetto.

Pedal (six stops): Open Diapason, Violone, Quint, Violoncello, Super-Octave, Trombone.

Couplers (five): Swell to Great; Swell to Pedal; Swell to Choir; Great to Pedal; Choir to Pedal.

Four composition pedals to Great; three composition pedals to Swell.

Compass, CC to A; Pedal, CCC to F.

In this organ the original Choir case was preserved, as already stated, in front; but the Choir organ wind-chest was placed inside the larger case, to cover up the pipes of which the dummy fan trumpet was added to the case-work.

Norman & Beard in 1900 converted the tracker key and pedal action to tubular pneumatic, but not the drawstop action, the general set-out remaining as before. A new feeder reservoir was placed over the door leading into the south aisle, with Watkins & Watson high-pressure engine. All the pipes were re-voiced, and harmonic trebles supplied to the chorus reeds. New keys, frames, jamps, draw-knobs, and pedal board were added.

The specification as it stands is practically as it was in 1875, slight changes having been made in the names of the stops. The only practical alteration is the conversion of the pedal Quint into a Bourdon, and the addition of an octave-coupler to the Swell.

The Rector and churchwardens are contemplating the cleaning and renovation of this fine instrument, and at the same time remodelling the interior to the extent of starting with a new building frame. It is not proposed to alter in any way the fine case or to modify the old pipe-work, but some tonal additions are desirable to improve the balance, and what is of greater importance is the rearrangement of the console, with the inclusion of piston action for the stop combinations. At the time of the last rebuild the arrangement of the drawstops of the manual and Pedal departments was left as in Gray & Davison's time, the Pedal draw-knobs being placed under the Swell division on the left-hand side of the console with the couplers. The old cramped building frame made it mechanically impossible to include in the Great composition pedals the Pedal organ registers, and thus every change in the Pedal organ tonality has to be registered independently by hand.

The musical traditions of this Church are of no mean order. It was here, between 1867 and 1870, that the memorable services in connection with the Pan-Anglican Synod were held, and, under the direction of the choirmaster of the Church, the late Robert Turner, that the London Gregorian Choral Association was inaugurated.

The old tradition musically is being well maintained. The Rector, the Rev. Walter P. Besley, is a keen and cultured musician. Organ recitals by organists of the front rank are given weekly on Tuesdays at one o'clock.

ST. LAWRENCE JEWRY

Choral work, in the hands of Mr. Lewis Jones (the present organist), now occupies a prominent place in the activities of the Church. This Advent Brahms's Requiem and the Christmas Oratorio have been sung in a manner which was felt to be much more of an act of worship than a mere performance; and during Lent Bach's St. John Passion and Dvorák's Stabat Mater will be heard.

As has already been pointed out, it is very difficult for players of modern organ music to handle the tonal resources of the organ, and some of the technical feats that we hear are only appreciated by those who are aware of the mechanical deficiencies of the instrument.

If so many of our best organists are good enough to go to St. Lawrence and give recitals, it is felt that they should not be limited in their repertory by antiquated mechanism, and the Rector with his churchwardens and advisers (amongst whom there are practical organists) hope to see a scheme carried out shortly involving the taking down of the organ and modernising the interior. It is not the intention to alter the tonal characteristics of the pipe-work—moreover, as stated previously, no one would be allowed to do this—but a limited amount of new tonal resource and an improved balance is thought desirable. Advantage will doubtless be taken at the same time to put in fan-blowing plant, to enable the large reservoir to be eliminated and thus give room for a better disposition for the pipes and wind-chests. The exhaust tubular pneumatic key-action should be retained, as it is equal to every demand that can be made upon it.

Whatever is contemplated for the future, all concerned may rest assured that in an old classical instance like this, nothing will be permitted to be done to the organ without the most careful inquiry by the Church authorities.

DR. ALBERT SCHWEITZER

This versatile man—musician, Bach scholar, organ-builder, theologian, and physician—has lately given recitals at Cambridge (Trinity College), Oxford (Christ Church Cathedral), Birmingham, and Westminster Abbey. His playing has drawn large audiences, and it goes without saying that his methods have roused much discussion among organists. Generally speaking he plays Bach much more slowly than do most English organists. His registration also is more elaborate, and to ensure its being carried out without interference with the music he has helpers at his side. In this he claims to follow the example of Bach himself, who (he says) played always with two of his sons managing the stops. His programmes have been drawn chiefly from the lesser works of Bach, his Westminster scheme being typical—the 'Little' E minor Prelude and Fugue, the Canzona in D minor, the Adagio from the Toccata in C, the C minor Fugue (subject c-g-g-g-a flat), and some short and quiet Chorale Preludes. In the E minor Fugue he doubled the E's in the pedal final entry, and made his cadence major. The C minor Fugue he played very slowly, a programme note giving his view that it expressed 'tragic sorrow'—a startling idea, seeing the vigorous nature of the subject and the animation of the counterpoint. The beautiful elegiac Fantasia that precedes it is far better suited by the description. The collections at these recitals have been in aid of the Doctor's work as a medical missionary in Africa. Thus his beloved Bach is a means of raising funds, as well as a constant solace in his lonely post in the primitive forest. The only luxury he allows himself, we hear, is a grand pianoforte with pedal attachment, presented to him by the Bach Society of Paris, whose organist he was for many years. He says his native servant doubled up with laughter when he first saw his master play with his hands as well as his feet. The Doctor carries back with him the admiration and good wishes of all his fellow Bachites in this country.

ORGANISTS' BENEVOLENT LEAGUE

We have received the twelfth annual report of this body, and note with pleasure that, despite the present economic difficulties, which affect church organists in a special degree, the League is in a flourishing condition. It appears, however, that so far this results rather from the self-denying energy of a few than from the support of the many. Thus the balance sheet shows that the 1921 receipts from organ recitals and concerts amounted to £145. This represents far too small an amount of rank-and-file effort. As Sir Frederick Bridge, the president, says, there should be at least five hundred such recitals given annually. At the modest estimate of £2 per recital, this would bring in £1,000. What an easy way of helping along a good work! Practically every organist enjoys giving recitals. To give one for the benefit of the old and destitute of his profession costs so very little in the way of extra trouble, that we think Sir Frederick's suggested total is far too small. There are enough keen recitalists to make it a thousand—or even two—for no one need limit his effort to one recital per annum. Readers who wish for a copy of the report, or for any other information, should write to the Secretary, Mr. Thomas Shindler, at the Royal College of Organists, Kensington Gore, S.W. 7.

On March 13, Mr. H. C. Colles gave a lecture at King's College on 'Quality in Hymn-Tune.' The main points of his address will appear in our next issue.

New organs have recently been erected by Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper at St. Germain's, Edghaston—a two-manual with nineteen speaking stops—and at Middleton Parish Church, Manchester—a three-manual of twenty-eight speaking stops. Both instruments are liberally supplied with accessories. The Middleton organ is enclosed in an oak case designed by Sir Charles Nicholson, whose admirable lecture on organ-cases will be remembered by many of our readers.

The fine parish church of St. Mary Redcliff was well-filled on a recent Saturday afternoon by members and friends of the Bristol branch of the Church Music Society, when Mr. Geoffrey Shaw conducted a Hymn Festival. Mr. Shaw gave an address on the ideals to be aimed at in the choice of hymns, both in regard to words and music, after which hymns were sung in various ways—full, choir, people, in unison, in harmony, with faux-bourbons, with and without organ, &c.

An election will be made on July 4 to a Musical Exhibition at St. Edmund Hall, Oxford, of the annual value of £40. Candidates must not be over twenty-five years of age on June 30, 1922. The exhibition is tenable for one year, and is renewable annually for a period not exceeding three years. Further particulars may be had on application to the Principal.

In our March issue we announced that the St. John Passion would be sung at St. Michael's, Cornhill, on March 31 and April 7, at 8 o'clock. This was a slip. Here is the correct programme: Friday, April 7, at one o'clock, Part 1; Monday, April 10, at six o'clock, the whole work; Wednesday, April 12, at one o'clock, Part 2.

ORGAN RECITALS

Mr. Eric Brough, St. Lawrence Jewry—Fugue in C minor, Bach; Choral, Honegger; Prelude and Fugue in G minor, Dupré. Jackson's Lane Wesleyan Church, Highgate—Prelude on 'Rhosymedre,' Vaughan Williams; Choral in E, Franck; Rhapsody No. 1, Howells.

Mr. J. G. Bamborough, South Parade Wesleyan Church, Grimsby—Sonata No. 1, Harwood; Irish Phantasy, Wolstenholme.

Mr. Harold M. Dawber, St. George's, Stockport—Sonata No. 1, Mendelssohn; Passacaglia in C minor, Bach.

Mr. Reginald Silver, Beer Parish Church—Gothic Suite, Boëllmann; Fantasia in four parts, Gibbons.

Mr. Louis H. Torr, St. Laurence, Southampton—Grand Chœur in G minor, Hollins; Imperial March, Elgar.

Mr. H. L. Balfour, Clapham Parish Church—Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach; Sonata No. 2, Merkel.

Mr. Ambrose P. Porter, St. Matthias', Richmond—Sonatas Nos. 1 and 6, Mendelssohn; Choral No. 3 and Pastorale, Franck; Prelude and Fugue in F minor and Chorale Prelude, 'Come, Holy Ghost,' Bach.

Mr. Arthur Meale, Central Hall, Westminster—Sonatas Nos. 7 and 8, Guilmant; Pastorale and Finale (Symphony No. 2), Widor.

Mr. S. Maurice Popplestone, Wesley Chapel, Frome—Prelude and Fugue in C, Bach; Concert Fantasia on 'Hanover,' Lemare.

Mr. J. Gray, Adam Smith Hall, Kirkcaldy—Benediction Nuptiale, Saint-Saëns; Sonata No. 1, Mendelssohn.

Mr. Herbert Weatherly, Bromley Parish Church—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Symphony No. 6, Widor. St. Stephen's Wallbrook—First movement, 'New World' Symphony; Prelude and Fugue in D, Bach.

Church of the Holy Communion, New York: Mr. Lynnwood Farnam—Toccata and Fugue in D, Bach; Introduction, Passacaglia, and Fugue, Healey Willan; Prelude on 'Martyrs,' Harvey Grace. Mr. Channing Lefebvre, at the same Church—Prelude, 'In Dir ist Freude,' Bach; Choral No. 3, Franck; Scherzo, Gigout.

Mr. W. J. Lancaster, Bolton Parish Church—Prelude on 'Old 104th,' Parry; Passacaglia with Choral, Karg-Elert; Toccata in D minor, Stanford.

Mr. Alfred Hollins, Clapton Park Congregational Church—Concert Overture No. 3, Hollins; 'Lied des Chrysanthèmes,' Bonnet.

Mr. C. H. Trevor, St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta—Fantasia, Rheinberger; Fugue in D minor and Prelude in B minor, Bach.

Mr. Claude A. Forster, St. John's, Forfar—Sonata da Camera, Peace; Fantasia and Fugue in A minor, Bach.

Mr. Herbert Howge, St. Nicholas Cole Abley—Pastoral Sonata, Rheinberger; Epilogue, Healey Willan; and a Bach programme. St. Stephen's Wallbrook—A Bach programme.

Mr. Fred J. Tarris, Barking Parish Church—Visione, Rheinberger; Overture in E flat, Faulkes.

Mr. W. Hunt, St. George's, Belfast—Sonata No. 1, Guilmant; Theme with Variations, Stuart Archer.

Mr. J. Matthews, St. Stephen's, Guernsey—Concert Rondo, Hollins; Symphonic Poem, Matthews; Finale (Sonata No. 1), Guilmant.

Mr. Francis W. Sutton, All Saints', Northampton—Fantasia and Fugue in G minor, Bach; Sonata No. 1, Guilmant.

Mr. Cyril G. Church, Church of the Holy Cross, Crediton—'Occasional' Overture; 'Finlandia.'

Miss Doris Fenner, St. Dunstan's-in-the-East—Prelude on 'Eventide,' Parry; Fugue in D minor, Bach.

Mr. A. Martin Hawkins, St. Michael's, Stockwell—Trumpet Tune and Air, Purcell; Prelude on 'Old 104th,' Parry.

Mr. Chassey Hector, Brighton Parish Church—Introduction and Finale from Sonata, Reubke; Postlude in C minor, Steggall.

Mr. Marcel Dupré, Hove Town Hall—Final, B flat, Franck; Pastoral Symphony No. 1, Vierne; Prelude and Fugue in G minor, Dupré.

Mr. John Pulein, St. Mary's Cathedral, Glasgow—Sonata in A flat, Rheinberger; Pastoral in F, Bach; 'The Blessed Damozel' and 'The Little Shepherd,' Debussy.

Mr. G. Bernard Gilbert, Town Hall, Stratford—Sonata No. 1 and Prelude and Fugue in G, Mendelssohn; Variations on an Original Theme, Hesse.

Mr. Albert Orton, St. Mark's, Southampton—Pastoral Sonata, Rheinberger; Introduction and Passacaglia, Keger. St. Lawrence Jewry—Air and Variations in G, Rheinberger; Prelude and Fugue in C, Bach.

Mr. Bertram Hollins, Beckenham Congregational Church—Sonata No. 6, Mendelssohn; Finale (Symphony No. 1), Vierne; Prelude, 'Rockingham,' Parry; Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach.

APPOINTMENTS

Mr. J. D. M. Hodge, organist and choirmaster, St. Augustine's, New Barnet.

Mr. J. T. Horne, organist and choirmaster, Cork Cathedral.

Mr. R. H. Pill, organist and choirmaster, Burley Lawn United Methodist, Leeds.

Mr. E. G. Yeo, organist and choirmaster, St. Luke's, Hornsey.

Mr. R. C. Young, organist and choirmaster, Holy Trinity Cathedral, Shanghai, China.

Letters to the Editor

THE ENGLISH LITANY OF 1544-60.

SIR,—Dr. Grattan Flood has misunderstood the letter of Cranmer to Henry VIII. which he quotes. On his own showing the letter was written months after the publication of the Litany, and therefore could not have referred to the music of this prayer. But in addition to this consideration there is Cranmer's own explicit statement:

'I have translated into the English tongue, so well as I could in so short a time, certain processions to be used upon festival days . . . If your Grace command some devout and solemn note to be made thereunto (as is to the procession which your Majesty has already set forth in English) [i.e., the Litany] . . . As concerning the Salve Festa dies the Latin note, as I think, is sober and distinct enough: wherefore I have travailed to make the verses in English, and have put the Latin note unto the same. Nevertheless they that be cunning in singing can make a much more solemn note thereto: I made them only for a proof to see how English would do in song.'

It is quite clear, therefore, that Cranmer was referring not to the Litany, but to the Salve festa dies and other processions for festival days. Another proof that the Litany was not intended originally to be the only procession in the English Church may be found in a note contained in the Prayer Book of 1549:

'Upon Christmas Day, Easter Day, the Ascension Day, Whitsunday, and the Feaste of the Trinity, may be used any part of Holy Scripture hereafter to be certainly limited and appointed, in the stead of the Litany.'

No doubt something was intended after the style of the Antiphons and Responsos formerly used for this purpose.

I should be interested to learn Dr. Flood's authority for the use of 'Processioner' as meaning the Litany. The word generally means the Processionale, or book of processions. Bede does not say that St. Augustine and his companions on entering Canterbury sang 'the Litany' and the Antiphon Deprecamur te; he says: 'they sang this Litany Deprecamur te.' The Antiphon is of considerable length; the music is published by the Plainsong and Mediaeval Music Society if Dr. Flood cares to see it.

There is one more sentence of Dr. Flood's that may possibly be misunderstood. He says there is no 'doubt that in 1545-46 the newly translated English Litany was roughly adapted to the old plainchant melody.' But (1) the Litany was not a 'newly translated' version of any Litany which previously existed in England, but was a compilation from various sources; (2) the melody was not 'the old plainchant melody' of the Litany, but was an adaptation from two or three plainchant phrases.

Dr. Flood also says that Kyrie Eleison was popular in Gaul in the early years of the 5th century, but Mr. Edmund Bishop tells us that it was imported into Gaul in the early part of the 6th century.—Yours, &c.,

E. G. P. WYATT.

STILL IN THE VAN

SIR,—A few days ago I saw in Maida Vale a laundry van bearing on its sides the words, 'SONATA LAUNDRY, BRETHOVEN STREET.' After this, who dares to say that the Bonn master 'won't wash?'—Yours, &c.,

JOHN E. WEST.

MR. SCHOLES, HOW DARE YOU?

SIR,—I was greatly astonished to read Mr. Percy A. Scholes's deprecating remarks concerning Brahms's Great C minor Symphony in a recent number of the Observer. This Symphony is assuredly one of the most glorious ever written, and nothing in the whole of musical literature is more wonderfully thrilling than the Introduction to the magnificent Finale. I had the privilege of hearing this Symphony under the immortal composer's own direction, when it was first produced at Leipzig in 1876.—Yours, &c.,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

22a, Carlton Vale, Maida Vale, N.W.6.

March 12, 1922.

AN INTERESTING MODEL.

SIR,—Enclosed you will find two photographs of a miniature model organ which I have made, and I am sending it with the hope that it may provide some little interest for you or your readers. The organ itself is very small, being only 8½-in. from base to top of largest pipes; the width is 6½-in., and the depth 4-in. The organ-case is elaborately carved and panelled, painted dark oak and varnished. The length of the two largest pipes is just 5-in., while the four small groups of pipes range from 1½-in. to 18-in. The pipes themselves are all hand-painted and decorated; the ground colour is a light blue enamel, and the groups of small pipes are a darker shade to give relief. The mouth-piece of each pipe is done in English gold and dark crimson enamel alternately, the leaf or floral design being in English gold lined with black. The tops of all the pipes have a band of white enamel, lined with very fine bands of gold and crimson, making the effect and grouping very charming. The pedal board, which is of full range, is radiating and concave. There are six composition pedals, representing three for Great and three for Swell, with Balance Swell Pedal in centre. The stops are grouped somewhat in the usual way—Great and Choir on the right, Swell and Pedal on the left. The stops over the Swell manual represent couplers. Perhaps I had better add that I myself am a voluntary organist, and that love for and interest in the organ no doubt provided the patience, as I may state there are over 2,500 different pieces altogether. The model has occupied my spare time for about three years.—Yours, &c., R. MASSEY.

119, Crescent Road,

Great Lever, Bolton.

February 21st, 1922.

THE MUSIC OF THE PICTURE-THEATRE

SIR,—No music-lover could have read your notes on the problem of the cinema without the utmost sympathy for your point of view, or without desiring an issue which would be as good for music as for the prosperity of the cinema. With all deference to Mr. Gordon Craig and Mr. St. John Ervine, their criticisms can only assist when it has admitted what is obviously permanent in the cinema. The cinema, a precocious art, is passing through acute growing-pains; but the complaint from which it suffers is the same for which these critical gentlemen have found no specific in their own crafts. I postulate as a feasible idea that the very extremity of a problem of this sort as it affects art is in itself an opportunity if used wisely and with deliberation. In the case of the cinema, the cult of the novelette, with all its artistic evils, has been brought nearer to an end in a few years than the publishers of cheap shockers could possibly have feared. The cinema has revealed at close quarters the shoddy stuff of the popular novel and the popular melody. It falls low, but that at least is not entirely because of the cinema, whose capacity, moreover, to transform dull tales and to infuse delight has been proved a hundred times. The failure of the cinema, the theatre, the art gallery, and all the arts which call for practical as well as artistic efficiency, cannot in my opinion be turned to account unless artists recognise the increasing irresponsibility of commerce where art is concerned, and take steps to displace the profit-making element to which the disastrous conditions are due. And if this be not done, then next year, and ten and twenty years hence, we shall still be reading academic criticism without having advanced a single step towards reform.

An important thing that would be welcomed is the appearance of a magazine entirely devoted to the cinema, and run on critical and progressive lines.—Yours, &c.,

STUART GUTHRIE.

Flansham, Bognor.

March 11, 1922.

SIR,—I venture to congratulate you on the incisiveness of your remarks in your last issue on the subject of cinema music, but my pleasure was tinged with regret at the small chance of their being read by the 'unmusical managers and trade officials'. . . usually inartistic and frequently even illiterate.' Truly these are the cuttle-fish. This wonderful race of men, even if they were able, have no time to think for themselves, and engage others to perform this function for them—generally the cheapest they can procure. The 'musical director' is one of these. More often than not this misnamed official has some pretension to his adjectival qualification, and sets out to provide at least a coherent entertainment. But he has not reckoned with Sir Knowall, who, on seeing a film run through on Monday morning, whistles a tune and insists that it is the music for such and such a scene. The musical director has no option, and down it goes. The outcome of this unlovely partnership is to be heard at practically every picture-hall from 2.0 to 11.0 p.m. (continuous).

I was recently invited into the orchestra of a cinema to witness the band in action. I was given a sketch of the music to the 'feature film.' It was amazing, appearing more appalling on paper than in performance, which was heart-breaking enough. Rag rubbed shoulders with Tchaikovsky and Bones hobnobbed with Wagner:

'Garden Scene,' 1½ minutes ... Rose in the Bud.
'The Breaking Point' ... Unfinished (seven bars N, Y).
'But he forgot,' 1 minute ... Barcarolle.
'While in Paris,' 2½ minutes ... Air de Ballet (?)
(Omitting second section).
'Gerald returns,' 1½ .. Flying Dutchman
(to letter 'M').

And so on.

Yet the band was a good one—well-balanced, and the instrumentalists efficient. They had to be, to cope with such a jig-saw.

It is not easy to see whence salvation will come. I fear it is a long cry to the third alternative suggested in your notes, that of a specially composed setting for each film, nor am I quite certain that this would prove ideal. Progress is sure to be slow, but a great step forward would be the extended and complete performance of recognised items, chosen to convey and may be to emphasise the general feeling (I hate 'atmosphere') of the picture or of any one part of it. This calls for a careful and earnest mental search through what must needs be a very wide range of music. The task is rendered none the easier by the prevailing custom which requires the musical director to provide his own music. (Incidentally a grant of even £2 to £3 a week would soon enable a discriminating musician to establish a library which would prove an asset in more than one sense to the company concerned.)

Parallel with this should be an improvement in the treatment of the breathing spaces which the orchestra must needs take. At present the pianoforte forges ahead, quite indifferent to the screen, playing from cover to cover any album of pieces which happens to come to hand. The Chopin Polonaise Album is a hot favourite. Alternatively, a deep pedal rumbling heralds the performance of an organ, not infrequently an instrument discarded by a discerning organ committee, and now redecored as a grand orchestral organ. Both of these are equally painful, bad, and inartistic.

Where the theatre is fortunate enough to possess an organ designed and built with an eye to the work it has to perform, the problem is partly solved, for the majority of films, apart from rough and ready comedy, afford good opportunity for an organist's powers of invention and improvisation. I recall hearing one of our leading organists (called in by a frantic management to fill a gap) improvise to a film for over an hour, and by allotting a definite theme to each of the chief characters, gave as near a perfect interpretation as could be wished. Its value to the audience was enhanced by the fact that the themes were chosen for the most part from well-known songs. I am glad to record that even the management was visibly affected, as it offered two guineas in excess of the prearranged fee.

In the ordinary way, the organ does not shine—for many reasons, a digression into which is tempting but not opportune. Yet apart from this, why do we not get more instrumental variety? Why the eternal solo pianoforte? Why not a string quartet, solo strings with pianoforte, organ and pianoforte treated antiphonally, pianoforte and woodwind, &c.? As a humble Tommy I once marched two miles to Church service with nothing more than the big drum and trombone. Ludicrous may be, but a very welcome change and not uninteresting musically!

The keynote to success in an entertainment lasting ten hours is variety.—Yours, &c.,

March 11, 1922.

MORIC FAN.

'A NOTE ON BEST SELLERS'

SIR,—I have just read the article in the March issue of the Musical Times, entitled, 'A Note on Best Sellers,' and I submit the following for 'A. K.'s' consideration.

I have not the faintest notion to whom 'A. K.' may be referring, but it seems to me that there is a lot of cheap (yet superior) rubbish being written lately on the subject of 'best-sellers' by self-appointed and (mostly) anonymous critics. There are other people (just as well qualified to judge, perhaps, as 'A. K.') who, if they knew to what 'A. K.' refers, might not be quite so cocksure of the 'poison gas' element in these much-maligned 'best-sellers.' Cannot 'A. K.' come out into the open, and give us names? We should like to be able to form our own judgment—perhaps.

I imagine no publisher who spends so much money and time 'nursing' a best-seller would object to its being advertised as such!

Anonymous criticism is very easy (if you can get an editor to publish it), but it also seems to me to be rather cowardly, and surely the entire raison d'être of criticism is nullified if readers do not know definitely to what the criticism refers, so, Sir, I ask for names.—Yours, &c.,

15, Frognal,
Hampstead, N.W.3.

ALBERT W. KETÉLÉRY.

March 22, 1922.

Sharps and Flats

I have just been reading, playing, and singing some seventy-five songs for the fifth or sixth time. It must have been rather trying to my neighbours. . . .
L. Duntun Green.

No musician ever makes a noise.—Herbert Fryer.

I consider myself a melodist and a classic. That is all.—Alfredo Casella.

Perhaps the most inspiring moment of the whole ceremony of the Royal Wedding was the famous Sevenfold Amen. Unaccompanied by the organ, the choir's voice thrilled through the building until it melted away in a whisper.—Lady Diana Manners.

The most beautiful feature of the marriage ceremony was the singing of the choir—particularly when they sang Stainer's Sevenfold Amen was their singing perfection. 'It made you feel as though you were among the angels,' said someone who was there.—Hannen Swaffer.

The auditorium could have accommodated three times the number of patrons had the seating capacity made it possible.—Rene Devries, Musical Courier.

I cling to my right to regard most of Bach's Fugues—there are exceptions—as objective music, which I am free to endow with as much humour as I like . . . So, to me, the '48' will remain a jovial companion to the end.—Edwin Evans.

We had a long recital by Madame Vera Lavrova (Baroness Royce Garrett). . . . At the same concert a number of pianoforte solos were played by the Princess Galitzine-Poushchine. I came away a democrat.—Ernest Newman.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players.

South Hampstead and St. John's Wood, N.W. There are vacancies for good amateur instrumentalists in the Amateur Orchestral Society. Meetings on Thursday evenings in the Lecture Hall of the New College Chapel, Adelaide Road entrance. Low fees. Music provided.—Apply, WATSON HARDING, 6A, Upper Park Road, N.W. 3.

Mezzo-soprano wishes to join party or meet accompanist for mutual study.—M. A. A., c/o Musical Times.

Viola player (gentleman) wishes to join string quartet, meeting preferably in S.E. London district.—A. J., c/o Musical Times.

Young gentleman, experienced, would like to join good male-voice quartet or small concert party requiring a 2nd bass; Kensington district preferred.—Write, H. S. H., c/o Musical Times.

Young pianist (gentleman) wishes to meet a young tenor or soprano for mutual morning practice. S.W. or W. districts preferred.—H. J. T., 1A, Adeney Road, Hammersmith, W.6.

Bass, who is in London alternate week-ends, would give services to Church choir. Also would like to hear of accompanist for mutual practice. West London.—B. A. S. S., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (lady) wishes to practise oratorios and songs of Tchaikovsky, Schubert, &c., with first-class baritone.—Write, T. J., c/o Hadson, 238, Brixton Road, S.W.9.

Gentleman (23), with well-trained tenor voice, desires to meet a pianist for mutual practice, for two or three evenings a week. London, S.W. district.—H. G., c/o Musical Times.

Pianist (young lady) would like to meet good violinist and 'cellist. Small Heath, Birmingham.—PASTORAL, c/o Musical Times.

Quartet, North London, seeks experienced and enthusiastic amateur 'cellist (male).—KINGSBRIDGE, c/o Musical Times.

Violist would like to meet violinist or pianist for mutual practice, or would join trio, quartet, or orchestra.—J. S. HALL, 55, Gt. Marlborough Street, W. 1.

Accompanist (male), good pianist, wishes to meet vocalists or instrumentalists with view to mutual practice. North London preferred.—A. BIGGS, 10, St. Edmund's Terrace, Regent's Park, N.W.8.

Young lady, pianist, would like to meet violinist or 'cellist (or both) for mutual practice on Monday, Thursday, Saturday, or Sunday evenings.—E. Sydenham, 31A, Victoria Road, Upper Norwood, S.E.19.

Wanted.—Good 'cellist, living in Blackburn or Darwen districts, to join amateur enthusiasts (flute, three violins, and pianoforte, ages 14-17), also players of the viola, double-bass, bassoon, &c., for a small amateur orchestra.—WALTER MITCHELL, 82, Blackburn Road, Darwen, Lancs.

Keen Lovers of Music are invited to join small string orchestra; amateurs only. Rehearsals, Tuesdays, 7 to 9. Central London.—SECRETARY, 12, Sandmere Road, S.W. 4.

Mezzo-Contralto, some professional experience, would like to meet lady pianist accompanist for mutual practice. District, S.W.2.—A. N. H., c/o Musical Times.

Vacancies in St. Matthew's Amateur Orchestra for 'cello double-bass, and efficient brass and wind players. Rehearsals on Saturdays, 5.30.—Parochial Hall, Wandsworth Bridge Road. Conductor, E. H. Melling, F.R.C.O.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of April, 1862:

EXETER HALL.—The third of the Great Choral Meetings of the London Division of the Handel Festival Choir took place on March 21, under the direction of Mr. Costa. The sixteen hundred members of the choir occupied the greater portion of the body of the hall, as usual leaving but little space for the musical public who were desirous of testing the effect produced by so vast a number. The programme for the evening comprised the choruses from Handel's Solomon, which are to be included in the second, or selection day, at the forthcoming performance at the Crystal Palace. The principal defects observable upon this occasion were the extreme weakness of the soprano voices and the overpowering tone of the tenors. The directors would do well to add considerably to their female voices. It must be well known that half the young ladies, if they sing at all, have but very feeble voices, while there is a much greater number of real singers among the men. Although there was of course some unsteadiness and incorrectness, yet it was wonderful how well the music generally was sung. There is a breadth and grandeur about the choruses from Solomon that will be productive of superb effect in the immense area of the Crystal Palace.

SIGNOR GIUGLINI'S favourite Romanza, 'O breathe those thrilling notes again.' Sung by him with great applause. Composed expressly for him by Emanuel Nelson. Price 2s. 6d., post-free. Liverpool, Magasin de Musique, 63, Bold Street.

MODERN DEVELOPMENTS IN MUSIC

A large audience assembled at the meeting of the British Association, on January 10, to hear Mr. Eugène Goossens discourse on the above subject. After alluding to the conservatism of musicians as a body, and deprecating the attitude of extremists—whether propagandists or reactionaries—Mr. Goossens said that in order to examine the situation dispassionately and without prejudice, we must rid our minds of trivialities and accept as inevitable every evidence of the enduring work of the past on the one hand, and significant progression of to-day on the other. The so-called modern movement might be said to date, roughly, from the beginning of the present century, chiefly in the work of men such as Stravinsky, Schönberg, Ravel, and certain of our own younger composers.

The technique of modern composition was a very different matter compared with that of former generations. The technical means at our disposal were so much more extensive, and the intricacies of harmonic speech were so much more elaborate and involved, that the present-day composer was very hard put to it to express himself in terms which might be considered at all different from his immediate predecessors. Harmony was used in a different manner from that of our forefathers, for now it not only served us as a backing, but most often constituted the whole raison d'être of the work. Rules for correct harmonic deportment were non-existent in the modern composer's code of musical manners, and still the possibilities remained infinite and capable of yet further exploitation. It was not to be assumed, however, that the modern employment of harmony had ousted melody. Certain composers had discovered that certain harmonic progressions, and certain methods of employing chromatic harmony, did themselves create melody. It was harmonic speech, as exemplified in the work of Stravinsky, Schönberg, and others, which alone would serve as illustration of development. The objective use of harmony, or a combination of particular sounds, was nowhere better exemplified than in the work of Stravinsky, which abounded in examples of daring, skillful, and sometimes brutal passages, to which no text-book could provide the key, and which was alone justified by the result achieved.

Emotion in music to-day might be differently expressed, but it was none the less as much behind every great modern work of art as it was behind the masterpieces of Bach and Beethoven. The methods of expressing it were very much more extensive, and it was the objectiveness and forcible directness of modern art which so misled the sentimental in this connection. Why should melody alone (in its diatonic sense) represent the only vehicle for real depth of expression? Who would deny the expressiveness of great modern works wherein the utmost possible emotional effect was achieved by an absolute inevitability of harmony and rhythm? In these days of shifting chromaticism it was the result of the combined rhythmic, harmonic, and melodic effect, and not necessarily harmony, or rhythm, or melody per se which was designed to convey the emotional meaning.

It was interesting to note the fondness of the modern writer for the somewhat cold precision and uncompromising qualities of wind instruments. This was almost a mild revulsion against the excessive abuses which had crept into the string-playing of some of our orchestras, wherein the strings as a body have full license to wallow in excessive rubato, vibrato, portamento, and other evils which did so much to detract from the musical value of so many impressive passages. Composers nowadays could therefore trust a simple unadorned theme to a wind instrument with far fewer misgivings than would be the case had the passage been relegated to the tender mercies of an over-sentimental violinist. In point of fact, the strings of the orchestra were far more constantly employed in a rhythmic, figurative, or percussive capacity than was the case formerly.

A feature of modern development, particularly in the matter of form, was the manner in which each successive work of our generation evinced more and more a tendency to eliminate ornamentation and excessive length of subject-matter. Ornament in music had recently reached a climax of fussiness and stupidity, and was often a mere pretext for covering over the bare bones of the work with a minimum of labour and a maximum of cheap effect. The poverty of thematic material which could be camouflaged in this manner was astonishing, but the resultant effect was hardly convincing. Nowadays the composer was taking a leaf out of the book of such giants as Bach and Beethoven, inasmuch as their constructive processes and the intrinsic strength and value of their musical foundation were eminently satisfying.

As regarded rhythm, the present tendency seemed to be reverting to the manifestations of the sub-conscious mind and abandoning ourselves to everything and anything but the 'set' rhythm. Elemental rhythms were in themselves a rather useful antidote to counteract the somewhat heavy glut of programme-music which many composers of to-day thought indispensable to public appreciation.

If music was to develop on normal progressive lines, the public must keep in touch with every manifestation of the actual developments which were taking place to-day. Both press and public were unwilling to throw their sense of the proprieties overboard and frankly accept once and for all the evidence of a new speech. It was necessary to keep in touch very closely with all the evidences of a progress which had gone before, for it was impossible to appreciate a significant modern art-work without studying to some extent the influences and examples which had led up to the creation of that work. We talked airily of classics, romantics, and moderns in a sense of watertight compartments with no sense at all of their very intimate co-relationship. It was obvious that unless all who profess any show of interest in music can keep abreast of the times, development in itself will be a slow process.

The fact was that art in general and music in particular did not play the part in our national life that it ought to do. We did not realise that every new evidence in the functioning of art was as important to our national welfare as any scheme of social or economic politics. Following upon the general stagnation of the past six years, a very energetic awakening among artists had occurred. In no art was this shown so completely as in music, and in no country more than our own. There was tremendous activity; London was the musical centre of Europe, where could be heard the finest music of to-day incomparably performed and interpreted. Providing the public would renounce its musical snobism and approach the business of hearing music with an open mind and a high degree of concentration; if all artists would work together in co-operation and shun mediocrity; and if we could forget occasionally the word 'British' and think of Art as a thing cosmopolitan and international, the next few years should show a condition of music and musical art in which all that was best and finest would immediately receive due recognition, and the mediocre and the immature be confined to outer darkness.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

Two performances of the Yeomen of the Guard were given by the students, under the direction of Mr. Cairns James and Mr. Henry Beauchamp, on February 17 and 18, the cast being changed for each evening. Apart from a few weak points the productions reached a high level, both in singing and acting, and reflected much credit upon the pupils and their teachers.

The chamber concert on Wednesday, March 1, opened with an excellent performance of Bach's Concerto in C major for two pianofortes (Messrs. Alan Bush and Roy Ellett), accompanied by the Junior Orchestra under Mr. Spencer Dyke. Amongst other interesting items in the programme may be mentioned the first movements of a Pianoforte Sonata by Balakirev (Miss Olive Pull), of a Pianoforte and Violin Sonata by Arnold Bax (Misses Eileen Wright and Madeleine Windsor), and of Frank Bridge's Pianoforte Quintet. The programme also included songs by A. Bax and Michael Head, a Caprice for the harp by Pierné (Miss Florence Edgcombe), and three movements from Schumann's Pianoforte Quintet.

On Wednesday, March 8, the choral class gave an admirable reading of Benjamin Dale's Before the paling of the stars and Dvorák's The Spectre's Bride, the former under the direction of the composer and the latter under Mr. Henry Beauchamp.

On Thursday afternoon, March 2, the Bishop of London, who had only recently recovered from a very serious illness, gave an interesting address to the students in the Duke's Hall. He explained to them that his chief reason for doing so was his desire that they should regard him as their Bishop, as he was regarded by other classes and professions which centred largely in London.

The death of Mr. Oscar Beringer has removed one of the oldest and distinguished professors. For many years he held a foremost position amongst pianoforte teachers in London, and as a member of the Committee of Management he had rendered long and valuable service to the Royal Academy of Music.

The Stierndale Bennett Prize (pianoforte) has been awarded to Betty Hunby (a native of London), Denise Lassimonne being very highly commended, and Joan Lloyd and Elsie Betts commended. The adjudicators were Miss Jessie Davies and Madame Elsie Horne. The Charles Mortimer Prize (composition) has been awarded to Kathleen V. Summers (a native of Buckhurst Hill), Leslie Cochran being commended. The adjudicator was Mr. Alec Rowley. The Goldberg Prize (singing) was awarded to Roy G. Henderson (of Edinburgh), H. Foden-Pattinson being highly commended. The adjudicators were Messrs. Frederick B. Ranslow, Arthur Walenn, and J. Mewburn Levien (chairman). The Joseph Maas Prize (tenors) has been awarded to Manuel Jones (of Ferndale, Wales), Denys Erlam being commended. The adjudicators were Messrs. Alfred Gibson and W. Henry Thomas.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The orchestral rehearsals held under the auspices of the Patron's Fund are enlarging their scope, and a scheme is now in operation which provides for a series of rehearsals as follows:

- (a) For British composers, irrespective of age or sex, affording them an opportunity for hearing their works played by a first-rate professional orchestra, and to the public, the critics, and students of music the opportunity for acquainting themselves at first hand with what is being done in this country in the way of British composition.

- (b) For British executive artists (singers and instrumentalists), giving them an opportunity for performing under the conditions, approximately, of a public appearance. For the present they will be drawn chiefly from the principal musical institutions of the country.
- (c) For British conductors who have had few opportunities for working with a full orchestra.
- (d) Of extracts from new operas by British composers. These will be rehearsed in the Parry Opera Theatre of the College, and will give an opportunity for assessing their value from the stage point of view.

A rehearsal of type (a) took place on February 16, type (b) on February 9, and types (b) and (c) combined on March 9. At all of these the New Queen's Hall Orchestra played, conducted by Dr. Adrian C. Boult.

There have been two private dress rehearsals of Madame Butterfly in the Parry Opera Theatre, on March 6 and 13, produced by Mr. L. Cairns James and conducted by Mr. S. P. Waddington.

There have been five chamber concerts, one choral and orchestral concert (notable for the second performance of Vaughan Williams's Pastoral Symphony conducted by Dr. Boult, and for Hulst's Hymn of Jesus, conducted by Sir Hugh Allen), and several 'informals,' at one of which four members of Dr. Boult's conducting class each directed a movement of Mozart's G minor Symphony.

M. J.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

By the death of Sir John D. McClure, the distinguished headmaster of Mill Hill School, the College has lost a highly valued friend and active supporter. Sir John's first connection with the College arose when he was preparing under Dr. C. W. Pearce for the D.Mus. London degree. This was quickly followed by his appointment as a member of the Corporation and of the Board, of which former body he afterwards accepted the office of chairman. Only a week before his death he represented the College at a distribution of certificates at New Cross, a function that proved to be so unexpectedly the occasion for his last service to the College.

Possibly little more evidence is needed to demonstrate the very live condition prevalent amongst the students than that afforded by the necessity that has arisen for forming a Social Club. As usual the Club will be open to past and present students, together with the professorial staff, and will receive the whole-hearted support of the College authorities. With a present terminal roll of more than six hundred students, the success of the movement is fully assured. The secretary of the Club will be pleased to hear from any past students thus wishing to renew or more firmly establish their association with the College at headquarters.

That the end of the term approaches has been manifested by the special students' concert given recently at the College, the chamber music and choir concert given at Steinway Hall, and the orchestral concert at Queen's Hall, all of which fixtures are the usual features of the rounding off of the term's work.

Quite a large number of distributions of certificates were held during the month, the list of the centres including the names of such separated towns as Reading, Bath, Dover, Wrexham, Kettering, and, in London, West Ham and Walthamstow. At this last centre H.R.H. Princess Louise (Duchess of Argyll) was graciously pleased to attend and make the awards.

Mr. Cyril Scott played his Pianoforte Concerto at Vienna on February 20, the conductor being Nls Grevillius, of Stockholm. J. D. Davis's new Violoncello Concerto was announced for March 25 at Berlin. M. Jacques van Lier being the soloist and Mr. Appleby Matthews the conductor. M. van Lier also promises Elgar's Concerto at Berlin, and has invited Mr. Dan Godfrey to conduct it.

Music in the Provinces

BARNSELEY.—The St. Cecilia Society gave King Olaf on March 9 in collaboration with a good orchestra. Dr. J. F. Station conducted, and the soloists were Miss Edith Wright, Mr. Harold Jolley, and Mr. Frank Holroyd.

BARNSTAPLE.—On February 18, the recently-formed Ladies' Choir, conducted by Mr. Alfred Long, sang Horne's A Choral Hallelujah, My true love (Challinor), I saw lovely Phyllis (Miller), and The song of the bees (Sargent).—The Orchestral Society, which consists entirely of amateurs and is conducted by Mr. J. W. Brannan, on February 27 played Coleridge-Taylor's Petite Suite de Concert, Elgar's Pomp and Circumstance, a Suite from Monsieur Beaucaire (Rosse-Bucalossi), The Caliph of Bagdad (Boieldieu), and a selection from The Gondoliers. The educational value of the work of this Society is wisely assisted by annotated programmes.

BEN RHYDDING (YORKS).—Franck's Pianoforte Quintet, Elgar's Quintet, and Haydn's Quartet in D, No. 5, comprised the main part of the chamber-music programme arranged by Mr. Raymond Hartley on March 7. The Ghent String Quartet were the players, and Miss Etty Ferguson sang.

BRETHESDA (NORTH WALES).—Mr. R. D. Griffith has formed a choir for oratorio work, and on March 15 Judas Maccabaeus was performed with orchestra. Mr. Griffith, an amateur musician, is doing splendid musical work in this big quarrying village.

BINGLEY.—Bingley and District Orchestral Society wisely restricted its programme on March 7 to music suited to its resources, and thus gave a creditable performance of the Jupiter Symphony, played, according to the custom of the Society, with the movements separated by solo items. Violin solos were played by Miss Jessie Hinchliffe, and the vocalist was Miss Alice Moxon.

BIRMINGHAM.—The closing Mossel concert of the present season, on February 25, was orchestral, a well-found little orchestra being conducted by Mr. Julius Harrison. Mozart's Hafner Symphony was played, but the most interesting number was Wolf's orchestral arrangement of his Italian Serenade Quartet, in which was heard charming viola, flute, and violoncello playing. Rhythmically, it is one of the most fascinating things in music. Hamilton Harty's arrangement of Handel's Water Music, two little pieces by Chabrier, and the conductor's jolly Widdicombe Fair, were played, and also Mozart's Violin Concerto, with Miss Daisy Kennedy as soloist; she also giving some Bach pieces for violin unaccompanied.—Dr. Albert Schweitzer gave at Birmingham (Carr's Lane), on February 27, 'An hour of religious music,' playing the Bach Organ Prelude and Fugue in G major and Epiphany Choral Preludes, displaying Bach as a mystic.—The series of 'celebrity' concerts closed on March 3 with an orchestral programme by the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra, conducted by Sir Landon Ronald, comprising the Hansel and Gretel Overture, music from The Mastersingers, and Elgar's Enigma Variations. Miss Irene Scharrer was the soloist in Liszt's Hungarian Fantasia, and Miss Florence Austral was the vocalist.—Solihull Musical Society on March 13 was conducted by Mr. Tracy James in Hamerik's Symphonic Spirituelle and music by Bach and Mozart. The choir sang Grieg's Landerkenning and Percy Godfrey's The Song of the Amal.—St. Paul was sung in the Town Hall on the same date in conscientious manner, conducted by Mr. Adams, with Mr. C. W. Perkins at the organ. The soloists were Miss Lilian Green, Mr. Arthur Gilbert, and Mr. Frank Macnamara.—The City Orchestra, at Bearwood, on March 12, produced a Serenade for strings by Alfred M. Hale. Mr. Appleby Matthews conducted this, and familiar light music, including Lully's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. Mr. Paul Beard played violin music, and Mr. Harold Casey and Miss Eva Benson were the vocalists.—This Orchestra's last Wednesday concert for the season on March 8 was conducted by Sir Landon Ronald, and included Brahms's Symphony in D (No. 2) and Delius's Brigg Fair.—A choir of workers, conducted by Mr. T. A. Charge, sang at a concert of the Arcadian Musical Society on March 15, their programme including Boughton's Early Morn and Charles Wood's Full fathom five.

BLACKPOOL.—The fourth of the Chamber Concert Society's series was provided by the Manchester Ladies' Trio, who played Dvorák in F minor and Beethoven in B flat. —The Creation was performed by the Adelaide Street Wesleyan Choir on March 5, conducted by Mr. Herbert Whittaker. —The Royal Albert Hall Orchestra, conducted by Sir Landon Ronald, visited the town on March 5.

BOURNEMOUTH.—Mr. Eugène Goossens's first visit to Bournemouth was on the occasion of the annual benefit concert of the Municipal Orchestra on February 15. The conductor's arrangement of Bach movements (originally written for Phæbus and Pan) and his Tam o' Shanter received their first performance at Bournemouth. The Don Giovanni Overture, Percy Grainger's Irish Tune and Shepherd's Hey were also given. Miss Marie Hall played the Bach Chaconne and two movements from Gordon Bryan's Suite (which she recently produced in London), with the composer at the pianoforte. —On February 16 Mr. Dan Goffrey conducted Rimsky-Korsakov's Capriccio Espagnol, Ernest Farrar's English Pastoral Impressions, and the New World Symphony. —On February 23 Vaughan Williams's London Symphony was given its fifth performance at these concerts, and Somervell's Highland Pianoforte Concerto was played.

BRADFORD.—Pianoforte trios played by Messrs. Dunsford (violin), Bentley (cello), and Midgley (pianoforte) were the feature of the Free Chamber concert on February 20. Beethoven's Op. 70 and Dvorák's Trio in G minor were played, and the other instrumental number was Stanford's Cello and Pianoforte Sonata in A. Miss Alice Moxon sang duets by Liszt, Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Cyril Scott, Quilter, and Frank Bridge. —On February 18 the Permanent Orchestra was joined by Mr. Frank Mercer, a local pianist, in Beethoven's Concerto in C minor, under the baton of Mr. Eugène Goossens, who also conducted his own By the Tarn and Liszt's Les Préludes. The concert was to have been conducted by the late Mr. Julian Clifford, and in his memory his poetic piece Lights out was given, under the baton of his son. Miss Doris Vane was the vocalist. —At the concert given by the Permanent Orchestra on March 11, Miss Bessie Rawlins played the Kreutzer Sonata, the Orchestra gave Mr. Hamilton Harty's arrangement of the Handel Water Music and Butterworth's Banks of Green Willow, and Mr. Percy Allatt sang two new songs by Mr. Julius Harrison, the conductor. —The Old Choral Society, closing its centenary season on March 15, gave Debussy's Blessed Damsel, Parry's Pied Piper, some of Stanford's Songs of the Sea, with Mr. Edward Hughes as soloist, and Rossini's Stabat Mater. The able conductor was Mr. Wilfred Knight. —The subscription chamber concert on March 10 was of exceptional character, for the programme was provided by the Hallé Wind Quintet, with Mr. Hamilton Harty at the pianoforte. Beethoven's Quintet in E flat (Op. 16), Bach's Flute Sonata in B minor, Brahms's Clarinet Sonata in F minor, and a Sextet by Ludwig Thuille were played.

BRAMPTON (CUMBERLAND).—On February 23 the Choral Society, numbering a hundred and fifty, was conducted by Mr. Drakeford in Handel's Ode on St. Cecilia's Day, a Madrigal by Walmisley, and choruses from Faust.

BRISTOL.—On February 21 Miss Dorothy Godwin gave a harp recital, assisted by Mr. Edgar Hawke (violin), Mr. Frank Taylor (pianoforte), and Miss Gertrude Winchester (vocalist). —The Royal Orpheus Glee Society on February 23 held its seventy-eighth annual ladies' night, and, conducted by Mr. George Risely, sang part-songs by Cooke, Lovatt, Walmisley, Moore, Hegar, and Lee Williams. —The Great Western Choral Society on February 28 was conducted by Mr. G. A. Beavis in Stanford's Phauldrie Crohoore.

CARDIFF.—The Musical Society, conducted by Mr. T. G. Aylward, sang part-songs of different epochs from Palestrina to Debussy and John Ireland, at its second concert of the season. —Mr. Herbert Ware's String Orchestra, on February 26, was heard chiefly in Mozart. The players were assisted by Mr. Zacharewitsch (violin), Miss Doris Woodall and Mr. William Boland (vocalists). —On February 26 the Catholic Choral Society, in conjunction with Mr. Garforth Mortimer's Orchestra, performed Mozart's twelfth Mass, conducted by Mr. T. J. O'Leary.

COLLINGHAM.—M. de Greef, during a recital on February 23, played Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor, two Scarlatti pieces, a Country-Dance (arranged by himself from one of Grétry's operas), Saint-Saëns's Variations and Fugue on themes from Aleste, and a showy Tarantella of Moszkowski. Mr. Roy Russell sang modern songs and Schumann's Dichterliebe, with Mr. Lloyd Hartley at the pianoforte. —Miss Keighley Snowden (pianoforte) and her brother, Mr. John Snowden (violinocello) played Brahms's Sonata in E minor on February 18; also a Folk-tale of Arnold Bax and some pieces by Purcell Warren. The violinocellist played an unaccompanied Suite of Bach, and Miss Elsie Suddaby sang Delius's To Daffodils and Armstrong Gibbs's The fields are full.

COVENTRY.—Mr. John Chapman conducted the Musical Club on February 23, when a fine performance was given of Bantock's War Song of the Saracens, with Miss Annie Danks and Miss Emily Rudge as solo vocalists and Mr. Walter Heard as flautist.

CUDWORTH (YORKS).—The Choral Society is a remarkable body for so small a village, and quite creditably sang Cowen's The Rose Maiden on March 13, and unaccompanied part-songs.

DUMFRIES.—Parry's Blest Pair of Sirens opened the concert of the Mechanics' Institute Choir on March 15, and Stanford's Phauldrie Crohoore occurred later in the course of an excellent programme, which Mr. C. F. Eastwood conducted.

EDINBURGH.—The Reid Orchestra collaborated on March 11 with the Royal Choral Union in a fine performance of the Choral Symphony, conducted by Prof. Tovey, Miss Flora Mann, Miss Lilian Berger, Mr. Steuart Wilson, and Mr. Clive Carey being the solo vocalists. Gustav Holst's Hymn of Jesus was given under the direction of Mr. Greenhouse Allt. —The last of the Mossel concerts on March 4 was orchestral, Mr. Julius Harrison conducting. The orchestra, consisted only of some thirty performers, played well in Wolf's Italian Serenade, two movements from Chabrier's Suite Pastorale, and Mr. Harrison's Humoreske and Widdicombe Fair. —For the Reid Orchestral Concert on March 4, Prof. Tovey secured the co-operation of the Royal Choral Union, and gave Gustav Holst's Hymn of Jesus. The choir also sang Parry's Blest Pair of Sirens, conducted by Mr. Greenhouse Allt. Of special interest was the performance of Beethoven's Triple Concerto for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello, with Miss Mary Grierson, Mr. Camillo Ritter, and Miss Ruth Waddell as soloists. —The three weeks' season of the British National Opera Company opened on March 6 with Aida, and on the following day Parsifal was given. A novelty for Scotland was Offenbach's Goldsmith of Toledo, and The Mastersingers was included in the repertoire.

GLASGOW.—In the course of its season, the Carl Rosa Opera Company, on February 20, gave Die Meistersinger with great success. Included in the company is a young local artist, Miss Maude Neilson, who has been equally successful in such different rôles as the Doll in Tales of Hoffmann and Micaela in Carmen. —With half-a-century of useful work to its credit, Glasgow Amateur Orchestra, on February 18, scored a success with a fine interpretation of Beethoven's seventh Symphony and a Hungarian Dance of Berlioz, Mr. Herbert A. Carruthers conducting. —On February 23, the Bach Society, conducted by Mr. A. M. Henderson, gave performances of the Concerto for two violins and pianoforte in D, and Arthur Somervell's Conversations about Bach. The choir sang the Chorales, O sacred Head now wounded and What tongue can tell Thy greatness? with violin obbligato. —The Ingram Musical Association, members of which are drawn from the employees of Messrs. J. & W. Campbell, was conducted by Mr. John Brown (in the absence of Mr. Robert Brown) in part-songs and choruses on March 1. —On March 11 Mr. William Robertson, conductor of the William Morris Choir, secured a good performance of an interesting programme of Madrigals and part-songs. Miss Jelly d'Aranyi played violin solos.—The University Choral Society on March 10 gave an interesting concert under the direction of Mr. A. M. Henderson. The choir was equally successful in a Palestrina Motet and in Gustav Holst's setting of Psalm 86 for tenor solo and mixed choir. The female voices sang Ireland's Aubade, and the male voices two songs by Walford Davies for baritone solo and male voices—Fear no more the heat of the sun and For a' that. Miss Helen Henschel sang to her own accompaniment, and Mr. Henderson played modern Russian pianoforte music.

GUERNSEY.—The annual Festival of the Guille Allès Choral and Orchestral Association, on February 23 and 24, surpassed all previous records of success. The programmes included Elijah, The Revenge, and Hubert Bath's Wedding of Shon Maclean. Mr. John David conducted, and the soloists were Miss Cecilia Farrar, Miss Ethel Peake, Mr. Albert Downing, and Mr. Herbert Parker.

HALIFAX.—The Choral Society has suffered a blow in the resignation of Mr. C. H. Moody, who has rendered great service to the Society since he succeeded Mr. H. A. Fricker in 1917. The farewell concert, on March 3, produced enthusiastic recognition of his labours. The Leeds Symphony Orchestra played the Merry Wives of Windsor Overture of Nicolai and Tchaikovsky's Casse Noisette Suite, and accompanied various choral numbers. Stanford's Songs of the Fleet (with Mr. Norman Allin as soloist) and Frederick Cliffe's Ode to the North-East Wind were sung, and numbers for ladies' voices included The Witches' Carnival, by Percy E. Fletcher. Basil Harwood's Organ Concerto, with orchestra, composed for the Gloucester Festival of 1910, was played by Mr. Shackleton Pollard.

HUDDERSFIELD.—The Glee and Madrigal Society gave a good programme on February 21, conducted by Mr. C. H. Moody, whose expressive Elegy, Give rest, O Christ opened the programme. Other pieces sung were As Vesta was (Weelkes), My bonny lass (Morley), Chivalry of the Sea (Parry), Country-Dance, Choral-Dance, and the King Arthur folk-song (Rutland Boughton), and some pieces for women's voices by Bantock and MacDowell.—The Philharmonic Society, composed of amateurs and therefore an educational institution, did its best—and very well, too—on March 4 in the Andante and Finale of Schubert's Symphony in C and in Grieg's Piano-forte Concerto, Mr. F. J. Sykes conducting and Miss Frances Cocking being the soloist. A novelty was an Elegy for strings and percussion by Mr. Thomas H. Clay, who conducted. Fould's Keltic Suite was effectively played.

HULL.—The Harmonic Society, on February 24, gave a performance of Rossini's Stabat Mater, conducted by Mr. Walter Porter, and also sang the Easter Hymn from Cavalleria Rusticana. The orchestra played the Meister-singer and Rosamunde Overtures.

ILFRACOMBE.—The Choral and Orchestral Society presented a programme on March 1. The latter organization—composed entirely of local players—has for some time benefited by the training of Mr. Watt-Smyth, and this occasion provided an opportunity for hearing the combined forces under his direction. The orchestral numbers included Coleridge-Taylor's Othello Suite and Tchaikovsky's Trepak.

KELSO (N.B.).—The Choral Union, consisting of a hundred voices under the conductorship of Mr. M. B. Kidd, sang Gade's Erl King's Daughter and Gounod's Gallia on February 22.—Mr. Kidd has also organized three chamber concerts, the Edinburgh String Quartet being the chief performers. Prof. Tovey joined them as pianist in the Elgar Quintet.

LEEDS.—The Philharmonic Society, on February 15, performed for the first time Elgar's The Music-Makers, conducted by Dr. E. C. Bairstow. The choir sang with close observance of every nuance, and the playing of the Leeds Symphony Orchestra was of a high standard. Miss Dilys Jones was the soloist. Delius's Concerto in C minor was given, with Mr. Frederick Dawson as pianist, and this player also introduced an Impression, Water Pearls, by a Yorkshire composer, Mr. William Baines. The choir was hardly up to its usual standard in Bach's Sing ye to the Lord. According to custom, the concert closed with Parry's Jerusalem, effectively orchestrated by an anonymous hand.—At the University, on March 13, Mr. Hoggett discussed Brahms and his songs, and Miss G. V. Selby sang several examples in German. Russian music was a feature of the programme given at Leeds University on March 13 in aid of distressed Russian students. Songs by Purcell, Strauss, Bemberg, and Dunhill (Cloths of Heaven) were sung by Madame Hopper.—On the same date the Arts Club gave a concert of works by contemporary British composers, including Elgar's Sonata for pianoforte and violin, German's Bacchanalian Dance for violin and pianoforte, music by Balfour Gardiner and Cyril Scott, songs by Elgar (Like to the damask rose), Graham Peel, Frank Bridge, John Ireland, Rutland Boughton, and Roger Quilter.—The programme of the Symphony Society on March 4 was interesting without being hackneyed. Conducted by Mr. Harold Mason, the orchestra was happier in the Prometheus Overture and in the Larghetto and Finale of Beethoven's second Symphony than in Quilter's Children's Overture. The Pavane from German's Romeo and Juliet Suite and the Gopak of Moussorgsky provided contrast, and an Albumblatt by Wagner completed the list of orchestral pieces. Vocal items were given by Mr. F. Lewis and Miss K. Burnell.—M. Kolni-Balozky, who is on the staff of Leeds University and happens to be a capable musician, has formed a students' orchestra, which made an auspicious beginning on March 7. It is at present wanting in balance, the lower strings being weak. A few professionals were enlisted, and Mr. Nagley led and also played Bach solos. The orchestra played three dances by Purcell, a Serenade by Elgar, The Deluge (Saint-Saëns), and Grainger's Molly on the Shore.

LEICESTER.—Dr. Malcolm Sargent, organist of Melton Mowbray parish church, at the recent Hallé orchestral concert conducted A night with Pan, a new orchestral work of his own. Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted Ravel's Suite Ma Mère l'Oye and Rimsky-Korsakov's Scheherazade.—The Glee and Madrigal Society at its second concert of the season sang music by Palestrina.—It is proposed to form a permanent Symphony Orchestra at Leicester under the direction of Dr. Malcolm Sargent, and four concerts are planned for next season. The existing organizations for giving orchestral concerts are the Leicester Orchestral Union with its annual concert under Major L. V. Wykes, and the Philharmonic Society, whose last concert was conducted by Sir Henry Wood.

LINDFIELD (SUSSEX).—The Musical Society, at its first concert, on February 22, numbered fifty performers and gave well-balanced performances of The Revenge, Elgar's The Snow, and Eaton Fanning's Daybreak. Dr. Henry T. Pringle conducted. Charles Hambourg's String Quartet played some Mendelssohn music.

LIVERPOOL.—At Mr. Crane's matinée concert on March 1, Elgar's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata was played by Miss Nanette Evans, a Welsh violinist, and Mr. Anderson Tyrer, and the latter also played an Étude in F minor by Lloyd Hartley, the Bach-Busoni Chaconne, and a Chopin group.—On February 28 Moiseiwitsch played Rachmaninov's Piano-forte Concerto No. 2, in C minor, with the Liverpool Philharmonic Orchestra, Mr. Julius Harrison conducting. Of special interest was the first performance at Liverpool of the conductor's Worcestershire Suite. The Philharmonic Choir sang part-songs—In these delightful, pleasant groves (Purcell) and O happy eyes (Elgar).—The British Music Society on March 8 devoted itself to the music of Arthur Bliss, who lectured on 'Tendencies in Modern Music,' and expounded the possibilities of the chamber orchestra. Demonstrations were given of the unusual combinations for which Mr. Bliss writes, such as voice and clarinet, voice and string quartet, two voices and chamber orchestra, voice (without words) and orchestra, as in Rout. The vocalists were Miss Grace Crawford (soprano) and Mr. Gerald Cooper (tenor), with an orchestra of ten.—There is in this city a dearth of first-class orchestral concerts of popular character, and therefore the visit of the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra on March 4, conducted by Sir Landon Ronald, was particularly welcome.

The chief attraction was Elgar's Enigma Variations, and the programme included excerpts from The Mastersingers and Hansel and Gretel, the Passepied from Delibes's Le roi s'amuse, and Liszt's Pianoforte Fantasia on his fourteenth Rhapsody (with Miss Katharine Goodson as pianist). Miss Leila Megane was the vocalist.—The National Opera Company closed a two weeks' run of unparalleled success, on March 4, with Tannhäuser, and left behind it a very solid satisfaction.—Miss Lucy Pierce, giving a pianoforte recital on March 8, played the Handel-Brahms Variations and Saint-Saëns's Caprice on the Alceste music.—The Post Office Choral Society sang St. John's Eve on March 8, conducted by Mr. Arthur Davies, and supported by an orchestra.—Audrey Smith, a ten-year-old pianist, gave a recital on March 9, showing an inner impulse as well as good teaching. Her brother Rodney, still younger, played the violin with confidence and good technique.—Recent recitals include that of Miss Marion Keighley Snowden, with four Sonatas of Scarlatti.

LONG EATON.—Mr. W. Woolley gave a sketch of the life and work of Sir Edward Elgar on February 11, with vocal illustrations by the Co-operative Senior Choir, including How calmly the evening, O happy eyes, As torrents in summer, Weary wind of the West, The Snow, and My love dwelt in a Northern land.

MANCHESTER.—The Hallé concert on February 24 was an exceptional success, for the music was not just such as he who runs may read. It was in some ways even forbidding, yet numbers and enthusiasm ran high. Busoni was the pianist in Liszt's Concerto No. 2, and also played his own Chamber Fantasy on Carmen and Liszt's E flat Paganini Study. Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted the orchestra, and memorable were the Valses Nobles et Sentimentales of Ravel, which followed Wagner's Faust Overture. Gustav Holst's The Planets suffered for lack of understanding (to be gained only by long acquaintance) and certainly left the listener who expected purely æsthetic delight a little flabbergasted.—The concluding Harty-Catterall recital for the season, on February 25, created the finest and most decisive effect in unfamiliar music. The Sonata in A by Pizzetti made a clear impression of distinction and beauty. Schumann's Sonata in D minor and one of Grieg's Sonatas completed the programme.—The C.W.S. concerts are now seriously established, though the programme on March 2 was somewhat too miscellaneous. Cyril Jenkins's Fallen Heroes and Schubert's The Night is Cloudless (with Miss Caroline Hatchard as soloist) were included; Mr. Peter Dawson sang Loewe's ballad Edward, and Mr. Edward Isaac played pianoforte music by Turina and Albeniz.—A Beethoven programme was offered at the Hallé concert on March 3, demonstrating the contrast between Beethoven in his first Symphony (C major) and his last (the Choral). Mr. Hamilton Harty missed some of the sublimity of the opening of the latter, but gave a superb reading of the Scherzo. The choir had the greatest triumph, its tone being rich, fine in substance, and the extreme pitch was reached easily. Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Sonnenberg, Mr. Herbert Eisdell, and Mr. George Parker were the solo quartet, and Miss Nicholls sang the air Ah! perfido. The Egmont Overture completed the list.—The O'Malley Quartet on March 4 played the Quartet in B flat by four Russian composers—Rimsky-Korsakov, Liadov, Borodin, and Glazounov.—On March 3 Mr. Martin Shaw gave a recital of his own songs at the University. In a short address he disclaimed any cultivation of a national idiom. Miss Alice Shawcross and Mr. George Parker were his exponents.—Mr. Gustav Holst was well received at the Brand-Lane concert on March 4, when he conducted three numbers from The Planets—Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn. The rest of the programme—which Sir Henry Wood conducted—was of popular character.—At the Hallé operatic concert on March 13 I Pagliacci was given with Miss Ethel Austen and Mr. Frank Mullings as principals. Mr. Hamilton Harty conducted the orchestra in Tchaikovsky's Suite in G major and Casse Noisette, In the steppes of Central Asia (Borodin), Gopak (Moussorgsky), and the chorus and orchestra in the choral dances from Prince Igor. Dvorák's Poetische Stimmungsbilder (Twilight's Way) and Palmgren's Auf dem Wasser and In Polka tak comprised the programme.—On March 9 New Mills Orchestral Society, under the direction of Mr. Baguley Waters, played Beethoven's C minor Symphony and Brahms's Variations on a theme by Haydn, and Miss Agnes Nicholls sang.—Sir Edward Elgar conducted a number of his own works at the Brand-Lane concert on February 27. Miss Beatrice Harrison was the soloist in the Violoncello Concerto, and other orchestral pieces were In the South Overture, the Bach Fugue, the Wand of Youth Suite, and Cockaigne Overture. Miss Phyllis Lett sang the Sea Pictures.—Other events to record are a recital of Max Mayer's songs, and pianoforte recitals by Mr. Maurice Cole and Mr. Robert Gregory.

MIDDLESBROUGH.—After forty years' strenuous work in the cause of music, Dr. Kilburn, on February 16, laid down the baton as hon. conductor of the Musical Union, he having entered on his eightieth year. The choir sang Brahms's Song of Destiny, the Epilogue from The Golden Legend, and Dr. Kilburn's setting of Ben Jonson's Queen's Hunting Song (accompanied by strings and two trumpets). The London Symphony Orchestra played a Suite of Dr. Kilburn's and Liszt's Les Préludes. Miss Agnes Nicholls and Mr. Herbert Brown sang Wagner music. A presentation was made to Dr. Kilburn by Sir Hugh Bell, supported by the Mayor.

MORLEY (YORKS).—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. John Groves, performed King Olaf on March 13, with the assistance of the Leeds Symphony Orchestra. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous and all-British, and in addition to orchestral pieces by Elgar, songs by Purcell, Parry, Stanford, German, and Bairstow were included.

NEWCASTLE.—The Male-Voice Glee Union on February 16 celebrated its twenty-first anniversary. Mr. S. G. Lovatt conducted, and part-songs and glees included The tuneful sound of Robin's horn (Grimshaw), Winter wraps his grimmest spell (MacDowell), Whither runneth my sweetheart (Gerrard Williams), Hushed in death (Hiles), Hereward the Wake (S. G. Lovatt), The Wedding of Shon Maclean (Patterson), and a Border Ballad by Maunder. Miss Ethel Fenton sang W. Morse Rummel's Ecstasy and Lovers' sighs by Maud Stewart Baxter. Violin music was played by M. Zacharewitsch.—The Glee and Madrigal Society opened the year on February 23 with a fine performance of Cooke's great glee Shades of the heroes, and other pieces sung were Beale's Come, let us join the roundelay, Paxton's How sweet, how fresh, Spofforth's My dear mistress, and some familiar and more modern pieces. Mr. Herman McLeod played Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in E minor.—Benton Orchestral Society, newly-formed, gave its first concert on February 23, playing Mozart's Jupiter Symphony, Thomas's Le Cid Overture, and Three Dances by Sárakovski.—The concert given by the Bach Choir, on March 1, was in the hands of the Catterall Quartet, which charmed everyone by its execution of Pizzetti's Quartet in A and Arnold Bax's Quartet in G minor, Beethoven's Op. 132 completing the programme.—The Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Hamilton Harty on March 8, played a Bach Concerto in G for strings, Ravel's Orchestral Suite, Mother Goose, Tchaikovsky's B flat minor Pianoforte Concerto, with Mr. Anderson Tyrer as soloist, and the New World Symphony.—On March 6 the Carl Rosa Opera Company opened a twelve days' season with the usual repertoire.—On March 9 the Royal Albert Hall Orchestra, under the auspices of the International Celebrity Concerts, was conducted by Sir Edward Elgar in Beethoven's fifth Symphony, the rest of the programme being somewhat on popular lines.—On March 15 the chief work of the Armstrong College Choral Society and the College Orchestral Society, which are conducted by Dr. W. G. Whittaker, was Bach's Magnificat. North-country songs, in Dr. Whittaker's arrangements, were successful, especially The Willow Tree and Elsie Marley. The orchestra played Handel's Concerto Grosso for strings, No. 1, and Mozart's Symphony in E flat.—Dr. W. G. Whittaker lectured on March 11 at Armstrong College on the B minor Mass of Bach. The Bach Choir sang the Kyrie, Credo, and other important choruses.

NOTTINGHAM.—Mr. William Turner's Ladies' Prize Choir gave a concert on February 26, and Miss Mabel Linwood gave a vocal recital at Heaton on February 27, assisted by Miss H. Eveline Hurcum (pianoforte).—On March 4 the Philharmonic Society, conducted by Mr. William Turner, sang Cyril Jenkins's Ode to the West Wind, Stanford's The Revenge, and part-songs. They were supported by an orchestra.—The William Woolley Choral Society on February 23 sang Elgar's The Fountain, Bantock's eight-part chorus, They that go down to the sea in ships, and Wilbye's Sweet honey-sucking bees. Mr. Woolley conducted.

OXFORD.—On February 26, in Queen's College Chapel, Mr. Besly directed the Deltingen Te Deum, Brahms's O heart subdued with grieving, Vaughan Williams's The Burial Psalm (Motet for baritone, chorus, quartet, organ, and orchestra), and Crossing the Bar (Besly), the chorus and orchestra being that of the Eglesfield Musical Society. Miss Norah Dawnay sang Purcell's Evening Hymn.—A programme of Schubert's pianoforte music and songs was given at Sanfield on February 28, the pianist being Miss Carola Geissler-Schubert (granddaughter of Schubert's brother), and the vocalist Miss Edith McCullagh.—Oxford Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. Besly, on March 2, gave a programme chiefly of 'classics.' Bach's Trio in C minor for organ was played in Mr. Besly's orchestral arrangement, a fair development of organ music in the larger medium. With Mr. Claud Biggs as pianist, Brahms's second Pianoforte Concerto (B flat) was also given.—At the fifth Subscription Concert on February 16, the English String Quartet played Beethoven (Op. 95), Schubert (Op. 29), and the Ravel Quartet.

PENRITH.—On February 23 the Musical Society performed Elijah, under Mr. J. Pollard. The choir numbered two hundred, and the orchestra fifty.

PLYMOUTH.—Dr. Harold Lake's Madrigal Society, on March 1, sang Wesley's When Israel came out of Egypt, Bach's I wrestle and pray, and Tchaikovsky's How blest are they, all for double choir. Among Madrigals and modern part-songs rendered were Delius's eight-part Midsummer Song and Julius Harrison's In the Forest (first performances in the West of England), To Daffodils (Harold Lake), Two Roses (César Cui), Wilbye's Sweet honey-sucking bees, Geoffrey Shaw's Gossip Joan, and MacLaren's The Three Fishers. Pianoforte quartet music was played by Mr. Reginald Ball, Miss Hannaford, Miss Winifred Blight, and Dr. Harold Lake.—Dr. Weekes's Orchestral Society on March 8 played Balfour Gardiner's Comedy Overture, Sullivan's Di Ballo, and the Prelude to Act 1 of Lohengrin. Dr. Weekes and Mr. Walter Weekes conducted. The former has announced his retirement after sixty years' strenuous work for music.

PORT TALBOT (WALES).—Grove Place Welsh Church Choir, conducted by Mr. George Llewellyn, gave, on February 16, Franco Leoni's The Gate of Life for the first time in the district. The orchestra was led by Mr. Gomer Jones.

PORTSMOUTH.—The third concert of the Quartet Players, on February 27, included William V. Hurlstone's Pianoforte Quartet and an excerpt from Richard H. Walthew's Five Diversions for strings. The players were Miss Edith Bunny (violin), Major R. Bullin (viola), Mr. Frank Cranmore (violinocello), and Mrs. Bullin (pianoforte). Mr. Ernest Groom sang Purcell's Hark! the echoing air. Handel's Where'er you walk, and Mullin's Sing, break into song.—The Temperance Choral Union, on February 18 (conducted by Mr. T. Plater), sang Elgar's Challenge of Thor, the choral fantasia from Tannhäuser, Sweet honey-sucking bees (Wilbye), and an Irish folk-song for female voices, Follow me down to Carlow. Mr. Cyril J. Fogwell was at the organ.—Under the direction of Mr. Ernest C. Birch, North End Choral Society gave excerpts from light opera on March 4. Mr. W. H. Heighway (violin), Mr. Cuthbert Walters (cello), and Mrs. G. Taylor (pianoforte), played Frank Bridge's Londonderry Air, and a set of his Miniatures.—Recitals have been given by Moiseiwitsch, and a local boy pianist, Reginald H. Renison.

SHREWSBURY.—The Philharmonic Society gave its third concert this season on February 16, performing The Hymn of Praise and miscellaneous choral and instrumental items. The soloists were Miss Gertrude Johnson and Mr. Hubert Eisdell. Mr. F. G. Rowland conducted.

SOUTHAMPTON.—Mr. Franz Somers has organized a series of Sunday concerts which have proved very successful. His co-operators are Miroslav Shlik, a Jugo-Slovak (violin) and John Hume (pianoforte). On February 19 the programme included John Ireland's Sonata in D minor.

SOUTHEAST-ON-SEA.—The Madrigal Society of which Mr. Walter L. Booth is the conductor is a fine exponent of its art. On March 2 the programme included Eaton Fanning's Daybreak, Dream love (Fletcher), Now is the month of Maying, Drink to me only with thine eyes, and A Franklyn's Dogge. Miss Hilda Blake sang songs, and Mr. Giovanni Barbirolli played cello pieces.

SUNDERLAND.—The Sunderland Vocal Union, a hundred and sixty strong, successfully undertook Mr. Alick Maclean's much-neglected work, The Annunciation, on March 16, under the composer's direction. An expressive performance drew great effect from Mr. Maclean's music, which provides profitable material for choral study. The solo parts were taken by Miss Flora Woodman, Miss Muriel Brunsell, Mr. John Booth, and Mr. Ernest J. Potts.

TORQUAY.—For the Orchestral Society's twentieth annual concert on March 7, Mr. Henry E. Crocker brought members of the Royal Marine Band from Plymouth to supply wood-wind and brass. Beethoven's Symphony in C and the Prometheus Overture, two Suites for strings by Elgar, Waltzes by Coleridge-Taylor, and Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, with Mrs. W. H. Mortimer as soloist, comprised the programme.

TORRINGTON.—Mr. F. J. Webber conducted the Choral Society and a small orchestra in Hubert Bath's Shon Maclean on February 22.

WEDNESBURY.—The programme of St. James's Choral Society, on February 20, included a concert version of Maritana with orchestra, conducted by Mr. Edward Bliss, the concert being a success from all points of view.

WORCESTER.—At the ladies' night of the Glee Club on February 28 the programme was largely orchestral.—The programme offered at the Symphony Orchestra Concert on February 26 consisted of chamber music. Bach's Double Concerto for violins and pianoforte was played by Mr. J. W. Austin, Mr. C. H. Baker, and Mrs. W. Hill, and Beethoven's String Quartet in D was given with Mr. F. Fielder as viola player. Mr. George Austin played organ music, including three Chorale Preludes on Welsh hymn-tunes by Vaughan Williams, and a Choral Prelude by Harold Darke.

YORK.—Acomb Choral Society, conducted by Mr. T. G. Robinson, on February 22 sang Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast and Parry's Blest Pair of Sirens. Mr. Maude led a good orchestra, and also played a Hungarian Rhapsody for violin by Hauser.—Sheffield String Quartet played to members of the British Music Society, on March 11, an Andante by William Baines, Elgar's Quartet, and with Mr. Raymond Hartley as vocalist, Vaughan Williams's cycle, On Wenlock Edge, Dr. E. C. Bairstow being the pianist.

The Chiswick Chamber Concerts Society gave an excellent programme on February 28. The Spencer Dyke Quartet played Gossens's By the Tarn and Jack o' Lantern, and, with Miss Isabel Gray, Elgar's Quintet. Miss Gwladys Naish sang Five Miniature Ballads by Hurlstone.

SOUND RANGING

At the meeting of the Musical Association on February 14 Mr. E. Lancaster Jones read a paper on 'Sound Ranging: with special reference to its use during the recent war.' The problem of finding the distance of an object, he said, was generally reduced to that of finding the direction of the object from each of a set of base points. Usually the object ranged was in motion, and the necessary measurements must be made quickly. In order first to perceive the object, and secondly to determine its direction, it was necessary that there should be a transmission of some kind of energy through the intervening medium, and that suitable detectors with means for determining the direction of transmission should be placed at the base points. Optical range-finding failed when the necessary light was absent or the opaqueness of the intervening medium prevented its transmission. In such circumstances sound ranging offered a practical alternative.

Before the war sound ranging was rarely employed except as an aid to the navigation of ships in foggy weather. During the war the intense development of such weapons of attack as long-range guns, night-flying aircraft, and submarines—all of which could be screened from visual observation—led to a corresponding development of sound ranging as an alternative. Since the war attention had once more been focussed upon the application of sound ranging to navigation in foggy weather and to marine surveying.

When a gun was fired it generated an impulsive sound-wave of very low frequency. The flight of the shell generated a series of waves of high frequency, which were a disturbing influence. The elimination of these was effected by using a resonant detector which was sensitive only to low frequency sounds. The detector used with most success was invented by a British subaltern, and was known as the Tucker Hot-wire Microphone. The lecturer gave a detailed explanation of the method of working this, and said that by it the position of the gun could be located to within fifty yards on an average about ten minutes after it was fired.

The perception of sound direction, so long as the sound affected both ears of the observer, was known as the Principle of Binaural Audition. A sound-wave coming from one side would impinge upon the ear upon that side slightly before the other, and by turning the head until the sound was central it was possible to determine the direction, either in front or behind. Special apparatus, consisting of conical horns mounted upon a frame which could be rotated about a vertical and also about a horizontal axis, and having the horns attached by tubes to the ears, increased the accuracy of determination. This method was used for locating aircraft.

Locating submarines was the most important problem of sound ranging during the war, and led to innumerable methods and appliances for its solution. The submarine, when in motion, generated sound-waves of a quality and rhythm easily recognised by a skilled observer. The energy of the sound-wave was readily transmitted by sea-water, and it was therefore only to be detected at the necessary distance by means of a receiver in contact with the water. The ship's own noises, &c., were disturbing elements whose effects had to be minimised. These considerations, together with the well-known properties of sound-waves as regards speed of propagation, reflection, refraction, interference, &c., determined the general character and development of the appliances used. Two main types of detector were employed—one purely acoustic, the other microphonic. In the former, some type of electric diaphragm responded to the sound-waves, and produced a corresponding wave in the air, which was transmitted by an air path to a suitable receiver on board the listening ship. The microphonic detector converted the sound-wave into an electrical wave, transmitted by wires to the ship, and mostly transformed back again to sound by a telephone receiver. The acoustic detector gave a more faithful response to the sound, but the electrical one was more sensitive and convenient. The lecturer exhibited and described several kinds of apparatus before passing on to navigation and marine surveying.

Some system of sound ranging had long been employed in connection with the navigation of ships in foggy weather, but it was not until the beginning of the present century that a practical system of sound-signalling was evolved. The receivers consisted of microphones, one on each side of the ship, and suspended in tanks filled with water. Direction was ascertained by comparing the intensity of the sound with each receiver and swinging the ship. In 1912 another system of oscillators or vibrators, which could be used either as generators or receivers of sound-waves, was devised. The hydrophones devised during the war had been extensively used for navigational purposes by the Americans, who had got very good results with what are known as M.V. tubes. These were also employed in sounding. Finally, reference was made to hyper-acoustic or ultra-audible methods, where the sound-waves had a frequency very much higher than the audible, being nearly similar to light-waves, but with the important difference that they were readily transmitted by media opaque to light.

MUSIC IN IRELAND

The organ recital given in the Chapel Royal, Dublin, on March 10, by Mr. W. E. Hopkins, 'Director of the State Musick,' was a notable event. By special request, Mr. Hopkins, who is organist of the Chapel Royal, repeated the programme which he had recently given with such conspicuous success at Æolian Hall, London. The recital was in aid of the fund for the restoration of Rheims Cathedral.

Although the 'Mater' concerts (which were not an outstanding financial success) ended on March 4, yet the Dublin Symphony Concerts, under Mr. Vincent O'Brien, will continue for some time longer, and on March 11 a musical feast was provided, which included Nicolai's Merry Wives Overture, and Elgar's Marche Militaire. Signor Lenghi Cellini sang.

Quite an interesting treat was afforded at the Abbey Theatre, Dublin, on March 15, when a benefit concert was accorded to Signor Simonetti, the well-known violinist. The artists included the beneficiare as well as Dr. Esposito, Miss May Meehan, and Mr. Michael Gallagher, and a charming programme was gone through.

As Ulster Hall, Belfast, has been commandeered by the military owing to the disturbed condition of the city, the operatic 'celebrity' concert advertised for March 14 had to be postponed till further notice.

The Belfast Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Mr. Godfrey Brown, gave a concert on March 11, in aid of the Belfast branch of the Musicians' Union, the principal item being Beethoven's C minor Symphony.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

OSCAR BERINGER, on February 21, in his seventy-eighth year. For over fifty years he had made London his residence. His gifts as a teacher of the pianoforte became widely known, and he soon won his way to a position of great influence. In 1885 he was appointed professor at the Royal Academy of Music and at the Royal College of Music, and for over twenty years he conducted an 'Academy for the Higher Development of Pianoforte Playing.' A correspondent sends the following personal appreciation:

'The passing of Oscar Beringer brings many recollections of his young teaching days to the mind of an old pupil, who began at the age of thirteen, about the year 1875, to have lessons with this enthusiastic young musician in a small house in Great Marlborough Street, where he had started his "Academy for the Higher Development of Pianoforte Playing," a cumbersome title derived from the German name of the Tausig School where he himself had studied. We were taught in classes of three, lasting an hour, twice a week. Various harmony professors also held weekly classes, of whom Prof. Ebenezer Prout was the most eminent, and the other pianoforte professors included Franklin Taylor, Dannreuther, and Bache. This means that this little music school really was a pioneer in England of the best pianoforte playing, and it is difficult for the young musician nowadays to realise the revelation it meant, after years of Thalberg's compositions and La Prière d'une Vierge. Beringer's chief insistence, it always seemed to me, was on clarity, truthfulness, and absence of muddle. His teaching in these respects led far beyond music, and made one feel their necessity in every branch of study. Sparing in praise, a few words of encouragement from him weighed far heavier than from an easier master, and were something to be remembered always—and, indeed, gloated over. In those days, at any rate, he had not much sympathy with so-called "interpretations." We were expected to play Beethoven and Schumann as the composers had written, and to learn to walk before we tried to run. His friend Von Bülow was a noted exponent of this school of playing. He opened to the writer, and doubtless to many others—among whom are numbered some of the most brilliant English pianists of the day—a new world of interest in music study for which we can never sufficiently be grateful.

ARTHUR HERVEY, on March 10, composer, author, and critic. He was of Irish descent and born at Paris. His early education took place at the Oratory, Birmingham, and among his earliest musical instructors was Berthold Tours. He was destined for the diplomatic service, but the claims of music were too strong. He completed his studies in France, which accounted for the particular interest he always took in French music. Some of his orchestral compositions attained a certain amount of popularity, and his works were heard at some of the big musical festivals. Among these may be mentioned Scena for baritone and orchestra At the Gates of Night, performed at the Gloucester Festival in 1901; two tone-poems, On the Heights and On the March, performed at the Cardiff Festival in 1902; and Youth, played at the Norwich Festival in the same year. At the succeeding Cardiff Festival (1904) his tone-poem In the East was performed. Summer was composed for the Cardiff Festival of 1907, and Life Moods was produced at the Brighton Festival of 1910. His tone-poem Jane was produced by the Philharmonic Society in 1907. He also wrote an opera Ilona in 1914, and his little one-act opera The Post Box was performed at the Court Theatre in 1885. He was the author of many graceful songs, and his Romance for violin is still often heard at concerts. He published a book on Masters of French Music, a book on French Music of the 19th century, a monograph of Alfred Bruneau, and his latest work on Saint-Saëns was published only a few weeks before his death. Also he contributed many articles, chiefly on French composers, to the Encyclopædia Britannica. He will probably be best remembered as the musical critic of the Morning Post from 1892-1908. In that capacity he was conspicuous for his broad views, which were not unduly influenced by his predilection already referred to for the music of France. His severest criticism was always couched in courteous language, which could not offend the people criticised. In private life he was a man of unflinching courtesy and great geniality, and always ready to help all who sought from him information or advice. He will be greatly missed by a large circle of friends: His compositions had a charm of their own. They were always marked by melodiousness, straightforwardness of utterance, and polish of manner.

HENRY R. EDMONDS, a young organist of great promise. He was born at Swindon, in 1901. Obtaining his F.R.C.O. diploma at the age of eighteen, he was awarded an organ scholarship at the R.C.M. in the following year, but resigned this with the intention of entering Exeter College, Oxford. Ill-health intervened, however, and after a short period as organist to the Countess of Craven, he was appointed, in the autumn of 1921, to the English Church at Hyères, where he died shortly after his arrival.

FANNY KEMBLE POOLE, a well-known and popular contralto of the 'seventies and 'eighties, who died on March 8. Madame Poole was primarily associated with oratorio, and sang at most of the musical festivals of her day. She was a descendant of 'the Kembles,' and a sister of Miss Alice Barnett, whose name is indelibly associated with the original productions of the Gilbert and Sullivan Operas at the Savoy.

Musical Notes from Abroad

AMSTERDAM

Mengelberg brought his season's activities to a climax by a splendid performance of Bach's St. Matthew Passion. After his departure for New York there followed a respite in orchestral programmes, only interrupted by a few popular concerts conducted by Prof. Max Fiedler, of which an evening devoted solely to Brahms (the Haydn Variations, Double Concerto, and first Symphony) will be remembered on account of the conductor proving himself a unique interpreter of this music.

Dr. Karl Muck, whom we are glad again to have as conductor during Mengelberg's absence, conducted his first concert on February 2—Beethoven's Fidelio Overture and the seventh and eighth Symphonies. Of his subsequent concerts one was devoted to Russian music, Anton Witke coming from Berlin to play Tchaikovsky's Violin Concerto. Subsequently we had a Strauss evening (with the Suite from Der Bürger als Edelmann and the Sinfonia Domestica), a classical concert (Handel, Bach, and Mozart), and a Beethoven concert.

On January 24 the Christian Oratorio Society, conducted by M. Schoonderbeek, was heard in a highly meritorious performance of César Franck's Blatitudes, for the chief tenor part of which M. R. Plamondon, of Paris, lent his valuable assistance.

A great number of chamber music concerts have taken place in the last four weeks—indeed, there were so many that I must confine myself to recording only the most prominent events. Among these has to be reckoned the visit of the Meredyll Pianoforte Quartet. This fine body of artists roused universal admiration at their first appearance in Holland, the high standard of their performance being evident in works by Mozart, Dohnányi, and G. Fauré. M. Schörg, the former leader of the famous Brussels String Quartet, came over with a new body of confrères. Their playing of works by Dohnányi, Schubert, Wolf, and Beethoven was perfect in every way. Very high demands were satisfied in a Trio evening given by Messrs. Evert Cornelis, Leydensdorff, and Canivez (one of the Concerts Royaux by Couperin and Trios by Ravel and Beethoven). The violinist Telmányi and the pianist Sandor Vas came this year only on a flying visit to Holland. This time they eschewed solo items, and gave a Sonata evening (works by Leo Weiner, Schubert, and Brahms), a venture which cannot but be said to have been wholly satisfactory.

In spite of present bad times and scanty public attendance, the number of soloist recitals has so far shown no diminution. In the majority of cases they were given by pianists. Only two violoncellists were heard, viz., M. Orobio de Castro (whose playing still shows a preponderance on the technical side) and the wonderful M. Gerard Hekking, a veritable king of his instrument. A Hungarian violinist, M. Alfred Indig, gave evidence of considerable talent, although he still lacks perfection. Among the many pianists hardly one has created so much interest as M. Paul Schramm. His performance, moreover, was due to a mere accident. He was to have acted as accompanist to the well-known Wagner singer, Madame Hertha Dehmlow. Unfortunately Madame Dehmlow succumbed to a spell of influenza, and the hall being already hired, the agent induced M. Schramm to give a pianoforte recital instead. Nothing like so perfect and finished interpretations have been heard for a long time. Dirk Schäfer, one of the few pianists who can always rely upon a crowded attendance, has this time included in his scheme some of his own works.

Finally, I have to record a concert given by the Finnish bard, M. Olli Suolahti, who accompanies himself on the national instrument called cantele, which plays such an important rôle in the Finnish national epic Kalevala. The cantele may not inappropriately be described as a hybrid form of the German zither and the Russian balalaika, surpassing both, however, in its multifarious resources of expression. With Suolahti came the Swedish singer, M. Johan I. Junghvist, who gave us a fine selection of Swedish folk-songs.

W. HARMANS.

GERMANY

In spite of widely spread materialism in Germany a deepening of the spiritual life seems to be taking place conjointly with the performance of the inexhaustible treasures of musical art. People's high schools and working men's committees everywhere seek to prepare the way towards a raising of the masses. With the disappearance of the Court, the town of Altenburg (S.A.) seemed to have lost considerably in æsthetic culture, but with the seizure of political power the cleverly organized working classes did not neglect the cultivation of musical and dramatic art. So long as they provide real art an explanation of the old cry panem et circenses may well pass muster. Kapellmeister Klaus Nettsträter produced during the past few months not only The Flying Dutchman, Aida, and Figaro, but also works by Schillings (Mona Lisa), Pfitzner (Christoffel), Waltershausen (Oberst Chabert), Puccini (Tosca), giving finally sixteen highly successful performances of Parsifal. Tosca, which was felt to be in glaring contrast with the home products—although the same singers appeared in all operas—afforded proof that although valuable foreign operas ought to be produced, yet the chief attention of German managers must be devoted to German works. Chamber music (Tchaikovsky's Trio in A minor, Brahms's Trio in B major, &c.), choral works (Beethoven's Missa solennis, Brahms's German Requiem), and orchestral music (three Beethoven Symphonies), helped to vindicate the reputation of Altenburg as a musical centre.

The devoted work done in these small German towns cannot be overestimated. Sondershausen, a town of about seven thousand inhabitants, can point to an artistic tradition of hundreds of years. At the last Loh-Konzert, Prof. Corbach's Orchestra played a Sinfonia patetica by Gottfried Herrman (Court conductor at Sondershausen, 1844-52) which had been lost. It was recently discovered by Dr. Göhler. Composed in 1841, the work is interesting as pointing directly towards Wagner on the one hand and Brahms on the other.

Wurzburg boasts a princely castle (built 1720-45) that is one of the most beautiful examples of the German baroque style. The desire to establish in its quaint halls a home for music was but the revival of the artistic interests of such lord-bishops as Friedrich Carl von Schönhorn and Adam Friedrichs von Seinsheim, which were not confined to the Court chapel. The Kaisersaal, where some recent Festival concerts took place, was well-suited for chamber music of all periods. While the main attention was concentrated on the treasures of the 18th century, the programme also contained little-known works by Tognetti, Galuppi, Rameau, Scarlatti, Phæbus and Pan, and songs by Philip Emanuel Bach, the 19th century being represented by Beethoven, Schumann, and Grieg, with vocal quartets by Brahms, and the art of our epoch-finding voice in Hermann Zilcher's Volksliederspiel. Admirers of Church music enjoyed a special treat in the Court Church, where Palestrina's Missa Papa Marcelli and an Offertorium by Orlando di Lasso were performed; in addition to which the Gregorian Choral of the Vatican was sung. Altogether, the Festival excited great interest among the large audiences assembled.

Stuttgart Theatre has produced two operas by Schubert, the first of which, Der treue Soldat, composed in 1815, when Schubert was eighteen years of age, has never been performed. The second work, Die Verschworenen, was written in 1823, and first performed in 1861 at Vienna. Although several theatres produced it, and although Motl gave it in 1890 at Karlsruhe in a revised form, it did not find favour with the public. Now Herr Rolf Lanckner has seized upon the opera, revising the entire text, while Herr Fritz Busch, along with Prof. D. F. Tovey, has taken charge of the music, in the hope of rescuing a very beautiful work.

A charming short opera by Mozart, Die verstellte Einfalt, composed by him at the age of twelve, was some time ago produced at Karlsruhe 'for the first time' (apart from a private performance in the year 1760 in the palace of the Archbishop of Salzburg). Herr Anton Rudolph has retained the original plot, but has replaced the nonsensical Italian text by a German text conforming with the music in style, form, and colour, and deepening the psychological interest.

The third day of a highly successful musical Festival in the old town of Naumburg a/S., famed in ecclesiastical history as well as in trade, presented two novelties in the shape of Gluck's Marienkönigin and Weber's Abu Hassan—charming operettas—in which the leading members of the Leipzig opera took part.

While the smaller German towns thus drink at the fount of pure art, the State Opera of Berlin performs Puccini's Tosca. It is surprising that such a work is staged at one of the foremost institutions of Germany. It does not elevate, it does not form the sense for beauty. Its appeal is to the lowest instincts of the masses.

A healthy contrast is found, however, in Pfitzner's Christmas play, Das Christoffel, which, like Humperdinck's Hänsel und Gretel, was originally written for a private circle, and, in order to preserve its valuable music, was afterwards rewritten as an opera. Pfitzner is no Humperdinck. What he writes is somewhat heavy. Children find the work too philosophical; to adults it is too naive. But the beautiful music overrides these defects. Hans Pfitzner is coming more to the front from year to year. The chief work of the Berlin Pfitzner-Woche (January 22-27) was a romantic Cantata, Von deutscher Seele, for four solo voices, mixed chorus, grand orchestra, and organ, based on poems by Eichendorff. The press is unanimous in recognising the Cantata as a very valuable work.

The Bochum Brahms Festival brought together a large concourse of enthusiastic listeners, led thither by such choice works as the Trio, Op. 8, the Quintet, Op. 88, the Sextet, Op. 18, the Pianoforte Quartet, Op. 38, the Clarinet Quintet, Op. 115, as well as songs and choruses for female voices. The Festival was a great success.

Foreign artists are again winning popularity in Germany. Mattia Battistini had a great reception in Un ballo in maschera; Anna Hegner has proved herself among the leading lady violinists of the day; Romuald Wikarski has given a successful Chopin recital; Frau Elsa Rydin-Oeberg has shown gifts of voice and mind in songs by Sibelius, Gluck, Peterson, Berger, Sjögren, Rangström, and Dvorák; Russia has sent Schelkov with songs by Moussorgsky; England supplied Miss Dorothy Robson, with songs by Delius, Parry, Arthur Bliss, Brahms, Wolf, and Strauss; the south of Europe was represented by Carmen Osorio, eleven years of age, whose playing of Bach, Beethoven, and Chopin was much admired. Other foreign artists who have sought appreciation are Jeanne Koetzier (songs), Anite Voileann (a Bach evening), Iris Törn (pianoforte), Frederic Drissen (songs), Elena Ivanova (songs), Louis van Laar (violin), Elsa Rydin-Oeberg (Northern songs), Lamond (Beethoven Sonatas), Lambrino (Bach and Beethoven), Josma Selim (chansons), Henry Holst (violin).

One of the greatest operatic successes of the past few years is Waldemar Wendland's Peter Sukoff, which was first performed at Basle and has now been repeated at Mayence. Olga Wohlbruck, the wife of the composer, has written a dramatic 'book' on a stirring tale from Russia under the Czars. Action predominates. In the music Wendland speaks a language entirely his own. The whole opera is so saturated with Russian spirit that it is unnecessary to inquire which are genuine Russian melodies and which are the composer's creations. There are climaxes of great beauty, born of the dramatic situations, and songs and dances are cast into concise forms. The opera was staged with great splendour. It is to be repeated at Paris, the text having already been translated into French.

Hans Bullerian is one of the stronger personalities among composers of to-day. His Stuck Symphony was received with unusual enthusiasm when recently performed at the Opera House of Charlottenburg. It is a series of symphonic poems, each describing a picture of Frank Stuck. In his orchestration the composer employs the most modern means of expression, and the players have to struggle with problems hitherto unknown. Frasselt and his artists carried off a great victory, and Press and public declared the performance a modern musical triumph.

Felix Draeseke's Sinfonia tragica was revived at the last symphony concert of the Dresden Opera-house Orchestra.

Draeseke (1835-1913), better known as the composer of Christus, is one of the most characteristic of modern composers, and his Tragic Symphony may be placed among the masterpieces of German music. Its 'tragic' character is confined to the slow movement—a majestic funeral march—and to a Finale that works up the material of the other three movements to a witches' Sabbath. The Sinfonia tragica has also been included in the programme of the Leipsic Gewandhaus Concerts.

Dresden, the Weber-town par excellence, commemorated the centenary of Der Freischütz by producing the greater part of Weber's operas on six successive nights. While Freischütz was modernised, Preciosa carried the spectators back a hundred years. Servants in old-fashioned costumes lighted the footlights and rolled up the curtain. Such things do not give the opera new life; but for the charming music no one would ask for a repetition of the work. Besides the stage works other little-known compositions were produced at a special concert, such as the pretty Peter Schmoll Overture; a Hungarian Rondo for viola and orchestra (which Weber afterwards arranged for bassoon); the Aufforderung zum Tanz (which gave the ballet an opportunity to take part); the Ubelkante (minus the Overture) with its beautiful choruses and soli; and the amusing operetta, Abu Hassan. Owing to a 'Weber-strike' the costumes for Oberon could not be furnished in time, and Euryanthe was repeated instead. The Weber Festival was a great success, and all the operas are to be performed again in the spring.

In the Finale of Don Giovanni Mozart quotes a melody from an old Spanish opera, Una cosa rara, by Vincenzo Martin y Soler, which for a time had been a serious rival to Figaro, but which soon after disappeared altogether. In rescuing this opera from oblivion, Leopold Sachse, of Halle, presented the stage with a work of great melodic beauty, dramatic strength, and characteristic instrumentation, a work which might almost have been composed by Mozart himself. The audience, which numbered many professional critics and such connected with the stage, pronounced the opera a distinct gain to the répertoire of the theatre.

F. ERCKMANN.

NEW YORK

Perhaps it is the restlessness of the present age that accounts for the seemingly inordinate intrusion of so much ultra-modern music in our concert programmes. I use the word 'intrusion' instead of 'demand,' for those who crave the dissonances are few in comparison with those who love melodies and harmonies. A Beethoven-Tchaikovsky-Wagner programme is considered old-fashioned by the modernists, yet a sold-out house and overwhelming applause greets such programmes, while Schönberg's Five Orchestral Pieces (which have been five years in reaching New York, and which would never have been missed if the score had been lost in mid-ocean) are listened to with smiles and even audible giggles from those who endure them for the sake of what Mr. Stokowski provides for the rest of the evening. Hardly less offensive was Mulhau's second Orchestral Suite, played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra under M. Pierre Monteux. The third movement, called 'Pastorale,' was a good imitation of a barn-yard in great commotion, while the Nocturne following suggested exhaustion from the conflict rather than the soothing influence of night and sleep. Sometimes the ultra-modernists over-reach themselves, with ludicrous results. At a song recital, when four Oriental Sketches by Henry Eichheim were presented, the singer got mixed with her music, and sang one number while the orchestra played the accompaniment to another, but nobody seemed the wiser until she had nearly finished!

Mr. Albert Coates (who might be called the apostle of the modernists) has, as guest-conductor of the New York Symphony Society, given us some better things. The Planets, by Gustav Holst, though formidable and demanding close attention, deserves more than one hearing, for the one hearing holds our interest sufficiently to induce a desire for a second, though it would require a great stretch of imagination to find any relation between the composition and the solar system. Eugène Goossens's Four Concerts, also produced by Mr. Coates, conveyed musical thoughts, though not very profound ones. A clever piece of modern work among those labelled 'first time anywhere,' played by the Philharmonic Society under M. Josef Stransky, was a Symphonic Fantasy called In the Court of the Pomegranates, by Emerson Whithorne, a young American composer. The Fantasy is brilliantly written, and it is not hard to visualise the appearance of the Court with 'the scarlet blossoms of the pomegranates scattered on the pavements, strange and gaudy birds nesting in the cornices, and giant cacti raising their horned heads.'

Very interesting, and in many places very delightful, is Gustav Mahler's Song of the Earth, given by the Society of the Friends of Music, under the baton of M. Artur Bodanzky. Mahler called the work a 'Symphony with contralto and tenor solos.' The words are taken from Chinese poems of the 8th century, and deal with the intoxication of wine alternating with periods of reflection. The drinking songs have been put into German, and were admirably sung by Mrs. Charles Cahier and Mr. Orville Harrold. The score is strongly imbued with the spirit of the Orient. 'While the birds trill,' the Chinese teacups tinkle in the pavilion of green and white porcelain, until finally the world sleeps and the temple gongs sound farewell.

At the Metropolitan Opera House Mr. Gatti lately produced Rimsky-Korsakov's Snow Maiden, with Signorina Lucrezia Bori in the chief part. It was written twenty years before Cog d'Or, and gives no intimation of Rimsky-Korsakov's later and more matured style.

For several years the Chicago Opera Company has made an annual visit to New York. It seldom introduces many novelties in composition, but often presents fresh and beautiful voices. Miss Edith Mason, an American soprano, who sang for some seasons at the Metropolitan, is now a member of the Chicago Company, and is delighting her audiences with the beauty of her voice. Mr. Edward Johnson, an American, is an exceptionally fine tenor, and Lucien Muratore seems to have no rival since the death of Caruso. Richard Strauss's Salome is being given this season by the Company, and though the work is not a novelty, it always produces something of a sensation and draws large and distinctively musical audiences. Yet Salome is not Richard Strauss at his best, nor is Miss Mary Garden at her best in the title-rôle. The Chicago Company is fortunate in having Signor Giorgio Polacco as chief conductor, as he is undoubtedly one of the best operatic conductors of the day.

From all the surfeit of digestible and indigestible modern music, we have sought and found relief and joy in the work of Hofmann and Kreisler, regardless of what they offered us. We must not entirely forget the newcomers, among whom none has given greater pleasure than that sterling English artist, Miss Myra Hess. She is a thorough musician, of fine intelligence, and has an excellent technique. Her répertoire is comprehensive, and she seems impartially to enjoy the old and the new, from Scarlatti to Ravel.

M. H. FLINT.

PARIS

Every week the concert-goer at Paris is able to map out his course well in advance, thanks to an admirable little periodical, Le Guide du Concert, which gives him a complete table of forthcoming events, with the full programmes and historical or analytical notes, generally quite useful. But those industriously-compiled lists only serve to drive home more forcibly the fact that it is impossible to attend every interesting concert that is given: three or four in the afternoon, four or five in the evening, day after day, is what confronts us. Despite all that is said about an uninterested and blasé Paris, those concerts, as a rule, are fairly well supported, and the musicians who give them must find it worth their while, for almost every week seems to bring with it an increase among competitors for halls and audiences.

At the Opéra has been produced Charles Silver's La Mère Apprivoisée, a not unpleasing but conventionally operatic version of The Taming of the Shrew, with Mlle. Marthe Chenal as Catharina and M. Rouard as Petruchio. The Schola Cantorum has given a concert performance of the whole of Pierre de Bréville's Eros Vainqueur, a fine lyric-drama, legendary in character, produced at Brussels in 1910, but still awaiting its production in the composer's native country. At the Théâtre des Champs-Élysées the Swedish Ballets have reappeared. They have added to the many quaint things in their repertory a Skating Rink full of quaintness in a limited way, for which Arthur Honegger has contributed music far less baffling, and far less exciting, than that of his Horace Victorieux. Another novelty, unpretentious and pleasing, is Dansgille, founded on Norwegian folk-dances.

At the Concerts-Colonne have been given A. Borchard's Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra, Eskual Herria, on Basque folk-tunes (the composer at the pianoforte), and Debussy's Fantasy for pianoforte and orchestra written at Rome in 1889-90, and revised by the composer at a late period of his life (Mlle. M. Long at the pianoforte). At the Concerts-Lamoureux M. Charles Kœchlin's Chorale for organ and orchestra was a welcome novelty. At the Concerts-Pasdeloup we have had no new works, but among items rarely heard both Paul Dukas's fine Symphony in C major and Sylvio Lazzari's impressive Prelude to Armor deserve special mention.

A few examples of British music were included in the month's budget, thanks chiefly to Mr. Howard-Jones's initiative. That excellent pianist has given two recitals here, at the first of which he played Ireland's Sonata, and at the second pieces by Goossens, Delius, Moeran, and Bax. Goossens's Suite for flute, violin, oboe, and harp was given at Marcel Grandjany's concert, and Cyril Scott's Sonnet and Irish Dance by Pierre Fol at a concert of L'Heure Musicale. I entirely agree with the suggestion recently made in the Musical Times by Mr. Calvocoressi that steps should be taken to submit contemporary British works to the committees of the Societies which exist here specially with a view to producing modern music. For the time being, British music is practically ignored. Meanwhile we could do with a few more propagandists as efficient and disinterested as Mr. Howard-Jones.

At the S.M.I. special interest attached to the first performance of five songs by a Japanese composer, Yoshinori Matsuyama, and to Eugène Grassi's Les Equinoxes, which are impressive and delightful. Works by M. Desrez have been given at the Salle du Conservatoire (a Pianoforte Trio and songs) and at the Concerts-Lamoureux (a lyric poem, Le Retour du Printemps); works by A. Kullman, J. Pillois, and Georges Sporck, at the Société des Compositeurs; Honegger's Violin Sonata (very interesting) at the Heure Musicale.

Mlle. Janacopulos's last recital, with its programme of works by Huré, E. Bloch, Milhaud, Ravel, Moussorgsky, and others, proved no less interesting than the foregoing. The same may be said of the last concert of the Société Orléine d'Alheim, at which Madame Orléine d'Alheim sang new songs by Honegger, and Mrs. Swainson songs by Roussel and Schmitt. At the Union Artistique an unusual item consisted of Troubadour songs (Ch. de Coucy, Thibaud de Champagne, and G. de Machant), harmonized by Ch. Neveu.

At the Lyceum Club M. Hans is producing a pianoforte with two keyboards invented by him. It would probably be interesting to compare it with the Emmanuel Moor instrument.

A. BOLD.

ROME

A concert recently given by the Amici della Musica aroused great interest, for the programme included a little-known work of Beethoven—a set of Variations on Mozart's air 'La ci darem' from Don Giovanni. These Variations have only seen the light since 1914, when Riemann discovered the MS. at Dresden.

At a concert of the Philharmonic Society, Signor Renzo Silvestri played an ultra-modern composition of Santoliquido bearing the title Ex humo ad Sidera. Probably the intention of the composer was to represent the earth by the basses, the stars by the extreme high notes of the pianoforte, and the passage by rapid chromatic scales, where a direct jump was not sufficient. A babe would have recognised the servile imitation of Debussy, and the audience did not fail to manifest its disapproval. The same composer, however, revealed himself as gifted with a certain personality in the song Riflessi sung by Signorina de Crisogono.

At the Sala Bach a cycle of three concerts illustrated the Sonata for violin and pianoforte, from its origin to our own day. The examples chosen were Corelli (in D), Bach (in A), Mozart (in G flat), Beethoven (in F), Schumann (in A minor), Brahms (in G), Grieg (in D minor), Franck (in A), Reger (in D minor), and Respighi (in B minor).

An excellent enterprise had birth on February 6, when, in the presence of the Queen Mother of Italy, the new Society of Wind Instruments for Chamber Music gave its first concert under the auspices of the Philharmonic Society. The programme was also of special interest to English-speaking musicians as containing a Quintet by Leo Sowerby, the young American composer who has just been awarded the American Prix de Rome. It is written for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and fagotto, and divided into three movements—'gaily,' 'elegiac,' and 'fox-trot' manner. The composer has good talent, particularly in melodic treatment, and is likely to benefit by the advantages offered him by the American Scholarship.

It is pleasing to note the activities of the Rivista Nazionale di Musica as a sign of an awakening in the somewhat behindhand musical journalism of Italy. Founded and directed by a well-known musico-literary critic, Vito Raeli, the Rivista includes amongst its contributors some of the best-known writers of Italy, such as Cametti, Orefice, Gasco, Alaleona, R. de Angelis, Elisabeth Oddone, Dr. Zabughin, &c. It was this journal that gave the first notice of an interesting discovery made by Albert Cametti, viz., that Rubino Mallapert was the master of Palestrina when the latter was a singer in the Cappella Liberiana of Rome.

Polyglot concerts—the taste and utility of which may be questioned—are generally a feature of the Roman season. Latest on the list is that given at the Sala Bach on February 7 by a lady of German origin—and good contralto voice—Madame Eugenia Von Klemm, who sang in no less than seven languages (Italian, German, American, Swedish, Estonian, Greek, French, and Russian!). The American songs were Croon, Croon, My Pickaninny Babe, and Ma Curly-headed Baby.

The Roman Philharmonic Society has continued to provide programmes of high interest and performers of the first class. The principal visitor has been Paul Loyonnet. His first programme was intended to illustrate the development of clavicembalo music, from the English virginalists to Bach, and included the following composers: Byrd, Bull, André de Chambonnières, Louis Couperin, Lulli, François Couperin, Scarlatti, Purcell, Rameau, Handel, J. S. Bach and Friedemann Bach. A later programme included La Plainte, au loin, du Faune by Dukas, written as a tribute to the memory of Debussy, and intentionally recalling the noted Après-midi.

The well-known Society of the Quartet, of Naples, whose component members are Vincent Cantani, Vincent Parmiciano, S. Scarano, and Sergius Viterbulii, has also been the guest of the Philharmonic and played Martucci's Quintet (Op. 45).

At the Sala Bach the principal event of the month has been a fine vocal and instrumental concert, organized and directed by the promising director of the hall, Dr. Ippolito Golante. The programme consisted of a Concerto Grosso by Handel, Bach's Cantata Christ lag in Todesbanden, an anonymous 17th century Motet, Ecce Quam Bonum, Pergolesi's Salve Regina for contralto, strings, and organ (the original form); and Scarlatti's Psalm Dixit. The concert was very successful, and was repeated by general request.

The 'Amia della Musica' at its fourth concert of the season presented Dohnányi's Sonata for violoncello and pianoforte, Martucci's Pianoforte Trio in C major, and the following works for pianoforte: Frescobaldi's La Frescobalda, an Allegro by L. Rossi (1760), a Giga by G. M. Rutini (1730-91), Il cuculo by Pasquini (1637-1710), and a Caprice by Scarlatti.

On January 23 the musical section of the American Academy at Rome inaugurated a series of monthly musical reunions, the object of which will be to make American music known at Rome. About a hundred persons, including the principal musicians of Rome, accepted the invitation.

and Mario Corti, the Roman violinist, acted as soloist. The music included the following works by Leo Sowerby: Quintet in F major for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon; three transcriptions of Folk-songs and Country Dances for pianoforte, Money Musk, Lord Rendal, and Irish Washerwomen; Sonata in B flat major for violin and pianoforte. As was said above, Sowerby is the young composer who has recently come to Rome on the newly created musical 'bursé' in the American Academy.

At the Augusteum, the eagerly awaited commemoration of Luigi Mancinelli (who died on February 2, 1921) took place on February 26 under the able direction of Bernardine Molinari. The first part of the programme was devoted to an interesting revival of eight movements from Vivaldi's Concert of the Seasons for string orchestra, cembalo, and organ. The second part was entirely devoted to music of Mancinelli, and consisted of the children's chorus and the Final Hymn from Isaiah (written for the Norwich Festival of 1887), a scene from Frate Sole for cinema and orchestra, the Berceuse from Tizianello (1880), sung by Madame Pasetti, a dance from A Midsummer Night's Dream (the last unelaborated work of the deceased master), a movement from the Venetian Scenes (1888), The Bacchanale for choir and orchestra from Hero and Leander, written for the Norwich Festival of 1896, and the ever-fresh and welcome Overture to Cleopatra (1877), undoubtedly one of the compositions destined to preserve the memory of Luigi Mancinelli.

For the other concerts, it is to be recorded that the Augusteum has been the scene of two fierce artistic battles this month, the one occasioned by Alfredo Casella's playing of his new—very new!—musical poem A notte alta, and the second by Bruno Walter's presentation of Schönberg's Transfigured Night. Howls, whistles, shouts, and the general accompaniment of epithets by which the Roman public makes its sentiments felt marked the reception of both these works, which, it must be confessed, well-merited such attention! At the Costanzi the principal event has been the revival of Strauss's Rosen Kavalier after eleven years.

LEONARD PEYTON.

TORONTO

It has fallen to the lot of Toronto during the past few months to hear some new and essentially modern music. Under the auspices of the rapidly developing Chamber Music Society, the Flonzaley Quartet played to a packed house—truly an event for a chamber concert here—of nearly three thousand people, and chose for one of its chief items the Eugene Goossens Phantasy Quartet, Op. 12. This work shows clearly the trend of the present-day English composer, and both in thought and construction proved very interesting to musicians who are not lucky enough to hear very much of the recent contributions from England.

To Mr. Albert Coates there fell a double honour—that of introducing what is perhaps one of the most impressive orchestral works of the time, Gustav Holst's The Planets, and also of showing what a guest-conductor of the young modern school can do with an orchestra which has not one of the best reputations even in its native city. The interpretation of this Symphonic Suite by the New York Symphony Orchestra was as remarkable as it was competent. Mr. Coates received one of the heartiest ovations Toronto has ever given to a conductor. The audience simply lost control. The impressions of most people seemed to be in favour of 'The Magician,' the fifth movement, for its original construction and material, the fourth 'Mercury,' for atmosphere and musical conception, and 'Mars' for mastery of rhythm. But rather in vain did the critic strain his senses for something which could definitely be termed 'Gustav Holst.' Perhaps in this age of rapid musical development it is unfair to ask for too much from a pioneer. One point, however, could not be overlooked—the composer's remarkable grip of orchestration. A second hearing might be more enlightening.

Enhancing his past reputation, Mr. Campbell McInnes delighted a large audience with a comprehensive reading of Schubert's song-cycle, A Winter's Tale. Educationally, this fourth Nine o'Clock gave Toronto a chance of hearing what otherwise would probably have remained remote.

Two choral concerts have been given recently. The Toronto Operatic Chorus, under the direction of Signor Carboni, was heard in Aida, and the National Chorus, under Dr. Ham, showed careful training in an à cappella programme. Miss Jeanne Gordon, of the Metropolitan Opera Company, was the contralto, and certainly revealed musicianship and personality above the usual platform standard. The numbers included: A Morning Song of Praise and On Jordan's Banks (Bruch); The Outgoing of the Fishermen's Boats (H. S. Robertson); Eili, Eili (traditional Yiddish melody, arranged by Kurt Schindler); Sea-drift (Coleridge-Taylor); Now Sinks the Sun (St. Christopher), by Horatio Parker, which has been performed at the Worcester and Bristol Festivals; and Awake, Sweet Love and Now is the Month of Maying, by Morley.

'Rapidly developing' is the phrase used above in connection with the Chamber Music Society. The truth of this statement was clearly illustrated in the second local concert given at the Arts and Letters Club by the Toronto String Quartet, led by Mr. Frank Blachford. For the first time in this city the Elgar Quintet, Op. 84, for pianoforte and strings, was heard and more appreciated than any other new work here this season. Profiting by the performances of the Letz, London, and Flonzaley Quartets, the style of playing and strength of interpretation of the local body showed very marked improvement upon previous performances.

Miss Myra Hess made a great impression at her recital with the Toronto Women's Musical Society. Her programme included works of Chopin, Scarlatti, Debussy, and Bach. She is undoubtedly the most talented and finished lady-pianist ever heard in this city.

From February 20 to 22 the Mendelssohn Choir held its twenty-fifth Anniversary Festival, assisted by the Philadelphia Orchestra (Leopold Stokowski). The works can only be mentioned, as space does not permit of any detail. These were: the Bach Motet, Sing Ye; Berlioz's Faust; Vaughan Williams's Sea Symphony (Parts 2 and 3); Ave Maria, Arcadelt; Judge me, O God, Mendelssohn; An Indian Lullaby, Dr. A. S. Vogt; Love's Tempest, Elgar; The Men of Harlech, Somervell-Schindler; The Fairies, Fricker; Scots Wha Ha'e, Leslie; Loch Lomond, Vaughan Williams; London Town, German; Festival Te Deum, Gustav Holst; Blest Pair of Sirens, Parry; Bless the Lord, O My Soul, Ippolitov-Ivanov; The Fairy, Vivian Hamilton; The Miracle of St. Raymond, Kurt Schindler; Sleep, My Pretty One, Ferrari; Old King Cole, Forsyth; The Wreck of the 'Julia Plant', Geoffrey O'Hara; Meistersinger; An Eriskey Love Lull, Robertson.

VIENNA

THE VOLKSOPER

In my February letter I gave some particulars of the Staatsoper. Our second operatic theatre is the Volksoper, which is situated in the outer districts of the city, thus clearly indicating its true mission. The idea leading to the foundation of this opera house, in 1905, was to supply the middle and lower classes with good operatic performances at moderate prices. One of the promoters of the Volksoper scheme, and incidentally the first director of the house, was Rainer Simons, a clever theatrical manager with a keen perception of the needs and possibilities of such an enterprise. He understood from the outset that the purpose of the smaller and more modest Volksoper, with its limited financial means, could not be in competition with the luxurious and spacious Staatsoper, as regards lavishness of scenery and staging, but rather the presentation of well-rounded performances, chiefly of the great classic operas, sung and acted by a well-balanced and thoroughly efficient ensemble not of stars but of young and ambitious singers capable of carrying the message of the masters to the minds of the masses. He was aided in his work by an almost unfailing sense for genuine talent, and many a singer whom he discovered and engaged for his Company has since acquired international fame. Having built up a comprehensive repertoire of the standard operas, M. Simons proceeded to enlarge the scope of his programme by adding interesting novelties of contemporary composers which were unduly neglected by the Staatsoper, and thus acquired for his theatre a clientele comprising both working people and musical connoisseurs. In 1917 M. Simons fell a victim to various unfavourable circumstances. His successor, who failed utterly, resigned a year later. It was then, immediately preceding the great 1918 Revolution, that Richard Strauss was appointed Director of the Staatsoper, and that the financial backers of the Volksoper, prompted by an ill-applied spirit of ambitious rivalry, induced Felix Weingartner to assume the directorship of their house. Once before Weingartner, who is principally a symphonic conductor, had attempted an operatic career when he directed, with small success and for a short period, the then Imperial Opera of this city. Undaunted by his first failure, he now decided to try his luck once more as an operatic manager.

Both Strauss and Weingartner were doomed to failure. It was probably unfair to demand from Strauss a knowledge of the practical requirements of theatrical management. Lack of practical theatrical experience also is, at least partly, responsible for Weingartner's mishap at the Volksoper. For the rest, his failure is due to his apparently declining powers as a conductor attendant upon his increasing age and, most of all perhaps, to the peculiar state of Austria's economic conditions. His income at the Volksoper is small as compared to the tempting salaries offered him for his South American and European tours, and these have more and more distracted his energies from his duties at the Volksoper. Weingartner has frequently been absent from his theatre for four or five consecutive months, relinquishing his office to irresponsible agents and second-rate conductors. Rehearsals were neglected, bad performances became the rule, and hardly any novelties were produced at his theatre of late, with the single exception of Weingartner's own Genesius, a thirty years old opera which proved to be an uninspired and antiquated medley of Wagnerian motives, and consisting mainly of 'Kapellmeistermusik.' Worst of all, the Volksoper has gradually forgotten its avowed purpose as a theatre for the masses. Prices were raised to such an extent as almost to equal those of the Staatsoper, but the repertoire grew dull and uninteresting. Finally he reverted to producing the popular operas of the ubiquitous Puccini, but even these would not attract the crowd, which preferred to attend the more spectacular performances of these works given at the Staatsoper at similar prices. Thus the present situation of the Volksoper is most critical and, according to well-founded rumour, Weingartner intends shortly to resign his post at that house.

THE PHILHARMONIC ORCHESTRA

Besides the Volksoper, Weingartner is also governing the destinies of the Philharmonic Orchestra which, in addition to doing nightly duty at the Staatsoper, gives a series of subscription concerts every season. Many consider the Vienna Philharmonic the greatest orchestra in the world, and while a certain over-estimation of this organization has become the rule among local patriots, it is surely to be regarded as one of the best of European orchestras and, at any rate, the foremost orchestral body at Vienna. Thus it is all the more painful to admit that the fluctuating state of affairs at present prevailing in this country, and the deplorable general decay resulting from the existing disorder, economic and political, have affected even this precious relic of a glorious past. Many of the most important of its members have accepted favourable offers from foreign countries, and Arnold Rosé, the Konzertmeister of the Orchestra, has practically left the organization for the sake of extended concert tours with his celebrated Quartet. The traditional dislike of rehearsals, which has been a privilege of the Philharmonic Orchestra's members even in old times, has grown beyond precedent, and Weingartner, all too often absent from the city, seems to lack the authority and energy required to combat this spirit. In view of Weingartner's alleged intention definitely to leave Vienna in the near future, the question arises as to his successor. According to the unanimous verdict of public and press, this should be no other than Wilhelm Furtwängler.

FURTWÄNGLER

Notwithstanding the popularity of Richard Strauss, the commanding figure of Vienna's musical life to-day is unquestionably Furtwängler. Three years ago he came here from Mannheim almost unheralded to succeed Oscar Nedbal as leader of the Tonkünstler Orchestra's subscription series, and within the short space of time which has since elapsed has succeeded in practically breaking the supremacy previously held by Weingartner and his Philharmonic Orchestra. The Tonkünstler series—the public has become accustomed to calling them 'Furtwängler concerts' pure and simple—is sold out twice for the entire year, and is ranked among the great events of the season, even in spite of the quality of the Orchestra which, though of fair standing, is not at all equal to that of the Philharmonic. The miracles which Furtwängler accomplishes with this body of players may best be judged by hearing the Orchestra play under any other leader. Ever since growing financial difficulties forced the Tonkünstler and Konzertverein Orchestras to merge—the combined forces bearing the name of 'Vienna Symphony Orchestra'—the two rival societies promoting these two series are, strangely enough, employing the same orchestra for their respective concerts. This affords an opportunity for hearing the same orchestra play under Furtwängler at the Tonkünstler concerts, and under Löwe on the Konzertverein evenings. Löwe is rather an exponent of a conservative older school, who excels in his readings—always authoritative, but never brilliant—of Brahms and Bruckner, which composers he prides himself in having numbered among his close personal friends. He is not at all a great conductor, but a sincere and earnest musician. If present plans materialise, Löwe is soon to retire to his other post as head of the Austrian State Conservatory of Music, of which he has been director for three years. The Singakademie, which is the choral section of the Konzertverein, has recently been united with the Philharmonic Chorus, formerly led by Franz Schreker, and the conductor of the combine is Bruno Walter, chef of the Munich Opera, who started his career at the Vienna Imperial Opera under Mahler. Furtwängler, besides his duties with the Tonkünstler Orchestra, has succeeded Franz Schalk (now co-director with Strauss at the Staatsoper) as leader of the Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde choral concerts, alternating there with Leopold Reichwein, who was formerly a conductor at the Staatsoper, but is now chiefly engaged in the more lucrative work of composing musical comedies for Viennese operetta theatres.

TWO POUNDS A MONTH

The orchestra undertaking all these concerts is the Symphony Orchestra already referred to, which is furthermore giving two popular concerts every Sunday afternoon, besides collaborating in a series of so-called Workers' Concerts, promoted by the Socialist Party of Austria in conjunction with the Austrian Government. These latter concerts, however, do not merely benefit the working classes. They also rally wide intellectual circles—professors, doctors, and students—who are at present practically excluded from attending the expensive concerts which are the rule here. In view of the tremendously important rôle which falls to the lot of the Symphony Orchestra, the news that this organization is now labouring under serious financial straits must be considered a national calamity. The State subsidy granted the Orchestra of less than two million crowns annually, and the annual municipal subsidy amounting to half a million crowns, have proved utterly insufficient to defray the growing deficit, although the monthly salary of each individual player amounts only to the pitiful sum of 71,000 kröner, which is approximately £2.

PERFORMING NEW WORKS

A Society which has been in existence for many years, having been founded by no less a personage than Johannes Brahms, has come forward recently with a timely new venture. The organization referred to is the Tonkünstler-Verein, which has resumed work, after some years of comparative retirement, with a very definite programme worthy of hearty commendation. By a series of concerts it proposes to give a hearing to the works of young and aspiring composers whose works are now precluded from public production owing to the high expense connected with such undertakings. The meetings of the Society are open to members and their friends without restraint, the membership fee is very low, and the best artists have volunteered their services for the cause of our rising composers, who will benefit by this enterprise not less than the musically-interested public. The organization seems destined to play an important part in the musical development of the city, far more so, for instance, than Arnold Schönberg's Society for the Promotion of Private Musical Performances. This organization—which was based on the autocratic principles of that firm believer in an aristocracy of art, Arnold Schönberg, and which strove for effectiveness within the narrow realm of a limited coterie of fanatics—has, for the present at least, suspended its activities owing to lack of funds. Even a genius like Schönberg will some day awake to the fact that great movements, musical or otherwise, though they originate with the elect few, are dependent upon the support of the masses in order to become productive. He will probably find that the necessary financial support for his aims will flow lavishly so soon as he decides to make his Society a matter of general public concern instead of, as has been the case heretofore, an affair governed solely by his own supreme, and at times erratic, will and supported exclusively by a small clique of his blindly and unconditionally devoted personal partisans.

PAUL BECHERT.

EARLY CHARTERS OF INCORPORATION GRANTED TO MUSICIANS

BY MURIEL SILBURN

(Continued from March number, page 275)

Another interesting example of the incorporation of executant musicians at an early period is found in the Tutbury Minstrels, who were incorporated by John of Gaunt, King of Castile and Duke of Lancaster, in 1381, during the reign of Richard II. This deed was known by the title of Carta le Roy de Minstralx, and applied to all the musicians within the 'honour' of Tutbury—an area comprising the counties of Stafford, Derby, Nottingham, Leicester, and Warwick. Hawkins gives an exhaustive account of this corporation, most of which is taken from Dr. Plot, the historian of Staffordshire, who was an eye-witness of the proceedings of the Tutbury Minstrels in 1680, thus proving that the customs established by the Charter of 1381 prevailed for three hundred years at least. The head of this body was known by the title of King of the Minstrels, and was supported by a bailiff and four under-officers or stewards. The election of officers took place yearly on the Eve of the Assumption, at Tutbury Castle. The proceedings began with an attendance at divine service: returning thence to the Castle, the roll was called; after which a jury of twenty-four—twelve representing Staffordshire, and twelve the other counties—was empanelled for hearing any 'plaints, or cause,' also for imposing fines for non-attendance and breaking the rules, and for the granting of licenses. The next procedure was the election of the officers, which was an annual procedure, followed by a banquet. Sports and pastimes were next in order, and a loathsomely full account of a bull-baiting is given by Hawkins. The charge by the steward to the jurors on such points as Dr. Plot mentions seems worthy of quotation:

'Then, to move them better to mind their duties to the King, and their own good, the steward proceeds to give them their charge, first commending to their consideration the Original of all Musick, both Wind and String Musick; the antiquity and excellence of both; setting forth the force of it upon the affections by diverse examples; how the use of it has always been allowed, as is plain from holy writ; in praising and glorifying God; and the skill in it always esteemed so considerable that it is still accounted in the schools one of the liberal arts and allowed in all godly Christian Commonwealths: where by the way he commonly takes notice of the statute, which reckons some musicians amongst vagabonds and rogues: giving them to understand that such societies as theirs, thus legally found and governed by laws, are by no means intended by that statute, for which reason the Minstrels belonging to the manor of Dutton, in the county palatine of Chester, are expressly excepted in that Act. Exhorting them upon this account to preserve their reputation: to be very careful to make choice of such men to be officers amongst them as fear God, are of good life and conversation, and have knowledge and skill in the practice of their art.'

It will be seen that the real object of the musicians' corporations was to act as a protective scheme against uncontrolled and vagabond minstrels. A commission granted by Elizabeth in 1567 for the protection of the Welsh bards, furnishes proof of this. The deed begins by declaring that:

'... it is come to the knowledge of the Lord President . . . that vagrant and idle Persons, naming themselves Minstrels, Rhymers, and Bards, are lately grown into such intolerable multitude within the Principality of North Wales that not only gentlemen and others by their shameful disorders are oftentimes disquieted in their Habitations, but also the expert Minstrels and Musicians in Tonge and Cunynge thereby much discouraged to travaile in the Exercise and Practise of their Knowledge, and also not a little hindred [of] Livings and preferment.'

To meet this state of affairs Elizabeth granted a commission to certain persons named, who were to utter a proclamation 'in all fairs, market towns, and other places of assembly' within the five most northerly counties of Wales that all persons 'that intend to maintain their living by name or colour of Minstrels, Rhymers, or Bards' shall appear before the commissioners. Calling to their aid 'men expert in the Faculty of Welsh Music,' the said Commissioners were then to appoint such as they deemed worthy, to 'use, exercise, and follow, the Science and Faculty of their Profession.' To those deemed unfit they were to give 'streight Monition and Commandment, in our Name, and on our Behalf, that they return to some honest labour. . . . such as they be apt unto for the Maintenance of their Living, upon pain to be taken as rude idle Vagabonds, and to be used according to the Laws and Statutes provided in that behalf.' This commission was signed by Elizabeth at Chester. Whether Her Majesty was petitioned on the subject we are not told.

It now remains to speak of the charters granted by the Kings of England for the protection of the musicians of the land. These charters, we are told, owe their existence to the fact that certain persons gained access to the houses of the wealthy by representing themselves to be members of the King's Minstrels. Accounts of Royal Minstrels extend as far back at least as the time of Edward III.; it is said that at the marriage festivities of that monarch's daughter, Margaret, as many as four hundred and twenty-six musicians were assembled. The earliest Royal Charter (the origin of which is explained above) was issued under the Great Seal of the Realm of England in 1472-73, by Edward IV., and provides that certain persons, the King's Minstrels, shall be 'in deed and name one body and cominalty, perpetual and capable in law, and should have perpetual succession.' The corporation was governed by a Marshal—a post held for life—and two wardens, who were elected annually. Their jurisdiction apparently comprised the whole of England—with the exception of the County of Cheshire, where the minstrels were already a corporate body, as we have seen. Their duty was 'the survey, scrutinie, correction, and government of all and singular the musicians within the kingdom.' Speaking of this charter, in Sandys's and Forster's History of the Violin it is declared that 'it did not prove of much benefit, and they [the minstrels] contrived to lose their reputation by the time of Elizabeth.' Surely an erroneous statement: far from not proving of much benefit it is 'the one charter' from which sprang all that came after.

The next charter that was granted by Royalty appears to have been obtained by the musicians of London from James I., in prejudice to the rights granted by Edward IV. to the musicians of the entire kingdom. According to Hawkins: 'James I., though it does not appear that he understood or loved music, yet was disposed to encourage it; for, after the example of Charles IX. of France—who in 1570 had founded a Musical Academy—he, by his letters patent, incorporated the musicians of London, who are still a society and corporation.' From this charter, therefore, the Musicians' Company originates, not from that of Edward IV., as is commonly stated.

(To be continued)

CONTENTS	Page
British Players and Singers: IV.—Dorothy Silk (with Special Portrait)	229
Modern Music: and a Way Out. By Rutland Boughton ...	231
Madrigalists and Lutenists (contd.). By Sylvia Townsend Warner	234
The Lure of Foreign Names. By Alexander Brent-Smith ...	237
Charles Gounod on Mozart's Don Juan . By Camille Saint-Saëns	238
Occasional Notes	240
Music in the Foreign Press. By M.-D. Calvocoressi ...	242
Music and Letters	242
The Musician's Bookshelf	243
New Music	246
Gramophone Notes. By 'Discus'	249
London Concerts	250
St. Martin's Pageant	261
W. G. Rothery, M.V.O.	261
Opera in London	262
Church and Organ Music	262
Samuel Sebastian Wesley's Tomb. By H. T. Gilberthorpe	262
(Illustrated)	262
The Organs in the Church of St. Lawrence Jewry. By Sidney	264
G. Ambler (Illustrated)	264
Letters to the Editor (with Illustration)	266
Sixty Years Ago	268
Sharps and Flats	268
Chamber Music for Amateurs	269
Modern Developments in Music	269
Royal Academy of Music	270
Royal College of Music	270
Trinity College of Music	271
Music in the Provinces	271
Sound Ranging	276
Music in Ireland	276
Obituary	276
Musical Notes from Abroad	277
Early Charters of Incorporation granted to Musicians. By	283
Muriel Silburn (continued)	283

Music:

I weigh not Fortune's Frown. Madrigal for Five Voices. By
ORLANDO GIBBONS	253

THREE EXTRA SUPPLEMENTS are given with this Number:
 1. Portrait of Dorothy Silk.
 2. 'Silent, O Moyle!' Four-part Song Arr. by Joseph Seymour.
 3. Competition Festival Record.

DURING THE LAST MONTH.

Published by NOVELLO & CO., LIMITED.

BACH, J. S.—Solos from the Sacred Cantatas. Set II. For Soprano, Alto, Tenor, and Bass. 2s. each.
 BUTTON, H. ELLIOT.—Communion Service in C, mostly in unison. (No. 1066, Novello's Parish Choir Book.) 8d.

CARPENTER, H. W.—Easter Anthems set to Chants. On Card, 1½d.

—“Requiem Æternam.” On Card, 1d.

GIBBONS, O.—“I weigh not fortune's frown.” Madrigal for S.S.A.T.B. Transcribed by H. ELLIOT BUTTON. (No. 950, The Musical Times.) 2d.

HALESEY, E.—“Lady, lay those frowns aside.” Madrigal for S.A.T.B. (No. 1395, Novello's Part-song Book.) 4d.

HARRISS, CHARLES.—“Pale and white is the rose.” (Grief.) Part-song for S.A.T.B. 3d.

—“Sunbeam, do not fly.” Part-song for S.A.T.B. 4d.

—“When gold-lipped morn.” (Fascination.) Part-song for S.A.T.B. 4d.

MANSFIELD, O. A.—Morning Hymn (“O Lord of the morning”). 1d.

PARRY, C. HUBERT H.—Symphony in E minor. For Orchestra. Full score, £2 2s.

POWELL, J. BADEN.—Office for the Holy Communion, in D minor. 1s. 6d.

RICHARDS, KATHLEEN.—Minuet, Gavotte, and Gigue. For Pianoforte Solo. 3s.

DURING THE LAST MONTH—(continued).

SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW, No. 358, contains the following music in both notations.—“Annie Laurie.” Scottish Air. Arranged as a Two-part Song. “The Pealing Bells.” Round for Four Voices. 2d.

SCHOOL SONGS. Published in two forms. A. Voice Parts in Staff and Tonic Sol-fa Notations, with Pianoforte Accompaniment (8vo). B. Voice Parts only, in Tonic Sol-fa Notation. A. B.

No. 1244. Three Unaccompanied Trios for S.A.B. (Staff-notation only) 2d. —
 “The Rowan Tree.” Scottish Air. “Drive the cold winter away.” Old English Tune. “Can love be controlled by advice.” Old English Tune.

No. 1303. Five Rounds. (Old English) 2d. —
 SWABY, R.—“Bourrée.” For Pianoforte Solo. 2s.

TALLIS, T.—“Os y cerchw fi” (“If ye love Me”). Anthem. Welsh Words. (No. 30, Anthemauro Novello.) Staff Notation, 3d. Tonic Sol-fa, 1½d.

PUBLISHED FOR

THE H. W. GRAY CO., NEW YORK.

BERGÉ, I.—“A visit from St. Nicholas.” For S.S.A. 50 cents (2s. 6d.).

HARRIS, CUTHBERT.—Caprice (“An April Day”). For Organ.

LEMARE, E. II.—“Easter Morn.” For Organ. 75 cents (3s. 6d.).

—Concert Gavotte. For Organ.

—October Serenade. For Organ.

MCCOLLIN, F.—“The Four Winds.” Chorus for T.T.B.B. with Pianoforte Accompaniment. 25 cents (1s.).

MERBECKE.—Communion Service. Adapted to the American Liturgy. Edited by C. W. DOUGLAS. 1s. (4s. 6d.).

SYKES, H. A.—“Romanza.” For Organ.

VINCENT, C.—Postlude in E. For Organ.

WEBBE, W. Y.—“Hide and Seek.” Duet for two Sopranos. 12 cents (6d.).

WOODMAN, R. H.—“Praise God in His Sanctuary.” Festival Anthem. 25 cents (1s.).

MANGELSDORFF'S EXAMINATION TEXT-BOOKS.

“THE GROUNDWORK OF MUSIC AND ELEMENTARY EAR-TRAINING.”

Paper, 1s., Cloth, 1s. 6d.

“300 Examination Questions” (Elementary), Cloth, 1s. 6d.

ARTHUR ELLARSHAW, 497, Coventry Road, Birmingham.

MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS REVISED.

LYRICS SET TO MUSIC, MELODIES HARMONIZED, MUSIC TRANSPosed AND COPIED, BAND PARTS WRITTEN, MSS. PREPARED FOR PUBLICATION BY A MASTER HAND, ACCOMPANIMENTS OF DISTINCTION WRITTEN TO SONGS.

For terms, write, A. CARRINGTON BRIGGS, Glennholme, The Common, Hessele, E. Yorks.

ACTIVE DIRECTOR REQUIRED, full-time occupation, London, in Music Publishing Company. Investment, £2,000. Salary £520 p.a. plus share of profits. Open to Accountants' and Solicitors' investigation. Write, Box 17, Nasco, Ltd., St. Ann's Chambers, Ludgate Hill, E.C. 4.

FOR SALE.—Two-manual ORGAN, now in Bognor Parish Church. In good condition, but bellows need some repair. Price £175, or near offer. Apply to F. Kitchener, Clovelly, Wood Street, Bognor.

ADVERTISER has for DISPOSAL CLASSICAL and MODERN MUSIC for Piano (two and four hands) and Organ. List on application. “H. C.” c/o Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.1.

ARTHUR ELLARSHAW, L.R.A.M., A.R.C.M., Pianist, Concerts, Recitals (solo Pianist only), 497, Coventry Road, Birmingham.

FULL FATHOM FIVE. Madrigal for male Quartet, by Arthur Mangelsdorff. Price 4d. Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, London, and from Arthur Ellarshaw, 497, Coventry Road, Birmingham.

THE POSTAGE OF THIS NUMBER IS TWOPENCE

No. 951

THE

MAY 15 1922

MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED 1844

MAY 1, 1922

Price 6d.

SPENCER PIANOS

GRANDS ▽ UPRIGHTS ▽ PLAYERS

Sole Agents

MURDOCH MURDOCH & CO

Piano & Player-Piano Experts

461 & 463 OXFORD STREET

And at BRIGHTON · PORTSMOUTH · SOUTHAMPTON
FOLKESTONE · DOVER · CHATHAM
BIRMINGHAM · CAMBRIDGE

ARCHIBALD RAMSDEN
LTD.
PATENT THREE COMPARTMENT TOP LID FOR GRAND PIANOS

We have already fitted over

1000 PIANOS

by most of the leading makers with this New Device.

Kindly send for Booklet giving particulars.

CECILIAN HOUSE,
65, WIGMORE STREET, LONDON.
12, Park Row, LEEDS.

FOUNDED
1837.

AGENTS
THROUGHOUT THE WORLD.

LANDS-UPRIGHTS.

AWARDS

for Good

Tone:

LONDON . . . 1851
PARIS . . . 1867
LIMA . . . 1872
CHRISTCHURCH
N.Z. 1882
LONDON . . . 1885

PLAYER-PIANOS.

Showrooms: 60, WIGMORE STREET, W.1. Phone; Langham 1418.
FACTORIES - - - LEIGHTON ROAD, KENTISH TOWN, LONDON, N.W.5.

ESTEY ORGANS ESTEY PIANOS

ONLY ONE GRADE OF EACH.
THE HIGHEST POSSIBLE.

Largest Stock of Organs in the World.

DESCRIPTIVE CATALOGUE POST FREE. CORRESPONDENCE INVITED.

Telephone: Museum 1317.

Telegrams: "ESTEY OX. LONDON."

Estey Organ Co.

- 12 -

RATHBONE PLACE,
OXFORD STREET,
LONDON, W. 1.

TWELVE NUMBERS NOW READY.

Historical Songs and Ballads of Ireland

ARRANGED BY

HERBERT HUGHES.

SILENT, O MOYLE
KITTY OF COLERAINE
THE DEAR LITTLE SHAMROCK
THE WIDOW MALONE
THE WIND THAT SHAKES THE BARLEY
RORY O'MORE

SHE IS FAR FROM THE LAND
THE LOW-BACKED CAR
GENERAL MUNROE
THE WINDING BANKS OF ERNE
THE BARD'S LEGACY
ERIN, THE TEAR AND THE SMILE

Price, 2s. each net.

METZLER TRIO SERIES

(Trios for All.)

FOR PIANO, VIOLIN, AND VIOLONCELLO. PRICE 1s. NET, EACH TRIO.

(Extra parts may be had for 1st violin, 2nd violin, 'cello, bass, and harmonium, price 4d. net, each.)

20 celebrated familiar numbers easily arranged for Cinemas, Restaurants, and for use in the HOME CIRCLE.

METZLER & CO. (1920), LTD.,

(ESTABLISHED 1788.)

142, CHARING CROSS ROAD, LONDON, W.C.2.

1. 1. 1.

Reproduced from a Photograph by C. Vandyk Ltd. Buckingham Palace Road, London, S.W. 1.

ROBERT RADFORD

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

MAY 1 1922

BRITISH SINGERS AND PLAYERS:

V.—ROBERT RADFORD

It is the executive musician's lot to win the brightest but the soonest withering wreaths. Theirs are plaudits and notoriety such as a composer hardly comes by. But their names are mostly ephemeral. Still a memory does now and then emerge from the tides of time. Acclaimed names of the 19th century, such as John Braham and Charles Santley, still have a meaning. They speak to us still of the best achievement and best taste, in that particular line, in a given period, and Mr. Henry Davey, the historian of English music, surely is right in insisting that the taste to which an outstanding singer appealed, the taste which at the same time he helped to form and refine, is part of the matter of history.

Robert Radford, our English 20th century bass, appears to us such a singer. What he has done and sung in the past twenty years speaks for what the English taste of the time has most required of a singer, and at the same time his taste and art have had their action on what we like sung and how we like it sung. Posterity then will kindly note the name of Radford in its records; the type of the good English singer, who starts by doing the things that are expected of him, only rather better, and then proceeds to do other things, enlarging his field without at all abandoning the first plot. In the unexpected achievement is the preservative touch against time. The thought of Santley sticks in the mind—the great, the one Elijah of the Mendelssohnian heyday, and at the same time the first English Vanderdecken, and the most brilliant. Similarly Radford, the established bass soloist of Handel Festivals, steps out as the first English Boris and Ivan, and a zealous mason in the new rebuilding of English opera.

Robert Radford, at this moment when we approach him with our little catechism, stands at the top of his half-completed arch of life-work: twenty years of public singing well and soundly built—twenty more to be done. But how peripatetic is the job of these modern master-singers! They are wondrous stores of lore about railway routes and hotel accommodation, and the catechiser's well-nigh only chance seems to be in an express dining-car. Linger elsewhere with your questioning, and your busy mastersinger is probably risking the missing of a train or defrauding an audience of its Judas Maccabæus or its Sarastro. Mr. Radford, however, is one day cornered, and then cheerfully submits.

AT THE ACADEMY AND THE FESTIVALS

Q. 'What is your age, birthplace, hereditary musicianship, nationality past and present, and so on?'

A. 'In spite of all temptation, an Englishman. Nottingham born and bred. A deserter from the honourable vocation of accountancy. A climber, who rose to the height of the Royal Academy of Music doorway by means of the step-ladder of accompanying a pseudo-nigger minstrel troupe. My mother was musical, my father had a good voice. As a boy I was a treble soloist. My voice broke, and I accompanied and conducted the minstrel troupe in spare time from office-work. Miss Agnes Larkcom thenadays used to come to Nottingham to teach. She gave me an introduction to Mr. Randegger. His encouragement meant my farewell to books and figures. I entered the R.A.M. in Mr. Frederic King's class. From the first my voice as a man has been a real bass, but I remember at the R.A.M. opera class singing Carmen's Toreador—transposed down. While I was still an Academy student I was given a small part in Berlioz's Faust at the Norwich Festival of 1899—I sang alongside Albani, Lloyd, and Black.'

'What was the real starting-point of your public singing?'

'Percy Harrison, of Birmingham, a powerful impresario in those days, engaged me for his subscription concerts. But for a time things were hard. I had the usual little humiliations of a young singer who wants to be a really commanding figure straightaway, but has to be glad enough to accept little engagements for—well, for the smallest possible number of guineas, if guineas are in the plural at all! My first Covent Garden year was 1905. It was the opening night—Don Giovanni under Richter, with Destinn, Renaud, and Journet. I was the Commandatore—not a small ordeal, I rather seem to remember.

'The next year (1906) was my first Handel Festival. I sang Judas Maccabæus. I was the "kid" of the Festival, and at the public rehearsal things went swimmingly enough. But before the performance I had not been particularly well, and in Arm, arm ye brave I "cracked" on the top E. Dreadful moment! I felt that the sound of that note at such an august ceremony must have gone forth to all the nation, and certainly I wasn't allowed to forget it by chaffing friends. But anyhow everybody still remained quite kind, and I was applauded charmingly by the chorus and audience, and in spite of that E I have sung at the other Handel Festivals since.'

'At how many Festivals all told have you sung?'

'Sorry! But it is so long since I gave up being an accountant. Roughly, say thirty.'

'And how often have you sung in The Messiah?'

'Sorry again! But, at a guess, two hundred times. And certainly a dozen to fifteen times in many years.'

'And how often have you sung in public?'

The question has Mr. Radford thoroughly beaten. He diffidently ventures the estimate 'three thousand.'

THE ENGLISH OPERA-SINGING REVIVAL

'Discuss [so the catechism proceeded] one or more new musical influences of your time.'

'There appears to me to have been a new dawn of appreciation of opera. The English Ring performances of Richter fourteen years ago, followed by Denhof's seasons and then, of course, Sir Thomas Beecham's, are bound to be historical. I must say I am an enthusiast for opera myself. I think it is a branch of music that a country cannot properly do without. There are people for whom it is the only avenue to music. I think a national school of opera singing (I do not mean a "National School" in capitals) is necessary if singers are to be complete artists. All this is rather more a faith of mine than just a professional outlook. I mean to say that as things are at present opera is not exactly an overwhelming pecuniary lure! I might even hint that a good many English singers who have given themselves to opera in the past dozen years or so were far from doing the best thing pecuniarily for themselves. But opera has a lure—a permanent lure both for singers and for the public. There are other musical forms as good, of course, but nothing that quite takes its place.'

The talk was inevitably drawing near the subject of the recent successful launching in the North of the British National Opera Company, which this May is taking the boards at Covent Garden. In the refloating of this Company—reported two and a half years ago, under the name of the Beecham Company, to be, after many a gallant expedition, a complete wreck—Mr. Radford has, of course, been a prime mover.

'February and March at Bradford, Liverpool, Edinburgh, Leeds, and Halifax showed that there is in the country an appetite such as had never been before for opera. Hopes have been surpassed. And so, although Italian and German and French and Russian ghosts may rise in myriads when we sing at Covent Garden in May, I remain quite optimistic about London. When I look round for the causes of this fresh appreciation it occurs to me that one share in the credit must go to the gramophone. Gramophone discs have taught people far and wide to know well certain portions of many operas. Many who have never been opera-goers are now not in fear of being entirely in the dark.

The gramophone is undoubtedly making rapid changes in the musical world. Apart from opera, it is changing the teaching of music in schools. Take Oundle; I suppose it is one of the most progressive of our public schools. Full-dress oratorios are performed there, and the gramophone is a regular means of musical instruction.'

THE SINGER'S TECHNIQUE

'Is opera-singing calculated to improve the English oratorio style?'

'We often hear now that it does. It is true enough, of course. It is also true that a good oratorio style is useful for opera. It is fair to English oratorio tradition to remember that Richter enlisted very many of his English Ring performers from the oratorio school. A good singer of Bach and Handel is already in no small part equipped for singing Mozart, Verdi, and Wagner. After all, some of the demands are the same. The singer of Bach and Handel has learnt to carve, so to speak, a formed and decided and eloquent vocal line. That too is wanted if a voice is going to be effective in a large theatre with a large orchestra storming at you. Now there is a modern type of quite artistic singer who is a failure at both. This is the type of singer who has never learnt to use a big brush.'

'This type, then, is something new since your own student days?'

'Apparently; anyhow I seem to come across more youngsters to-day whose one and only ambition is the singing of "art songs," and remarkably intelligent and musicianly youngsters they often are. But there is a tendency among them to mix their tastes in general music with matters of vocal technique. They wish at all costs to sing the music of certain modern composers, and certain modern composers seem to me to have the fault of writing vocal music which disregards the very nature of the human voice. Do they write for the violin in a way which would be more appropriate for kettle-drums? Anyhow, at colleges where I examine I find the level of intelligence and musical perception high and the average command of voice production poor. These clever students cannot, for all their musicianship, step out and take a creditable part in the B minor Mass or Aida.'

'What music, then, if not Schönberg and Stravinsky, should be the singer's school?'

'Sing Purcell, Bach, Handel, and Mozart I suggest, and if you can sing them well, then you may shame the devil!'

'What music is your own private delight?'

'The answer is in four letters—B-A-C-H. When I need a tonic I sit down and play Bach—cantatas and so on. For pleasure in actual singing give me Handel, Mozart, Verdi, and Wagner—all of them men who knew how to write for the bass voice. There comes in a little grievance I have against composers of to-day. How many of them think of differentiating voices? Of course there is Elgar, and every bass must take off his hat at the name. Judas, in The Apostles, is one of the greatly characterised parts of universal music. There are some first-rate songs of John Ireland. (And in parenthesis I rather pat myself on the back for having been some sort of factor in getting Ireland's earlier songs published.)

'But if you grumble to an ordinary composer that his songs are too high for you, he gaily says, "Oh, transpose down a third or so!" Yes, transpose down, accompaniment and all, and the composition becomes dull and ineffective! It is curious that in days when so much is thought of orchestral colour-values composers are so indifferent towards vocal values. I should have thought it was clear that in a bass song the distribution of the accompaniment, for instance, ought to be quite different from a soprano song. In the orchestra a composer does not lightly say, "Oh, transpose that trumpet part down and give it to a bassoon."

'I think huge credit is due to Mr. Plunket Greene for winning nowadays a hearing for bass voices in music of a better stamp than used to be the vogue. It is not so long ago since a bass soloist could sing little more interesting songs than The Diver and The Skipper type. I notice, too, that there appear to be more true basses nowadays than twenty years or so ago. I seem to remember that a true bass was rather a rare bird. We could to-day do well with a first-class basso cantante, heavy and with a big upward range—I mean a Wotan voice. It is not easy in the length and breadth of the land to find a good English Wotan, I can assure you.'

[Mr. Radford's own range is from about F sharp above the bass stave to the C below it.]

'Beecham was once conducting a rehearsal of The Magic Flute, and at one place in Sarastro's recitative, where one usually goes up to C, Beecham pointed down, and I dived beneath the stave. It "came off," and ever since I have sung the low C.'

TRANSLATIONS AND SCENERY

Mr. Radford draws by way of a hobby, and he confesses to having composed 'on the quiet.'

'One of my songs was published under a nom de guerre by Boosey, and had something of a success, but I don't really suffer from swelled head on that account.'

In the first English Ring Mr. Radford sang Hunding and Fasolt. Then in the first Beecham season he took part in Strauss's St. John's Eve and in Mozart's Seraglio (Osmin). Among very many later rôles some of his favourites are Boris Godounov, Ivan the Terrible, the Father in Louise, Pogner, and King Mark. He feels strongly about the inadequacy of many English versions of well-known operas.

'Ludicrous translations have been a great handicap to the singing of opera in English. The chief responsibility is the publisher's. Some foreign publishers in particular seem neither to know nor care what nonsense in guise of English is printed in the score. Then there are able literary people who write readable translations which however ignore the quality of singableness. Before anyone dares to publish an English version of an important opera there ought to be a round-table conference at which all the points could be discussed. This is a question which one day the National Opera Company is going into thoroughly. As it is, most singers edit their parts themselves. Bit by bit we ought to build up a collection of definitive English librettos, each one tested in sense and in use. There are few enough existing ones that will pass all tests.

'A valuable innovation which the National Opera Company can already plume itself on is the new substitute for scenery—Mr. Oliver Bernard's device—which has been approved lately in the North. The principle is: curtains played on by shifting lights instead of solid "sets." My own belief is that in all the non-realistic operas this will entirely replace conventional scenery. Mr. Herbert Thompson, at Leeds, gave it the warmest praise, and to my mind the poetic, atmospheric effect is incomparable. The idea derives, no doubt, from Gordon Craig's theories of stage decoration. There is furthermore the additional advantage that much money is saved in avoiding the transport of scenery. In fact, it opens up a fresh future for opera performances, particularly in the provinces. The Magic Flute, Tannhäuser, Tristan, Faust, and Madame Butterfly have already been staged in this way. The experiment is to be tried next month at Covent Garden.'

Mr. Radford remembered that when his words saw the light, 'next month' would be 'this month,' the fateful month of May.

'It will be a month of crucial importance to English singers. We do not ask for overmuch indulgence from opera-goers. At the same time, let them be as kind as they can be. This is the reorganized Company's first year, and difficulties are pretty considerable. But the give-and-take and the esprit de corps behind the scenes are extraordinary—a refutation of those who scoffed at vain opera-singers being incapable of pulling together in a common cause.'

In a last word, Mr. Radford was asked about the prospect of English music finding a home among these English singers.

'A ticklish question! The size of Covent Garden is such a consideration. If we were playing in a smaller theatre there are half-a-dozen English operas which it would be a pleasure and an assured success to stage; but isn't it a fact that the indubitable masterpieces of English opera are little masterpieces—I mean Savitrì and The Immortal Hour, and The Boatswain's Mate and Shamus O'Brien—whereas Covent Garden was built for Meyerbeer and Verdi? Can you yourself name an English grand opera, of the Covent Garden scale, appropriate in every way for production by us this summer?'

[But here the catechised catechiser blenched, and was still.]

'But as time goes on the production of English operas will be one of the very reasons of the National Company's being,' said Mr. Radford.

And he mentioned a name or two; but for these the time is not yet. C.

PROTECTION FOR CRITICS

BY ERNEST NEWMAN

The critics seem to have been having rather a bad time lately. First of all there was the case of the Editor of the Revue des deux Mondes, who was ordered by a court—apparently in perfect seriousness—to place at the service of some dramatist or other, who thought he had not been treated with sufficient respect, twice the space of the original article for a reply to a criticism. Next came the Parisian actress who threatened proceedings against an artist for having exhibited a caricature of her—which of course is only another form of criticism. Then another Parisian actress sued a dramatic critic for damages because he gave in print the true reason for the sudden termination of one of her performances—which was not that she was overcome by the emotion induced by her part, but simply that her dental plate had come in two. The lady did not deny the truth of the explanation, but felt that in making it public the journalist had been lacking in reverence for her as an artist. They are a touchy lot. You can't chaff them without their being offended; you can't discuss them seriously without their being offended. What are you to do with them?

Recently we have had the sad spectacle of Mr. C. B. Cochran being compelled to conquer his well-known aversion from self-advertisement and come into the limelight with an attack on the dramatic critics. Mr. Cochran is nothing if not thorough-going. It is only his kindness of heart that holds him back from suing for libel those critics who are so thick of head or so hard of heart as not to recognise that whatever Mr. Cochran does in revue is right. 'I imagine,' he says, 'that if a newspaper stated that a customer at Harrod's Stores indignantly refused to pay for a handkerchief sold as silk but actually of calico it would make itself liable for a libel action unless it could prove the statement to be true.' I suppose it is only my stupidity, but it does not seem to me that the two cases are absolutely parallel. Whether a handkerchief is made of silk or of calico is a matter of fact, not of opinion. There are tests by which it can be settled to everyone's satisfaction. But whether a 'turn' in a revue is sufficiently clever or amusing for a critic to write home about, or even to write to his paper about, is a matter less of fact than of opinion; and I cannot quite see our judges and juries, as yet, sending people to gaol for the crime of differing from an impresario on a matter of taste.

Now that threats of legal action are in the air, perhaps the critic may be allowed to contribute a note or two to the chorus. He is generally regarded by the people who are technically known as artists as something to be fired at. What if, as a change, he begins firing himself? It may easily come to this if certain people in the world of music do not mend their ways.

They are strange people, these artists. They profess to have the utmost contempt for criticism and the critics; yet they spend many pounds every year in reprinting the criticism of the critics—when it happens to be favourable. No critic objects to that procedure in and by itself. Critics are kind-hearted people, and if they can help a lame dog over a stile they are only too glad to do so. But they have a right to object, and they do object, to the dog getting the lift under false pretences. The dog, for his part, has no right to go about making it appear that a critic has been admirably helping him over the stile when what the critic really tried to do was to push him under the stile and keep him there, in the interests of other dogs and of humanity's calves. Still less right has the dog to go about saying that the critic tried to poison and hamstring him, when all the critic did was to say that he did not like the dog's bark, or was doubtful as to his having a license.

Some of these 'artists' have a way of cutting out a sentence here and a phrase there from a criticism, and reprinting these in such a way as to make it appear that what was at its best a tolerant or ironic smile on the critic's face was really a grin of ecstatic welcome. Sometimes the 'artist' goes beyond even this mild form of sharp practice. I once wrote about a certain foreign singer in terms that were designed to make it clear even to him how little I thought of his art. A little later a compatriot of this person, returned from a tour in his native country, told me that this 'artist' was everywhere proclaiming in the native press and in his programmes that I had alleged him to be one of the greatest singers I had ever heard. I have no remedy, of course. Sheer mendacity of this kind is rare, but the methods of one or two 'artists' in this country also have made me doubt whether they have pondered very deeply on the ethics of quotation.

I am moved to these remarks by a recent experience with an English composer who shall be nameless. This person advertised in at least two English newspapers that the Sunday Times had said that 'this composer's work is dead, dead beyond recall.' I quote in full what I did say, omitting only, in charity, the name of the composer and that of the work under discussion :

'At the same concert we had the Overture to Mr. X.'s ——. I should have preferred to say nothing about it, for it is against my nature to speak ill of the dead, and ——*, I fear, is dead beyond the hope of resurrection. Sometimes, however, an autopsy on a musical work is desirable in order to determine the cause of death. —— evidently died because of a lack of harmony between its various functions. The Overture is typical of the whole. It shows Mr. X. as a composer without the smallest faculty of self-criticism. Whatever comes into his head apparently goes on to paper; there is no sifting out, no refining of this and scrapping of that. The result is that each of his long works is the strangest medley of real genius and distressing commonness. Genuine inspirations rub shoulders with ideas that make you wonder how any man could write them out and not see the banality of them. There are things in the —— Overture that make you catch your breath with astonishment and delight; there are other things that make you blush for the composer.'

It is clear from this, surely, that I was discussing not the composer's work as a whole, but one work only of his, and that even in that work I found a good deal to admire. Is it a constitutional incapacity for accuracy that makes him pervert this judgment, in his advertisements, into 'this composer's work is dead, dead beyond recall'—the implication of these words being that I was referring to the whole of his work—or must we seek another explanation? Even the phrase 'dead, dead beyond recall' is not mine.

Anyhow, this sort of thing cannot be permitted to continue. Mr. X.'s perversion of my words must have come under the eyes of many people who would have no means of knowing that it was a perversion. I found it innocently reproduced, as gospel truth, in two American journals, and no doubt it appeared in others. I am not taking the incident too seriously. Students of instrumentation are familiar with the description of the bassoon as the clown of the orchestra. This particular composer is regarded by some people as the bassoon among composers; and for that reason they look with an indulgent eye upon his escapades.

* I.e., this particular work—an opera.

It may interest composers, artists, and agents to know that the Critics' Circle (in connection with the Institute of Journalists) has recently been deliberating on matters of this sort. The critics have too long submitted uncomplainingly to their criticisms being distorted and perverted for the purpose of advertisement. Artists and agents, as a result of license too long unchecked, have come to believe that they have not only a prescriptive right to quote part or all of an article for their own purpose (which, of course, by law they have not), but a right to misquote it in any way that suits them best. Sometimes a critic who invariably initials his own articles in the newspaper for which he writes finds that an uninitialled notice by some other member of the staff is reproduced with his name appended to it. He is thus made responsible in the public eye for an opinion with which perhaps he disagrees. Sometimes, by selection and rearrangement of words, he is made to say something quite different from what he really did say. I write, let us suppose, that 'among the violinists of the third class, Miss Jones is a player of the first order.' This is reproduced in the advertisements with the first seven words omitted. I have seen critiques so mutilated in this and other ways that in their advertised form they have expressed the exact opposite to what the critic meant to convey.

Occasionally the alteration is so slight that one can hardly say positively that it amounts to perversion, yet the critic knows that the reader of the advertisement is getting from it an impression rather different from that which he would have got from the article itself. Here is an example of this milder form of manipulation. In a recent Musical Times review of new pianoforte music (not by me, let me add) appeared the following: 'Cyril Scott's Inclination à la Danse (Elkin) has an impetus that is too often lacking in his music. Its harmonic flavour is sharper, and its rhythm more incisive. We could do with more Scott of this kind.' This has been condensed in an advertisement into eight words: 'We could do with more of this kind.—Musical Times.' I leave it to the reader to say whether he thinks this conveys accurately the full meaning of the reviewer.

A principle is at stake, and it is time either some aggrieved individual or some responsible journalistic body took action upon it. In law, the rights in an article are vested in the author or the paper. The moral right to reasonable quotation has never been denied, but if the quotation is to be not merely unreasonable but positively misleading then it is time someone put the law into force against a transgressor, as a lesson to the others.

A few months ago, it will be remembered, Mr. Rudyard Kipling brought an action against the makers of a certain proprietary article for the alleged unauthorised and improper use of a verse of one of his poems to advertise their preparation. He won his case, and was granted an injunction to restrain further infringement, with costs against the defendants.

'It was said [remarked Mr. Justice Peterson, in giving judgment] that quotation was permissible if it was fair and reasonable. No doubt an author might not object to quotation for certain purposes; but there was no right to take a substantial part without the author's consent, and he [the learned judge] saw no reason why an author should permit the use of a quotation for the purpose of pushing the goods of an advertiser.'

Now it is frankly for the purpose of pushing their goods that composers and performers reprint the remarks of critics; and the critics have at least the right to ask that in this process of unauthorised reprinting they shall not be made to seem to say something quite different from what they really said—either by pure falsification on the advertiser's part or by manipulations of, or omissions from, the original text. These people and their agents have too long assumed that a critic's articles are theirs to do what they like with. I suggest that it be impressed upon them that if they wish to reprint an article, or part of one, for advertisement purposes of their own, they should first submit to the critic or the newspaper, for his or its approval, the summary or the paraphrase they propose to make of it: and that every such reprint shall bear the date of the original article. This is sometimes of the first importance to the critic. I myself have had the annoyance of seeing some many-years-old references of mine to a certain composer—about whom my opinion has largely changed in the interval—circulated without their date being given, and so made to convey a wholly false impression of my present views upon him.

Some day, I think, the courts will have to be asked to decide as to whether these traditional practices of artists and agents are permissible. Within the last few months an American author, Mr. W. F. McCaleb, brought an action—and, I believe, won it—against the exhibitors of an 'historical' film for misquoting on the screen from an historical treatise of his. He '... alleged in his pleading that the purported quotation is erroneous, and that it expresses a view diametrically opposed to the opinion in fact expressed by him in his book, and that it is injurious to him in his reputation and standing as an author and historian.'

Commenting on the case, the Author (the journal of the [British] Incorporated Society of Authors) says that '... it would seem, on the principle of the British cases,* that Mr. McCaleb is right, and that he ought to succeed in his action if he can prove that the quotation attributes to him an opinion which, in fact, he never expressed.'

* Cases decided by English courts in the author's favour on the ground of 'misrepresentation of facts as to what the author had written, thereby falsely imputing to him the authorship of work inferior to his own standard of work in the same class.' Some of the perversions I have seen of a critic's words for advertisement purposes would certainly come under this category.

I hope that the people who are in the habit of manipulating Press notices for their own purposes will take note of these legal opinions. The majority of these good people are not consciously dishonourable; they are simply doing blindly or semi-humorously what it has become the practice in the profession to do. Now they know how the critics resent it, they will no doubt see that it is not cricket, and give it up. To the others—who are impervious to any appeal to their honour—the friendly warning may be given that they are playing a dangerous game.

ZOLTÁN KODÁLY

By CECIL GRAY

While the name of Kodály is already vaguely familiar to a few, his work remains almost entirely unknown for the very good reason that, with the exception of two early works, none of it has hitherto been published. This omission, we are glad to note, is now being speedily made good, and the recent simultaneous issue by the Universal-Edition of several of his latest works affords ample opportunity to everyone who is interested in contemporary developments for making the acquaintance of a singularly talented and original personality.

The fact that he already enjoys a certain legendary and shadowy reputation among cognoscenti without his works being known is in great measure due to the constant association of his name with that of his compatriot and contemporary, Béla Bartók, whose works are relatively familiar. This association, though doubtless inevitable, is not at all to Kodály's advantage, all the less so because there are at first sight sufficient superficial resemblances between them to justify it, and even to warrant the inference that Kodály is only a follower or imitator of Bartók. Nothing could be further from the truth. Such stylistic similarities as do undoubtedly exist are not the result of the influence of either composer upon the other, but are simply the outcome of wholly impersonal and extraneous influences to which both have equally been subject. Their respective talents have been nurtured by identically the same conditions, and have reacted to precisely the same artistic stimuli, particularly that afforded by the distinctive idiomatic peculiarities of Hungarian folk-music. But there the resemblance ends. Although both speak the same language to a certain extent, they express a totally different order of ideas and emotions. Their personalities are quite distinct from each other, and this, after all, is the only thing that really matters. It is not, ultimately, the national element which Borodin and Moussorgsky share in common that imparts significance to their music, but their individual genius. They merely happened to make use of certain hitherto neglected modes of expression for their own very good purposes. The reason why the music of Rimsky-Korsakov, on the other hand, does not exhibit the same genuine and lasting qualities lies precisely in his utter lack of personality, in his almost entire reliance upon novel and exotic colouring and idiomatic piquancies which fail to retain our attention once the charm of their novelty and unfamiliarity has worn off. Although Kodály's utterance is highly coloured by national peculiarities, the quality of his thought is markedly personal, and a comparison of his music with that of Bartók reveals more contrasts than of similarities, more points of divergence than contact.

Kodály has written very few works—surprisingly few, in fact; but it would be a great mistake to assume that this is due to any lack of invention. As a matter of fact, sterility in art is far more frequently characterised by excessive than by restricted production; in any case, a few good works constitute a surer earnest of virility than a multitude of bad ones. The exiguity of Kodály's output, like that of many other fine artists, is due rather to a deliberate restraint and self-control than to any lack of invention. He is the possessor of an unsparing critical sense, and a laudable distaste for encumbering the already groaning earth with even one more unnecessary or imperfectly realised work.

This aristocratic reserve and sensibility reveals itself also in his choice of media. He does not appear to be greatly attracted to the orchestra, but prefers to confine himself almost entirely to the comparatively restricted domain of chamber music. Two songs with orchestral accompaniment are his sole contribution to the larger forms. It is this curious and possibly unique combination of a popular and idiomatic mode of expression with refinement and delicacy of feeling, which constitutes the peculiar charm and appeal of Kodály's art.

In the earlier works the popular element tends to preponderate, and in some of the pianoforte pieces (Op. 3) can be found traces of an exasperated sensibility and a less restrained emotion than his later works exhibit. Particularly interesting is the group of sixteen songs with pianoforte accompaniment, settings of traditional words to music which embodies to such a remarkable degree the idiomatic characteristics of the Hungarian folk-songs on which they are modelled that they are almost indistinguishable from the originals. Here is a typical passage from No. 4:

SIXTEEN SONGS, OP. 1, No. 4.

KODÁLY.

Ex. 1. mp cresc.

Indeed, Kodály is much more uncompromisingly national from the very beginning than Bartók. The latter in his early works shows evident traces of the influence of Wagner and Strauss; but the former seems always to have evinced a decided hostility to German music, and to have altogether escaped its influence, for better or for worse. But in the course of time, while Bartók becomes more Beethovenian, Kodály falls to a certain extent under the influence of the modern French school, to certain members of which he reveals a marked affinity—although, unlike them, he neither falls into a bath of tonal impressionism nor makes use of any programmatic implications, literary or pictorial.

But while his style becomes more cosmopolitan and eclectic, the quality of his thought becomes increasingly personal. This is generally found to be the case with nationalist composers, unless they are content to write a few works, or, alternatively, to go on repeating ad infinitum what they have already said. It is no mere coincidence that Borodin, to use his own words, was only a Sonntags-musiker, who nevertheless found time to say all that he had to say in the intervals between his chemistry lectures at a girls' school (or was it experimental physics, like Dr. Pangloss in Candide?); that Moussorgsky similarly wrote very little, and seems to have spent most of his time in trying to supplement the somewhat poor yield of the national soil by means of too copious libations to local deities; that Synge had already begun to repeat himself before his untimely death; that Mr. Yeats, not being a professor of chemistry nor a Sonntags-dichter, nor yet a dipsomaniac, and still very much alive, came to an end of his limited, if exquisite, vein many years ago; or that Sibelius, Bartók, Stravinsky even, have all to a very large extent abandoned nationalism, or have, at any rate, mixed so many extraneous elements with it that it is no longer pure and undefiled. The fact is that although nationalism is a fertile field for musical exploitation, it is one which is quickly exhausted. Its many and indisputable riches lie near the surface, and its soil needs the constant enrichment of the more fecund, though probably more corrupt, loam of cosmopolitanism. The deeper and more profound an artist's utterance, the more universal in style, the more individual in conception it tends to become. Nationalism is a via media, a middle term, neither one thing nor another, neutralising complete individuality of thought and inhibiting a large and impersonal utterance of it.

And so we find that in his later and maturer works Kodály adopts a slightly broader and more eclectic style, although, as with Bartók or Sibelius, his thought is still recognisably coloured by racial proclivities.

It is difficult to think of any work for a solo instrument other than the pianoforte since the time of Bach which is able to awaken and maintain our interest except possibly Paganini's Violin Capricci. Stravinsky's clarinet pieces, for example, short though they be, succeed in outlasting our even shorter patience. To write an unaccompanied 'Cello Sonata in three movements, as Kodály has done, demands considerable courage, but his musicianship is more than equal to the test. Our attention is held from first to last, as much by the abstract musical interest of each movement as by the wealth of resource and ingenuity of treatment which so eloquently testify to the intimate understanding of the nature and capabilities of the instrument for which the work is written. It is all the more worthy of serious attention in view of the scarcity of interesting modern 'cello music. It must be admitted, however, that it demands a virtuoso to perform it, the last movement in particular being of exceptional difficulty.

The Duo, Op. 7, for violin and 'cello, is hardly so satisfactory, largely on account of the almost insoluble problem which the combination presents. The perfect balance and texture of the quartet or even of the trio are unattainable, while the compensating advantages of the free, rhapsodic, and improvisatory possibilities at the disposal of the solo instrument are similarly excluded. A duo is not an ensemble nor yet two solo instruments, and in a work of any considerable length the unsatisfactory nature of the combination is bound to manifest itself. The slow movement nevertheless is one of great charm and melodic beauty.

The second String Quartet, Op. 10, is stylistically akin to the Quartets of Debussy and Ravel, relying less upon melodic independence or intricacy in the part-writing than on harmonic or colouristic contrast. The second movement—a slow movement, Scherzo, and Finale in one—is characteristically national in the constant vivid alternation of emotional extremes which it exhibits, between a mood of tender and elegiac sorrow and one of exuberant, almost boisterous, gaiety. Here is an extract:

QUARTET NO. 2, OP. 10.

KODÁLY.

Ex. 2.

pp molto dolce. ppp ppp mp f

senza sord. f cresc. con fuoco. cresc. f allargando.

The Serenade for two violins and viola (Op. 12) is the most recent of Kodály's works and one of the most attractive, particularly the second movement—a dialogue between the first violin and viola, while the second violin sustains throughout a soft, murmuring accompaniment—a conception full of charm and delicate ironic fantasy:

SERENADE, OP. 12.

KODÁLY.

Ex. 3.

Lento ma non troppo. (♩ = 92.)

1st V. p indifferente.

2nd V. sempre p p (tremolo con sordino.)

p espress. cres. cres. cres. p ff p ff

In fact, Kodály's slow movements strike us as being on the whole his best; they are certainly the most completely personal. He has a vein of wistful meditation, of searching melancholy and tenderness, which is peculiarly his own. With all his simplicity and directness we are nevertheless always conscious of a curious subtlety and refinement of style, a studious exactness and precision of touch underlying the somewhat deceptive appearance of candour and ingenuousness in his procedure.

Bartók touches greater heights and wider extremes than Kodály; his genius is of a more robust order. Kodály seems rather to avoid extremes, not necessarily because he is fundamentally incapable of them, nor because he subscribes to the anti-emotionalist dogmas of a certain momentarily prominent group of composers, but simply out of a natural and instinctive reticence and a habit of emotional reserve.

There is a delicate and elusive fragrance about his music which it is impossible to define or analyse; a subtle flavour and aroma not unlike that of his native Tokay, imperceptible no doubt to palates vitiated by the vodka of the modern Russians, or by the cocktails and Cocteaux of 'Les Six.' We may be indifferent to it at first, but in time we learn to appreciate it. If this brief and inadequate notice should be the means of introducing it to a few potential admirers, its modest purpose will have been achieved.

PLAYER-PIANO PROJECTS

By J. D. M. RORKE

Mr. Carroll Brent Chilton is an enthusiast for musical culture, and, in particular, for the player-piano. I understand he was in at the birth of that invention, and he has been its devoted exponent and advocate ever since. Mechanically, the player-piano has reached a limited perfection, and for a number of years the only improvements have been in points of detail. It is also in widespread use. Mr. Chilton, however, is disappointed with the results. It has not achieved, and does not promise to achieve, for the cause of music anything like so much as he had hoped. In particular, it is not leading to any increase of technical musical knowledge. Mr. Chilton believes that, to a large extent, the standard form of instrument used is responsible for this failure. He has evolved ideas of his own for developing its educational possibilities. Apparently he has been unable to get any manufacturer to carry them out, and he appeals to musical people generally for support and pressure.

Mr. Chilton presents his case with perhaps rather too much abundance and impetuosity for the average Englishman. He takes a big view, and is full of ideas, very sound and illuminating, but by the time his 'pen has gleaned his teeming brain' the reader is somewhat dazed. Yet this ought not to blind us to, what seems to me at least, the very real importance of his argument and the very great merits of his suggestions. His proposals are two.

I.

'Audiscript Score.' This is the name given to a roll, perforated in the ordinary way, on which appears also the printed score. It is to be used in combination with an instrument Mr. Chilton has planned, in which the tracker-bar, music-roll, and take-up spool are set perpendicularly; in operation the paper passes laterally across the tracker-box, from right to left, the natural motion for reading. In addition, a running analytical commentary is printed on the roll.

The question arises of where the score would be placed on the roll. It is obvious that, even on the uppermost portion of the paper, the notation would be cut up and largely obliterated every time the music made an excursion to the top of the keyboard. This difficulty is met by printing the score very large across practically the whole width of the roll. As a matter of fact, the staves are so planned that the printed notes are in actual association with the perforations which they represent. The cuttings in the paper grow out of the notation, as will be seen in the accompanying photograph.

3 ANDANTE By MOZART from a four hand Transcription.

This, in brief, is Mr. Chilton's proposal. A consideration of it raises certain practical queries and criticisms which I can indicate, although I am not competent to gauge their seriousness. As to the horizontal movement of the roll, there would certainly be no mechanical difficulty in this, and it would seem to me to be an improvement even with the rolls that we have (e.g., for song rolls, with the words printed on them). The only doubt is, how would it affect the tracking of the roll? Mr. Chilton claims that it would improve the tracking, that gravity would keep the paper in constant alignment by its lower edge, and make a self-tracking device unnecessary. On the other hand, it seems to me possible that there would be an increased tendency of the paper to 'billow.'

The 'Audiscript' score is not such plain sailing as at first sight it may appear. There are no accidentals in the excerpt reproduced. If you think out the problem of these, and then consider a page of very chromatic modern music, it is obvious how continually notation and perforation must part company. The attempt to make them coincide might as well be abandoned; it will often lead to that very obliteration which it is designed to avoid. It must be left over, unless and until the day comes of a reformed notation, in which every note on the pianoforte is shown always in the same position on the stave, whatever its name. Further, the cost looms big. I do not know what the expense of such large-scale engraving would be, or of such a triumph of adjustment as would be needed to make the printing register with the perforation through a long roll, with various changes of key-signature. It is no use pretending the cost would not be high, and possibly prohibitive, except for rolls with a very large circulation. Alternatives suggest themselves: an extra two-inch strip at the top of the roll on which the notation and commentary could be printed. But this would unclass the standard width, and unfit or handicap the instrument for playing existing rolls. The only practical course would seem to be Mr. Chilton's first idea of printing the notation at the top of a standard-size roll, and letting it take its chance, and occasionally suffer from invasions by the perforation.

These are practical difficulties which I think should be exposed. But there is none of them which cannot be overcome, and which ought not to be overcome when we realise the very great importance of this proposal. I do not think even Mr. Chilton himself overstates it.

To begin with the most immediate result: It would lead not only to more intelligent but more artistic renderings, the player-pianist having phrase-marks, bar-lines, and every indication of the score before his eyes.

But the possible gain that comes into view is something very much bigger. There are thousands of people using player-pianos, perhaps hundreds of thousands, and among them a great many real enthusiasts, who are handling music in masses quite out of reach of the ordinary performer, and getting bigger views and wider impressions than are otherwise possible to any but the very best-informed musicians. This is all to the good. It has unlocked a whole new realm of interest and joy to the layman, and it is bound to affect the general level of musical taste. But it is becoming very obvious now that the effect of the player-piano on musical culture is strictly limited, and shows no signs of ever passing its limitations. The lover of music in this sort shows little or no tendency to pass on into the freedom and mastery of the art for creative or any other purposes. The gulf between him and the musician remains as wide as before. Music may be for him one of the most real and familiar values of life, but it is still an entirely mysterious thing. However great or small a factor technical understanding may be reckoned to be, it is certain that without it there can be no possession of music. The mere music-lover hasn't got the freedom of the city. He may know its length and breadth and beauties better than many of the citizens themselves—that is a common case—but he has to confess that he is a stranger and sojourner. The cloud-capped towers, gorgeous palaces, solemn temples, and so on are for him too, but the fact remains that there are these others who can at least build some No. 57, Harris Street, and would in time evolve a new city if the old were swept away, while he couldn't begin to put brick to brick.

Now the perforations of a music-roll treat one as a tourist and sight-seer, but the musical notation treats one as a citizen. One may be very far from deserving or desiring to be taken so seriously, but I strongly feel that we ought not to be given the first without the second. I could almost say that it is immoral. It is the kind of thing an artistic and paternal government would make illegal. Only by being treated as citizens can some few here and there among the outsiders ever develop towards that status.

It would be a great mistake to claim too much. I am not under the delusion that any sensational revolution is going to be effected simply by deploying the score under the eye of our average player-pianist while the music is in his ears. On the other hand, we must not underestimate the immense psychological importance of a graphic representation, especially for those unused to classifying sounds. I am perfectly sure that even that rough presentation of what is happening which the existing music-roll supplies is a very large factor in the ordinary man's apprehension of music that he gets in this way. He has a right to be given a graphic representation in a rational and intelligible form. Our present musical notation is not one of the triumphs of the human mind. It is excessively clumsy and makeshift, but it is the accepted written language of music. We don't give an infant a picture-book without some lines of text below, which he can ignore or presently spell his way through, and in music we ought not to treat anyone as outside the pale. No doubt the bulk of players will remain unable to read, but we shall have thrown open the way, and there will be some, especially among young people, who will take advantage of it.

In addition, I hardly need to urge the value of the running commentary on the music which it is proposed to print on the roll. Mr. Chilton, I think, plans his notes too elaborately. One doesn't want to stop to read through a paragraph of biographical information or of poetical description; that can be got from books. All that is desirable is a brief analysis of structure. The sections, for example, of a movement in sonata form would be marked—Introduction, Exposition, Working-out, Recapitulation, Coda, any Episodes, &c.; the main subjects would be lettered and their recurrences and derivatives noted, and every change of key pointed out. It may be said that this information, too, can be got from books. Not always, and besides it usually wants more effort and skill to apply than the plain man is equal to. What is the use of asking him to locate bar 256, even with some such additional direction as 'after a brief incursion into G minor'? But with notes printed in their proper place on the roll, he would lap up knowledge of form without knowing he was being educated. This would be a very simple and uncostly improvement, and the only wonder is that it is not already standard practice.

I would reiterate, however, that the vital matter is the printing of the musical notation. Of all that is being said and done to develop the educational possibilities of the player-piano, this proposal takes on for me the momentous importance of a key-position, a sort of bridge-head, if we hope at all to open up a way from the love of music to the freedom and possession of it, and if the widely-diffused enthusiasm that this instrument generates and nourishes is going to contribute anything solid to the musical culture of our time. There is, unfortunately, no public demand for it, and accordingly no commercial motive for introducing it. All that can be done is to try to spread the feeling that there is something almost artistically immoral in the present position. Ever more and more people, like myself, are living on an art which they don't hold up, which they couldn't keep alive, far less lift up to that increasing life which is the only alternative to decadence.

II.

Only a very short note can be given to Mr. Chilton's second proposal, though it also is interesting. He wants to see on the market a small and cheap students' player-instrument for the reading of music. Our only idea of a player-piano is a display instrument that weighs a ton and costs from £150 upwards, and in a fair wind can be heard a mile. Mr. Chilton plans a 'Ford' player, the size of a small writing-desk, weighing fifty pounds and costing £20: simply a 'Reader,' inaudible a few yards away. A stringed instrument of any compass seems to me impracticable on this tiny scale, but perhaps the idea could be carried out with tuning-forks on 'Dulcitone' lines, or in the form of a reed-organ.

I said that the perforated roll should not be put into the layman's hands without the musical score. The larger significance of this second proposal would seem to be that the printed score should not be put into the student's hands without a presentation to the ear.

Probably it will always be a small percentage of musical people who can read a score by eye alone quickly and satisfyingly. Even these may be in difficulties when they meet with a new idiom—compare Schumann's change of opinion about Tannhäuser when he heard it, having previously only seen the score. Again, a skilled reviewer of the Musical Times was complaining only a month or two ago of the difficulties of his task in dealing with a good deal of modern music—quartet music, for example—incapable of being played by hand, and of an advanced type. But a 'Reader,' within the means of nearly all, will present the score simultaneously to eye and ear.

Mr. Chilton dreams of a time when all music will be published in that double character, and doesn't regard any music as well and truly published until it is offered in a form which makes it both visible and audible.

The Apostles will be performed at Bedford on May 18 by the Bedford Musical Society with full orchestra, a choir of two hundred, and a strong cast of soloists. Dr. H. A. Harding will conduct.

PEARSALL'S LETTERS*

By W. BARCLAY SQUIRE

VI.

To Chancellor OEHLER,

Hotel de la Poste, Rohrschach,

Sunday morning, Feb. 7, 1847.

MY DEAR SIR AND FRIEND,—I regret much that I could not stay to-day at St. Gall (where I arrived last night on my return from Einsiedeln) in order that I might have had the pleasure of communicating to you verbally the greeting and remembrances which the Sub-Prior requested me to express, and have had also an opportunity of telling you what passed at the Monastery.

Now let me say something of music. The Kapellmeister at the Monastery is a very amiable person and has practical knowledge of his art, but he is too little acquainted with the Church music of the great masters of the 16th and 17th centuries to have that admiration of it which it deserves. He was so obliging as to order the performance of my Salve Regina. It was sung by the school-students, and on the third repetition it went correctly. He was kind enough to pay me some compliments, but I do not think he cared for it. But the Sub-Prior was more satisfied with it: I am sure of this, for when it began he was at the other end of the room, which was a long one, and he came over to us and sang with the students, which was a proof to me that the music pleased him and that what he afterwards said to me was his genuine opinion. As Professor of Music in the school they have a person (I forget his name) from Cologne who has been educated in the Conservatoire de Musique at Paris. He plays the violin and pianoforte very well and is also esteemed there as a good composer. P. Gall told me that he had sent you a Tenebrae of this person's composition. His manners are more French than German, but I have no doubt that he deserves the praise which they gave him for skill and good conduct.

The collection of music at Einsiedeln is not (so they told me at least) very large, but there are very interesting things in it. Six Masses by Caldara were shown me. But only the parts are there. The partitions appear to have been lost, so that I could not judge of their merit. Yet the voice parts are flowing and the forms of the different figures employed so graceful, that I would desire no greater pleasure than an opportunity of reproducing the partitions from the parts. There are also some Motets by Scarlatti, printed at Amsterdam, I believe, in the year 1705. These are unknown and perhaps not likely to be known at Einsiedeln, but their author was so great a master that they must be remarkable. These are also merely printed in parts. They have the parts also of some Masses of Eberlin. He was a composer who flourished about the middle of the last century and had a great and, according to Burney, a deserved reputation. I have heard much of Eberlin's Church Music from old people who remembered it and who spoke of it in terms of high commendation, but I have never seen any of it. I have no doubt that there are other things equally interesting in their archives, but I had not time to make a regular inspection.

P. Gall has made very interesting discoveries with regard to the music of the more ancient time. On the inside of the covers of most of the MS. books at the Convent (I mean those of the 10th and immediately succeeding centuries) were parchment leaves torn out of still older books and pasted there to keep the covers firm. These he has unpasted, and many curious things have appeared. Amongst others an Oratorio with music in Neumenschrift of the 12th century. The neuma characters are, however, simple and not difficult to decipher, because they are written on five lines. A part also of an old (so at least it seems to me) instruction-book with neuma notation has also been recovered, but this presents more difficulty than the other with regard to its interpretation.

I wish it were possible for me to remain there six months in order that I might see what I could dig up. There are materials at Einsiedeln which would throw light on the ancient history of the art such as has never been thrown yet. But they can only be understood by a person who has a practical knowledge of it and has been accustomed to read the musical characters of the 15th and 16th centuries. Would it be impossible to form a Society whose object should be: 1st, to explore and explain the Church Music previous to the 15th century; and 2nd, to ascertain what compositions of the great masters of the 16th, 17th, and 18th centuries exist in the cloisters of Switzerland, Bavaria, Austria, and Bohemia? If P. Gall and you and I and a few others would work at these objects, how much might be discovered and rescued from oblivion! I do not know whether the Abbot of Einsiedeln, as chief of a monastic order, could consistently with his position be President of such a Society, but if not the Bishop of St. Gall might be President of it, if he would accept the office, and at the end of each year its discoveries might be published. I wish you would mention this to P. Gall and ask him whether the formation of such a Society be feasible? My paper is at an end; therefore I will delay what I have further to say until I next come to St. Gall, which will be probably in the next week. In the meantime,

Believe me,

Very faithfully yours,

R. L. P.

What the project was which took Pearsall to Einsiedeln does not appear, and there is no further allusion to it in his correspondence. The P. Gall who is frequently referred to in these letters was Benedict Morel, born in 1803, who became a monk in 1820 (when he changed his name to Gall), was ordained Priest in 1826, early in life was Librarian at Einsiedeln, and from 1848 Rector of the Monastic Stiftschule. He was a poet and musician, and his collection of Latin mediæval hymns, which appeared in 1868, is still a standard work. He died in 1872. It is interesting to note that the Collection of Music at Einsiedeln, which Pearsall describes in the above letter, was enriched after his death by a number of MSS. from his own library.

VII.

To the Rev. HENRY THOMAS ELIACOMBE, Vicar of Bitton.

[At end:] February 18, 1847.

[Beginning missing.] I have before me a long letter almost three parts written in answer to your last, but I will wait for something which I want to enclose in it, and so will not finish it till I get them. In the meantime I will send you a piece of music which I intended to enclose in its also. It is a Salve Regina which was sung at the Monastery of Einsiedeln with very good effect. (N.B.—I spent two days last week at this celebrated cloister, and made some interesting discoveries and acquaintances there, of which I have written an account in my letter.) I have written it in a style long obsolete in our Church, but capable of producing a great effect when understood and well sung. It was the custom of the earliest hymn-composers of the Christian Church, in setting words, to select a vowel in some important word at or near the end of each verse, and thereon to sing, or rather write, a musical phrase such as might allow the singer to let his soul gush out in adoration of God. The phrase was technically termed a neuma (quasi νεῦμα) which in the old books, de Cantu et Musica Sacra, is thus defined, 'Suspiratio animae redemptae ad coelestem patriam.' Such neuma-phrases occur on the words salve, lacrymarum, ostende, virgo. If sung by disciplined singers with the enthusiastic devotion which is sometimes to be found in the monasteries, and particularly in Italy, where even the lower classes can give way to a passionate expression of their feelings and still be graceful, I am told that these phrases have an indescribable effect, and I believe it from what I heard at Einsiedeln. Be so good as to send the Salve (after you have copied it, if you like to do so) to Mr. Corfe for the Madrigal Society, and explain to him what it is and ask him to do me the favour of trying its effect there. I think it will not fail to please, although we English are too cold in our natures to sing it like the natives of a more genial climate, who, considering it as an aspiration to Heaven, employ not only voice but heart and soul in its execution. And it is all very well that we should not try to do so, for the attempt without the natural impulse would be little better than a detestable caricature. For the present moment, adieu. Give my affectionate regards to all at Bitton and my felicitations to Miss Barker, and believe me,

* Other letters of R. L. Pearsall appeared in the Musical Times for October, 1920.

Ever yours sincerely,

R. L. P.

The Salve Regina which was sung at Einsiedeln is evidently the earlier version of the four-part setting published in 1856 by Schmid of Gmünd, and later in 8^{vo} form by Messrs. Novello. From Oehler's copy in Add. MSS. 38543, it is clear that Pearsall wrote it originally for three voices (s.s.a., solos and chorus), and that it was in this form that it must have been sung at Einsiedeln and sent to Mr. Ellacombe. The 'Mr. Corfe' mentioned later in the letter was John Davis Corfe (1804-76), organist of Bristol Cathedral, and for many years conductor of the Bristol Madrigal Society.

(To be continued.)

RANDOM NOTES ON A RECENT EUROPEAN TOUR

By C. À BECKET WILLIAMS

Just a word or two by way of preface. When I go abroad I do not go with the express intention of hearing music. I go to collect material for my own (which does not mean plagiarism, though it sounds rather like it!). So if these notes should surprise my readers by reason of their brevity, the above must form my excuse. And if they are astonished that their own conceptions should not agree with mine, my reply is that I write as I find things, not as other people suggest they should be found. So without further preamble let us start on our journey.

The first place of importance I stopped at was Cologne, where I went to the Opera to see Hansel and Gretel. The orchestra was rather too subdued—owing perhaps to the prevailing decorousness of the town under British occupation—the chorus was poor, and the principals bad. But for a provincial town the production was splendid, the transformation scenes especially being wonderfully handled. The witch flew about like a veritable fowl, and the fire burnt with a brilliance I have never seen equalled even on the stage. The impression brought away was that the mechanics were excellent, but the singing and acting poor.

From Cologne I went to Innsbruck, and on arriving at that melancholy spot promptly went to bed for the whole of Christmas week with some sort of fever or another. It was at this town that I saw what was, musically speaking, perhaps the most pathetic thing I have ever witnessed. This was a performance of Aida at the Town Theatre. It was really heart-rending. The poor orchestra—one felt they were half-starved—the dirty, old dresses of the chorus, and the makeshift scenery altogether formed a spectacle meet for tears. If the reader could but realise the martyrdom that poor Austria is undergoing! I could indeed open his eyes to some of the things I have seen happening to a people who are without doubt the most charming and agreeable in Europe. For example, the chambermaid at my hotel received as salary the sum of eight hundred crowns a month, and out of that had to provide most of her own food. (The pound was then worth about thirty thousand crowns.) One day I saw her emptying the tea-leaves out of my pot of tea and drying them on the hot-water pipes for future use. But the Austrians are a proud race, and do not complain. The upper classes live and die in the direst straits without a word. The country is full of parasites of all kinds—Jews, Bavarians, Italians, and the less intelligent sort of English, forced by the high cost of living to cross the Swiss border for this year.

Yet there is no ill-will towards the English. I was in a cabaret one night, and a group of Bavarians were baiting an Englishman who understood but little of what they were saying. Some Austrian students present soon cracked their heads for them! Luckily, there was plenty of snow about. But this is to digress.

From Innsbruck I went into the mountains for some ski-ing, and from thence to Vienna. On the way I passed Salzburg, and immediately understood Mozart, as he can never be understood without seeing this truly idyllic town.

I arrived at Vienna late at night, and found that the taxi's were as dear as in England. But the next day I discovered that living was extremely cheap, taking into account the valuta—indeed much cheaper than at Innsbruck. And what a lovely place! No wonder it has been for so many years the spiritual home of music. Culture and refinement seem in the air, and friendliness also. Yet those lucky ones who knew Vienna before the war aver it is all so changed and sad. Well, it must have been fairly gay in those days!

Many foreigners give concerts here, although there can be no profits. Certainly the expenses are small. For instance: a 'Wigmore Hall' type of concert costs about £5, including advertising, and a 'Queen's Hall' concert with orchestra, £60. Among well-known people who have given or are giving concerts, I noticed the names of the two Harrisons, Dorothy Moulton, Violet Clarence, Poulenc and Milhaud, Sorabji, and others whose names escape me. Sorabji seems to have bemused the good Viennese with his music, and amazed them by the astounding skill of his performance.

Judging, however, by the programmes I saw, Vienna is still rather conservative. Korngold, Strauss, and Reger, with a sprinkling of the early Schönberg, seem to be as much as will be tolerated at present. Of course, generally speaking, the cultured middle class (the sort of circle Schubert drew around him) are either starving or at any rate cannot afford the mere penny or so that a good seat costs:

but even the workmen and profiteers at Vienna seem musical, and opera is exceptionally popular. I heard two performances. The first was Rosen Kavalier, conducted by Strauss himself. (I sat in great state in the stage box for five shillings.) The performance was good beyond words, and the work itself a revelation to me, who had never yet heard it. Surely Strauss in this opera, and in some of his songs, has written music which makes him the peer of any master, living or dead.

The other opera I heard at the Volksoper, a sort of Viennese 'Old Vic.' It was Die Meistersinger, and really excellently done. The soloists were good, the chorus competent, and, as usual, the production satisfactory, the last Act being a feast of colour.

Of course Vienna is renowned for its light operas. I saw two of the new ones, the titles of which I forget. For some unknown reason they both dealt with the adventures of Indian princes, and each contained one jolly tune which was much in evidence, but beyond being better written than English examples, they did not attract me. The plots and action were poor, and even the 'lingerie' part of the business badly managed. Some terrible person has written a musical comedy in which all the songs are set to airs by Schubert, and I am told this is enjoying enormous popularity. We groaned at Peer Gynt being turned into rag-time, but that was nothing compared to this grotesque and tasteless sacrilege.

I went to two organ recitals at the great Kuntsler Haus. Even going to an organ recital is a terrible business at Vienna. First of all, one can never get tickets where he expects to get them, and nobody seems capable of giving any information. Secondly, the whole of the ground floor of the vast hall is arranged like a railway station, with numberless cloak-rooms, and one may not go upstairs without leaving even his hat at these places, the fee for which is often more than the cost of the concert ticket itself. It is really an awful experience, and matters are not improved by the sight of the hall above, which is intensely and horribly baroque. Nothing can be seen of the organ but the console and a sort of grating behind which can be caught occasional glimpses of pipes. A most inartistic organ-case, I thought. The instrument itself is very powerful, but it struck me that there was too much reed tone and too few diapasons. However, this is always noticeable about foreign organs, especially in France. The performers in each case were good, but not wonderful, and the music consisted of Bach, Reger, and Liszt (the Ad nos Salutare Fantasia). Reger seems to be played ad nauseam, and Karg-Elert, for whom I have a sneaking preference, not at all. In both cases the performers hardly changed their registration at all from start to finish. It seemed as if they had their manuals prepared beforehand, and stuck to them all through. The result was unnecessarily colourless, considering the impressive array of gadgets the player had at his disposal. But this is better than changing stops and rhythm at the same time!

While on the subject of organs I cannot help mentioning the singular organ-cases to be seen abroad. But perhaps I shall be allowed to write about these at some future date.

From Vienna I went to Venice—a place to read about, but not visit, unless one is a millionaire. In St. Mark's, the music I heard was slightly more horrible than the building (one sympathises with Mendelssohn and his remarks on Italian organists).

At Florence I heard no music, and having very little time at my disposal at Rome, I heard only one opera, but this was quite enough. The Roman performance requires a hardy constitution to endure it. The work begins at '9.0 sharp' (which means 9.30). There are tremendous waits between the Acts, and you are lucky to be out by one o'clock in the morning. I heard Puccini's Il Tabarro and Suor Angelica. At midnight I left, and they were still at it. Judging from the programmes, the Italians are even more conservative than the Austrians. Casella is popular, but more as pianist than composer—or so it would appear. I noticed a performance of one work by Santoliquido, otherwise convention seemed to rule the day. But as I was in the city for only ten days, it would be absurd for me to express any opinion on its musical life. I finally went to Naples. It is, I should fancy, the dearest town in the world, and the most irritating. Everywhere may be heard infernal mandolines, and singers with voices like screeching crows. You go to Pompeii, mandolines; you climb Vesuvius, mandolines; you sail to Capri, or drive to Baia, mandolines again. To crown all, pirates and bandits at every corner tried to make me buy models of this diabolical instrument. I am pretty tough-skinned as regards bad music, but literally and truthfully, the street musicians of Naples drove me from Italy. May I recommend my more advanced brethren to try tonal experiments with mandolines and fiddles out of tune, à la voix celeste? Such music as resulted should surely portray all the perversions known to Tiberius, or even to the modern Neapolitans. Can one say more?

NEW LIGHT ON EARLY TUDOR COMPOSERS

By W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD

XXV.—JOHN DYGON

Among the few early Tudor composers whose works are quoted by Sir John Hawkins the name of John Dygon gets an honoured place. Hawkins printed a Motet of his from the Royal Collection, namely, Ad lapidis positionem, but so little did the great English musical historian know of Dygon's biography that he considered the work as having been composed towards the middle of the 16th century.

Since Hawkins's day no new light has been thrown on the career of Dygon save that he graduated Mus. Bac. at Oxford, in 1512, and that he was Prior of St. Augustine's Abbey, Canterbury, at the dissolution of the monasteries in 1538. Neither Dr. Ernest Walker nor Mr. Henry Davey has pierced the obscurity which has hitherto enveloped Dygon's biography, and though the amount of new information which I have gleaned is not so large as could be desired, yet the facts now brought to light will serve to stimulate some future delver of Tudor records.

John Dygon was a nephew of John Dygon who was elected Abbot of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, in January, 1497, and was a novice under his uncle between the years 1497 and 1504. It is safe to assume that he was born circa 1485, and he doubtless entered the famous Canterbury choristers' school, in 1494. This choristers' school had been endowed so far back as February, 1319-20, by Prior Henry, of Eastry, and had therefore a good tradition. Young Dygon, after his reception as a novice, displayed uncommon musical abilities, and at length, in April, 1512, graduated Mus. Bac. at Oxford.

Meantime, Dygon's uncle died in 1509 and was succeeded as Abbot by John Hampton, after whom came John Essex. A curious hypothesis was started by Mr. A. Hughes-Hughes in his article on Dygon in the new edition of Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians to the effect that John Dygon was probably an alias or assumed name for John Wyldebere, or else that he was to be identified with John Wilborne, who was alive in 1557.

Fortunately, there is no need for this complex hypothesis as to the identity of John Dygon, because we learn from Twyne, the famous antiquary, who was a friend of John Essex, last Abbot of St. Augustine's (whose rule extended from 1520 to 1538), that the Abbot 'sent John Dygon, sub-prior of the monastery, to Louvain,' in 1521, in order to avail himself of the tuition of the celebrated Juan Luis Vives, the Spanish humanist.

Dygon studied under Vives at Louvain from 1521 to 1523, and then returned to England with his master, who had been urged by Cardinal Wolsey to take up the post of Lecturer on Rhetoric in Oxford University. As is well known, Vives came over, and resided at Corpus Christi College, then under the presidency of Dr. John Claymond. So great was his fame that he attracted vast numbers to his lectures, including Henry VIII. and Queen Katherine, and he was also appointed tutor to the Princess Mary (1524-26). Two other distinguished scholars had come over with John Dygon and Vives, viz., Nicholas Wotton and Jerome Ruffaldus, in 1523.

Not alone the antiquary Twyne but Vives himself has borne ample testimony to the outstanding abilities of Dygon. Vives mentions him with eulogy, nay, 'with great affection,' as Cardinal Gasquet writes (The Eve of the Reformation, p. 38). Dr. Nicholas Wotton was made Dean of the Chapel of the Princess Mary. He was afterwards an Ambassador; and Jerome Ruffaldus subsequently became Abbot of St. Vaast, Arras.

So great were the merits of Dygon both as a musician and a learned monk that Abbot Essex, in 1526, promoted him to be Prior of St. Augustine's. Meantime, his friend Vives had married Margaret Valdaura at Bruges, in 1524, but he returned to England on October 1, 1528.

Dygon continued as Prior of St. Augustine's from 1526 to 1538, and was also schoolmaster of the Almonry School (which had been confirmed by a Bull of Pope Eugene IV., dated December 28, 1431). At length came the dissolution of this famous Abbey, when Abbot, Prior, monks, and Song School had all to disappear. The deed of 'Surrender' is dated July 30, 1538, and the first two signatures are those of the Abbot and Prior, namely, John Essex and John Dygon. The late Dr. James Gairdner in his Lollardy and the Reformation (1908) caustically writes that Henry VIII. had been guilty of many villainies, including 'the plunder of St. Augustine's monastery, from which he turned out the monks, and put deer in their places.'

In the list of pensions granted to the monks of St. Augustine's, Canterbury, on September 2, 1538, the Abbot and Prior were assigned substantial amounts. Abbot Essex did not long survive his deprivation, as his death took place in January, 1541, but John Dygon is believed to have become secularised and to have assumed the name of John Wilbore. Mr. A. Hughes-Hughes says that 'there is good reason for believing that he was the John Wylbore who was appointed prebendary of Rochester Cathedral, in 1541, and who died there in 1553.'

Anyhow, John Dygon, Mus. Bac., Prior of St. Augustine's, was assigned the pension of £13 6s. 8d., and as such disappears, but if we assume that he adopted the name of Wilbore, there is some reason to agree with the view of Mr. Hughes-Hughes, as, in the new constitution of Rochester Cathedral on June 18, 1541, Hugh Ap Rice was appointed first Prebendary, John Wilbore second Prebendary, and Robert Johnson third Prebendary, with Walter Phillips as Dean. All the same, I have a shrewd suspicion that John Dygon's name was his own, just as was John Essex's, and if so, unless he adopted an alias, he disappears from the records in 1538. His master, Juan Luis Vives, had been imprisoned for espousing the cause of Queen Katherine over the divorce question, and died on May 30, 1540. It is not at all improbable that Dygon also died before the close of the year 1541, if not earlier, and that he was known only by the name of John Dygon to such intimate friends as Vives and the antiquary Twyne: in fact the authority of the latter, who was a contemporary, goes far to disprove the ingenious suggestion of Mr. Hughes-Hughes as to Dygon's change of name.

Unfortunately most of the compositions of Dygon have disappeared, but sufficient remain to attest his powers. In particular his beautiful three-part Motet, Ad lapidis positionem, stamps him as attempting higher flights than most of the English Tudor school of the period 1500-20. Mr. Hughes-Hughes thinks that this Motet 'bears some resemblance in style to the music of Okeghem, as was very natural considering how nearly contemporary the two composers were,' but it must be borne in mind that Okeghem wrote between the years 1453-83, whereas Dygon was not born till 1490. Further, Mr. Hughes-Hughes says that 'some passages bear a comparatively modern stamp, and one can detect a foreshadowing of Giovanni Croce, and even of a still later style in several places.' I cannot agree with this opinion, as assuredly Dygon's style is very far removed from that of Croce. Yet Dygon's work is really good for the period, and does not deserve the harsh verdict passed on it by Dr. Ernest Walker, whose opinions on many composers, including Handel, Arne, and Sullivan, are at variance with those of equally well-equipped musical critics. Canterbury may well be proud of Dygon and also of Sir William Haute, whose memoir will next engage our attention.

CHOPIN

BY CAMILLE SAINT-SAËNS

(Authorised translation by Fred Rothwell)

'Chopin!' When the good King Louis Philippe was alive you should have heard with what a dainty accent and eager expression women uttered the two syllables. The artist's elegant manners, and the ease with which his name was pronounced, certainly contributed largely to the huge success he attained. And besides, he was consumptive at a time when robust health was unfashionable; women, on sitting down to table, would thrust their gloves into their glass and nibble only a few dainty morsels at the end of a meal. It was bon ton for the young to look pale and thin: Princess Belgiojoso appeared on the boulevards dressed in black and silver white, looking as wan and ghastly as Death himself.

Chopin's illness, though real enough, was regarded as an attitude he had assumed. This jeune malade à pas lents, a foreigner with a French name, son of an unhappy country whose fate was pitied and whose resurrection was desired by all in France, was in every way calculated to please the public of the day; indeed, all this served him better than his musical talent, which, as a matter of fact, this same public did not in the least understand.

Proof of this lack of comprehension is to be found in the popularity of a certain Grand Waltz in E flat, now quite forgotten, but in those days strummed on every pianoforte to the exclusion of other works of Chopin that were really characteristic of his talent. He had but few admirers worthy of the name: Liszt, Ambroise Thomas, Princess Czartoriska (his best pupil), Madame Viardot, and Georges Sand (who extolled him to the skies in her Memoirs, proclaiming him the greatest of composers, 'approached by Mozart alone,' she added—a childish exaggeration, though at the time a useful counterpoise to the general opinion which saw in Chopin merely an agreeable pianist and looked upon Liszt as a performer of amazing powers of execution). Thus was judged and interpreted the musical ability of the two geniuses whose influence on the art of music has been so great!

Times have changed. After prolonged years of barren strife, the great compositions of Liszt have taken their rightful place. The Waltz in E flat is relegated for ever to the lumber-room, and all the dream-land flowers that appeared in the garden of the marvellous artist claimed both by France and by Poland now blossom in perfect freedom and scatter their fragrance around. We admire and love—but do we understand them?

Chopin's musical studies had been so incomplete that the great vocal and instrumental fields were not for him; he had to confine himself to the pianoforte, wherein he discovered an entirely new world. This specialisation, however, may lead the judgment astray. When interpreting his works we think too much of the pianoforte—of the instrument regarded as an end in itself: we forget both musician and poet. For Chopin is, above all, a poet who may be compared with Alfred de Musset: like the latter, he sings of love and women.

More than all else, Chopin was sincere. His music, without being in accordance with any particular programme, is invariably a tone-picture; he did not 'make' music, he simply followed his inspiration. He expresses the most varied human feelings; he also gives musical form to the impressions produced in him by the sights of nature. But whereas in others—in Beethoven, for instance—these impressions may be pure and unalloyed, in Chopin's music (with the exception of a few polonaises that voice his patriotism) woman is ever present; everything is referred to her, and it is this stand-point we must adopt if we would give his music its rightful character. His music thrills with a passion—now overflowing, now latent or restrained—that gives it an inner warmth of feeling which makes it live intensely. Too frequently this passion is replaced by an affected and jerky performance, by contortions utterly opposed to his real style, which is both touching and simple.

This latter word may excite surprise when speaking of music that bristles with accidentals, with complicated harmonies and arabesques; but we must not, as is generally done, lay too much stress on these details. Fundamentally the music is simple, it betokens great simplicity of heart, and this must be expressed when playing it, under penalty of completely falsifying the intentions of the composer.

Chopin distrusted himself: he invited—and sometimes followed—pernicious advice, unaware that he himself, guided by instinctive genius, was more clear-sighted than all the savants around him, who were devoid of genius of any kind.

At the beginning of the famous Ballade in G minor, the last bar of the introduction, we find in the original edition a D, evidently written, though subsequently corrected into an E. This supposed E gives an expression of pain, quite in harmony with the character of the morceau. Was this a printer's error? Was it the original intention of the composer? The note produces a dissonance with unexpected effect. Now dissonances were at that time dreaded, though nowadays as welcome as truffles. From Liszt, whom I questioned on the matter, I could obtain nothing except that he preferred the E flat. So do I, but that is not the point. The conclusion at which I have arrived is that Chopin, when playing the Ballade, sounded the D; but I am still convinced that the E flat was his first inspiration, and that the D was adopted on the advice of timid and maladroit friends.

These marvellous works are threatened with a great peril. Under pretext of popularising them there have appeared new editions bristling with erroneous fingering. That, indeed, in itself would be a small matter; but, alas! they have also been improved upon, perfectionnées, and this means that alien intentions may gradually replace those of the composer himself.

I cannot enter into the technical details necessitated by such an inquiry, but it is high time someone thought of bringing out an edition—if not of all his works, at least of those that deserve to be handed down to posterity—going back to the fountain-head and showing us the master's thought in all its purity. This fountain-head consists of manuscripts, wherever they can be found; original editions, now very rare; and Tellefsen's edition, at present difficult to find, badly engraved and printed, and containing many faults, though these are easy to see and can be corrected. Before it is too late, may a really intelligent editor raise to Chopin's memory this imperishable monument that has nothing in common with the Kritik-Ausgaben with which the musical world is invaded as by some destructive phylloxera!

A REMARKABLE HANDEL COLLECTION: CHRISTOPHER SMITH'S TRANSCRIPTS OF HANDEL'S WORKS

BY E. VAN DER STRAETEN

Christopher Smith, Handel's amanuensis, made three sets of transcripts of the great master's works, and Charles Jennens, who wrote the words of The Messiah and other works of Handel received one of these sets from Christopher Smith the younger. From the latter it went into the library of his relative, Heneage Finch, Earl of Aylesford, about 1774, where it remained until the Aylesford library at Packington Hall was sold about two years ago, when Mr. Harold Reeves acquired the greater part of the Handel transcripts, as well as a considerable number of MS. copies from the works of 18th century composers, and sold them to Mr. Newman Flower, who is deeply interested in Handel. Mr. Flower succeeded in tracing and acquiring a number of volumes of the Handel manuscripts which at the sale had been purchased by other buyers, and with the assistance of Mr. W. C. Smith, of the British Museum, supplemented it by the acquisition of odd instrumental and vocal parts, mostly in Christopher Smith's hand, as well as a number of books, pictures, prints, &c., connected with Handel and his period, from various sources. Mr. Flower's library contains at present the largest collection of original Handel transcripts, amounting to nearly two hundred volumes.

The particular interest attaching to these transcripts lies in the fact that they were made under Handel's personal supervision, and thus give an authentic version of his scores, containing in some instances corrections and alterations in his own handwriting. They give, moreover, as was the custom of the times, at the beginning of the songs the names of the singers—for whom, in some instances, they were specially written—and likewise the names of those to whom they were allotted at subsequent performances. Apart from the information which this affords us about the great singers of Handel's time, it reveals another fact of even greater interest—more clearly illustrated, however, in Chrysander's collection of Christopher Smith's transcripts, now in the town library of Hamburg. In Handel's time these scores were evidently used for quite a number of performances. They contain notes, alterations, and corrections, not unfrequently in Handel's own handwriting, which showed that he attached less importance to the specific tone-colour or character of a given key in which he had composed a song than to a perfect rendering. Our greatest modern composers, from the beginning of the 19th century downwards, choose singers who are able to sing their parts as they are written. Handel, on the other hand, whenever he found a singer in whom a fine voice was allied to artistic qualities, would not hesitate to transpose a song to suit that particular voice, or even give a woman's song to a man, or vice versa. The famous arioso, 'Softly, Sweet,' from Alexander's Feast, among others, presents a flagrant instance. The original version, with violoncello obbligato, is in the key of D major. Against the voice-part, written in the soprano C clef, we find the name of 'Signora Strada,' but underneath the stave, at the beginning of the line, is written in Handel's hand, 'Sig: Tend' (Tenducci). Against the line of the violoncello solo he wrote in pencil 'Mrs. Cibber in Contralto ex C \sharp ,' and underneath, 'Mrs. Weichsel ex A.' Here we have, apparently, a record of four different performances, and transpositions of the song for two of these, unless the notes relate to his frequent troubles with the singers, and denote that another had to be substituted for the one first selected for a particular performance. The recitative of this version is written in the tenor clef, and the arioso in the soprano clef. The whole of this is struck out, and another version is inserted between the leaves for contralto with violin (instead of violoncello) obbligato. The recitative is now in the key of E minor, ending on the dominant of A major, in which the arioso then follows. At the top of this page we find in pencil the name of 'Sig: Mosor,' at the bottom, 'Wrote in the Soprano clef,' and underneath, 'for Guard,' meaning evidently the famous singer, Guardacci. A transposition of a third higher is indicated by letters in pencil being placed over the printed notes, in which Handel, according to the German custom, used the letter 'h' for the note 'b.' The original version of The soft, complaining Flute, first given to Mrs. Cibber, then to Signor Guadagni, is struck out, and another version, with 'Flauto Traverso and Liuto Solo,' for Signorina Francellini, substituted.

In the oratorio, Athalia, the first scena, 'Blooming virgins,' with cembalo and violoncello soli, is cut out, and a number from Parnasso in Feste substituted. There are many alterations in the course of the work, but the end underwent the greatest changes. Under the words, 'Hail, royal youth, long live the King,' is written in pencil, 'the Church and save the King.' In the recitative, 'Reviving Judah,' the words, 'With firm united hearts we all shall (? illegible) conquer' are substituted, then all has been crossed out and 'Anthem, The King shall rejoice,' written over it. This ending was altered again, as is shown by a cembalo part, with indications for a trumpet obbligato, and for a chorus in D major of fifty-four bars, at the end of which are the words, 'End of the Oratorio.' On a subsequent page the recitative, 'Reviving Judah,' is continued with pencil notes of alternate words, but this again is crossed out. A chorus, 'Bless the true Church, and save the King,' follows this, and another recitative for Athalia, which is crossed out again, and underneath is written in pencil, 'Chorus, Around let acclamation—anthem, The King shall rejoice, Fine.' But this was not to be final yet, for on the next page we find a Tutti unisono, 'Oppression no longer I dread thee,' followed by a recitative for Athalia, a recitative and aria for Nathan, recitative for Joad, aria 'To Darkness Eternal' for Athalia, a recitative for Joad, at the end of which is written in pencil, 'Aria,' and two words which are illegible. Then follows a duet-aria for Joad and Josabeth, recitative Ab(ner?) at the end of which we find the words 'Concerto ex f(?),' and a final chorus, 'Give Glory.' The above reference to the introduction of an instrumental Concerto is interesting, as it shows that the prevailing custom of that time of introducing instrumental solos as interludes was not restricted to the opera, where many eminent artists used to play concertos between the Acts. That this was done also in oratorios is not generally known, yet in the above-mentioned score of Alexander's Feast we find two notable instances. After 'Timotheus placed on high,' &c., we find in Christopher Smith's handwriting the words, 'Concerto per la Harpa'; and after 'She drew an angel down' is written 'Concerto per l'Organo.' Unfortunately the names of the artists are not given, though we need not ask who played the Organ Concerto when Handel conducted.

The Christopher Smith copies from the Aylesford collection do not contain many notes, as they were evidently not used much, if at all, for public performances, but they comprise sets of vocal and orchestral parts of all the works therein, which have since been completed in many instances by Mr. Flower, who has been fortunate in obtaining from various sources original MS. copies of missing parts. He has, moreover, acquired the first printed editions of a great part of Handel's works, including some copies of great interest. There are, for instance, ten volumes of string parts of 'Handel's Songs. Selected from his latest Oratorios for Concerts. For Violins etc in six parts etc published by John Walsh.' They were used at the 'Concerts of Antient Musick,' and on the dissolution of that Society were removed to Buckingham Palace, and presented by Queen Victoria to the Royal College of Music. They contain many MS. insertions made for their use at the Concerts of Antient Music. An original edition of Alexander's Feast, edited by Mozart, belonged to the celebrated contrapuntist and composer, Eduard Grell, whose name is stamped on the title-page, and a German edition of The Messiah, by Joh. Ad. Hiller, contains very interesting contemporary MS. notes about the work and its first production at Berlin. A copy of Songs from Messiah, published by Walsh, is probably the earliest edition of this work, as the words 'To be sung an Octave lower' are engraved over the beginning of the air, 'He was despised,' the notes of which are printed an octave higher than in any subsequent edition. There is no copy of this edition in the British Museum, and Mr. Flower's copy may be the only one now in existence.

One of the greatest treasures of Mr. Flower's Handel collection is the autograph copy of the words of Theodora, by T. Morel, the author, with Handel's autograph inscription, 'I intend to perform this oratorio at the Theatre Royal in Covent Garden. George Frideric Handel.' A reproduction of the autograph is given by kind permission of Mr. Flower.

Theodora.

An Oratorio.

*I intend to perform this Oratorio at the Theatre Royal in Covent Garden
George Frideric Handel*

The portraits in Mr. Flower's possession include the original of Hogarth's oil painting of Handel, a contemporary oil painting of Handel as a boy, by an unknown artist, a very fine contemporary miniature of the master and a number of interesting prints of Handel portraits, the very rare portrait engraving by Faber of the Handel singer, Carestini, and one each of Faustina Masse, Dr. Arnold, and others connected with the Handel circle. He has also an autograph letter of the famous singer Grimaldi, called Nicolini, and a number of other interesting Handel souvenirs.

The MS. volumes from the Aylesford collection contain also a considerable number of vocal and instrumental compositions of Handel's circle and other musicians, mostly of the Georgian period. Among these are several unique—and, in some instances, entirely unknown—works by famous 18th century composers, especially violinists; but we must reserve their description for another occasion, as it would lead beyond the limits of this article, and much has to be sifted and cleared up before it can be profitably undertaken.

A considerable number of works on Handel, and matters connected with him, completes a remarkable collection which Mr. Flower has not brought together from selfish reasons, but intends to make accessible to serious students of the great master's works.

AN ITALIAN VIEW OF BRITISH MUSIC

The Critica Musicale of Florence for February contains a long article on English musical life—apparently one of a series—by Vittorio Ricci. He is concerned in this number with editors, critics, and instrument-makers, and begins with a general statement about the great development of musical education, noting, by the way, that music is more generally appreciated than any other art. Even in the lower classes, he remarks, there are few people who have not some knowledge of the elements of music. He attributes to this fact the number and excellence of the choral societies, and singles out for special praise the Glasgow Orpheus Choir. Curiously enough, although the details given are accurate in the main, all notice of the Competitive Festival is confined to a foot-note.

His knowledge of publishers is considerable, although apparently he thinks it worth while to mention specially the publishers of Mr. Frank Bridge and of Mr. Cyril Scott, and omit those of Elgar. The Musical Times, he says, 'is rich in very valuable articles touching upon all points of musical science.' Amongst the dailies he singles out The Times and the Daily Telegraph, 'which on a special day of the week dedicate many long columns to music, and their articles are often exceedingly important.' The literary works on music chosen in illustration of his remarks are the 'bulky Dictionary' of Grove, the Oxford History of Music, and the histories of Mr. Davey, Dr. Walker, and Mr. C. A. Harris.

In conclusion Signor Ricci remarks that the last few months have marked a considerable improvement in the British world of music, which suffered no less than the Continent from the economic upset of the after-war period. On the other hand, the conditions of opera, which appeared to have most brilliant prospects thanks to the 'wealthy and able maestro Beecham,' are now worse than ever, and Covent Garden, once famous for its summer season, is now the home of all kinds of entertainment, not excluding the cinema.

F. B.

MUSIC UNDER BOLSHEVISM

BY C. D. GRAHAM

A telegram from Moscow, recently issued by the Russian Trade Delegation in London, throws an instructive sidelight on Bolshevik mentality. According to this document it appears that the Soviet is devoting particular attention to the maintenance and development of science and the arts, with particular reference to music. The Musical Department of the People's Commissariat, for example, has set itself to encourage 'the new musical institutions created by the revolution.' Among the institutions referred to are the Petrograd Philharmonic Orchestra and the Moscow Philharmonic and Symphonic Orchestras. All these, however, were in existence long before the revolution, and to claim them as products of Bolshevism is to carry special pleading to lengths which are scarcely permissible even in political propaganda. Imagine, too, the unkind remarks that will be made by English composers concerning the apathy of our own Government when they learn that in Russia—as it is to-day—the Soviet thinks so highly of music as a panacea for famine and disease that official publications on the subject outnumber all others by more than three to one. Indignation may give place to doubt when we try to reconcile this statement with a recent foreign interview with Glazounov, in the course of which that eminent composer said that although he had completed several new works, he was unable to get them printed in Russia owing to the complete break-down of the music publishing apparatus.

To Ivan, lacking the bare means of subsistence, are also offered such questionable delights as discussions of his folk-songs, 'vocal and instrumental methodology,' and the 'construction of new tonal systems.' This last branch of the inquiries being undertaken by the National Institute of Musical Science should gladden the hearts of any young composers who are beginning to find themselves gruelled for lack of new dissonances. As business men, however, the Bolsheviks should appreciate the possibilities of a scheme that might, by means of a little judicious advertisement, develop into a new source of revenue. We may yet see something of this kind:

'Latest Tonal Systems while you wait! Do not invent your own Interplay of Sonorities, but send for sample of our up-to-date Tonal Tabloids. Extra strength, specially adapted to Symphonic Poems, &c., dealing with Battle, Murder, Sudden Death, and the Joylessness of Things Generally! Mr. X. Stravaginsky writes: "I owe everything to your wonderful System. Press and Public alike acclaim stupendous realism of my latest work, 'Gloom.' Please send at once another packet of your Cacophony Capsules.'"

It is, indeed, difficult to take seriously the cynical disregard of the functions of humane government displayed in this telegram. The actual facts, however, are stranger still; and information upon which implicit reliance can be placed fully confirms the Bolshevik policy of providing a starving population with circuses in preference to bread. As though to emphasise the prevalent misery, there are given nightly at Petrograd representations of opera and ballet which in splendour and costliness of mounting transcend anything of the kind to be seen in Russia before the war, or in the heyday of the Vienna Opera. It seems incredible that such lavish spectacles, together with first-rate classical concerts, can be given at all; but what are we to make of the fact that admission to them may be obtained without payment of any sort by all who care to avail themselves of the privilege? Such cynical indifference to the claims of a stricken populace invites inevitable comparison with the perverted mentality of another notorious patron of the arts, for in similar circumstances Nero was also a firm believer in the efficacy of 'instrumental methodology.'

Musical America for April 1 contains a note from a Montreal correspondent to the effect that Joseph Bonnet proposes to become a priest on his return to France from his present Canadian tour. Arrangements have been made for his reception as a divinity student at Paris. He will join the Benedictine order.

Occasional Notes

In a vague sort of way musicians have long believed their art to be possessed of healing powers. They remember the harping of David before Saul; they quote Congreve's tribute (usually ascribing it to Shakespeare); and they sing with approval:

In sweet music is such art
Killing care, and grief of heart
Fall asleep, or, hearing, die.

Yet not many of them seem to be aware that at the present time music is being employed as a medicine in a systematic manner, and with a measure of success that must inevitably lead to important developments. How this is being done may be seen in the Annual Report of the Vocal Therapy Society, a Report which every musician should read. (It may be had from the Secretary, at 27, Grosvenor Place, S.W. 1.) This is the first full statement issued by the Society, and covers the period from Armistice Day, November 11, 1918 (the date of the first meeting of the committee) to November 11, 1921. The mere words 'annual report' suggest the driest of reading—lists of subscribers, balance sheets, and the like. But here is a document so full of poignant interest as to make the reader wholesomely uncomfortable. We have not forgotten the war—every quarter-day gives us a painful reminder; more or less we bear in mind those who lost their lives in it; but do we remember the wounded and shell-shocked who are still slowly recovering? Apparently not, for here is a Society doing wonderful work for them, and yet hardly able to maintain its activities—still less extend them—for want of money.

What is the Vocal Therapy Society doing? It is curing, largely by means of music, certain types of disability resulting from wounds and shell-shock—stammering, loss of speech, facial paralysis, nervous collapse, lung trouble, &c. The work is under the direction of an executive composed of medical and musical experts, among them Sir James Dundas Grant, Sir Frederick Mott, Drs. Walford Davies, Arthur Somerville, and J. E. Borland, and Messrs. Walter Ford and Geoffrey Shaw. Musicians among the vice-presidents include Sir Henry Wood, Sir Henry Hadow, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, and Mr. Plunket Greene. Any doubt as to the practical nature of the Society's work should be settled by such names as these. If more evidence be needed, it is set forth, case by case, in the Report. Here you may read—in fact it is your duty to read—of (for example) T., shot through the right lung; lung full of adhesions, and very confined in action; after some months of treatment, in which breathing exercises played an important part, T. improved and went on to voice-production. He was 'very husky at first . . . owing to a wound in his throat,' but his voice developed, and he was soon singing at concerts. T. is now discharged, and is 'keeping very fit.' S. was a shell-shocked stammerer, hysterical, and 'with practically no confidence in himself.' After treatment by breathing, relaxation, speech, and singing, he was 'able to sing solos before a large audience'; discharged with good prospects, 'a fairly normal and contented man.' A. had been dumb for several years; recovered his voice, but stammered badly; 'his greatest joy was found in singing, and regularly every day for nearly six months he worked at singing and breathing exercises'; voice increased in power; now an out-patient, but 'keeps in touch with the music-room and sings whenever possible.' B. made his first appearance in the music-room under painful circumstances, being 'highly nervous and about to "throw a fit";' was 'trembling so violently' that the teacher had to do something to take his attention off himself; the 'something' was the playing of Chopin's C minor Prelude; in a few moments 'every limb was still,' and at the end of the singing-class A. had got over his fright, and was singing and taking breathing exercises. A miner who had been blown up in Mesopotamia had not spoken for two years; recovered his speech, the first word uttered being 'Mother.' G. had lost his voice for years; found it again after nine lessons; 'spoke to the Sister in a strong, manly voice, to her great surprise. There were great rejoicings in the ward.' As well there might be.

Here are three comments of the men on singing: 'It's a regular tonic'; 'I don't feel the same person as I did before I began to sing; curious how it takes you out of yourself'; 'I lost ma leg and ma voice, but t'voice come back, so t'leg doesn't matter.'

An outcome of the work is the formation of the King's Services Choirs, which have given concerts, separate and massed; they have even a little competitive festival of their own, singing against one another for a cup presented by Lady Bective. In a lesser degree something has been done on the orchestral side. At the Enham Village Centre there is a successful band of ten players, one of whom deserves mention. He had been a trombone player before the war, but was no longer able to control his old instrument, having been wounded in the jaw, as a result of which the right half of his upper lip was paralysed. He was persuaded to try the cornet, and after assiduous practice became a first-class player; at the same time he 'greatly improved the condition of his lip.'

The Report dealt with above was sent to us by a member of the committee, who, in his accompanying letter, said: 'We do so want the public to take a little more interest in us.' He could not have uttered a more telling reproach. Think of musicians above all needing to be asked to 'take a little interest' in such a work as this! We ought to have taken a lot of interest since November 11, 1918. However, it's not too late. There is still plenty of work for the Society to do, and there will be for some years. If we musicians do our duty there will be such a shower of donations that the Society will be able to engage the extra teachers it wants; still more dumb men will speak (think of the one who led off with 'Mother!') and there will be further 'rejoicings in the ward.' The few of us who are really unable to give may still help by sending for the Report, reading it, and talking about it. Publicity is needed, and now that the daily press is no longer full of M. Coué and his auto-suggestion, it might do worse than give a push to the less showy methods of the Vocal Therapy Society.

An interesting experiment was made at Æolian Hall on March 30, when Mr. John Dunn played Elgar's Violin Concerto with the orchestral part supplied by Mr. G. D. Cunningham on the organ. The result, though not entirely satisfactory, was good enough to encourage further effort along the same line. The idea is not new, for Mr. Bernard Johnson has frequently used the organ as a substitute for the orchestra in pianoforte concertos at municipal concerts at Nottingham. The combination of organ and pianoforte, however, is far more satisfactory than that of organ and violin. For one thing, the two keyboard instruments are both in the tempered scale; for another, the percussive effects of the pianoforte and the sostenuto of the organ are excellent foils. Moreover, the nuances of the pianoforte and the violin are very different in character. The real crescendo—that on a sustained note—is impossible on the pianoforte, and is one of the most characteristic effects of the violin. At Æolian Hall we felt that the power gradations of the solo instrument needed a far more sympathetic background. The string tone rose and fell in power while the accompaniment, when it happened to be played on an unenclosed portion of the organ, remained fixed. Occasionally, when Mr. Cunningham used only a quiet combination on the Swell, the effect was delightful. Excellent too were the little bits of orchestral detail from time to time—brief solo passages for the wood-wind, and so on.

But on the whole the constant organ tone became a trial to the ear by the time the work was ended. Perhaps the fact that the Concerto was immediately preceded by a long organ solo was partly responsible for this. After a work of the size of Bach's G minor Fantasia and Fugue (finely played from memory by Mr. Cunningham), we needed something as different as possible from organ tone before embarking on another forty minutes of it in the Concerto. Still, as was said above, the result was such as to encourage further experiment. There must be many violinists and 'cellists who wish to play concertos, but are put off, either by the cost of an orchestra or by the unsatisfactoriness of the pianoforte as a substitute. It seems to us that the solution lies in a combination of the pianoforte and organ, the former supplying the rapid decorative portions of the orchestration, and the latter backing it up with sustained wind passages, variety of tone-colour in fragments of solo work for flute, clarinet, oboe, &c., and a bass of the firm and sonorous type that is as characteristic of the organ as it is lacking in the pianoforte. Moreover, the two instruments atone for each other's defects in other ways. The organ is deficient in rhythm and accent—the pianoforte's strong points; the pianoforte is lacking in sostenuto—the department in which the organ is supreme. We hope to see a good organist and pianist laying their heads together and showing what can be done in this way. A successful trial would solve at least one of the economic problems of to-day, just as the use of the small chamber orchestra is solving others.

Among modern sets of part-songs few have equalled in popularity Elgar's group of five for male voices, the words translated from the Greek Anthology. We are glad to hear that these fine choral miniatures have lately been arranged for S.A.T.B. by the composer. The new version will be published towards the end of the present month.

Mr. Theo. Wendt, musical director of the Cape Town Orchestra, writes to us, giving particulars of the concerts which the Orchestra will give during its annual tour through the Union of South Africa. The programmes are of first-rate quality—a judicious blend of works that are familiar and others that ought to be. British composers are well represented, as the following list will prove: Elgar's Enigma Variations, Holst's Beni Mora Suite, Howells's Puck's Minuet, Hart's The Wild Geese, German's Theme and Six Diversions and Men of Harlech March, Quilter's Children's Overture, and Fould's Keltic Lament. There will be two performances of Hiawatha by the Pretoria Choral Society, conducted by Mr. John Connell, and a programme devoted chiefly to Gilbert and Sullivan.

In view of the cosmopolitan character of the populations in the towns to be visited, this is a very fair show for our music. Inevitably the bulk of the programmes are made up of the standard orchestral repertory of Beethoven, Wagner, Tchaikovsky, &c., so not much room is left for contemporary work. Of such space as is available, however, British music occupies a larger share than any other school.

The many friends of William Higley will be glad to hear that he is returning to the concert platform. He will make his reappearance at Æolian Hall on June 2, when he will give a recital of songs by Vaughan Williams, Holst, Elgar, Dale, Brent Smith, Bairstow, Naylor, Pointer, &c., as well as Airs by Purcell, Bach, and Handel. A first hearing will be given to a set of three Salt Water Songs by Thomas Wood, the music-master at Tonbridge School.

Mr. R. J. Pitcher sends us a good specimen of English as she is wrote by a prospective customer in Mexico. As it amused us, it will probably amuse some of our readers, so we print it:

México, D.F., 17th march, 1922.

Miss F. J. Fitch,
21, Boundary Road,
Saint John's Wood, N.W.8.
LONDON.

Respectable Miss Fitch:

I will be thankful, if you please to send me information over 'The Techniquer,' in order to know its teaching's proceeding, as well as to taste the prices and conditions for to acquire the apprenticeship's.

I improve this opportunity for to present you my very respectful civility, as your

Very Truly, ———

But, while we laugh, let us remember that, funny as the letter is, it is nothing beside the result the average Englishman would produce if he tried his hand at writing Mexican.

A booklet giving particulars of Bach's music published by Novello has just been issued. It contains useful information as to the choral works—character of the music, degree of difficulty, solo voices required, time taken in performance, and so on. The list includes also Bach literature, references to songs, organ music, arrangements for organ, harmonium, pianoforte, orchestra, pianoforte and violin, &c. It may be had on application to the publishers.

We are glad to hear that the Glastonbury Festival work has been saved by the success of the School at Bristol, Birmingham, and other places. At Bristol extra performances have had to be arranged in order to meet the public demand; at Birmingham, Mr. Barry Jackson's production of The Immortal Hour has been drawing crowded houses, and arrangements are now being made for its transference to London.

It is indeed high time that Londoners had an opportunity for making acquaintance with a work which in a very unusual degree has impressed both public and critics. So far as we remember, its only London performance has been one that for various unavoidable reasons was far from adequate. There will be a Summer School of Greek Drama and Music at Glastonbury during August, the chief musical event being the production of Boughton's new opera Alceste. Lectures will be given by Prof. Gilbert Murray, Mr. R. W. Livingstone, Mr. F. W. Cornford, and others.

As a token of appreciation of Mr. Edwin Evans's constant efforts on behalf of contemporary music he is to be presented with his portrait, painted by Wyndham Lewis. The cost has been borne by a group of native composers that includes our 'four B's'—Bax, Berners, Bliss, Bridge (Frank)—Goossens, Hart, Holst, Ireland, Scott, and others, besides a number of prominent French, Italian, and Russian musicians. We take more than usual interest in this tribute because the bulk of Mr. Evans's work for modern British music—at all events the journalistic side of such work—has been done in the pages of the Musical Times.

In his new book Interludes, Records, and Impressions Sir Charles Stanford makes a lively attack on music publishers. Publishers have long been regarded as fair game, perhaps because they have not as a rule taken the trouble to defend themselves. But there is something to be said on their side, and it may be worth while trying to say it. The cause of music in this country is not helped by a feeling that publishers as a body have little enterprise and even less musical taste. Dealing with the question of publication, Sir Charles makes damaging comparisons between this country and Germany:

'The supply of English music of what may be called the serious type—chamber music, orchestral works, and the like (and quantities of it are in existence) are (sic) mostly in manuscript upon their composers' shelves. If the writers had been "made in Germany" most of their works would have been procurable by the public long ago. Being writers in a country where publishers follow the trend of society and disbelieve—or at any rate argue that the public disbelieve—in British work, they cannot find their way into print, still less obtain the smallest value for it. The consequence is obvious in every music-seller's window—a row of royalty ballads. The exceptions are sufficiently few to prove the rule.'

Why say 'every,' if there are exceptions? And are these exceptions so few? Do we see rows of royalty ballads in the windows at Novello, Curwen, Chester, Winthrop Rogers, Stainer & Bell, Elkin, Schott, Lengnick, Goodwin & Tabb, Murdoch, and Augener? This is not a small, but a large proportion of our publishers. As to the publication of serious native music, things are not yet all that might be desired—especially by the serious composers concerned—but they are far better than they were twenty years ago. It is worth noting, too, that the most marked improvement has taken place during the past four years—a period of exceptional difficulty, owing to the cost of production and the economic obstacles in the way of rehearsal and performance of new works. Music publishers, as a body, have shown not less, but rather more, enterprise than the bulk of business houses, seeing that their wares are not yet regarded as necessities of life. And after all, a complaint comes ill from one who has had about a hundred and seventy works published, practically all by British firms. But Sir Charles will see little good in a native publisher :

'When a German composer, even a beginner and little known, produces a work in his own country the publishers congregate to hear it, and to form their judgment upon its suitability for print. If an English work is produced, the English publisher is at his own fireside ; he knows nothing of its fate and cares less. Even the favourable comments of the press will fail to move him to consider at second-hand the claims of any work which does not fall into the category of large profits and quick returns. A string quartet, an orchestral symphony or concerto, would be looked upon as matters far too ephemeral to be considered in the same breath as a three-verse song with organ obligato. Their author will be pitied for wasting his valuable time on visionary ideals.'

The best answer to this is furnished by the list of published works by Stanford himself, Elgar, and Parry, and by the present steady stream of new publications by such men as Vaughan Williams, Holst, Frank Bridge, Bax, Goossens, Ireland, and others.

Sir Charles goes on :

'A leading publisher in America—which is to all intents and purposes a new field for music, and a land where commercial interests are paramount—lately said that he made it a rule to include a solid percentage of high-class music in his catalogues, even if they spelt a deficit in themselves, for the credit of his house and of his country. The sooner it is brought home to the English music publisher that the credit of a nation's output depends in the main upon music of the highest class . . . the better will be the outlook of this nation in the world of art.'

There may or may not be more than one publisher in America of the type Sir Charles holds up as an example ; it is certain that practically every book and music publisher of repute does the same thing, and does it so much as a matter of course that he makes no song about it ; his catalogue will speak for itself. But he can do it only out of the profits made on the more or less ephemeral works and the certain successes, and even then, with the best will in the world, he has to see that his business earns dividends, or up will go the shutters—and away will go the chance of the serious composer getting anything published at all. Even publishers must live, and they should be no more expected to adopt a consistent policy of publishing at a loss, or even at a great risk, than a teacher should be expected to gather round him none but talented and impecunious students and teach them gratis or on a speculative basis. Elsewhere, speaking of the cost of orchestral rehearsals and concerts, Sir Charles says some wise things about the folly of killing the hen and then expecting the supply of eggs to continue. Much of it might easily be applied to this question of the issue of new and difficult music. Let us have fair play for publishers, no less than for hens.

Miss Ursula Greville is to be heartily congratulated on the success of her tour in Germany and Austria. Even more significant than the press eulogies is the fact that she has been engaged to sing in the autumn at a Vienna Philharmonic concert and at an orchestral concert at Berlin.

Music in the Foreign Press

D'INDY ON THREE CONTEMPORARY COMPOSERS

In Le Courrier Musical (March 15) Vincent d'Indy speaks severely of three works which he heard for the first time during his recent visit to the United States :

Schönberg's five Orchestral Pieces are incoherent, and the writer can find in them no trace of the various qualities which great composers have ever considered necessary in the practice of their art. Schönberg himself seems to be ashamed of their purposelessness, and to be trying to make up for it by needless violence and, fortunately, by brevity.

Korngold's Die Tote Stadt is described as second-rate Puccini and Leoncavallo at his worst ; the libretto as a travesty of Rodenbach's beautiful book Bruges la Morte.

Prokofiev's The Love of the Three Oranges (whose plot d'Indy describes at length) is a complicated piece of clowning, amusing in its way, but in which music is relegated to the background for the mere reason that it cannot be listened to in conjunction with the show on the stage. The music is skillfully written, and shows signs of a genuineness which would certainly assert itself more convincingly if Prokofiev were less concerned with 'out-Stravinskyng Stravinsky.' The score contains a few delightful pages.

A PROTEST FROM KORNGOLD

Dr. Karl Holl having written in the Frankfurter Zeitung that the score of Die Tote Stadt contains a good deal of imposture and muck ('Attrappe und saloppe Arbeit'), Korngold adduces in the Merker (March 1) testimonials from various conductors to the effect that Dr. Holl's verdict is altogether unfounded. He further proceeds to protest against Dr. Holl's utterances in general, and particularly against his valuation of the libretto.

DENMARK AND SCHÖNBERG

In the Signale (March 8) Fritz Crome writes from Copenhagen :

Denmark, in musical matters, is progressive enough. To show that we whole-heartedly keep up with the truly significant modern currents, it will suffice to name Louis Glass, Peder Gram, Paul von Klenau, and especially Karl Nielsen. So far as the extreme radical movement is concerned, the experimental 'modernist' movement which is represented by Pratella in Italy, by Cyril Scott in England, and chiefly by Arnold Schönberg, we must confess that we have nothing to show, and have taken little pains so far to seek knowledge. It is only this winter that we have become acquainted with Schönberg's music, thanks to Paul von Klenau, who has given us a whole evening of it.

The writer considers that Pierrot Lunaire, which was the chief event of the concert referred to, produced a mixed impression, but certainly gave rise to the wish that it may soon be heard again. He doubts whether the road followed by Schönberg really leads anywhere.

RIMSKY-KORSAKOV AND BORIS GODOUNOV

In La Revue Musicale (April) Robert Godet emphatically protests against the 'emendations' introduced into the score of Boris Godounov by Rimsky-Korsakov. Like Pierre d'Alheim, Jean Marnold and others, he considers the alterations altogether unwarrantable, and expresses the wish that Moussorgsky's masterpiece be known in its genuine form.

MUSIC IN SOVIET RUSSIA

In the same issue, André Julien writes that throughout Russia theatres are surprisingly active. At Moscow and Petrograd, operas and ballets are in great favour. The most popular composer is Rimsky-Korsakov. Tchaikovsky comes second, Borodin with his one opera, Prince Igor third, Moussorgsky fourth. Few foreign works are produced.

No new composers have cropped up, but a number of previously unknown conductors, singers, and instrumentalists are mentioned with praise. Stanislavsky, the famous manager of the Arts Theatre, is producing opera under particularly fine conditions. At a minor theatre the writer one night saw a conductor gravely beating time to an 'orchestra' consisting solely of a pianist; the opera performed was Eugène Onegin. Petrushka, The Fire-Bird, and many long-forgotten ballets are being produced. Glière has written two new ballets, Khrysis and Comediantes.

At the Moscow Grand Theatre symphony concerts are given. Most of the programmes during the last two years were devoted to Beethoven, Wagner, Strauss, and Scriabin. A room previously reserved for the Tsar's private use has been turned into a hall for chamber music concerts, where the whole series of Beethoven's Trios and Quartets was given. A number of concerts of modern chamber music took place last season.

A FORGOTTEN ITALIAN COMPOSER

In Il Pianoforte (March) Luigi Perrachio gives a thoughtful, thorough survey of Giuseppe Martucci's pianoforte works:

Martucci (1859-1909) remains most unjustly overlooked. At a period when pure music was practically ignored throughout Italy, he wrote works of outstanding merit. His output for the pianoforte is more important from all points of view than Sgambati's. Its chief characteristics are dignity and austerity. It is especially his later works that deserve close attention—for example, the Novella, Op. 50, the Fantasia, Op. 51, the Capriccio and Serenade, Op. 37, the Prelude, Toccata, and Gigue, Op. 61, the last Serenade, Nocturno, and Intermezzo (Opus numbers not given). The Pianoforte Concerto (Op. 66) is perhaps the finest of his works.

STRAVINSKY

Equally thoughtful and instructive is A. Hilio Cimbri's article on Stravinsky in the same issue. The writer deals with his subject on the plainest lines, and refrains from all forms of special plea. He likes Stravinsky's music, and says so, defining its chief characteristics felicitously, from the non-technical point of view.

BALAKIREV AND BERLIOZ

In Le Ménestrel (March 4) Adolphe Boschot publishes a letter from Balakirev to Berlioz, urging him to write a new symphony, and suggesting a complete programme founded on Byron's Manfred—

Balakirev at the time of writing (September, 1868), being apparently unaware of the existence of Schumann's Manfred music.

A PROPOSAL TO TAX MUSIC IMPORTED INTO FRANCE

The question—moved, apparently, by the French publisher Durand—whether it would be an advantage for France to impose a tax upon imported printed music is being actively discussed in the French press. Opinion, so far, is unanimously against the proposed measure. E. Vuillermoz (Le Temps, February 24), Jacques Hengel (Le Ménestrel, March 24), and A. Mangeot (Monde Musical, March), agree in declaring that it would be disastrous. It has since been decided that the question would not be considered.

Le Ménestrel states that Henri Rabaud (the Director of the Conservatoire), Widor, Théodore Dubois, Paul Vidal, Georges Hue, and other well-known French composers, were among the first to sign a protest against Durand's proposal.

In Le Courrier Musical (March 15) Ch. Tenroc emphasises that the French editions of the classics are more trustworthy, better printed (and on better paper), and cheaper than the German. Only custom, and systematic dumping on Germany's part, fight in favour of German editions.

THE GROTESQUE, THE COMICAL, AND THE HUMOROUS IN MUSIC

The first copy of the Prag monthly Der Aufakt to reach this office (March) is interesting enough to make me regret not having seen the previous issues. It contains an article by Dr. Th. Veidl on the principles of humour in music, with instances from Beethoven's works; an account by Dr. Paul Nettl, of the first comic-opera produced at Prag, La Patienza di Socrate con due moglie (text by Count Minato, music by Antonio Draghi, 1680); an essay by Richard Specht on 'The Grotesque in recent music' (in which no reference is made to Russian music nor, with the sole exception of one to Berlioz, of French music); and another, by Dr. Zdeněk Nejedlý, on the comical characters in Smetana's operas.

M.-D. CALVOCORESSI.

The Musician's Bookshelf

Sir Charles Stanford's occasional dashes into the field of musical journalism are so invariably successful that the fruits are too good to be left in the obscurity of magazine files. Here, in his Interludes, Records, and Impressions (Murray, 12s.), he reprints a batch contributed to various journals during the past few years, together with several papers that now see the light for the first time. Sir Charles has a big pullover most musical writers, owing to his having been on intimate terms with so many great musicians of the past generation. He has but to start telling us what Richter, or Joachim, or von Bülow said or did on a given occasion, and he has our ear at once. But a good deal more goes to the making of this book. Sir Charles is not only one of our most distinguished composers—and surely our most versatile; he is also the teacher of a large proportion of the men who are now putting the creative side of our music on its legs again. As a result, his pronouncements on composition and musical education are above all practical. Many a fat treatise on the former subject says less than is here packed into thirty pages. The most interesting thing in a good chapter on 'Some Conductors and Their Methods,' is the comparison between Richter and von Bülow. (By the way, the author is hasty in saying that among the many absurdities 'abolished by Richter was the pp opening of "For unto us"'. If it was ever abolished it has revived, and may be heard right and left from choral societies large and small.) Apropos of conductors' methods, admiring audiences of the perspiring and Ajax-defying lightning types should bear in mind Sir Charles's remark that 'the best judgment of a conductor is formed by sitting in front of him, not at his back.' Richter and von Bülow often left the orchestra alone, so far as the folk behind them could judge, but all the time their eyes were busy. Sir Charles says that playing the organ under Richter, he 'felt the conductor's eye through his spine without looking round for the beat.' The chapter on 'Bayreuth in 1876,' is full of interest. Sir Charles approves of the Paris step of giving the Ring with the long and dull portions omitted—'a relief to the hearer, but anathema to the true Wagnerite.' Speaking of the Bayreuth performance, he says:

'I sat in the theatre immediately behind Liszt. I could not but smile at the amount of time which he spent at these moments in the arms of Morpheus. He walked up and down afterwards under my window, speaking with enthusiasm of those very moments which I knew he had not heard, or which came to him from reading the score, or from—dreams, nightmares, perhaps.'

There is a generous appreciation of Sterndale Bennett and an admirable tribute to the value of the amateur, with special reference to Sedley Taylor, Arthur Coleridge, Spencer Lyttleton, and others. The paper on 'Music and the War' expresses with vigour what most of us felt at the time it was written—1916. To-day we cannot get quite so hot on certain points. There is a touch of spleen in the discussion of Richard Strauss, though some of the hits are fair enough. For example:

'He cannot even leave the domestic hearth and the innocence of childhood alone, but blares at infancy with tubas and trombones. In his view Blake should have been a Boanerges in the nursery, howling Treitschke instead of baby rhymes; and the bath should have been sown with floating mines.'

But it does not do to argue, as Sir Charles does, that the elements of German militarism can be clearly traced in modern German music. If they are there they are also in the music of the Allies. The following sentence can be applied to a good proportion of English, French, American, and Russian composers of the past twenty years, and, going farther back, to Berlioz, and even Beethoven:

'He relies increasingly upon the numbers of his executants, upon the technical facility of his players, upon the additions and improvements to musical instruments, upon the subordination of invention to effect, upon the massing of sounds and the superabundance of colour to conceal inherent poverty.'

This is said of Strauss by way of showing that he is 'the counterpart of Bernhardt and the General Staff.' A German critic might almost as justly say that our massed band performances and Handel Festivals are signs of militarism and aggressiveness.

The question of the pace of some portions of Beethoven's ninth Symphony having lately been in the air, the chapter thereon comes at a good moment especially as it settles beyond dispute the fact that the tempo of the Scherzo and its Trio should be $\text{♩} = 116$ and $\text{♩} = 116$ respectively. A reproduction of a photograph of the original full score, giving the juncture of the two movements, is so conclusive that we wonder how any such a question could have arisen and remained debatable for a century. Other chapters in this enjoyable book deal with Jenny Lind, Pauline Viardot-Garcia, and Grove, recent tendencies in composition, and the growth of the symphony. There are a few signs of want of care in the final stages of proof-reading, e.g., a passage on Richter and horn- and oboe-tone in the chapter on orchestras is repeated almost word for word in that on conductors; there are a few eccentric punctuation; and in the prefatory note the Musical Quarterly becomes the Musical Quarterly Review, and Music and Letters has its title not at all improved into Music and Literature.
H. G.

The man who sets out to write warmly and picturesquely about art—and above all about music—treads the knife-edge of a path. A few words too many, a few badly chosen epithets, a slip on a technical term, and over he goes on the highfalutin and bathos side. So hard is it to keep the pot bubbling and brimming without slopping over! Here is a writer who can do the trick with brilliant success—Paul Rosenfeld. His Musical Portraits: Interpretations of twenty Modern Composers (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d.), is a series of vivid studies of some of the most discussed composers of to-day—Mahler, Scriabin, Stravinsky, Schönberg, Ornstein, Ravel, Bloch, with some who are now accepted rather than discussed—Franck, Liszt, Wagner, and several of the Russians. The papers are reprints from various (American) journals, and to this fact must be put down the overworking of a handful of epithets of the punching kind. Reprints rarely get the revision they require; the process involves so many drastic changes. The cutting out of repetitive and other passages that, more or less necessary in journalism, are redundant in a book, calls for so much patching and rewriting that the author shies at it, especially if he sees a stack of current work waiting at his elbow. So we throw no stones at our Rosenfelds and Turners, being duly grateful when good stuff is rescued from magazines and put before us in book form. And Mr. Rosenfeld's is very good stuff indeed. Opening his volume almost at random, take this extract from the chapter on Sibelius, and see if it does not make us realise how our complacent Saturday afternoon audiences at Queen's Hall found it hard to get on terms with his two Symphonies:

'Sibelius has written music that seems . . . to be the very North indeed . . . There are times when he comes into the concert-room like some man of a former age, like some spare, knotted barbarian from the world of the sagas. There are times when he comes amongst us like one who might quite conceivably have been comrade to pelted warriors who fought with clubs and hammers; like one who might have beaten out a rude music by black, smoking hearth-sides quite as readily as make tone-poems for the modern concert-room. And his music, with its viking blows and wild, crying accents, its harsh and uncouth speech, sets us without circumstance in that sunken world, sets us in the very midst of the stark men and grave, savage women for whom the sagas were made, so that we can see them in all their hurtling strength and rank barbarity, can well-nigh touch them with the fingers of our hands.'

This is no doubt the real Sibelius, whose bleak Symphonies will never oust Finlandia and the Valse Triste from their place in English repertory.

And take this passage as an impression of the Stravinsky of The Rite of Spring, the vivid fidelity of which will be felt by all who have heard the music—especially those who have heard it without the boring choreographic accompaniment of 1921 :

'The new steel organs of man have begotten their music in Le Sacre du Printemps. For with Stravinsky, the rhythms of machinery enter musical art . . . there has come to be a music stylistically well-nigh the reverse of that of the impressionists. Through him, music has again become cubical, lapidary, massive, mechanistic. Scintillation has gone out of it. The elegance of Debussy, the golden sensuality, the quiet, classic touch, are flown. Instead, there are come to be great, weighty, metallic masses, molten piles and sheets of steel and iron, shining adamantine bulks. Contours are become grim, severe, angular. Melodies are sharp, rigid, symmetrical. Chords are uncouth, square clusters of notes, stout and solid as the pillars that support roofs, heavy as the thuds of trip-hammers. Above all, there is rhythm, rhythm rectangular and sheer and emphatic, rhythm that lunges and beats and reiterates and dances with all the steely perfect tirelessness of the machine, shoots out and draws back, shoots upward and shoots down, with the inhuman motion of titanic arms of steel. Indeed, the change is as radical, as complete, as though in the midst of noble moonlit gardens a giant machine had arisen swiftly from the ground and inundated the night with electrical glare, and set its metal thews and organs and joints relentlessly whirling, relentlessly functioning.'

Against this tough and hammering prose, bristling with d's and t's, might be set in contrast passages from the chapters on Debussy, Franck, Scriabin, and others as warm and glowing as the music they describe. In this very real sense Mr. Rosenfeld does interpret his chosen composers to us, doing more with a few pages of words than many a writer manages with double the amount of language plus musical examples. It is a rare gift, though perhaps the result is not for everybody. It would be easy to pick out a few of the less successful passages and on the strength or weakness thereof pooh-pooh the book as mere 'fine writing.' Let this reviewer confess that he began to read with misgivings ('Hullo! another gusher!'), but was soon captured, for Mr. Rosenfeld's glowing and violent vocabulary is not mere sounding brass. It is a medium as natural to him as a harmonic idiom is to a composer, and through it he delivers himself of criticism usually fresh, and often penetrating.

The readers of this set of studies will ask for more. Why not a series on the older composers? The Stravinskys and Ornsteins, the Debussys and Scriabins, are well suited with flowers of speech that alternately suggest the cactus and the orchid. The Bachs, the Palestrinas, the Scarlattis, and Purcells would call for something so very different that we should like to see what sort of a fist Mr. Rosenfeld would make of the job. H. G.

Luigi Torri's volume on the construction of the violin and violin makers (published by G. Zanibon, Padua) is a fairly comprehensive record of the books, monographs, and even essays, that have been written on the subject. Naturally enough, not all the author's definitions appear equally adequate. For instance, Wasielewski's Die Violine und ihre Meister surely deserves more than the cursory notice it gets from Mr. Torri. And there is little to be gained by giving in extenso such a title as that of Wettengel's work, which occupies sixteen lines. It is true that in this case the title is also a complete summary of the contents. But we should have preferred the collector's summary and criticism to the author's words. The value of a record of this kind is not so much in the number of works catalogued as in the judgment passed on their worth and on the writer's point of view. The fact that M. Tolbecque has written a volume on the luthier's art is not interesting in itself. The interest would lie in a brief comment on M. Tolbecque's views. As a preparation for a more exhaustive study of the subject, Mr. Torri's volume is, however, invaluable.

B. V.

The importance of imitation in the study of counterpoint cannot well be overrated, especially at the present time. Nature teaches that for any development of the higher branches of a tree there must be a corresponding development of its roots. And in view of the rapid and extraordinary developments that have taken place in music during the last twenty years or so, it becomes more important than ever to strengthen the roots of musical knowledge. We welcome accordingly such a work as Oreste Ravanello's Study on Imitation (published by G. Zanibon, Padua). The author deals fairly thoroughly with scholastic imitation, dividing the work into three parts, of which the first deals with definitions of various imitations (perfect, free, rising or falling motion, &c.), the second consists of exercises on short given basses, and the third offers fuller examples for practice.

B. V.

New Music

STRING MUSIC

String quartets of excellent quality are rarer now than they have ever been. It is evident that the modern taste does not run in the direction of this somewhat exclusive and certainly exacting form. On the other hand, quartets of very fair merit are perhaps more numerous now than they were when Beethoven wrote. Edward Norman Hay's Quartet, published by the Carnegie Collection of British Music, is certainly no exception. It is not too ambitious, and its effect ought to be pleasant enough on the whole. Only now and then are there passages which at least the reader of the score must consider less convincing. Mr. Hay apparently is aware of the fact that mere number of notes does not make for effect in violin or 'cello music as it does in the case of the harp or the pianoforte. But this otherwise praiseworthy reticence can be carried too far. For instance, the Poco Largamente, at page 39, suggests a climax that a performance may realise very imperfectly owing to the distribution of the parts, and especially to the weakness of the 'cello part. A reading of the score is of course a different thing from actual consecutive performance, and an error of judgment which appears dangerous at first may pass almost unnoticed in the practical test. The trumpets in the first long tutti of the Tchaikovsky Violin Concerto which appeared heinous to its first conductors are now accepted and condoned in view of the other merits of the work. But Tchaikovsky would have been wiser if he had accepted the criticism of Richter and deleted the offending passage. If Mr. Hay should find that in the actual performance a bar or two are not quite what he anticipated, let us hope he will have the courage to amend the flaws, for the Quartet deserves this, and the doctrine of infallibility is a very recent one.

Miss K. Dorothy Fox's Chant Élégiacque (Bosworth & Co.), dedicated to her 'Father and Brother,' has a touch of the family affair, namely, modesty, simplicity, and a certain degree of intimacy. (It is no use giving ourselves airs with those who know us well.) But the piece is none the worse on that account, and should be appreciated by amateurs in search of simple and attractive melody.

B. V.

FULL SCORES

Durand's have just issued Corelli's Concerto Grosso (No. 8) in G minor (Fatto per la Notte di Natale), edited by Rhené-Baton. The score is for first and second violin and violoncello solo and the usual string orchestra with the continuo 'realised' for pianoforte by the editor. A very pleasant Pastorale seems to be the best of the batch of movements.

From Chester's comes the miniature score of Joseph Jongen's Tableaux Pittoresques for small orchestra, Op. 56—Le matin dans la campagne, Danses, Paysage de montagnes, and Fête populaire. It belongs to the type of chamber-orchestral music that is a good deal in favour at present and is likely to be even more so. The composer, however, gives directions as to its adaptation for performance by a bigger force when the work is given in a large hall. So far as can be gathered from a reading of the score, this appears to be a delightful work. Jongen is one of the best of contemporary composers in this vein—one well suited to his delicate fancy and sense of colour.

H. G.

SONGS

A Song of Shadows (Winthrop Rogers). This poem of Walter de la Mare with its undertones of ghostly visitants, festooned frost-flowers, smouldering embers, its musician, with his viol or lute, playing by the light of the stars among the shifting shadows, has been sensitively expressed in song and accompaniment by C. Armstrong Gibbs. We shudder to think of the fate of this delicate lyric at the hands of a mediocre composer with unsatisfied longings for cheap effects. But this poem, and the same poet's Silver, have been merged into music by a composer who has poetic imagination and a sense of the beauty of words and their fitting adjustment to harmony and tone. The clear-cut chords of the accompaniment to the tranquil cadences of Silver alternated by a single bass note and its deeper octave give the moonlit night effects of the poet's theme of the silvered surfaces of creatures and things when 'the moon walks the night in her silver shoon.' There are wit and humour in this same composer's setting of de la Mare's Five Eyes and John Mouldy (Winthrop Rogers). The melodic design of Five Eyes, with its five quavers and semiquavers to almost every bar representing the miller's three black cats with five eyes between them, is clever and amusing.

For his Five Irish Songs (Murdoch) Arnold Bax has chosen poems by two of the best contemporary Irish poets and J. M. Synge. Padraig Colum's The Pigeons, with its chromaticism, closely packed chords in constant semitonic progression, and hesitating chromatic triplets, is a vivid realisation of the wild pigeons' tremulous notes and iridescent colouring. The melody for the voice is simple and tender, expressive of a childless woman's sorrow stimulated by the sound of the young pigeons stirring in their nest. The Irish folk-song lilt and idiom, and the Irish sentiment which is always far removed, happily, from sentimentality, are heard in the fine settings of Joseph Campbell's As I came over the grey, grey hills, and I heard a piper piping, and in the exquisite, sensitive rendering of Colum's Across the Door.

Herbert Hughes's arrangements of old Irish songs and ballads are always as near perfection as can be. If I had a-knew, a fragment of an old Derry Ballad (Enoch), is arranged with the usual good taste and artistic restraint characteristic of this composer.

Massi-Hardman's Near the Rill, To the Nightingale, and The Beloved's Voice (Augener) are settings of poems by Russian poets translated by John Bowring. They will prove useful to singers requiring simple and tuneful melodies.

The music of The Enchantea Hour, a miniature song-cycle by John Heath (Enoch) to a lyric of James Stephens and four short poems by W. A. Stokes, will meet with popularity. Both songs and accompaniments are easy, and the words possess humour and are dainty. Easthope Martin's setting of Tennyson's irritating, reiterative Break and Helen Taylor's The Minstrel (Enoch) are illustrative of the poems with their somewhat trite and worn sentiment.

There is a quaint humour and pathos in D. M. Stewart's Denny's Daughter (Augener), words by Moira O'Neill, that will bring it success with audiences who want a simple, cheering song, and Breville Smith's The Emigrant (Elkin) is a pleasant, racy setting of John Masefield's poem. The same may be said of Paul Edmonds's The Old Woman.

Arthur de Greef's Apart (Enoch) is a melodious and slightly sentimental setting of a lyric by Eileen Newton.

Cyril Scott's Villanelle of Firelight (Elkin) is spoilt by the constant sibilant sound of words such as 'things,' 'swings,' 'kings,' and others rhyming with 'wings,' which occur twice in each of the six verses.

Gerrard Williams's setting of Shelley's Time (Novello) has originality. The severe and somewhat grim music is well-suited to Shelley's conception of the sea as cruel, rapacious, treacherous, 'terrible in storm.' This same composer has made an excellent arrangement of The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington (Novello).

L. L.

Like as a father

May 1, 1922

ANTHEM FOR TENOR SOLO AND CHORUS
FROM "O COME BEFORE HIS PRESENCE WITH SINGING"

Psalm ciii. 13, 9

Music by GEORGE C. MARTIN

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED; NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

TENOR SOLO
Arioso. Andante con moto

mf

Like . . . as a fa - - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren,

Andante con moto ♩ = 100.mf legatocon Ped.

so . . . is the Lord mer-ci-ful to them . . . that fear Him.

mf

CHORUS. SOPRANO

mf

Like . . . as a fa - - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren,

mf

so . . . is the Lord mer-ci-ful to them . . . that fear Him,

CHORUS. BASS

mf

Like . . . as a

so is the

CHORUS. TENOR mf

so . . . is the

fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren, so . . . is the Lord mer-ci-ful to them that . . . fear Him.

CHORUS. ALTO

mf Like . . . as a

Lord mer-ci-ful to them that fear Him, Like as a

Lord mer-ci-ful to them . . . that fear Him,

senza Ped. Ped.

fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren, . . . like as a

fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren, . . . like . . . as a

The musical score is written for four voices (Soprano, Alto, Tenor, Bass) and piano accompaniment. The key signature is one sharp (F#), and the time signature is common time (C). The score is divided into two systems. The first system contains the first two stanzas of the hymn. The second system contains the third stanza. The piano accompaniment features a steady eighth-note pattern in the right hand and a more complex, moving line in the left hand. Dynamics include mf (mezzo-forte) and f (forte). Crescendos are marked with cres. above the notes.

mf.
Like as a fa - ther
fa - ther, like as a fa - ther fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren, like as a fa - ther
mf
Like as a fa - ther
pit - ieth his own chil - dren, He will not al - way be chi - ding, pit - ieth his own chil - dren, He will not al - way be chi - ding, pit - ieth his own chil - dren, He will not al - way be chi - ding, pit - ieth his own chil - dren, He will not al - way be chi - ding,
He will not al - way be chi - ding, nei-ther keep - eth He His an - ger for
He will not al - way be chi - ding, nei-ther keep - eth He His an - ger for
He will not al - way be chi - ding, nei-ther keep - eth He His an - ger for
He will not al - way be chi - ding, nei-ther keep - eth He His an - ger for ev - er. ev - er. Like as a fa - ther

The first system of the musical score for 'Like as a Father'. It features a vocal line with lyrics 'ev - er. ev - er. Like as a fa - ther' and a piano accompaniment. The key signature is one sharp (F#) and the time signature is 4/4. Dynamics include ff and mf.

pit - ieth his own chil - dren, so . . . is the Lord mer - ci - ful to

The second system of the musical score. The vocal line continues with 'pit - ieth his own chil - dren, so . . . is the Lord mer - ci - ful to'. The piano accompaniment provides harmonic support. Dynamics include mf.

Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own them . . . that fear Him, like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own
Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own
Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own

The third system of the musical score, which includes a four-part vocal setting. The lyrics are: 'Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own', 'them . . . that fear Him, like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own', 'Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own', and 'Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own'. The piano accompaniment is consistent with the previous systems. Dynamics include mf.

chil - dren, so is the Lord mer - ci - ful to them . . . that chil - dren, so is the Lord mer - ci - ful to them that chil - dren, so is the Lord mer - ci - ful to them . . . that chil - dren, so is the Lord mer - ci - ful to them that . .

fear Him, e - ven so is the Lord mer - ci - ful, mer - ci - ful to fear Him, e - ven so is the Lord mer - ci - ful, mer - ci - ful to fear Him, e - ven so is the Lord, the Lord mer - ci - ful, mer - ci - ful to fear Him, e - ven so is the Lord, the Lord mer - ci - ful, mer - ci - ful to them, to them . . . that . . . fear Him, that fear

them, to them that fear Him, that fear . .

them, to them that fear Him, that fear . .

them, to them that fear Him, that fear . .

them, to them that fear Him, that fear . .

TENOR SOLO
lento al fine

Lake . . as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren, e - ven so the
Him. Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren,
Him. Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren,
Him. Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren,
Him. Like as a fa - ther pit - ieth his own chil - dren,
lento al fine

Lord, . . the Lord is mer - ci - ful to them that fear . . Him.
e - ven so is mer - ci - ful to them that fear Him.
e - ven so is mer - ci - ful to them that fear Him.
e - ven so is mer - ci - ful to them that fear Him.
e - ven so is mer - ci - ful to them that fear Him.
rall.

rall. Ped. 16 ft. (8ve. higher)

(Continued from page 332.)

CHURCH MUSIC

The remarkable edition of Tudor Church music now being published for the Carnegie United Kingdom Trust by the Oxford University Press (Humphrey Milford) should claim the attention of all musicians. The principal editors are Dr. R. R. Terry and Dr. Edmund H. Fellowes—two musicians who have taken a distinguished part in shedding light on the greatest period of our musical history. The music comprised in this series, we are told, will be representative of the work of composers for both the English and the Latin rite in the various forms of Services, Motets, anthems, and hymns, and will present in modern form some of the splendid music we inherit from the Tudor period, of which but little is known. Recent researches have disclosed the fact that there are many composers whose work, hitherto lost to sight, is worthy to take a place beside that of such well-known men as Tallis, Byrd, Morley, and Gibbons.

Of the numbers so far issued one of the most striking is Thomas Weelkes's very fine setting for six voices (S.S.A.T.B.B.) of Hosanna to the Son of David. Another remarkable work is Peter Philips's jubilant Motet The Lord ascendeth, for S.S.A.T.B. William Byrd is represented by a beautiful little Ave Verum, for four voices, with Latin and English text; a Motet for four voices, Then did priests make offering; a setting for five voices of the Compline Hymn, O Christ, Who art the Light and Day, in which the tune is placed in a different part in each verse; and a five-part setting of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis (S.A.A.T.B.). Other numbers are the Leroy Kyrie (Hear my prayer, O Lord), a Motet for four voices by John Taverner; O pray for the peace of Jerusalem, anthem for four voices (S.S.T.B.) by Thomas Tomkins; Thomas Tallis's Motet for four voices, I heard a voice from Heaven; and Orlando Gibbons's fine anthem for Ascension Day, O God the King of Glory (S.A.A.T.B.), with organ accompaniment.

Choir-trainers should make themselves acquainted with this series, always remembering, of course, that the music is for voices—all the above except the Gibbons work are for unaccompanied singing—and that no amount of mere playing over can give an adequate idea of the actual effect in performance.

Byrd's well-known canon Not unto us (Non nobis Domine) is now published by Novello in two arrangements on a single sheet—for A.T.B. and S.S.B.—and in both notations. From the same firm may be obtained S. Wesley's tuneful short anthem for men's voices (A.T.B.), Behold, how good and joyful, and a set of eight Quadruple Chants by various composers—Turle, Walmisley, and others—and including the well-known one in F by Oakeley.

H. Elliot Button's setting of the Office of the Holy Communion in C (Novello) is mainly for unison singing. Though very easy, the music is interesting and well-written, and admirably suited for use in places where the choir resources are limited or where a congregational setting is desired.

There is good stuff in John Pullen's setting of the Magnificat and Nunc Dimittis in E flat (Bayley & Ferguson). While not over-elaborate or lengthy, this musicianly work will commend itself to a good choir. There are one or two misprints in the organ part.

Off the beaten track is J. G. Bissley's anthem for general use, Content thyself with patience (Novello)— a tasteful setting of some words (spelling modernized) from a brass, dated 1572, in Beaconsfield Parish Church. Also worthy of notice is Lancelot G. Bark's anthem for evensong, Before the ending of the day (Bayley & Ferguson), which is melodiously and fluently written.

Those acquainted with Easy Plainsong Settings of the Holy Communion Service for Congregational Use (Mowbray), edited by E. G. P. Wyatt and W. H. Ferguson, will be interested to know that a book of organ accompaniments to these, under the same trustworthy editorship, may now be obtained from the publishers. The book contains eight settings of the Kyrie (three in nine-fold form), Merbecke's Credo with Francis Burgess's organ part, five settings of the Sanctus, five of the Agnus Dei, and three of the Gloria. The inexperienced accompanist will here find excellent models on which to base his own work.

Missa Fidelium, by Godfrey Scaats, is described as 'a plain Mass in English.' It is mostly in unison, and is intended to be sung in free rhythm as in ordinary plainchant. It should prove welcome in places where plainsong and other simple settings are used.

Interesting to Bach lovers should be the issue in Welsh by Novello of Bach's splendid Motet for five voices, Jesu, priceless Treasure (Jesu, meine Freude). Evidently Wales is expected to take its due share in the growing appreciation of Bach's great choral works.

G. G.

MALIPIERO'S QUARTET

When Strauss was last in London he confessed that the easiest path of the composer is that of the ultra-modern or futurist school. G. Francesco Malipiero's Rispetti e Strambotti, for string quartet, (Chester) fully bears out this assertion. In the old days quartet music meant that some degree of individual attention was given to each member of the party. The harmonic style was no less useful than the contrapuntal, but even harmonic progressions were presented in such a way as to give each part the utmost independence. All that has been changed. Now, apparently, when the composer fails to find something to say, when his mind goes on a journey or perchance sleepeth, he simply makes his instruments repeat the same bar over and over again. A Pedale justifies everything. In Malipiero's Quartet, for instance, after the first few bars, first and second violins and 'cello (at II.) have a pedale lasting fourteen bars; at v. first violin and 'cello rest from care for another dozen bars; at VII. the whole quartet repeats one phrase for eight bars; and after a cadenza-like passage for the first fiddle, viola and 'cello find another oasis with a pedale accompaniment repeated for sixteen bars; at VIII. the fiddles again try otium cum dignitate; but the ten bars at IX. (Lento, triste) leave all the players free from concern—barring the first fiddle—for a good long while. And other examples could be added to prove that repetitions abound. What is the meaning of this, we wonder. Does Malipiero believe that unless he repeats himself the audience might miss his point? If this is the case, his concern for the audience does him honour; but, as a matter of fact, his points are of the plainest. Perhaps he has some reason which the uninitiated may not fathom. Perhaps every time we hear a group of notes repeated we ought to think of something different—the immutability of fate, the tedium of a long railway journey, or red-tape. For the plain man, however, a repetition is a repetition for a' that. If we cannot pretend to read the mind of the composer, the mind of the listener is clear enough. It is at least singular that some of those who came to 'change a' that' should now adopt methods which cry out for another and more radical change:

Who would not laugh if such a man there be,
Who would not weep if Futurist were he?

B. V.

WORKS BY ARTHUR HONEGGER

A variety of things from the pen of this active and much-discussed composer is now available, and will enable the musical public at large to form its own opinion.

Even a cursory glance at the vocal score of the incidental music to Le Roi David, a 'dramatic Psalm' by René Morax, produced last year at the Théâtre du Jorat (Switzerland), will show that his mind works on broad, straightforward lines. The music consists of vocal and instrumental numbers, generally brief, some episodic, and serving a merely decorative purpose, others more developed and full of substance. The Evocation of the Witch of Endor, David's Dance before the Ark, and David's Death are among the finest (Foelisch Frères, Lausanne, publishers).

In the first Violin Sonata (Sénart) imagination and constructive ability are displayed. The tone is impressively dramatic. (It is to be presumed that the G clef in the pianoforte part, lines 2-5 of the third movement, is a misprint, and should be an F clef.) A clever Toccata et Variations for pianoforte (Mathôt), weird, not unimpressive songs, Six Poèmes extraits des 'Alcools' de G. Apollinaire (Mathôt), the early Trois Pièces for pianoforte (Mathôt), and Quatre Poèmes for voice and pianoforte (Chester), with the arrangement for pianoforte duet of the Pastorale d'Été (Sénart) complete the material for prosecution and defence.

M.-D. C.

WORKS BY A. TANSMAN AND OTHERS

Alexandre Tansman is a young composer whose music is no less rich in choice discords than Honegger's, but at first sight appears less straightforward and less purposeful. In his second Violin Sonata (Demets) he avoids flying in the face of custom. Indeed, the violin part consists largely of ripe, tuneful phrases, the pianoforte co-operating in not unfamiliar wise. The Petite Suite for pianoforte (ibid.) is not so cloying, and simple enough of its kind. But the two books of Pianoforte Preludes (ibid.) afford ample opportunity for investigators to show their capacity to discriminate between genuine effort towards expression and mere indulgence in the latest conventions. I should like to see more of the composer's music before deciding in his favour or against him.

With Malipiero's Omaggi, for pianoforte (Chester), dedicated to a parrot, an elephant, and an idiot respectively, things are far simpler. The question is, shall we grin with the composer or stonily stare while he grins at us? René Chausard's New York Pictures, for pianoforte (Demets) are unaffected, pleasing little trifles. Oreste Ravanello's pianoforte pieces, Impressioni, Trentine, Venezia, and Padova (Zanibon, Padua), are not very substantial. With Manuel de Falla's Cancion del Amor Dolido (Chester) we get a welcome foretaste of the new Ballet El Amor Brujo. Messrs. Chester have issued Malipiero's À Claude Debussy, which first appeared in the Homage to Debussy published by the Revue Musicale.

M.-D. C.

ELEMENTARY PIANOFORTE MUSIC

A set of Six Musical Illustrations for pianoforte, by Oscar Beringer (Augener) will, we think, be warmly approved by both teachers and pupils. They are attractive in style, and would provide excellent practice and recreation for young people of about the Lower Division (Associated Board) stage. The shortest and simplest of the set is No. 4, Boy Scouts passing; school-boys will enjoy this. No. 1, Good Morning, a graceful Serenade, gives opportunities for melody playing, light arpeggio work, and crossing left hand over right. No. 2, Poor Pussy, is an expressive lament. Arpeggios in easy positions passed from hand to hand with left crossing over right are the chief feature of the daintily-written Raindrops (No. 3). In No. 5, Sunday Morning, we meet with bell effects and an ancient chorale; the latter on its second appearance demands neat playing of chords in close position in both hands, alternating with wide leaps to octaves in opposite directions. The last of the set, Good-Night, a charming Nocturne, needs a hand capable of playing octaves and octave chords with ease. These six pieces, which are published in separate numbers, should prove welcome to teachers on the look-out for good educational music.

Two Dances by Edgar L. Bainton—1. Redowa, Bohemian Dance; 2. Strathspey—are capital examples of this composer's work. They are short, and, although not difficult, require a neat, crisp touch. Played at a good speed (Molto vivace and Allegro vivace) they should prove exhilarating little pieces. They are published separately by Augener.

Leonard Butler's Asterisks (Augener) comprise under one cover four pieces—Chanson Poétique, Capricciello, Valse Mignonne, and Berceuse. They are moderately easy, melodiously written, and the composer has obviously laid himself out to please. Much the same may be said of the same composer's Country Idylls (Augener). There are six of these issued in separate numbers, each filling two pages.

A work which will probably be appreciated by many young players issues from Augener under the title of Wagner Lyrics. There are two volumes containing between them twenty-one pieces, simply arranged and edited by A. Roloff. The books are excellently produced, and provide a well-varied selection of Wagner melodies ranging from Rienzi to Parsifal.

Two sets of Two Pieces in Contrasted Styles for small hands by Charles W. Pearce (Jamesons) may be recommended. Set 1 contains an Air varied (after J. Battishill, 1738-1801)—a charming little movement—and a Stately Dance (Tempo di Gavotta). Set 2 gives us a Courante (after J. Battishill) and a melody with variations, On a Cambridge Chime. These two useful books will be found specially valuable for developing independence between the two hands.

Ernest Austin is, or should be by now, widely known amongst pianoforte teachers as a composer of high aims whose music is not only attractive to the pupil but also definitely educational. Three albums of pieces for young pianists just issued by Larway contain some of his most attractive work. Ditties and Dances comprise twelve pieces in two books. Slightly more difficult are six numbers under one cover entitled Musical Verses. The third volume, Lyric Fancies, is a collection of twelve simple pieces which are apparently of less recent date than the other books. These albums might well follow the composer's popular Playtime Pieces.

Arthur Baynon's five sketches for pianoforte, A Shropshire Lad, after verses by Housman (Augener), make an attractive little Suite of pieces all quite simple, the longest running only to about thirty bars.

Little players will be delighted with A Child's Garden of Music, ten miniature tone-pictures by M. E. Marshall (Bosworth). Illustrations by I. Graeff appear at the head of each piece, to which is appended an apt quotation from R. L. Stevenson's A Child's Garden of Verse. G. G.

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

The H.M.V. records for this month are very strong on the instrumental side and weak on the vocal. First place must go to a splendid record of Till Eulenspiegel played by the Symphony Orchestra under Albert Coates. This is, I think, the first time the work has been recorded in full. The only other record known to me is a very much cut version issued by the Columbia Co. Here we have the whole of it, on two 12-in. d.-s. records. The reproduction is excellent, the wood-wind as usual scoring all along the line.

The 12-in. record of Heifetz playing the Valse from Tchaikovsky's Op. 48 is a topper—that is the word that comes at once to the tongue, and a good word, too, with the sanction of no less an authority than Samuel Johnson, who in one of his letters praises something as 'topping.' Heifetz is heard at his very best here, and the recording is a triumph.

An excellent chamber music record is a 12-in. d.-s. giving us the Beatrice Hewett Pianoforte Quartet in spirited performances of the Finale (Rondo alla zingarese) from Brahms's Op. 25, and the Finale from Dvorák's Op. 87. The balance is good and the details unusually clear.

The Enigma Variations records are now completed, so the gramophonist may sit at home at his ease and enjoy in full one of the finest orchestral works ever written. This is well, because after all we get far too few performances of the Variations at concerts. On the comparatively rare occasions of its performance you will generally find members of the audience asking one another, 'Why don't we hear this work more frequently?' There is no reply. The spare side left on the last Enigma record is filled by a pleasant little work by Elgar not well-known—the Fan Ballet—a trifle produced for a war charity performance in 1917, and apparently not performed since.

A 10-in. d.-s. pianoforte record of Lamond has on one side Rubinstein's Barcarolle, and on the other, the Finale from Beethoven's Sonata in F, Op. 10, No. 2. The Rubinstein is rather faded, like most of the composer's works, but the Beethoven wears uncommonly well. The record of it is not only very enjoyable; it could be used as a capital means of instruction. Lucky student of to-day to be able to call in a Lamond as teacher, and make him play your task over and over again, and at any pace you want!

A good record from the vocal side is that of Clarence Whitehill singing Amfortas's Prayer ('Mein Vater') from Parsifal, in German (12-in.). When such things are sung at the opera or in the concert room, we generally hear far too much of the orchestra; in this record we don't hear enough. In the case of an ordinary tum-tum accompaniment the less we hear the better, but in works of the kind under notice the actual musical interest is often in the orchestral background rather than in the voice part. In fact, background is the wrong word, seeing that the voice part can often be omitted with little or no loss. All the same, I fancy that for recording purposes the original full scoring is unsatisfactory. Even in a purely orchestral record we cannot count on hearing more than a proportion of the details, especially in regard to the lower brass and strings; when we have a vocal soloist—sometimes two—singing into the receiver the orchestra becomes a mere 'also ran.' Probably better results would be obtained with the orchestral part re-scored for a small combination—say a string quintet and a few solo wind instruments. Such a force would need no repression, it would not clog the voices, and it would be able to give us all the really important constituents of the original score.

A 10-in. record of John McCormack in A. M. Sanders's 'Little Town in the Ould County Down' is of small musical interest, and Mr. McCormack's emotion in this connection leaves us cold. Now that the Isle is free from the heel of the oppressor (as Mr. Dooley would say), perhaps Mr. McCormack and other exiles will flock back to her. On the other hand, perhaps not.

It needs a great deal more than Tetrizzini's singing of 'Ah! non giunge uman pensiero' from La Sonnambula to make such feeble stuff worth hearing. Moreover, the singing itself is displeasing until the showy part comes along. The low and middle notes are hard and poor in quality, so much so that a few dozen brilliant chirps at the end do not atone. The flute player who provides some antiphonal twiddles deserves such floral tributes as are on hand; he is far cleaner than the singer.

Two other examples of dead music figure on a 12-in. d.-s.—'Sainted Mother' from Maritana, and 'Quis est Homo' from Rossini's Stabat Mater, sung by Rosina Buckman and Edna Thornton. If one didn't know the items one would say that the operatic number was the more 'sacred' of the two. Perhaps the Rossini suffers from its unhappy likeness to our old friend 'Oh my darling Clementina.' But both are so futile that it is a pity to waste a couple of fine singers and a few hundredweight of costly material on making records of them.

Dr. A. Eaglefield Hull has just completed a course of popular lectures at Huddersfield on Musical Appreciation, culminating, on April 4, with the History of the Opera, to illustrate which a stage performance was given (in costume) of the love scene from Debussy's Pelléas et Mélisande and the final Act from Moussorgsky's Boris Godunov, together with excerpts from Madame Butterfly and The Beggar's Opera, the parts being presented by students of the College of Music and the Technical College. Mr. Arthur Broadbent was most successful as the Czar, and Mr. D. R. Oxley made a model Shuisky. Miss Doris Hall seemed eminently fitted for the interpretation of Debussy's elusive music.

London Concerts

ROYAL PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY: DELIUS'S REQUIEM

The Royal Philharmonic Society's last concert (March 23) was choral. The orchestra had the collaboration of Mr. Kennedy Scott's Philharmonic Choir in Frederick Delius's Requiem (new) and in the Ninth Symphony. Mr. Albert Coates conducted.

Mr. Delius's work, dedicated 'To the memory of all young artists who sacrificed their lives during the war,' had long been talked of, and was known by hearsay as 'A Pagan Requiem.' The epithet was dropped on March 23, but the programme announced:

'It is not a religious work. Its underlying belief is that of a pantheism that insists on the Reality of Life: It preaches that human life is like a day in the existence of the world, subject to the great laws of being.'

The text which set out to do all this (we say 'the text,' for surely not the most convinced programmatist would maintain that music can propound anything so dogmatic) was by an anonymous German, and a translation by Mr. Philip Heseltine was sung. This text, clumsy and inchoate as only German prose-poetry can be, unfortunately could only add to the restlessness of those whom the title 'Requiem' had struck as inappropriate. Some of the bitterness over this title was excessive, for Mr. Delius has numerous precedents in the use of the word in a non-liturgical sense. We think of Burns:

While all around the woodland rings,
And every bird thy requiem sings.

The text set off with a declaration in the vein of 'Vanity of vanities, all is vanity.' Weaklings soothe themselves with lying hopes. The strong recognise the finality of death. The second movement (À la grande amoureuse) was an equivocal love-song—perhaps the dying man's eulogy of his mistress, Death—'She gave to many and yet was chaste as a flower,' sang the baritone-lover. The third movement celebrated death as peace for the weary and out-worn—a winter sleep which, though the individual as such has utterly perished, has its awakening in the unfailling springtime and the innumerable generations to come.

It is strange that though such a philosophy may be true as true, it does not do as a mainspring of art. If we are to have art at all we must allow it, as its necessary atmosphere, the possible illusion that there is some scheme in things, that there is some sense in human activity, that this blessed life gets somewhere beyond the mere providing of a suitable soil for next year's daisies. The arts simply cannot breathe in the pure atmosphere of disillusioned thought, and music when yoked with this philosophical negation blandly contradicts its partner. We had an example when Mr. Granville Bantock set a choir to sing strenuously for an hour, unaccompanied, texts from the grim old scepticism of Ecclesiastes. We had another in this Requiem, for after the composer had done his appointed task and the singers had had their say, the music broke forth for a final page and a half into strains of mystic jubilation.

Music, even that of the sophisticated Bantock and Delius, is far too unsophisticated to be able to join in the denial of life's value so gloated over by their chosen texts. The energy demanded by the musical execution of such works is in itself a mystical affirmation.

'It preaches that human life is' so and so; yes, it preached, and that was a good deal of the offence. The sacrifice in the war of the lives of young artists (and of young butcher-boys too, for that matter) seemed a theme for more humility. Who are we, their survivors and their beneficiaries, to 'preach' so dogmatically about the motives and the end of their being? Without any special confessional bias, we like better the humility of another text: Requiem æternam dona eis, Domine.

Mr. Delius's music lasted for just half an hour. It was a very little while when we had to be persuaded of so much. Now and then there was a patch of good Delius, and we all know how fascinating that can be, seeing the composer's ultimate mastery in the shifting play of chromatic harmonies, charming as day-dreams. But there was nothing in this music, not any striking invention or consecutive argument, to claim the attention. The text bitten off was altogether more than it could, in fact, chew. The vocal writing was very instrumental. The soloists, Miss Amy Evans and Mr. Norman Williams, were, like the chorus, dutiful.

A performance of the Ninth Symphony remains to-day what Handel Festivals in the past were—a rite of pomp and circumstance, rarely enough celebrated and not to be missed, like a royal wedding, which we see if possible as we may not have the opportunity for seeing another. Mr. Coates laboured like a Titan. In the present phase of his conducting music is not to be beguiled out of the machine. It has to be wrestled for, and often with an almost intolerable sense of strain. The soloists were Miss Amy Evans, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Arthur Jordan, and Mr. Herbert Heyner, and the capital choir sang as well as need be. Prof. Donald Tovey has the enviable happiness to admire this Finale, and to be probably right when he admires anything.

C.

THE BACH CHOIR

The Bach Choir had paid its due to Bach earlier in the winter, so on April 7 at Queen's Hall it reposed on Dvorák's Stabat Mater, with a preface (short works of Byrd, Charles Burke, and Holst). We liked the preface best. Dr. R. Vaughan Williams conducted.

The concert again in some quarters drew some trite references to 'Northern choirs.' This is to ignore the nature and state of the Bach Choir, which admittedly does not do exactly what a 'Northern choir' does; but do all Northern choirs cover the Bach Choir's ground? The six-part Motet of Byrd, Christ is risen, from the 1589 book, justified the concert: only it left us wanting more from that source. Charles Burke's St. Patrick's Prayer, for chorus and orchestra, had previously been sung only in private, at Morley College, by the composer's fellow-students. Burke was a London Irishman who was fifty-nine when he gave himself to music. He then studied under Holst at Morley College for the last fifteen years of his life. The interesting singularity of his career is not necessary to the recommendation of this short Fantasia on Irish hymn tunes, which can well stand on its own simple merit. The tunes are those made known by the English Hymnal as 'St. Patrick' and 'Deirdre.' There are a fairly long instrumental opening and an interlude between the statements of the two tunes. These tunes in themselves are the makings of the work, and the composer has done nothing to torment them.

After Holst's pupil, Holst himself—with one of the earlier works of his maturity, the first group of three Choral Hymns from the Rig Veda, Op. 26 (1911). Now that everyone knows The Hymn of Jesus and The Planets, these fine Hymns ought to win more ground. The first, To Indra, with its 5-4, unrelenting beat and harmonies of the smithy, belongs to the Holst of Mars. The second is To the Unknown God, partly unaccompanied, partly moving over a ground bass which in its first key descends thus: E, D, C, B, A sharp, G sharp, F, E. The third, a Funeral Hymn in 7-4 measure, is not a conventional dirge, but an utterance of strong piety, closing (and here Holst's harmonies, too, have all the strength of piety) on the words, 'Go forth, go forth, go tread the path on which our fathers trod, that leads unto their fellowship with God!'

The Bach Choir was so certainly singing the Stabat Mater to its pleasure that we ought not to be so ungracious as to mention that something (a fading of the music's own charm? an uncommunicated secret kept amongst the choir?) made us restive, and this despite the excision of certain numbers.

C.

THE GLASGOW ORPHEUS CHOIR

This famous choir gave a couple of concerts at Queen's Hall on April 8. I should like to join in the chorus of rapture with which my critical brethren have since been making the welkin ring, but, frankly, the afternoon concert left me disappointed. Perhaps my seat was too near the choir. Maybe I succumbed rather too easily to the irritation caused by Mr. Robertson's habit of giving encores before they are demanded; of twiddling on the pianoforte in an amateurish manner before each song, instead of giving the choir a plain chord; and of making short speeches whenever possible. After all, a well-designed programme should have a structural value worth respecting. Why print a scheme in which (presumably) contrast and balance have been carefully considered, and then destroy these qualities by sticking in encores every few minutes? We had got no farther than the second item when, after no remarkable outburst of applause, Mr. Robertson began to throw his extras at us. I left after two hours of medley, and he was still at it. The choir is a good one, though I heard more impure chording and out-of-tuneness (especially at the start) than we get from real first-raters. But I should like to hear the singers in a programme of the quality of the best items sung on this occasion—the Death Croon of Bantock (beautifully sung) and the Elgar, Benet, and Balfour Gardiner pieces. Most of the arrangements of Scots songs were poor. So far as vocal arrangements go, the national music of Scotland badly needs the treatment English and Irish song has had at the hands of Vaughan Williams, Holst, Stanford, Charles Wood, and Herbert Hughes. In fact, the Orpheus repertory needs screwing up a good bit so far as the quality of the music is concerned. The fact that the conductor can write so enthusiastic a programme-note on the obvious and theatrical Dead in the Sierras of Coleridge-Taylor is significant. By the way, the ending of Cargoes had the point knocked off by the final 'Dirty British coaster' phrase being sung not molto allegro, as directed, but molto moderato. All that can be said for this novel bit of interpretation is that it turns a difficult passage into an easy one. It is to be hoped that the visits of the choir will become annual. Mr. Robertson is right when he speaks of the value of such visits, but he is, I think, mistaken when he implies that English critics have any objection to the programmes being made up largely of Scottish national airs. On the contrary, we can do with any amount of these fine tunes, but we want them unspoiled by sentimental arranging and harmonization, and in their performance we object to their rhythmic impulse being destroyed in order that a point may be made for the gallery. I should add that nothing in the concert was more enjoyable than a group of three songs of the Hebrides, sung by Miss Boyd Steven with a simplicity and a touch of 'pawkiness' that made them irresistible. H. G.

THE LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The work with which Mr. Albert Coates made his re-entry into London music (at Queen's Hall, on March 20) was unfortunately one of the kind that we can easily do without. It was very unselfish of Mr. Coates to put his duty to himself as a conductor second to the claims of young Italy, and to give us Respighi's Ballad of the Gnomes, but the object was unworthy of the sacrifice. The 'story' of the Ballad (a poem by somebody) is repulsive, and, in its English translation, scarcely intelligible. The music is all effects, and the sum total of them (as often happens) is dullness. Was it by ironic design that Till Eulenspiegel followed? That masterpiece of the 'queer story' in music was the best possible commentary on the Ballad. Next came a hurried excerpt from the Firebird of Stravinsky, and lastly the C minor Symphony. Mr. Holbrooke's Bronwen Overture was not played, for want of score and parts.

M.

HARRIET COHEN

On March 20 Miss Harriet Cohen gave a pianoforte recital, the programme of which ranged from Bach to Bax. The principal work played was Bax's Pianoforte Sonata, which has been considerably revised since its composition. Miss Cohen played it again at the end of the programme, and a good many people stayed to hear. Unfortunately the critics of the morning papers who would have profited most by the repetition were unable to make use of the privilege owing to the exigencies of Fleet Street. The Sonata is a difficult work to play and not easy to grasp at one hearing, but the strength and dignity of the final Coda make an instant impression, and the melodic beauty of some of the tenderer passages has an equally direct appeal. That Miss Cohen would play with sympathy and finished technique was a foregone conclusion, but many listeners must have been surprised at the way in which she has developed in depth and breadth of style. She also played three little pieces of Goossens's—it is hard to imagine them better played—and she was heard in the pianoforte part of Bach's Brandenburg Concerto in D, accompanied by the small orchestra of Mr. Goossens. The interpretation was highly artistic, but now and again the pianoforte part was somewhat too obtrusive.

A. K.

ELENA GERHARDT

Miss Elena Gerhardt gave two recitals, the first on March 21 and the second on March 30. The first had a miscellaneous programme and the second was entirely devoted to Schubert. I can speak only of the first. Miss Gerhardt had not been heard since before the war. In the interval her style has undergone a complete change. She is no longer so lavish of her great gifts, or carries her audience away by the sheer enthusiasm of her singing, but we have instead a more deliberate and mature art, in which effects are carefully graduated and the interpretations are controlled by a subtle and sure instinct for artistic fitness. In one or two numbers we missed the inspiration which the accompaniment of Arthur Nikisch always gave her, and this is said without any disrespect to Miss Paula Hegner, whose playing was indeed of uncommon excellence and a model of sympathy. During the earlier half of the programme Miss Gerhardt seemed, not unnaturally, a little nervous, but the quiet dignity of her singing of Beethoven's Creation's Hymn was impressive, although she could not quite reconcile us to hearing Adelaide sung by a woman. She was at her best in the Brahms group which finished the programme. The change in her style was most noticeable in Von Ewig'er Liebe, which was much more deliberate than it used to be and not so dramatic, but beautifully sung all the same. Her greatest achievement was In stiller Nacht, which was a masterpiece of sustained singing. The enthusiasm of the audience was unbounded.

A. K.

ANTHONY BERNARD'S ORCHESTRA

Several recitals have had the advantage of accompaniments and interludes by Mr. Anthony Bernard and the London Chamber Orchestra, and this is an innovation we cannot too much prize. At a concert of a single singer in particular the playing of these excellent musicians can give the happiest relief; for, short as such concerts usually are, there are not many singers who can throughout keep up unflinching attention, and the intervention of another soloist—a pianist or another—is apt to snap the chain of interest.

At one of these concerts (Æolian Hall, March 22) Mr. Bernard conducted his own arranged accompaniments of some old English songs, and also had the privilege of introducing to many of us a work, still in manuscript, of Gustav Holst—St. Paul's Suite, for strings. This work, in three movements, is one of the most perfect in the great musician's lesser essays, and publication, which should not be much delayed, will certainly carry it wherever there are string players eager for vital music. The movements are a jig, a slow movement which is expressive and clean (and when a composer can be said to achieve absolute cleanliness in a slow movement, is not nearly everything said for him?), and a most invigorating Finale in which the old Dargason dance tune is worked contrapuntally with Greensleeves. This Suite was again played at the Hampstead meeting of the British Music Society on April 4.

Mr. Bernard's Orchestra contributed to the programme of Miss Agnes Johns, pianist (April 5), a newly-transcribed work of the elder Scarlatti, and at Mr. Roland Hayes's song recital later in the same day a Suite of dances and Act-tunes from Purcell, delightful in themselves and delightful in the well-pointed execution.

C.

GERRARD WILLIAMS

Mr. Gerrard Williams gave a concert of his own compositions at Æolian Hall on March 27. He impressed those most likely to have a sound judgment in such matters by his obvious sincerity, his originality free from eccentricity and mannerism, and the modesty which restrains him from attempting to write in the larger forms before he is a complete master of the smaller. His best-known work is his Pot-pourri, which when played in the orchestral version was universally praised for its charm and refinement. The principal item in the programme was his second String Quartet, a pleasant work, with a genial outlook, genuinely inspired by the English folk-song idiom. Some of the songs (sung by Miss Phyllis Carey Foster and Mr. Osmond Davis) pleased so much that they had to be repeated. They have a good sense of atmosphere, and are far more singable than much modern vocal music.

A. K.

BÉLA BARTÓK

The programme of the concert given by Béla Bartók at Æolian Hall comprised a variety of his works, early and recent, among which the new Sonata for violin and pianoforte and a set of eight Improvisations on Hungarian Peasant Tunes, proved particularly interesting for the reason that they illustrated the latest stage of the composer's creative evolution. Bartók's method of dealing with folk-tunes has always been remarkably spirited and original. The Improvisations are practically the only work of his in which he does more than provide an effective but simple setting for tunes of this order. In the Sonata we have a work of ample proportions, whose architecture and substance are equally impressive—so impressive, indeed, that many people who frankly confessed that they did not understand much of it were yet able to speak of it in appreciative terms. For those of us who had previously heard it (at the concert given a few days earlier at the house of the Hungarian Chargé d'Affaires), it is comparatively easier to describe the Sonata; to point out, for instance, that whilst following no traditional tonal scheme, the first movement is in regular sonata form, the working-out of the two main motives being close and full of interest. The second (slow) movement, in ternary form, is particularly beautiful and melodic. The Finale, whose form is approximately that of a Rondo, brings back the atmosphere of energy and bustle which characterises the first movement. But this very inadequate description leaves untouched the essential features of the Sonata, its vitality and eloquence, its fine balance and masterful conduct. Miss Jelly d'Aranyi played the violin part splendidly, and the composer, in this work, in his other pianoforte pieces, and in various pieces by Zoltán Kodály, was equally excellent. Their success was shared by Miss Grace Crawford, who sang Hungarian Folk-tunes with accompaniments by Bartók.

M.-D. C.

OLD MUSIC

If the enthusiasts for old-time music persevere long enough the public will discover that well-chosen programmes from the 16th and 17th centuries give the most reliable promise of enjoyment. Many were drawn to such concerts as those given by Miss Dorothy Silk, Mrs. Gordon Woodhouse, and Mr. Gerald Cooper (at Æolian Hall on March 21, for example) by the air of respectability conveyed in the words 'old music,' and by the notion that the hall-mark of good taste nowadays is to be susceptible to the quaint, old-fashioned, even primitive charm of these soothing strains. They are learning, however, that there is no need for these patronising adjectives. No musically-inclined person could hear Mrs. Woodhouse play the B flat Bach Partita, or Miss Silk sing Purcell's Evening Hymn, without feeling that the music is as alive and full-blooded as most of the modern romantic stuff that audiences are brought up on. Luckily this form of propaganda is in the hands of the right people, who choose their programmes discriminately and perform them to perfection. Mr. Gerald Cooper is himself responsible for a series of old-music recitals, the second of which took place at Æolian Hall on March 29, his helpers being Miss Dorothy Helmrich (vocalist) and Mr. Godfrey Ludlow (violin). Miss Agnes Johns joined in the movement on March 5 (at Wigmore Hall), when she sang 'Ayres for the Theatre,' by Purcell.

M.

THE LAST CHELSEA 'POP.'

At Chelsea Town Hall on April 12, the Philharmonic String Quartet brought to an end a season of 'Popular' chamber concerts, during which they gave about twenty British works. The composers honoured on this occasion were Mr. Josef Holbrooke, who joined three of the string players as pianist in his Quartet in G minor; and Mr. Arnold Bax, whose Irish Elegy called in the services of Miss Gwendolen Mason as harpist and Mr. Leon Goossens with the cor anglais. This work made a worthy climax to the British series. It shows to a high degree the composer's faculty of detaching himself from current moods and conventions and devices without resorting to trickery or far-fetched means. His music says out-of-the-way things with many subtle inflections and tones of voice, and it makes one unified story or picture with nothing irrelevant, however elaborate the detail. This balance and clear purpose were welcome after the music of Mr. Holbrooke, which, for all its protesting, had left a feeling of argument unachieved. Beethoven's Serenade Trio for flute, (Mr. Albert Fransella), violin, and viola followed, and the programme concluded with Mr. Ravel's Introduction and Allegro for harp, flute, clarinet (Mr. Charles Draper), and string quartet.

M.

AMATEUR SOCIETIES

Barclay's Bank Musical Society gave its concert at Queen's Hall on April 5. Both orchestra and choir were able to please the most critical. The best things done were the brisk performance of Berlioz's Carnaval Romain Overture, under Mr. H. J. Rouse, and the choir's singing of Elgar's Reveille under Mr. Herbert Pierce.

On the same evening the Royal Amateur Orchestral Society was at Kingsway Hall, and gave its first concert after eight years' silence. Mr. Arthur Payne was at his old post as conductor.

The Strolling Players helped to raise our opinion of amateur standards at Queen's Hall, on April 6, by playing Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony with a good imitation of professional ease and responsiveness. The same programme included Sir Landon Ronald's Garden of Allah Suite, with the composer conducting.

A Haydn Symphony (No. 12, in B flat), Dvorák's Symphonic Variations, and Beethoven's Violin Concerto, made a stiff programme for the Westminster Orchestral Society at Kensington Town Hall on April 11. The violinist was Miss Lena Kontorovitch, and Mr. Edric Cundell conducted.

M.

CHORAL CONCERTS

As a part of the St. Anne's, Soho, Bach Jubilee Festival the Novello Choir gave an hour of music at the Church on March 25. The programme contained Jesu, Priceless Treasure (sung not quite so well as the Choir has been heard to sing it), Parry's There is an Old Belief, Whyte's O Praise God in His Holiness, and Holst's Lullay, my liking and This have I done for thee. The Parry and Holst items were admirably sung, especially the second of the Holst works. Mr. Thomas Fussell played a delightful Violin Sonata by Joseph Gibbs (1699-1788), and Mr. Roland Jackson sang solos. Mr. Harold Brooke conducted. The choir announces a fine programme for its concert at Bishopsgate Institute on May 9—works by Holst, Bantock, Parry, Elgar, Geoffrey Shaw, Balfour Gardiner, Vaughan Williams, &c. Anne Thursfield will sing old English songs, and songs by modern British composers.

We could feel that the London Choral Society had completely taken up its old function when, on April 11, it performed The Apostles at Queen's Hall. It is a good thing for London that it possesses a choir so determined to follow the narrow path to the rescue of neglected master-works. Except for the performance given farther North by Mr. Allen Gill and his choir, London seemed content to forget the existence of this wonderful oratorio—one of the works of all time—while provincial societies constantly keep it in mind, and performance. Mr. Arthur Fagge's singers still have to acquire the technique and experience for an intimate interpretation of such difficult and subtly-written music, but the experiment of public performance will strengthen them in their further study of it. The principal parts were sung by Miss Carrie Tubb, Miss Phyllis Lett, Mr. Sidney Pointer, Mr. Walter Saull, Mr. Norman Allin, and Mr. Howard Fry.

No new sensations arose out of the choral singing at the Royal Albert Hall, on April 1, when The Dream of Gerontius was performed, or on Good Friday, when The Messiah was given according to custom. The phenomenon in each case was that of a tenor soloist of magnetic personality claiming the chief share of the audience's attention and favour—Mr. John Coates on the one occasion, and Mr. Frank Mullings on the other. Moreover, as The Messiah drew to an end, interest was more and more concentrated upon Sir Frederick Bridge, whose retirement was to date from the end of the Amen chorus. But that is a matter beyond the scope of a concert record.

One of the best choral performances of the year occurred on March 25, when Verdi's Requiem was given by the Crystal Palace Choral and Orchestral Society under Mr. W. W. Hedgcock. The singing was all very much alive. A week previously the Dulwich Philharmonic Society, in the same hall, had given a good account of The Redemption, Mr. Martin Kingslake conducting.

The Langham Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Hugh Marleyn, gave the complete Song of Hiawatha at Queen's Hall on March 28. The performance was highly creditable considering the abnormal disadvantage suffered by the choir from shortage of male singers.

The Westminster Choral Society opened its programme at Queen's Hall, on April 4, with Bach's Sleepers, awake, Stanford's Songs of the Sea followed, with Mr. Herbert Heyner as soloist, and lastly Hubert Bath's Legend of Nerbudda. Mr. Vincent Thomas conducted.

M.

Among other doings of choral societies in or near London credit is due to the Highgate Choral Society for giving Brahms's Requiem on April 3, under Mr. F. Cunningham Woods; and to the Battersea and Wandsworth Evening Institutes' Choral Union for its performance of A Tale of Old Japan, under Mr. C. Ritson Smith, on March 24.

ODDS AND ENDS

We are uncertain to which of the above species Mr. John Coates belongs, but know, without having been to it, that his recital at Chelsea Town Hall on April 4 was excellent. It treated of Love, in English and French. Of other vocalists worthy of mention, the month brought in Mr. Roland Hayes, the lyrical tenor of the day, and Mr. Riddell Hunter, a true artist in interpretation.

Among players of instruments Elman and Lamond have led the way. Miss Jessie Hall, unknown before her pianoforte recital on March 31, gave the most intelligent performance of the Appassionata that has been heard in London for some time. She is quite a 'find,' and should come well to the front if she keeps her head always as clear, musically, as it was on this occasion. Another discovery was the veteran M. César Thompson. The mastery of style in his violin playing was astonishing for an artist of his years.

In chamber music, besides the Chelsea 'Pops,' and the Lener Quartet, we have heard the MacCullagh Quartet from Liverpool, and can affirm that its provincial reputation is well-founded. The Wood-Smith Quartet has also made its first appearance; and the Kruse Quartet has carried on.

No violoncellist has been prominent on the recital platform, but Madame Suggia was the focus of interest at the Queen's Hall Symphony Concert of March 25, when she played Schumann's Concerto.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY

Sir Frederick Bridge said good-bye to the Royal Choral Society on Good Friday when, after the usual performance of The Messiah, he laid down the baton for the last time to a rolling volley of cheers. He has held office for just over a quarter-of-a-century, having succeeded Barnby in 1896. It is a long innings, and few men could have carried it through so successfully on the personal side as Sir Frederick has done. It would have been easy to haul down the flag during the war, but Sir Frederick and his choir kept it flying to such a tune that the difficult post-war period finds the old Society stronger than ever.

THE NEW CONDUCTOR

Mr. H. L. Balfour has been appointed to the vacant post, and takes up the work with hearty good will from choir and public. His association with the Society goes back even farther than Sir Frederick's, for he was appointed organist in 1895. He has long acted as deputy chorus-master and conductor. His successor at the organ has not yet been announced.

The invitation issued to British composers by Colonel Somerville for original or transcribed military band music, has met with a smaller response than last year. Sixteen works were submitted, and only two have been approved by the adjudicators. These are a Scherzo by H. A. Keyser and Alla Marcia by T. Verney.

Opera in London

THE BOATSWAIN'S MATE AT THE 'OLD VIC.'

It was a satisfying experience to witness the performance of Dame Ethel Smyth's opera The Boatswain's Mate at the 'Old Vic.' on March 30. The worth of the work I fully appreciate, and my own conviction is that it will live very much longer than anything else this clever woman has—as yet—accomplished. The fact is that opera with a story that everyone can appreciate gets very much nearer the mark than something set to a highfalutin fable with which we have nothing in common. But here is something at our very doors and that introduces characters we all know. And in the Waterloo Bridge Road they were very much at home. There was the fullest appreciation of the Cockney bean-feasters and of their ditty that reproduces all the well-loved cadences—save one, a diminished second on the penultimate note of the cadence—and when the Policeman made his entry there was a hum of delight. Yet I think it was something more than the story that won the piece its enthusiastic reception. This audience, of any audience in London, does appreciate opera, and for the simple reason that it has been made familiar with all examples of the form. The operatic 'course' at the 'Old Vic.' has ranged from Balfe's Bohemian Girl to Wagner's Tristan and Isolde, and back again. Consequently the audience could appreciate the cleverness of Dame Smyth's work. In its new form—that is, a reduced orchestration which is in every way a gain—it makes a very strong appeal.

The performance, too, was good indeed. So far we had always seen pretty nearly the same people in it. The 'Old Vic.' Company showed us that people of a very different calibre could be equally effective. Miss Muriel Gough as Mrs. Travers was not the prima donna masquerading, but a woman of the people and a human being. But she must not carry her actuality too far, or we shall not hear one single word; as it was we heard very few. Mr. Robert Curtis made a delightfully old-fashioned figure of The Bosun, and I liked Mr. Sumner Austin's Travers. The composer conducted, and conducted well—in fact far better than in the concert-room. But then there is so much of the real Ethel Smyth in the music. We can do with more of it; there are more stories by W. W. Jacobs for the making of Cockney idylls, and we have so few really British operas.

F. E. B.

DANCERS AT COVENT GARDEN

A new supplement to a film display was provided when at the beginning of April, M. Massine and Mlle. Lopokova, with other former members of the Russian Ballet, made their appearance after the 'pictures' of the day had been shown at Covent Garden. They offer a display of dancing without the gorgeous concomitants we associate with Russian Ballet. But then M. Massine, the guiding spirit, is not a Russian and never was one, and several of his Company are Londoners born and bred, e.g., Mlle. Ninette de Valois knows where St. Paul's Cathedral is, and has for some seasons danced at the Royal Opera. And so on. The fact is, this is purely a dancing show, and a very good one into the bargain. The first programme contained an outstanding number in the illustration of some of the old Strauss (not Richard) dances. Then M. Massine and Mlle. Lopokova depicted for us Stravinsky's Ragtime. The crude wooden gestures, graceless movements, and general ineptitude fitted the music exactly—for this is a serious composition and not a joke, though after M. Massine's investment it will occupy its proper place and never again be taken seriously. The programme has been varied each week, but for the second week at least Ragtime was retained, the frantic gesticulations of both M. Stravinsky and M. Diaghilev (by wire) from Paris being unavailing to stop the production, and giving to it just the needed first-class 'puff.' The dancers were well served musically, with Mr. Eugène Goossens in command, as he is also of the accompanying matter for the films, which accounts for the fact that we do not hear Schubert's Unfinished Symphony while the hero is being eaten by the lions or thrown over the cliff in a live motor-car.

F. E. B.

DINNER TO SIR LANDON RONALD

Sir Landon Ronald was entertained at a dinner, given by the Music Club—in celebration of his being knighted—at the Hyde Park Hotel on April 3.

Lord Burnham was in the chair, and the company numbered nearly two hundred. Among those present were, besides a distinguished company which included Lord and Lady Stuart of Wortley, Gen. Sir F. and Lady Maurice, Sir Frederick Newnes, Bart., and Mr. Henry Russell, representatives of all the numerous interests with which Sir Landon Ronald is connected. Sir Hugh Allen was unfortunately prevented by illness from being present, but the Royal College of Music was represented by Mr. Claude Aveling. The Corporation of the City of London was represented by Mr. Pakeman, who was Chairman of the Music Committee of the Corporation when Sir Landon Ronald was appointed principal of the Guildhall School of Music, and Sir Francis Green, Bart. (who is the present chairman), Alderman Batho, and Mr. Sheriff Mills Mackay. The Guildhall School of Music was represented by Mr. and Mrs. Saxe Wyndham and Mr. Orlando Morgan. The Albert Hall Orchestra was represented by Mr. Stephenson Kent, the Albert Hall by Mr. Hilton Carter, the Royal Philharmonic Society by Mr. J. M. Leven, the London Symphony Orchestra by Mr. W. H. Reed, the British Music Society by Mrs. Balkwill, and the Federation of Music Industries by Mr. Alexander Dow. Mr. Enoch was unfortunately prevented from being present, but was represented by several members of his family and Mr. Broadhurst. Among the musicians who were present were Mrs. Norman O'Neill, Mrs. Carl Rosa, Mr. Herbert Walenn, Mr. Arthur Hinton and Mrs. Hinton (Miss Katharine Goodson), Mr. Victor Beigel, Mr. Waddington Cook and Mrs. Waddington Cook (Madame Medora Henson), Mr. Arnold Bax, Miss Knocker, Madame Saltini-Mochi, and Miss Harriet Cohen. There was a short programme of music in which Mr. Lionel Tertis, Mr. Fraser Gange, and Miss Amy Evans took part, with Mr. Harold Craxton at the pianoforte.

In proposing the toast of the evening, Viscount Burnham pointed out that the time when musicians were banished to the backstairs of palaces was past, and they were now receiving their due meed of honour; still, the only art which received full recognition was that of politics—if it was an art. One of his earliest recollections was a meeting at his grandfather's house with a musician of kindly presence and dundreary whiskers—Mr. Henry Russell, Sir Landon's father, author of Cheer, Boys, Cheer and A Life on the Ocean Wave, two songs of virile inspiration which have had not a little influence on the history of the nation. After briefly reviewing the many phases of Landon Ronald's varied career, the speaker said it was no exaggeration to state that there was no great orchestra in Europe which had not been under the baton of Sir Landon, and he especially emphasised the fact that he had introduced several of the works of Sir Edward Elgar to the Continent. He alluded to his position as Chairman of the Association of Conductors, to his work for the Albert Hall Concerts, and for the Promenade Concerts at Birmingham, which had marked an important stage in the development of musical taste in the Midlands. Referring to his work at the Guildhall School of Music during the last eleven years, he said that his principal achievements had been the division of the students into professional and non-professional, the creation of a thorough curriculum for the former, and the institution of the Club, whereby the staff, which was previously a body without cohesion, had developed an admirable esprit de corps; besides which his position in the world of music enabled him to persuade most of the eminent artists of the day to perform to the students. His greatest claim to esteem and affection was the consistently lofty aims which had inspired him in the service of his art. Their guest's life had had incalculable significance for the increase of other people's happiness and the decrease of their sorrows.

Sir Frederick Bridge followed, taking the place of Sir Edward Elgar, who was prevented by illness from travelling to London. He reminded his hearers of the fact that he had been Sir Landon Ronald's first teacher of Theory at the Royal College of Music, and he added, amid laughter, that if he could not boast that he had done him much good, he was glad to say he had not done him much harm. Sir Landon Ronald was, what he liked to see—a good all round man, and he also referred to the fact that Sir Landon had been invited to assist the Royal College of Music at its concerts next season in succession to himself.

In replying, Sir Landon Ronald spoke with great feeling of the debt of gratitude he and his family owed to Lord and Lady Burnham, and the late Lord Burnham. He paid a tribute to the services of the Music Club in arranging a function of this kind. He thanked Lord Burnham for the way in which he had spoken of his efforts in various directions, and expressed his gratitude to the representatives of the various musical institutions with which he had been connected for their presence. He prophesied that among the composers at present living, two would go down to all time as the greatest of our epoch, Sir Edward Elgar and Richard Strauss, and he was proud to number both of them among his personal friends.

Sir Ernest Wild proposed the health of the Chairman, and in reply Lord Burnham congratulated him on his appointment to the office of Recorder of London. Mr. A. Kalisch proposed the health of the guests, to which Mr. Pett Ridge replied with a humorous speech in which he especially eulogised the shrinking modesty of musicians who refuse to be interviewed and scarcely dare to face the camera.

A. K.

Mr. Philip L. Agnew has been elected chairman of the committee of management at the Royal Academy of Music, in the place of the late Sir Edward Cooper.

Church and Organ Music

QUALITY IN HYMN TUNES: LECTURE BY MR. H. C. COLLES

Discussion on this subject too often consists of more or less violent exposition of personal tastes, wholesale condemnation of composers in groups, the setting up of other groups in their places, and similar uncritical methods. Mr. Colles, in his recent King's College (London) lecture, was above all practical, backing up his arguments with illustrations from familiar sources. The value of the lecture lay chiefly in his informal discussion of the various points, with liberal use of the keyboard. It is a pity that this, the most practical and convincing portion, cannot be reported. But even a quarter of a loaf is not to be despised, so we are glad to be able to give the following résumé, from Mr. Colles's notes. He began by pointing out that the most important event in English music during the last century—the event, that is, which had the most far-reaching effect on the taste of the community at large—was the publication in 1862 of the first edition of Hymns Ancient and Modern. After giving an account of its inception, Mr. Colles went on to say that the position of authority gained by the book showed the popular need of such a work. Without the help of any Act of Uniformity it gained an authority almost equal to that of the Book of Common Prayer itself. It contained, however, one fatal flaw, which had disastrous results—a flaw which must be laid to the charge of the worthy King's College Professor, W. H. Monk—it served to standardise a debased form of tune. Mr. Colles hastened to add that it contained many fine tunes, and still more which, taken by themselves, were innocuous; but their cumulative effect was bad for two reasons. First, they reduced rhythm to a minimum; second, they set a premium on four-part vocal harmony. Wesley's 'Aurelia' may be regarded as the normal type. Its metre was the same as that of 'O Sacred Head' (A. & M. 111), but the pace of German hymnody, being much slower than the Anglican, made all the difference. Typical examples in this metre were Gauntlett's 'St. Alphege' (A. & M. 350), Ewing's 'Jerusalem the Golden' (A. & M. 228), and Steggall's 'St. Kenelm' (A. & M. 562). Metre, however, was not the important factor. The point was that these syllabic tunes, with cadences or half-cadences at the end of each line, taken at a pace of about $\text{♩} = 70$, limited the possibilities of musical character to practically two features—the melodic curve and the harmony. With luck a composer might do something with it, but that the result was largely a matter of luck was shown by the fact that Ewing in 'Jerusalem the Golden' succeeds, while Parry's tune for the same hymn fails (Church Hymns, 561).

The hymn tune had not always been stereotyped; we might say that it had never been so until the advent of Hymns A. & M. The writer of the 'Grove' article on the subject gloried in this stereotyping, quoting as an example of Nonconformist 'impropriety' a tune which seemed to Mr. Colles infinitely preferable as a type:

Ex. 1.

Here Mr. Colles quoted a dictum of Garwood's: 'Hymn tunes are bad because they have no diddle-diddle-dums.'

FREEDOM OF RHYTHM

In vocal music freedom of rhythm—i.e., independence of the metre of the text—was a first essential. This principle had been realised in Church music throughout the ages, from plainsong onwards. As an illustration of the gradual loss of this freedom, Mr. Colles discussed five settings of 'Come, Holy Ghost, our souls inspire'—a good choice, seeing that it is the only metrical hymn included in the Prayer Book. In the plainsong setting as given in the English Hymnal (No. 154) the ligatures or neumes (notes bound together by being sung to a single syllable) imparted just that musical freedom:

Ex. 2.

In the modernised (Mechlin) version of the same melody given as an alternative in the English Hymnal and set as the first tune to the hymn in A. & M. (157):

Ex. 3.

the rhythm was simplified, being almost in regular 3-4 time. The tune remained a fine one, though some of the spontaneous feeling of the original had gone with the irregular rhythm.

Tallis's tune for the same hymn (E. H. 153) obtained freedom by a wholly different method:

Ex. 4.

Here the grouping of several notes to a syllable was done with the object of increasing the range of the tune; the groups helped us to 'get somewhere' in an easy and natural manner. Rhythmical variety was obtained by means of different lengths of note—an idea which belongs to the technique of mensurate music and is foreign to plainsong.

Attwood's setting, given in hymn tune form in the English Hymnal (156) showed the composer more tied by the metre. He is rather timid with his groups of bound notes, placing them on the verbal accents; still, their mere presence saves the tune from stiffness. There was a real saving grace at the point where he throws the accent across the bar:

Ex. 5.

And light - en with ce - lest - ial - fire.

—the kind of thing Purcell was so fond of doing in his triple time melodies.

Finally, there was Dykes's tune for this hymn (A. & M. 157), a tune which has never become popular, but one worth mentioning in this connection because rhythmically it was something like Attwood's. It was, however, even more timid in the way of any kind of freedom, and poorer in outline.

THE ELEMENTS OF FREEDOM

The lecturer showed that the two chief ways of obtaining the required freedom are (1) the grouping of notes on a single syllable, and (2) the use of different time-values for notes on long or short syllables. By these means poetic lines of equal length, such as those of a long metre hymn, can fitly be set to musical phrases of unequal length. Freedom was the very essence of a good melody. The type of tune established by A. & M. robbed music of its freedom. So did ragtime, though by an exactly opposite convention. It was the one element which these two extremes had in common, and it was the one by which both would ultimately stand condemned.

In music as in everything else there was a right and a wrong freedom. What was required in this particular case was freedom to make music in a strong and supple form. Without this strength and suppleness hymn tunes were apt to be not only uninteresting, but unvocal as well—the kind of tune we hear people describe as 'wandering, awkward to get hold of.' When a composer was tied down to a stereotyped shape he had to make an effort to be original. This was fatal, because there were practically only two ways open to him. First, there were curious, unexpected, or jerky intervals, which were awkward to sing, and which plainly said, 'I am trying to avoid convention.' For example, Mr. Colles cited Stephens's 'Blagdon' (A. & M. 602), which was unconventional only when it was uncouth, thus:

The second way of making the stereotyped shape attractive was by sweetening the harmony to taste, after this manner:

HARMONY

Every tune implied harmony of one kind or another. The modern singer, however ignorant he may be, was always subconsciously thinking a harmony to his tune; it was one of the means by which he picked it up. The right, inevitable harmony for a tune was that which helped to point out the simple outline of the melody. It never contradicted this outline, and strictly speaking, it had no separate existence of its own. Henry Smart's 'Regent Square' (A. & M. 232) may be taken as a type of a bold tune in which the harmony exactly satisfied these requirements. As an example of the reverse, Mr. Colles mentioned Dykes's setting of 'Christian, dost thou see them,' in which four of the eight lines were almost devoid of melodic interest. [The lecturer might have pointed out also that we got a better tune, so far as the first half was concerned, by leaving out the treble part and regarding the alto as the melody—a queer state of things in music intended for congregational purposes. The result is that the crowd gets the monotone, and the tune goes to the weakest part of the choir!] The fact was, of course, tunes of this type were of the kind to be listened to rather than sung. They had a good deal in common with the part-song, whereas a good hymn tune lost little or nothing by being sung without any kind of harmonic support. As another example of a hymn hopeless from a congregational point of view Mr. Colles gave Monk's 'Melton Mowbray' (A. & M. 530), in which the little bit of duet for treble and tenor:

SOPRANO AND TENOR IN HARMONY.

Small notes on Org. without octaves.

with its ad lib. and a tempo was entirely opposed to the congregational idea in hymnody. One of the chief evils of the 19th century choral service was this shifting of the musical interest from the nave to the choir-stalls.

Summing up, Mr. Colles said that the three marks of a good tune were (1) a free rhythmic shape, produced by (2) irregularities bound together by development, and (3) a harmony which supported and propelled the tune on. As examples of development he advised his hearers to examine 'The Rosy Sequence,' 16th century (E. H. 238), Gibbons's Song, 17th century (E. H. 302), Jeremiah Clark's 'King's Norton,' 18th century (E. H. 419), and Goss's 'Praise, my soul,' 19th century (E. H. 470). These showed the same principles of melodic development at work beneath the changing fashions of at least five centuries.

In conclusion Mr. Colles laid stress on the indefinable quality which made a fine tune—a quality over and above those which can be pointed out by the analyst. An obviously faulty tune may yet have an impulse, and a faultlessly constructed one may be dead. This did not mean that the principles of construction were after all unimportant. On the contrary: the comparative rarity of successful results without their aid proved their soundness.

BACH'S LIFE IN MUSIC

Mr. Clarence Dickenson, Director of Music at the Union Theological Seminary of New York, recently gave a series of four organ lecture-recitals in which Bach's biography was set forth in music. The plan was one well calculated to appeal to the general public. We give the opening items:

Born at Eisenach, 1685.

At ten years of age, at Ohrdruff, copied by moonlight

CHORALE PRELUDE 'From Heaven High' Pachelbel (1653-1706)

As solo boy, at fourteen, in St. Michael's Church, Lüneburg, sang

SONG ... 'O Saviour sweet'

Walked to Hamburg to hear

SONATA (for two violins, violoncello, and organ) ... Reinken (1623-1722)

Appointed organist New Church, Arnstadt, 1703.

At nineteen, when brother John Jacob went to Sweden, wrote

CAPRICCIO ON THE DEPARTURE OF MY BELOVED BROTHER

Arioso: 'Do stay here.'

Walked fifty miles to Lübeck, on leave of absence for four weeks, and stayed four months to hear:

TWILIGHT MUSIC ... Buxtehude (1639-1707)

(A Buxtehude Cantata)

Returned to Arnstadt and wrote

FUGUE IN G MAJOR 'A la Gigue'

And so on.

Excellent, but one or two details strike us as questionable. Thus, the Prelude No. 1, of the '48,' was first given as a harp solo, and then in the Gounod Ave Maria version with violin and harp; and in the final programme, as a specimen of the Motets written by Bach for performance at St. Thomas's, Leipsic, was sung Blessing, Glory, and Wisdom (Lob und Ehre), a work ascribed to Bach on very slender grounds. Spitta thinks it was by Georg Gottfried Wagner, a student at St. Thomas's, Leipsic. In any case it is too poor a work to be included in a programme dealing with his maturity. Mr. Dickenson was assisted by a host of players and singers, and the whole scheme was evidently the fruit of great pains and enthusiasm. We commend the idea to local Bach Societies in this country, as a basis for a good winter's work, and an attractive scheme from a public point of view.

During the past season the choir of Christ Church, Crouch End, with the assistance of professional soloists, has performed the following works: Brahms's Song of Destiny and Rhapsody for alto solo and male-voice chorus; Dale's Before the paling of the stars; Vaughan Williams's Fantasia on Christmas Carols and Five Mystical Songs for baritone solo and chorus; Parry's Blest Pair of Sirens; and Dvorák's Stabat Mater, in addition to many detached and small choral works and two comprehensive carol services. This is a record of which choir and choirmaster (Dr. Walker Robson) may well be proud.

A recital of music by old English composers and Bach was given at St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta, on February 14, by the Cathedral choir and the string orchestra from the Calcutta School of Music, conducted by Mr. C. H. Trevor. An excellent programme included Bach's Concerto for two violins, the Purcell Suite for strings recently arranged by Albert Coates, Bach's Chorale, Jesu, joy of man's desiring, with string accompaniment, and choral items by Tye, Farrant, and Tallis. A group of organ pieces from Mr. West's Old English Series was also down for performance, but a heat-wave put the organ out of action.

The St. Matthew Passion was sung at the Priory Church, Malvern, on April 11, by the Oratorio Choir, with orchestral accompaniment, under the direction of Dr. Louis Hamand. The tenor and bass solos were sung by Mr. E. Howell and Mr. H. Brown, the Priory choirboys singing the soprano and alto numbers. Mr. Paul Beard was principal violin, and the obbligati were played by Mr. J. W. Austin, Mr. Leon Goossens, and Mr. John Snowden.

Brahms's Requiem was sung at St. Alban's Abbey on April 4 by the St. Alban's Bach Choir, with Miss Viola Salvin and Mr. T. S. Miles as soloists. The accompaniment was supplied by organ (Mr. Alleyne Warren), pianoforte (Mr. Claiborne Dixon), and drums (Mr. S. E. Pearce). Mr. W. L. Luttman conducted. The work next to be rehearsed by the Society is the B minor Mass.

The London Society of Organists visited the National Institute for the Blind on March 25, when Mr. H. C. Warrilow gave a recital, and afterwards addressed the gathering on 'Music and the Aeroplane,' with pianoforte illustrations by Mr. H. V. Spanner.

The choir of East Kirkby Baptist Church has lately sung The Messiah twice—at its own church on March 5, and at St. Wilfrid's, Kirkby, on March 25, conducted by Mr. Harris Barke, with Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson at the organ.

The City Temple Choral Society sang Mendelssohn's Hymn of Praise and Come, let us sing, on April 8, conducted by Mr. Allan Brown. Mr. G. D. Cunningham accompanied on the organ.

Gounod's Redemption (Part 1) was performed at St. Saviour's, Paddington, on April 12, with Mr. Albert Orton at the organ. The solos were sung by members of the choir.

Messrs. Rushworth & Dreaper have just erected a new organ in St. Peter's Church, Aintree, Liverpool—a two-manual with eight stops on the Great, nine on the Swell, three on the Pedal, and eighteen pistons.

Sir Frederick Bridge will play one of his own compositions, and will also speak on behalf of the Organists' Benevolent League, at Mr. Allan Brown's recital at the City Temple on May 6, at 3 p.m.

Lee Williams's Gethsemane was sung at High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, on April 9, under the direction of the organist, Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson.

A Festival of Easter music was given at Winchmore Hill Congregational Church on April 25, when an admirable programme included Holst's Two Psalms for chorus and orchestra, Vaughan Williams's Hymns for tenor solo, viola, and orchestra, the same composer's Mystical Songs for baritone, chorus, and orchestra, Bach's Violin Concerto in E, and J. M. Joseph's Two Pieces for strings. The soloists were Miss Dulcie Nutting, Mr. Ernest Yonge, and Mr. Frank Marriott. Mr. D. Marblacy Jones conducted. Music is a great feature at this Church. Thus, on April 11, a recital of chamber music was given, the works played being a Haydn Quartet and a couple of Elgar works—the Quintet and Violin Sonata; and this had been preceded by a series of organ recitals by Mr. D. Marblacy Jones, the programme of which included a fine lot of the best organ music, old and new.

THE ORGAN

This admirable quarterly completes its first volume with a number full of good fare. Colonel Dixon writes on 'The Tonal Structure of the Organ,' Dr. Eaglefield Hull chats on some of the organ tutors of which we have recollections, pleasant and otherwise—Rinck, Schneider, &c., the Rev. Andrew Freeman surveys the Father Smith organs at Cambridge, and Mr. Harvey Grace delivers himself of 'Some Thoughts on Registration.' A couple of fine plates of organs at Lübeck illustrate Mr. Adcock's article on the subject, and there are many other features of interest.

ORGAN RECITALS

Mr. F. Gostelow, King Street Congregational Church, Luton—Choral No. 3, Frank; Finale (Sonata No. 1), Guilmant; Overture in E flat, Faulkes.

Mr. John Pulein, St. Mary's Cathedral, Glasgow—Sonata No. 6, Mendelssohn; Pastoral, Frank; Cradle Song and Scherzo, Grace; Triumph Song, Rowley.

Mr. George Pritchard, St. Mary's, Widnes—Fugue in E flat, Bach; Sonata No. 5, Mendelssohn; Imperial March, Elgar.

Miss Laura Slingsby, St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside—Prelude and Fugue in E minor, Bach; Andantino from fourth Symphony, Tchaikovsky; Sketch, Schumann.

Dr. R. Walker Robson, Christ Church, Crouch End—Fantasia in E minor, Silas; Funeral March, Vierne; Prelude and Fugue in F, Buxtehude; Variations on 'Crucifixus,' Liszt.

Mr. A. S. Warrell, St. Mary Tyndall's Park, Bristol—Rhapsody No. 3, Saint-Saëns; 'Gaudemus,' Jephson; Choral Improvisations, Karg-Elert; Postlude on 'Martyrs,' Grace.

Mr. G. F. Robertson, Hinckley Parish Church—Prelude and Fugue in C, Saint-Saëns; Thema Ostinata, Charlton Palmer; Overture to the 'Occasional' Oratorio.

Mr. James M. Preston, St. George's, Newcastle—Toccata, Boely; Pastoral, Scarlatti; Meditation in Ancient Tonality, Grace; Toccata di Concerto, Bossi; Variations Sérieuses, Mendelssohn.

Mr. Harry Wall, St. Paul's, Covent Garden—'Triumph Song' (on 'Sanctorum Meritis'), Pearce; Prelude and Finale (Suite No. 1), Lyons; 'Laus Deo' and Réverie on 'University,' Grace; Skandinavisch, Rheinberger.

Mr. C. H. Trevor, St. Paul's Cathedral, Calcutta—Prelude and Fugue in B minor, Bach; Ave Maria, Arcadelt-Liszt; 'Aspiration,' John E. West.

Mr. B. Langdale, St. George's, Barnsley—Largo Funèbre, Rens; Heroic Suite, Rowley; Lament, Grace; Valhalla Scene from 'The Rhinegold.'

Mr. Alban Hamer, Bloemfontein Cathedral—Sonata No. 1, Merkel; Fugue in E flat, Bach; Prelude on 'St. Peter' and 'Darwall's 148th.'

Mr. Fred Gostelow, Luton Parish Church—Dorian Toccata and 'Fiddle' Fugue, Bach; Scherzo, Turner; Overture in C, Hollins; Meditation, Gostelow.

Mr. F. G. Goodenough, Trinity Congregation Church, Reading (before the Berkshire Organists' Association)—Sonata in E minor, Rheinberger; 'Dithyramb,' Harwood; Gothic Suite, Reilmann; Symphony No. 5, Widor.

Mr. Patrick Black, Dumbarton Parish Church—Prelude on 'Nun Danket,' Bach; Capriccio, Fumagalli; Overture in E flat, Faulkes.

Mr. R. E. Redman, St. John's, Clapham Rise—First Suite, Borowski; Prelude on 'St. Anne's,' Parry; Allegro Maestoso, John E. West; Concert Overture in C minor, Redman.

Mr. H. C. Warrilow, National Institute for the Blind, Great Portland Street, W.—Overture in D minor, Smart; Prelude, Fugue, and Variation, Franck; Finale in E flat, Guilmant.

Mr. Bertram Hollins, Beckenham Congregational Church—Con moto maestoso, B. Hollins; Choral with Variations (Sonata No. 6), Mendelssohn; 'The Angel's Farewell'; March on a Theme of Handel, Guilmant.

Mr. C. Thornton Turner, Punshon Wesleyan Church, Bournemouth—Solemn March, Smart; Toccata in C, Bach; Irish Rhapsody, Wolstenholme.

Mr. C. F. Waters, St. Mary-le-Bow, Cheapside—Sonata in F sharp minor, Rheinberger; Choral Melody, Waters; Finale (Sonata No. 5), Guilmant.

Mr. W. J. Lancaster, Bolton Parish Church—Prelude on 'Old 113th,' Charles Wood; Fugue on BACH, Schumann; Choral in G, Vierne; 'Evocation à la Chapelle Sixtine,' Liszt; Agitato (Sonata No. 11), Rheinberger.

Mr. W. J. Comley, Hertford Parish Church—Sonata No. 1, Guilmant; Prelude on 'St. Mary,' Charles Wood; Fantasia on 'Darwall's 148th,' Darke.

Mr. Herbert Hodge, St. Nicholas Cole Abbey—Finale from Sonata in F sharp minor, Rheinberger; Minuetto from Oboe Concerto, Handel; Overture in C, Mendelssohn; Barcarolle, Sterndale Bennett.

Mr. Arthur Meale, Wesleyan Central Hall—Sonata No. 6, Mendelssohn; Sonata No. 2, Rheinberger; Fantasia in E flat, Saint-Saëns; 'St. Francis preaching to the birds,' Liszt; 'Finlandia.'

APPOINTMENTS

Mr. George W. Gaythorpe, organist and choirmaster, Brunswick Wesleyan Church, Pendleton.

Mr. Gilbert P. Matthews, organist and choirmaster, St. Mary's Parish Church, Stafford.

Letters to the Editor

THE ORGANS IN GENOA CATHEDRAL

SIR,—Now that Genoa is so much in the public eye, your readers may be interested in the organs in the Cathedral of San Lorenzo. Here are some notes I made when on a visit a few years ago. The Cathedral itself is a building with a nave in the Byzantine style, the chancel being Renaissance. The three organs are placed in the transepts and behind the high altar. That in the south transept is very old, and is now disused. It was in use when Paganini played his violin in the choir. (The choir is behind the altar, and out of sight from the nave.) A second (accompanimental) organ is in the choir. It has no pedal organ, and, so far as I could judge, about four stops. A handsomely carved oak casing with heavy doors (also carved) encloses the whole instrument. The tone sounded very pleasant from the nave—especially the celeste. There was no Swell to this organ.

The Great organ (Organo Primo, the verger called it) is on a marble gallery in the north transept, and faces the old one which stands on a similar gallery. It is in a fine oak case, and has two very handsomely painted doors to cover the front pipes when not in use. The doors are painted on both sides. The organ was erected about 1800 by Lungini, an organ-builder of Brescia. The carving on the case seems very much older, so probably it was rebuilt in the old case. As the organist was away when I viewed and played upon it, a good deal of information had to be missed, the verger's supply soon giving out. The front pipes, seen when the folding-doors are open, are 16-ft. cut to their speaking length, and apparently of pure tin.

The stops are arranged on either side of the manuals, and are mahogany bars projecting about three inches from the jambs. They pull inwards against a spring, and hook down. The names are printed on paper labels above the slots.

The composition pedals move the stops, but not to their full amount, and these also hook down. The Swell pedal is balanced and in the centre. The blowing is by hand, the blower working a wheel.

The pipes appeared to have plenty of room, and the organ sounded very well indeed, though the Mixture work is perhaps a trifle on the aggressive side. On the whole it was a very enjoyable instrument both to play and to hear.

The pedal board is radiating and concave, compass CCC to F. Manual compass CC to C3. The reeds were somewhat out of tune, but I was told that the tuner was just about due, and that he paid visits regularly.

The flutes and the Dulciana are very charming stops.

The specification is as follows (August, 1910):

GREAT (right-hand side, 2 rows of levers).

	FT.		FT.
Principale	16	Violoncello	4
Principale, No. 1	8	Furniture	2
Principale, No. 2	8	Timpani (a 3-rank Mixture)	8
Bourdon	8	Cymbale*	7 ranks
Flute	8	Tromba	4
Ottava	4

Two composition pedals.

* I regret I did not note composition.

SWELL (left-hand side, 2 rows of levers).

	FT.		FT.
Principale	8	Dulcet	4
Dulciana	8	Cornet	3 ranks
Flauto Traverso	8	Corno Inglese	8
Ottava	4	Bassoon	4

Two composition pedals.

PEDAL (2 rows under Swell).

	FT.		FT.
Sub Basse	16	Bombarde	16
Bourdon	8	Tromba	8

Vox Humana, 8-ft., is with the Pedal group of stops, but I did not use it. Presumably it is in the Swell box.

There are three Couplers, by hitching pedal—Sw. to Gt., Gt. to Ped., Sw. to Ped. The shape of these pedals differs from that of the composition pedals. The manual action is tracker.—Yours, &c.,

F. B. GOODMAN.

A GREAT MUSICIAN

SIR,—The Musical Times is constant in its effort to praise famous men (and women) month by month. May I have a little space for the praise of a musician who is not famous, though his name has been carried all over the world? That sounds like a conundrum. The explanation, however, is simple. Every string player knows the signature, 'John R. Toms, Wellington, Somerset,' on the packets of carefully tested strings which they use, and orders for those strings come from every part of the world to the little Somersetshire town from many of the greatest fiddlers of the day. But it is not of Toms's strings that I write, though much might be written of them and of James Kelway Toms, the son of my old friend and teacher, who has made the perfect testing of strings the devotion of his life.

Mr. John R. Toms is himself unknown to the majority of musicians, and that, I am inclined to say, is their loss and his gain. Through a life of some eighty-five years (I do not know his exact age) he has escaped notoriety, at any rate until this month, when he and Mrs. Toms celebrated their 'diamond' wedding, and were immensely surprised and delighted by the numbers of congratulations which poured in on them, headed by a telegram from the King and Queen.

The event forms a suitable occasion for, but is not the substance of, what I would write of Mr. Toms, the musician. When people say that England has no musical life, I think of Mr. Toms. He has lived all his days in one little town near the borders of Somerset and Devon, where concerts of a professional kind are practically unknown, twenty miles from the nearest cathedral town, and for eighty years or so he has simply radiated music to all about him. He told me last year when I visited him that he was four years old when his father bought and gave him as a toy an old organ, which had been removed from the Parish Church. As a child he amused himself by inventing pedals for his organ, attaching them by strings to the keys of its single manual. That organ has been his life-long companion; he improved it, added in course of time a second manual and real pedals, and it is now a beautiful little instrument of mellow, old-world tone, on which he daily plays the Chorale Preludes of Bach, Handel's choruses, and a whole repertory of delightful things.

I was about four when I first heard Mr. Toms play, and stood spell-bound while he entertained my father's guests first on the pianoforte then on a wonderful harmonium which he had brought to the house with him. I distinctly remember being surprised that the ladies and gentlemen there assembled could go on chattering in their barbarous Victorian fashion while such sounds were in the air. It was the first music other than nursery rhymes which I had ever heard, and to be Mr. Toms's pupil soon became the ambition of my life. That came to pass a few years later, and I shall never forget my first pianoforte lesson with him. He taught me 'musical appreciation' decades before the phrase became the cant of the pundits. He made me love Handel and Mozart, described the instruments of the orchestra, illustrating their tone by the various stops on his organ, showed me full scores, fired my ambition to hear a real symphony, and so on, using a hundred arts, not with any idea of systematising training, but because he loved it all so much that he had to share it. He told me of fine singing in Cathedrals which he had heard on his rare holidays, read me accounts of concerts at the Crystal Palace and St. James's Hall (some of them were from an unknown paper called the Musical Times), and, most of all, his modesty about his own powers, which seemed to me marvellous, made me realise that music must be a very big thing indeed, since so great a master could regard himself as the least among her servants.

And what he did for me he has been doing for everyone who drew near with ears to hear all these years. I found him last year still bringing together his friends for little weekly musical gatherings. We played Mozart together, but while the great melodies of his youth remain the joy of his age, he was keen to hear everything I could tell him of modern music, and produced some pianoforte pieces by Debussy and John Ireland which he was practising.

I do not know whether there are many such musicians in the country parts of England. I have never met another Mr. Toms, but I hope that he is not so unique as he seems to me to be, for of such is the kingdom of Music.—Yours, &c.,

H. C. COLLIER.

'M. EGON PETRI AND OP. 106'

SIR,—Surely your contributor 'C.' is quite wrong in describing, on page 261, s.v. 'Egon Petri and Op. 106,' 'M.' Egon Petri as 'the Hungarian pianist.' We all know that the bouleversement that occurred between August, 1914, and November, 1918, altered much; but did it alter a Dutchman into a Hungarian? For many years I have laboured under a grievous delusion if Egon Petri is not a son of my old friend Henri Petri, olim joint leader, with his compatriot Julius Röntgen, père, of the Gewandhaus Orchestra, and slightly later, leader of the then Royal Opera orchestra at Dresden.—Yours, &c.,

33, Oakley Street,
Chelsea, S.W.3.

ROBIN H. LEGGE.

April 2, 1922.

A STRANGE OMISSION

SIR,—A contemporary journal recently published an article on works written for two pianofortes, and mentioned a number of compositions of this class by various composers, living and dead. The article went on to enumerate some of the very few works for two pianofortes written by British composers, but strangely omitted to name my own two works, viz., an elaborate Suite in five movements, Op. 50 (consisting of a Preludium, Andante Pastorale, Scherzo, Marche Triomphale, and Finale), and a Toccata Brillante, Op. 144. Both these works are published by prominent Continental firms, and have been repeatedly performed in England, Germany, and America.—Yours, &c.,

ALGERNON ASHTON.

22A, Carlton Vale,
Maida Vale, N.W. 6.

April 9, 1922.

'THE ENGLISH LITANY OF 1544-60'

SIR,—Mr. E. G. P. Wyatt's letter does not call for a detailed reply, and therefore I shall content myself with briefly answering his statements.

1. As I had Cranmer's letter before me I did not misunderstand his meaning.

2. The Processioner was practically synonymous with the Litany, as Duchesne and other authorities state. St. Augustine and his monks sang the Litany as Bede records (Plummer's edition).

3. The Litany was newly translated in 1544, and the melody was plainchant. My point is that Stone did not compose music for the Litany at that time, but that the compilers adapted the ancient plainchant.

4. As to the Kyrie eleison being popular in Gaul in the early part of the 5th century, it is sufficient to point out that St. Patrick (430) was acquainted with it. If Mr. Edmund Bishop says 'it was imported into Gaul in the early part of the 6th century,' it is a slip, for, in addition to the fact of its being known to St. Patrick, it was introduced at Vienne by Bishop Marvertus, circa 470, and was extended to all Gaul by the Council of Orleans in 511.

In conclusion, may I quote from Sir Henry Howorth's fine volume on St. Augustine the Missionary (1913)? 'The particular anthem quoted by Bede occurs in one of the Rogation Litanies in use long after at Vienne, and probably in other churches of France.'—Yours, &c.,

April 8, 1922.

W. H. GRATTAN FLOOD.

THE BALLAD IN AMERICA

SIR,—As I have only just returned to England after four months in the sun, and as I received no English papers during that time, will you permit me to say a word or two apropos your January 'Occasional Notes'?

I am pleased to see that my retort to the egregious Mr. Francis Rogers has met other eyes beyond those for which it was intended. Had I thought it would be quoted I would have corrected certain printer's atrocities which make it look as though the writer is as ignorant of the principles of the English language as the sub-editor of an American musical paper—an editor of one once suggested, in the course of a disagreement, that my name was evidence of Teutonic origin!

My version of the Latin tag was hujus generis omnes. The epithet applied to 'operatic singers' was Simian-brained, not similar-brained, which makes nonsense. I spoke, too, of 'Galli-Curcis, Tetrazzinis,' not of 'Galli-Curci's (!) Tetrazzini's.' I hasten to exonerate you from any share in these enormities; they are due entirely to the skill of Musical America.

In the same notes you make some observations on the matter of the ballad concert, the lack of which the American writers on music appear to think is a self-evident proof of their country's incalculable superiority to yours. Now, Sir, I am not a Briton, and have on plenty of occasions given satisfactory demonstration of the fact that neither am I a rampant Anglophile, but I must confess that impudent nonsense uttered by people who know nothing whatever of what they are talking incenses me as much when it is about yourselves as anything else—all of which is to lead up to the statement which I make calmly, in cold blood, and after careful examination of Musical America and Musical Courier over four or five years, namely, that in America the things that are here known as ballads have a share in practically every singer's recital programme I have seen. Here, by tacit consent, the ballad is relegated to the scullery of the musical edifice—the ballad concert—and generally kept there. The people who wish to associate with scullions know where to go to find them. Such, however, is the 'democracy' of your American 'cousins,' that they are not revolted by the spectacle of Carrie Jacobs Bond or Charles Wakefield Cadman jostling Bach, Brahms, Schumann, Schubert, to say nothing of Borodin or Rimsky-Korsakov, Debussy, Gabriel Fauré, Duparc, and the Frenchmen in one and the same programme.—Yours, &c.,

KAIKHOSRU SORABJI.

175, Clarence Gate Gardens, N.W.1.

April 17, 1922.

'HAND DEVELOPMENT FOR THE PERFORMER'

SIR,—Before proceeding to deal with Mr. Pitcher's reply to my letter on this subject, let me point out that our art in its many aspects—including that of the physical limitation—is so much bigger than any of its individual servants that we all might learn with advantage to desist from anything in the nature of personal tourneys. Mr. Pitcher does me too much honour to associate my name with those artists he lists at the conclusion of his letter, if he does so seriously. If not, then he is descending from a big subject to a little practice quite out of keeping with the true artistic spirit.

We are both agreed as to the futility of finger-exercise at the keyboard for its own sake, and I am glad to be able to assure Mr. Pitcher that, thanks to the teachings of Mr. Tobias Matthay in particular, which are available even at Sydney, full muscular development and control are within the reach of every serious-minded student. (I am sure he will forgive me dealing solely with the pianoforte aspect of the subject, as that is the peculiar object of my research.) Still quoting from the above reliable source, while a large proportion of the developmental work can, and should, be done away from the keyboard, exercises are yet necessary in order to tone up those weak points which are present in almost every pianist's technical equipment, and to teach the union of muscular habit and key-treatment.

Far be it from me to disparage any of the artists whom Mr. Pitcher names, but it is fair to point out Mr. Matthay's contention that executive artists are often ipso facto deficient in the faculty of analysing technical processes. A concrete example of the truth of this statement will be found in the second volume of Miss Brower's Piano Mastery, where Mischa Levitzky, who has recently left a meteoric trail in this continent, owns to the fact that he honestly did not know at that date (1916) the causes of his technical mastery. As M. Levitzky has not yet appeared in London, perhaps I am taking an unfair advantage, but the interview in the same volume with John Powell presents a specially fatuous example of misguided genius in the shape of a false analogy between pianoforte playing and violin or voice-production.

I will conclude by once again agreeing with Mr. Pitcher that the approbation of a particular musical school or faculty is in itself no recommendation, as history does truly teach us. My own peculiar veneration—I can use no lesser word—and esteem for Mr. Matthay's teachings rest, not on the fact of the expositor being an R.A.M. professor, or even the founder of a distinctive school, but because I have tried and proved them, with the truly startling result that I have almost overtaken the errors of eight years' wrong habits in less than seven months. For this reason I am impelled to contest, not new inventions, but statements of scientific fact which, illumined by eminent authority and practical proof, I feel are mistaken. My letter stated at the outset that my concern was not with the device in question, but with the alleged principles of its operation.

Space forbids me to enlarge further on this subject, and I therefore subscribe myself,—Yours, &c., ROY HEAD.

'Ellerslie,' Clanwilliam Street,
Chatswood, Sydney, Australia.
February 15, 1922.

'THE IMPORTANCE OF CORRECT PLACING OF THE VOICE'

SIR,—When I had appeared on Mr. Tree's platform, and, despite the very severe catarrh from which I was then suffering, performed, as best I was able, the part assigned to me, I thought the question at issue had been disposed of. I notice, however, that in his advertisement in your issue for this month Mr. Tree has taken a liberty with my words of which I do not approve and wish to correct.

It is quite true that I made public confession of having made a mistake, but I defined it clearly. I felt that it would have been wiser on my part to have first inquired who Mr. Tree was before entering upon a discussion with him. That, Sir, was the mistake I confessed to, which is not the meaning implied by Mr. Tree.

In private I told Mr. Tree that he, too, had made a mistake in giving such scant detail of his method in his letter of April last year, and while he made no objection to that remark, he said that in such a letter it was difficult to enter more minutely into detail.

Having been brought into personal touch with Mr. Tree, I am now able to speak of his method with considerable assurance. The method which he practises in singing is neither more nor less than the old Italian one in its purity, and I must add that it was a great pleasure for me to meet an Englishman with such complete control of his vocal apparatus. In practice, there is nothing between us, and not so much in theory as appears on the surface. His 'speech into song' method, if taught competently, I believe to be capable of giving good results; it is when it is adopted by an individual, without the aid of tuition, that I fear it may not be fruitful of good. My opinion is based upon the fact that 'correct speech,' whether in theory or practice, may convey a different conception to different minds, while the difficulty of its application is augmented by the further fact that an amateur, being unable to hear himself as others hear him, may unconsciously fall into a vicious method, imagining that he is working along the proper lines. Yet that remark may be applied to any method.

'Speech into song' is after all only a method of commencing the training of the voice, as I feel sure Mr. Tree knows, and I still believe that the older is the safer and surer method. Of course it is of extreme importance to make a proper start, for unless the foundation be well and truly laid the superstructure will be in danger; but a vast amount of hard work faces anyone who wishes to sing really well after that foundation has been laid. It must, however, be remembered that real vocal artists are born, not made. All that the best and most conscientious master can do is to teach his pupils to control and use their voices; what lies beyond that point depends entirely on inborn talent.—Yours, &c., A. KEAY.

2, Gledstanes Road, W. 14.

April 15, 1922.

[This discussion is closed—once more!—Ed., M. T.]

A REMARKABLE PUBLIC SCHOOL PROGRAMME

SIR,—I shall be glad if you can find space to print this letter in your next issue, as I feel that such an incident as that of which I write should not be allowed to pass without some mention in the annals of music in England to-day. I refer to the orchestral concert which took place in the hall of St. John's College, Hurstpierpoint, on Saturday, April 1, when the following programme was played:

1. Fifth Symphony Beethoven
(1. Allegro con brio 2. Andante con moto).
2. Song 'Through the fields in winter' V. Sokolov
3. Finlandia Sibelius
4. Præludium Jarnefelt
5. Spinning Chorus (with orchestra) ... } Wagner from 'The Flying Dutchman' }
6. Song ... 'Still as the night' ... Carl Bohm
7. Soli and Chorus (with orchestra) } Gounod 'Light as air' ('Faust') }
8. Incidental Music to 'A Midsummer Night's Dream' } H. A. Hawkins
9. March (dedicated to the School) ... H. A. Hawkins Conductor—Mr. H. A. Hawkins.

Mr. Hawkins, the school organist and choirmaster, collected a full symphony orchestra of forty-two players from Brighton and district, and after only one rehearsal conducted a most successful performance. He also composed the last two items on the programme, the first-named being a fully orchestrated arrangement of the very delightful music he wrote for the school play last December. The March was composed specially for a similar concert last year, and is dedicated to the school.

The vocal soloists are all members of the school, and the school choir sang the choruses. This concert was the third annual event of the same description, and shows what can be done to further musical appreciation and interest in our public schools. A considerable number of visitors were present, and the sincerity of the applause accorded to each item and the whole-hearted enthusiasm and enjoyment shown throughout pay a very high tribute to the outstanding musicianship of Mr. Hawkins, to whom must be awarded the laurels of a very interesting and instructive evening.—Yours, &c.,

April 10, 1922.

AN 'O. J.'

Sharps and Flats

I have no patience with any critical superiority which hints that it can take in a previously unheard and very elaborate thirty-two page piece of modern music, details, and ensemble, at one sitting. It reminds me of the dear lady I overheard one day at the Royal Academy remonstrating with her young companion, 'How you do linger before the pictures! Why can't you take them in at a glance, as I do?'—P. A. Scholes.

Some of this [Russian verse and song] sweats vodka at every pore. It will be retorted that German song is not wholly free from evidence of association with German beer; and, indeed, the worst specimens of German tearfulness are obviously the product of German beerfulness.—Ernest Newman.

The esoteric idea of beauty is a very dangerous one, and the youth of eighteen who moons about Hampstead Heath with a volume of Keats in his pocket needs very careful treatment. (I used to do this myself, so I know.)—Martin Shaw.

The mysterious benefactor of the London concert-going public who, as mentioned in the Daily Mail on Saturday, generously makes good the inevitable deficit on some of the most important London concerts, is Mr. Balfour Gardiner, the composer.—Daily Mail.

We are inclined to doubt whether Mr. Balfour Gardiner will be effusively grateful to the Daily Mail for having disclosed his identity with the anonymous benefactor to whom it had referred, a couple of days earlier, as having taken 'a delight in making good the losses incurred on many of the most important concerts given in London.' We do not envy him his post-bag, or, in other words, his daily mail.—Musical News and Herald.

Whether or not the Englishman really likes hymns, he always says he does; and, when he dies, no obituary notice is complete without the name of his 'favourite hymn.'—R. K. Terry.

This extraordinary modern music, now! But then I always remember that I did not like The Dream of Gerontius a bit when I first heard it; but think of that beautiful double chorus. Splendid! So, I always say with this modern music, we shall come on to it.—Sir Frederick Bridge.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of May, 1862:

Mr. Henry Parratt has been appointed organist of the Parish Church at Huddersfield. This appointment was held by Mr. Parratt's father for nearly fifty years.

OBITUARY.—Jacques Elie Fromental Halévy died during the last month, at Nice. He was born at Paris, in May, 1799, of Israelitish parents, whose name, originally, was Levy.

TO MUSICIANS AND AMATEURS.—Original Musical Articles and Criticisms.—Read the Age we Live in, weekly, price one penny. Order in the City, of Pottles, Royal Exchange (by post, twopenny); 16, Gate Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields, W.C. A first-class musical and general newspaper for 4s. 4d. per annum.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players.

Pianist (young lady) would like to meet good violinist and 'cellist. Small Heath, Birmingham.—PASTORAL, c/o Musical Times.

Quartet, North London, seeks experienced and enthusiastic amateur 'cellist (male).—KINGSBRIDGE, c/o Musical Times.

Violist would like to meet violinist or pianist for mutual practice, or would join trio, quartet, or orchestra.—J. S. HALL, 55, Gt. Marlborough Street, W. 1.

Accompanist (male), good pianist, wishes to meet vocalists or instrumentalists with view to mutual practice. North London preferred.—A. BIGGS, 10, St. Edmund's Terrace, Regent's Park, N.W. 8.

Young lady, pianist, would like to meet violinist or 'cellist (or both) for mutual practice on Monday, Thursday, Saturday, or Sunday evenings.—E. SYDENHAM, 31A, Victoria Road, Upper Norwood, S.E. 19.

Wanted.—Good 'cellist, living in Blackburn or Darwen districts, to join amateur enthusiasts (flute, three violins, and pianoforte, ages 14-17), also players of the viola, double-bass, bassoon, &c., for a small amateur orchestra.—WALTER MITCHELL, 82, Blackburn Road, Darwen, Lancs.

Keen Lovers of Music are invited to join small string orchestra; amateurs only. Rehearsals, Tuesdays, 7 to 9. Central London.—SECRETARY, 12, Sandmere Road, S.W. 4.

Mezzo-Contralto, some professional experience, would like to meet lady pianist accompanist for mutual practice. District, S.W. 2.—A. N. H., c/o Musical Times.

Vacancies in St. Matthew's Amateur Orchestra for 'cello, double-bass, and efficient brass and wind players. Rehearsals on Saturdays, 5.30.—Parochial Hall, Wandsworth Bridge Road. Conductor, E. H. Melling, F.R.C.O.

Young tenor desires to meet a pianist (lady or gentleman) for mutual practice a few evenings a week. Within five miles from Charing Cross.—J. B., c/o Musical Times.

Young lady accompanist (still studying) wishes to meet lady, either vocalist or instrumentalist, for mutual practice. S.E. district.—E., 4, Cedars Road, Beckenham, Kent.

Pianist would like to meet violinist or vocalist (at Oxford) for mutual practice.—T. J., c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist desires to meet violinist and pianist with view to mutual practice; East Dulwich district.—C. H. S., c/o Musical Times.

GUSTAV HOLST ON PURCELL

Mr. Gustav Holst lectured on Purcell to the London section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians at University College on April 8. The lecture was illustrated by excerpts from Dioctesian performed by students of Morley College. Dr. R. R. Terry was in the chair. We give the gist rather than the actual words of Mr. Holst, who was by no means at his least interesting when he digressed from his notes. These digressions were frequent.

Purcell is commonly called the greatest of English musicians, but this superlative is too loosely and perfunctorily thrown out. Mr. Holst has a misgiving for superlatives, and the sight of Dr. Terry at hand made him think of other possible claimants—William Byrd, or even one of the earlier 16th century composers. It is most likely not wise to use this particular superlative for Purcell, just as a superlative is unwise when disparaging a composer—Beethoven, say, since there is a good deal of current disparagement of Beethoven. Rather than call Beethoven the worst of composers it is wiser to say nothing at all about him! Nevertheless, Mr. Holst indulged later in a superlative or two over his cherished Purcell.

Purcell is glibly called 'the greatest' on the strength of certain sacred works. There are sacred works of Purcell, such as the Morning Hymn and two Evening Hymns, which are of the best. But Purcell no more than Mozart is to be appraised on the strength of his sacred works. What should we know of Mozart if we knew merely the Masses and Motets and never thought of the G minor and other Symphonies or of the G minor Quintet or The Magic Flute? Purcell, who is pre-eminently a secular musician, a musician of the theatre, has long been best known by a few of his worst anthems. And Mr. Holst launched a shaft at the Restoration anthem, a baneful thing, and a baneful influence to-day. Much is heard nowadays of the sins of Victorian Church music—Stainer and Sullivan. But that is a dead influence, its lure has gone. Whereas ears are still shut to the badness of the Restoration Church music, in spite of the example of the peerless 1600 style nowadays available for all.

Purcell is one of the half-dozen greatest of all composers of stage music. And, true Englishman that he was, he was a great innovator. Mr. Holst threw out the suggestion that the great strokes of musical invention have been the strokes of Englishmen—the device of counterpoint, the device of 'modern harmony' (otherwise known as wrong notes), the device of atmospheric effects, and dramatic characterisation in music. These last two were the inventions of Purcell. Not only did he invent dramatic characterisation, but he also remained the only master of it for the best part of a century after his death. Gluck and Mozart, in places, and Wagner (and characterisation is, for Mr. Holst, Wagner's supreme gift) exploited the field that Purcell had found. Handel, and the contemporary Italian opera, were dead to this possibility of music. Their arias and scenes were impersonal.

If Dido and Enceas was written in 1680, when Purcell was about twenty-one, it is the most wonderful expression of precocious, original genius in all music. The feature that above all makes Mr. Holst marvel is the 'lyrical recitative,' and one phrase of that recitative—Dido's Darkness shades me—he called the most moving sentence in all English music. Dido was written for a girls' school at Chelsea, and Purcell suited the occasion by writing the vocal parts within a very narrow range, and by setting the English with the most beautiful attention to the language. Purcell is incomparable in his nice treatment of English, and in writing for this girls' school he could count on a reasonably cultivated diction from his singers. Afterwards Purcell blossomed out as a copious composer of the equivalent of our musical comedies and revues. His range, his harmony, his orchestration, all were enriched in those later years, but there was one backsliding: the lyrical recitative of Dido not only was not developed, it was dropped altogether in favour of the mean perfunctory secco recitative that anyone could write.

Here a certain resemblance to his own career happily beguiled Mr. Holst into reminiscences. Mr. Holst, too, has written music for a girls' school and has been a theatre musician. He esteems himself happy that his girls' school period came after his theatre period. His experiences in a theatre band have, however, at least two results, he managed to read there the complete works of Turgeniev, and he arrived at an answer to the puzzling question, 'Why do people go to "musical plays"?' The answer is: 'To be tickled.' The people who go are, when they go, in the mood to tolerate nothing but being tickled. They will tolerate no appeal to the imagination.

Purcell collaborated in the equivalent of our musical comedies; only where to-day we have flamboyant vulgarity there were, two hundred and thirty years ago, acres of bombast. Mr. Holst accepts Dr. Ernest Walker's epithet for Purcell—he was 'accommodating.' He did what cannot be imagined of a musician of Beethoven's or Wagner's temper. He complaisantly scattered his jewels over the bombastic acres of late Restoration drama; a bad period which delighted in improved versions of Shakespeare (hence The Fairy Queen, a version of A Midsummer Night's Dream).

This brought Mr. Holst to the title of his lecture—'What shall we do with our Purcell?'

The problem is: The most characteristic music of this pure genius being attached to intolerably dismal literature, how to make use of it for our pleasure to-day? Mr. Holst's answer is that Purcell having been accommodated in 1600 must to-day continue to accommodate. He did not mind associating his genius with the bombast that was popular. Let us not mind dissociating it, and frankly marry it again to something we like better. The alternative is to leave Purcell's musical plays unhonoured and unsung as a matter of antiquarian interest. Mr. Holst, an impassioned defender of the living spirit in Purcell's music, recommends the free use of the pruning knife. The bombast of the plays must go, and with it too the mere padding which the accommodating Purcell was not too proud to provide. Even good things must be cut out too, as they found at Cambridge when they restored much of Shakespeare into The Fairy Queen; for Shakespeare's sake one of the best of Purcell's songs had to go.

As a practical example of 'what to do with Purcell' Mr. Holst described his dealings with the Dioclesian music, which last year was adapted as a masque and was played with delightful effect by Morley College students at Brook Green, in Hyde Park, and at the Old Vic. Mr. Holst is still vague on the original subject of Dioclesian. No spoken words were retained at all. A hint or two from some of the sung words suggested a St. George and the Dragon story, and this was acted in dumb show to Purcell's accompanying strains, while some exquisite songs and one of Purcell's finest choruses accommodated themselves well to the new plot. Mr. Holst is so far from blindly adoring Purcell that he expurgated the Overture completely. It seemed to him lifeless as any piece ever written from a sense of duty in a classical style.

At Morley College, where they have already performed Dido, The Fairy Queen (the first performance after the two-hundred-years-long loss of the manuscript), and Dioclesian, a revival of King Arthur is in prospect, and Mr. Holst's application of his principles of pruning and accommodation will be looked to with special interest in that particularly inchoate work. But Purcell's music in the last Act Mr. Holst holds to be supreme in English patriotic music. C.

THE DUPLEX-COUPLER PIANOFORTE

The Emmanuel Moor Duplex-Coupler Pianoforte was exhibited at the meeting of the Musical Association on March 24. Mr. F. Gilbert Webb, who explained the instrument, said his object was to provoke a discussion on its possibilities, its advantages and disadvantages, and its probable influence on the future of pianoforte music. The artist abhorred anything which savoured of the mechanical, and was inclined to regard new devices with suspicion, forgetting how greatly music was indebted to mechanics for its highest flights. The invention of the keyboard revealed the inadequacy of the thumb, the use of which was once forbidden. It had now become as useful as the other fingers, but how to overcome its comparative shortness had been the problem of technicians for centuries. The new duplex keyboard converted the handicap of the thumb's shortness into an advantage.

There was nothing new in two keyboards. The real novelty and value of Mr. Moor's invention lay in the last inch of the visible part of the lower keys being raised, thus bringing the notes of the lower keyboard into convenient distance to be struck by the thumb when the hand was on the upper keyboard. These prominences on the lower keyboard eliminated in great measure certain awkward positions of the hands constantly occurring when playing contrapuntal music. They avoided the crowding of the fingers together in closely written passages, and enabled important inner parts to be accentuated with comparative ease. Moreover, a chromatic giussando became possible.

By coupling the keyboards, octaves could be played as single notes on the lower keyboard. Both notes so produced were struck with equal force, which was very rarely the case on the single keyboard. The result was the greater emphasis of the higher harmonics and a very perceptible difference in tone quality. Though there was a certain loss of human quality, it should at the same time be recognised as a new effect capable of artistic development. The advantages of the upper keyboard being an octave higher in pitch than the lower were very great. Extended arpeggios and chords and distant snatch notes were brought nearer together and fairly under the hand. Chords could be devised to produce hitherto unheard resonances.

The legitimate use of the second keyboard was to secure greater ease of execution without alteration of the music. If it could not be used without adding notes to what the composer had written then it should not be employed. The duty of the pianist was to be faithful to the composer. This would be made easier by the diminishing of technical difficulties. Presuming the Duplex came into general use, composers would inevitably avail themselves of the greater possibilities it afforded, and it would be only a matter of time for the difficulties of the Duplex to become as great as those on the present keyboard, but the artistic worth of complexity must always depend on the emotional and intellectual effect.

Miss Winifred Christie played a number of pieces and selected passages in order to demonstrate the points made by Mr. Webb, and interested members of the audience asked questions.

EARLY CHARTERS OF INCORPORATION GRANTED TO MUSICIANS

BY MURIEL SILBURN

(Concluded from April number, page 294)

Charles I. dealt very liberally with his musicians, one of the early appointments of his reign being that of Nicholas Lanier as court musician at the liberal salary of £200 a year. He granted a charter to the musicians of the realm, which bears date July 15, 11 Car., and commences by reciting its foundation upon the lines suggested by Edward IV.'s charter. It further relates that:

‘... certeine persons, suggesting themselves to be freemen of a pretended society of minstrels in the cittie of London, in prejudice of the liberties and privileges aforesaid in the said recited letters patent mentioned and intended to the minstrels and musicians of the said King [Edward IV.] and his heires, did by untrue suggestion procure of and from King James of ever-blessed memory, letters patent under his great seale of England, bearing date the eighth day of July, in the second yeare of his raigne, to incorporate them by the name of master, wardens, and cominalty of the arte or science of the musicians of London. And, among divers other privileges, to grant unto them the survey, scrutiny, correction, and government of all and singular, the musicians and minstrells within the said cittie of London, suburbs, liberties, and precincts of the said cittie, or within three miles of the same cittie. By colour whereof they endeavoured to exclude the musicians and minstrells enterteyned into the King's service, and all others expert and learned in the said art and science of musick, from teaching and practising the same within the said cittie and three miles thereof, that would not subject themselves unto their said pretended fraternity, or purchase their approbation thereunto, although greate part of them were altogether unskillfull in the said art and science of musick.’

The above passage throws considerable light upon the origin and material of James's charter, but the musicians to whom Charles granted a charter were not satisfied until they had, as they thought, entirely demolished the letters patent granted by James. The charter under consideration proceeds to describe how a scire facias (i.e., a writ) had been brought by the Court Musicians of Charles against the Musicians' Company of London, in the High Court of Chancery, and how ‘judgment of their prosecution had been had and given accordingly, and the letters patent vacated and cancelled thereupon.’ Briefly stated, James granted a charter to the Musicians of London in prejudice to the Act of Edward IV., and the musicians of Charles went to law against the said Company, won their case, and restored the law of Edward IV., which applied to the whole realm, the county of Chester excepted.

Proceeding with Charles's charter, we find that the King

‘... for and in consideration of the good and faithful service which the said musicians had done and performed unto him, and in pursuance of the intent and meaning of the said King Edward IV., ... doth, for him, his heires and successors, will, ordeine, constitute, declare, and graunt that the said Nicholas Lanier [and forty-nine others] his said musicians, or all such persons as are or shall be the musicians of him, his heires, and successors, shall from henceforth for ever, by force and vertue of the said graunt, be a body corporate and politique in deed, fact, and name, by the name of Marshall, Wardens, and Cominalty of the arte and science of Musick in Westminster, and by the same name have perpetual succession, and be capable in the law to impleade and be impleaded: And that they have a common seale.’

Then follows the appointment of officers. The corporation was to meet in or near the city of Westminster from time to time, and had power both to make bye-laws and impose fines on such as transgressed them. Next comes a clause for the ‘better government and ordering of all such as do or shall profess and exercise the art and science’ of music, which grants to the Marshal and his officers the ‘survey, scrutinie, correction, and government of all and singular, the musicians within our saide Kingdome,’ with the usual exception of Chester, of course. The remainder of the clause gives those admitted the right to exercise their art in London or elsewhere in the kingdom, except Cheshire, ‘any act, ordinances, or constitution of common council of the said Cittie of London or any other matter or thing whatsoever to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding.’ The conclusion of the last sentence was evidently intended to be the death-blow of the charter granted by James, and to render impossible any intended resuscitation of it. Although granted in the eleventh year of Charles, this charter is declared by Hawkins not to have been carried into practical use until the Restoration: it seems, however, to have received Royal Confirmation three years after it was originally granted.

Turning to the Restoration we find that the first meeting was held at the house of Mr. Ganley, at Durham Yard, Strand, on October 21, 1661, Nicholas Lanier acting as Marshal. The following items are taken from Hawkins:

1662. January 20.—Ordered that Edward Sadler for his insufficiency be silenced and disabled.

February 3.—Richard Graham appointed their Solicitor-at-law.

February 19.—It appears they licensed teachers of music.

1663. January 13.—Ordered that Matthew Lock, Christopher Gibbons, Dr. C. Colman, and William Gregory do come to the Chamber at Durham Yard on Tuesday next at 2 p.m., and bring each of them £10 or show cause to the contrary.

Under date March 1, 1663, we learn that a petition was presented to the King's Majesty for the renewing of their former patent. This petition seems eventually to have had the desired effect, for in 1670 was received a renewal of the patent, which runs as follows:

‘Whereas His Sacred Majesty hath been pleased after the example of his Royal Ancestors, to incorporate the Musicians of England for its encouragement of that excellent science, and the said corporation to have power over all that profess the same, and to allow and make free all such as they shall think fit: This is to give notice to all persons concerned in Musique, that the Corporation sits the Saturday in every week at their Hall in Durham Yard in the Strand, in pursuance of the trust and authority to them committed by his Most Gracious Majesty, and that they have granted several deputations into several counties to execute the same.’

Little remains to be said, save that these meetings came to an end in 1679, and thus the letters patent lapsed from sheer disuse. With respect to James's charter as represented in the Musicians' Company, it still survives, and so late as 1737 exercised its rights by arresting certain musicians playing at a concert in St. Martin's-le-Grand.

This paper is merely introductory to a subject so extensive that only by having easy access to a great number of ancient State papers and records, could full justice be given it.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

■ The members of the Dramatic Class gave two performances of Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona and of a fantasy in one Act, The Maker of Dreams, by Oliphant Down, on March 22 and 23, the cast being changed at each performance. The productions on both evenings reached a distinctly high level, and in several directions showed a marked advance upon previous productions.

An orchestral concert took place at Queen's Hall on March 28. The programme opened with the Funeral March from Coriolanus by A. C. Mackenzie, played In Memoriam the late Sir E. E. Cooper and the late Mr. Oscar Beringer, both of whom had been associated with the R.A.M. for many years, who had died each within a few days of the other in February last. A delightful performance of Saint-Saëns's Introduction and Rondo Capriccioso for violin was given by Mr. Israel Schlaen, a young violinist of considerable promise, and Miss Joan Lloyd and Mr. Russell Chester were heard in Pianoforte Concertos by Chopin and Tchaikovsky. The vocal items included songs by Gluck, Verdi, and Coleridge-Taylor, and a duet from Humperdinck's Hansel and Gretel. The programme also included an Overture, Prospero, by F. Corder and the second part of Saint-Saëns's third Symphony.

The summer term opens on Monday, May 1.

Commencing on May 3, a series of four lectures upon the 'History of Music' will be given by Dr. Frederick G. Shinn, in the Duke's Hall, on Wednesday afternoons at 4.30. The subjects of the lectures will be: César Franck; Johannes Brahms; the Rise of National Schools of Music; Bohemia and Russia; the English Musical Renaissance.

During the coming term the celebration of the centenary of the founding of the R.A.M. will take place, and this will include a number of important musical and social gatherings, full particulars of which will be announced in due course.

The following distinctions have recently been conferred: F.R.A.M., Messrs. Ernest Read and John Solomon; A.R.A.M., Mesdames Beatrice M. Bayly, Eveline Fincken, Grace Dorothy Griffiths, Messrs. Eric Bray, Eric Grant, and Leslie Regan; Hon. R.A.M., Messrs. John Booth and Fraser Gange.

TRINITY COLLEGE OF MUSIC

The summer term was formally inaugurated on April 26, when Sir Frederick Bridge gave an address to the students on the subject of 'Diligence,' and afterwards distributed diplomas and certificates to the successful students of the College at the Higher Examinations held earlier in the month. Prizes were also given to the following students: Harold Fairhurst and Dorothy M. Brittain (Grosvenor Gooch Bequest), and to Muriel Stopes, who gained the highest marks in musical history at the (Lent) Terminal Examination for those attending the Teachers' Registration Course.

The following candidates who were elected to scholarships as the result of an open competition held during the month were presented to the members of the Board: Ena Kathleen Browne, Dorothy G. Callender, Irene Kohler, William Lovelock, Margaret Mather, Adelaide S. Collins, Reginald Leopold, Dorothy F. Sexton, Herbert S. G. Batter, Eva N. Clarke, Constance Davies, Doris L. M. Duck, Lilian Mann, Eirlys Roberts, Miriam F. Anglin, Edward A. Kealey, and Dorothy N. Fox. After this ceremony a short programme of music was performed.

The following professors have recently been appointed to the teaching staff: Mr. Val Marriott, who will give a violin recital in June next at the College, and Miss Ethel Snape (singing).

On the occasion of the silver wedding of Mr. Henry T. Sims, conductor of the Bath Choral and Orchestral Society, a presentation was made to him on March 27, as a token of the esteem won by him during thirty-eight years of valuable service. The presentation was made by Lady Peirse, after a performance of Brahms's Requiem by the Society. Two days later a similar presentation was made to Mr. Sims in the interval of a performance of Elifjah by the Swindon Mechanics' Institute Choral and Orchestral Union, of which Mr. Sims has been conductor for twenty-five years.

ENGLISH MUSIC AT BOURNEMOUTH

BOURNEMOUTH, Easter.

Perhaps 'festival' is a term the least bit pompous for this series of concerts—predominantly of English music—with which Mr. Dan Godfrey is enhancing the April pleasures of this favoured place of greenery and soft airs and leisured throngs. 'Festival' suggests a consistent austerity which the circumstances cannot quite warrant, but the notion is capital—the notion of bringing out, day by day, works of native music of all schools, their interest enhanced by the presence of the composers and by the performances of celebrated executants—and Bournemouth, if Bournemouth has, as we may say, 'half-an-eye' to the spreading of its name in the world, will see to it that Mr. Godfrey's Easter festival of English music becomes an established annual.

Wonders, no doubt about it, have been worked at Bournemouth by Mr. Godfrey; his programmes, even when 'mixed,' and his truly admirable, euphonious, little orchestra, are wholly beyond and above the seaside music of the usual acceptance. It rests with the place itself to make these wonders more (Mr. Godfrey, we can guess, quite aches to go farther), and the place itself, which, in a dozen aspects and quarters, declares itself the haunt of moneyed ease, must be told that more is feasible and due, until it well equals the musical rank of such a watering-place as Wiesbaden.

Composers who have come or (since at the time of writing the course is still two-thirds to run) are to come to conduct their works are Sir Alexander Mackenzie, Sir Edward Elgar, Dr. Vaughan Williams, Dame Ethel Smyth, Prof. Granville Bantock, Mr. Gustav Holst, and Mr. Eugene Goossens. Singers and players are Mr. John Coates, Madame Kirkby Lunn, Miss Dorothy Silk, Miss Marie Hall, Mr. Harold Samuel, Mr. Stanley Kaye; and Sir Henry Wood and Mr. Albert Coates are to conduct.

Balfour Gardiner's Shepherd Fennel's Dance began the festival (April 13). When Mr. Granville Bantock lifted the conductor's stick for The Pierrot of the Minute we reflected that Bournemouth is lucky in the charms that can help to persuade a musician to come a hundred and fifty miles to conduct a piece of seven or eight minutes! Mr. Kaye, a young Yorkshire pianist, played in Stanford's C minor Pianoforte Concerto (Op. 126) (1911), which Mr. Godfrey conducted. Very nearly a 'great' Concerto was written here. But another turn of the wheel, we say, a degree more of heat, of impulse, and all would have lived from end to end. As it is we never fail to admire, but are engrossed only at intervals. The beauties of the work are the 'chamber music' passage in the first movement, the appealing 'song without words' of the A flat Adagio, and the Irish animation of the Finale. Mr. Kaye's playing was in a style better fitted for chamber music.

Dr. Vaughan Williams conducted his Pastoral Symphony. It is seldom in a decade, in a generation, that a song so new allows the hearer so to cast off dutiful apprehensions in the hearing. Ought we not to try harder? Mightn't more be won out of it by an extra strain on sympathy or intelligence? Such questions here fall away like tiresome winter gear when a first day of real spring invites the untrammelled stride. Here is fresh music! You gape more than you deliberately appraise, for it keeps on being 'just wonderful,' like an ideal coastwise walk where the turning path keeps on giving you a fresh curve of a bay, a fresh blue headland; you do not hurry, for the moment is good, and you go on and on for the ever-changing lights and contours. Certainly no Niagara or erupting Vesuvius is there to startle you round any one of the corners of this Symphony. There seems no call for strain on any sense. But, heavens! how beautiful the soft lines of low hills and curving sea!

The Good Friday programmes were of smaller account. There were symphonic movements of Schubert and César Franck, and Mr. John Coates spread every sail of his faultless singing art. But for Sullivan's reputation that In Memoriam Overture is clearly a pity. A bit of The Messiah was in the strange company of a celebrated Prelude in C sharp minor and songs sung to pianoforte accompaniment. On April 15 Madame Kirkby Lunn sang Dido's Farewell and some of Elgar's Sea Pictures, and Mr. Eugène Goossens succeeded both as conductor and composer. His Tam o' Shanter was encored. Mr. Godfrey conducted a short symphonic poem, Tintagel, of Arnold Bax, which made good hearing. This is a work to which the Bournemouth orchestra had given a first hearing some few months ago. It speaks with a good deal of rich and easy eloquence. A 'breezy summer day' by the celebrated ruins is described as the music's inspiration; thoughts of Tristan naturally insinuate themselves, and the admired composer delicately refrains, though with the Atlantic tinge in full view, from a storm. It is not, at least after this single hearing, easy to agree with Mr. Godfrey who declared this attractive Tintagel to be quite one of Mr. Bax's capital works. C.

Music in the Provinces

ANSTON (near Sheffield).—At the Musical Society's twelfth concert on March 18, Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast (with Mr. Joseph Green as soloist) was given, Mr. Edwin Presswood conducting. The most notable of the unaccompanied numbers was Morley's Fire, fire, my heart. Miss Mary Kirk played the first movement of de Beriot's seventh Violin Concerto.

BATH.—The Choral and Orchestral Society performed Brahms's Requiem on March 27, conducted by Mr. Henry T. Sims. Miss Fiffine de la Côte sang the soprano solo with much beauty of tone and expression.

BRISTOL.—The newly-formed Symphony Orchestra played Scriabin's Rêverie at its first concert on April 2. Mr. Maurice Alexander conducted, and Mr. Albert Sammons played solos.—On March 21, at the last concert of the Clifton Chamber Concert Party, were played Pizzetti's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in A and Florent Schmitt's Pianoforte Quintet in B minor.—The Philharmonic Society closed its season on April 1, the special feature being Act 2 of Rutland Boughton's The Immortal Hour. The programme also included Bach's God goeth up with shouting, Bantock's Sea Sorrow (from Songs of the Hebrides), Percy Grainger's Walking Tune for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, and Mock Morris for strings, and the unison song for choir and orchestra from Holst's The Planets. Mr. Arnold Barter conducted, and Mr. Rutland Boughton was present.

BIRMINGHAM.—On March 25, a massed choir, made up of eight Birmingham and Black Country male choirs, conducted by Mr. W. G. Robinson, sang Elgar's Reveille and a Lament by Robertson, and were conducted by Prof. Granville Bantock in one of his own works.—The Midland Institute Orchestra played an Overture, Jack, the Giant Killer, by Laurence Powell, and an Entr'acte by W. J. Fenney on March 20, Prof. Granville Bantock conducting.—The City Orchestra, at its final concert on April 2, played Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, the Hungarian March by Berlioz and the Meistersinger Overture.—At a concert given by Mr. Herbert Simmonds on March 17 he sang Moussorgsky's Death's Serenade and Rachmaninov's Christ is risen. Miss Joan Willis played the 'cello part of a Sonata in F by de Fesch, and with Mr. Percival Hodgson and Mr. Mullinar Tchaikovsky's Pianoforte Trio.—Under the auspices of the British Music Society, on March 16, Violin Sonatas by Bach, Mozart, Beethoven, and Brahms were played by Mr. Alexander Cohen and Mr. Lloyd Hartley.

BRADFORD.—At the sixth (and last) of the Free Chamber concerts on March 20, York Bowen's Suite in A minor was played by Messrs. Whitby Norton and D. Bentley, with Miss Nellie Chapman as pianist.

CALVERLEY (YORKS).—On March 20 the Choral Society sang Ernest Farrar's setting of The Blessed Damozel for alto solo, chorus, and orchestra, conducted by Mr. Norman Strafford. Miss Etty Ferguson was the solo vocalist in this and in Brahms's Alto Rhapsody. The orchestra (of local players) also gave Parry's Lady Radnor's Suite. Brahms's second Violin and Pianoforte Sonata was played by Mr. Edward Maude and Mr. Strafford.

CARDIFF.—Mr. Herbert Ware opened on April 4 a series of chamber concerts at reasonably low prices, he being the violinist of a pianoforte trio party.

CHATHAM.—The Free Church Choirs' Association numbered four hundred voices on March 29, and was conducted by Mr. Leslie Mackay in Thou, O God, art praised in Zion (C. H. Macpherson) and O Lord, the Maker of all things (King Henry VIII.), these being test-pieces for the Kent County Festival; Jesu, Word of God Incarnate (Elgar), Peace I leave with you (Wadeley), and Tchaikovsky's Hymn to the Trinity, No. 3: Arise, awake (Morley), The splendour falls (Walker), and My soul, there is a country (Brent-Smith).

CUDWORTH.—The Sheffield Quartet party played the Elgar Quartet on March 27 at the chamber music concerts promoted by the Workers' Educational Association.

DUMFRIES.—The Musical Section of the Mechanics' Institute was conducted by Mr. C. F. Eastwood in an excellent programme including Parry's Bliss Pair of Sirens, Stanford's Phaëdra's Croon, Coleridge-Taylor's Viking Song, and Scottish part-songs arranged by E. L. Bainton (Phyllis, the fair and The winter it is past), E. T. Sweeting (Johnnie Cope), and John E. West (Wi' a hundred pipers).

DURHAM.—Parry's Joh was performed on March 26 in the Cathedral, the Rev. A. D. Culley conducting a large choir and orchestra. Mr. C. B. Maude was at the organ.

EASTON-IN-GORDANO.—Three parish choirs combined on April 5 under the direction of Mr. J. V. Cavell, and presented Nunn's Everyman.

EXETER.—The string orchestra organized by Mr. Edward Petherick and conducted by Mr. Albert James, continues its valuable Concerts for the People. On March 23, to members of the Literary Society, and at a later date in another district, an excellent programme was played that included a Suite of three pieces by Purcell, and Debussy's Danse Sacrée and Danse Profane.—The programme of the Chamber Music Club on March 24 included the Clarinet Quintets of Mozart and Brahms, Holst's four Songs for voice and violin, and Brahms's Liebesslieder-Walzer.—Songs by Dr. Ernest Bullock (I love my God as He loves me) and Quilter were sung on March 28 by Mrs. Ivan Pasmore; Mrs. Ernest Bullock played the Bach-Tausig Toccata and Fugue in D minor and de Sévécac's En Vacances.—Bach's St. Matthew Passion was performed in the Cathedral on April 8 and 11 by the Cathedral Choir and the Voluntary Choir. Dr. Ernest Bullock conducted, and Mr. F. G. Bradford was at the organ.

GILLINGHAM.—On March 30 the Women's Citizen Choir of twenty voices, conducted by Mrs. Paggett, sang Mendelssohn's Greeting, Beethoven's Creation's Hymn, Schubert's Behold! it is a golden morning, and Franz Abt's The Seeds of Love and When the Swallows.

GRANTHAM.—At the last concert of the Philharmonic Society, held on March 16, the works performed were Coleridge-Taylor's Bon-Bon Suite and Gade's The Erl King's Daughter. The orchestra played the Peer Gynt Suite, and a set of variations by the conductor, Mr. Edward Brown.

HARROGATE.—Mr. Howard Carr has been appointed conductor of the Harrogate Orchestra in succession to the late Julian Clifford. Mr. Carr is hon. secretary of the Musical Conductors' Association and an hon. director of the Royal Philharmonic Society. He is a composer of orchestral music, notably the sketches, Three Heroes and The Jolly Roger.

KEIGHLEY.—On March 27 the Glee Union, conducted by Mr. J. Harker, sang Hail! God of Song (K. J. Pyne), Cordelia (G. A. Oxborne), Wanton Gales (S. Webbe), an African Idyll, Timbuctoo (Geibel), and Elgar's Feasting I watch.

KIRKCALDY.—On March 22 the Musical Society performed The Golden Legend with orchestra, Mr. Charles M. Cowe conducting. The choir numbered two hundred and fifty voices, and was supported by a capable orchestra of thirty. The principal vocalists were Miss Doris Vane, Miss Marie Hyles, Mr. John Perry, and Mr. Horace Stevens.

LIVERPOOL.—The Rodewald Society's series of concerts was wound up on March 20, when the Catterall Quartet played Brahms, Hugo Wolf (Italian Serenade), Glazounov, and Mozart. The same Quartet played to children (under the auspices of the Art Studies Association) at the Liverpool Collegiate School on March 20.—On March 21 the Irish Society organized a concert of Irish music, the chief feature being Stanford's Phaendrig Crahoore, performed by the Irish Choral Society with orchestra, conducted by Mr. H. P. Allen.—At the Crane Hall recital on March 22, Mr. Joseph Greene played pianoforte works by William Baines, Norman Peterkin, Horace Watkins, and Frederick Morrison.—At the recital for children at Rushworth Hall on March 25, Miss Desirée MacEwan lectured, and the music played included Bach's French Suite in E, the Scarlatti Sonata in B flat, a Toccata by Paradies, and some of Ravel's Sonatinas.—At the last matinée recital at Crane Hall, on March 29, Mr. Walter Hatton (violin), played a Hungarian Dance by Fischer, and Mr. Arthur Spencer (pianoforte) played Scarlatti Sonatas and Frank Bridge's Suite, A Fairy-tale.—In the Collegiate School Hall, on March 29, the Amateur Orchestral Society played to fifteen hundred children under the auspices of the Art Studies Association. Mr. Gordon E. Stutely conducted the first movement of the Unfinished Symphony, and songs by Arensky were sung.—M. Béla Bartók was the guest of the British Music Society on March 30, and played a good deal of his pianoforte music, including Three Burlesques, Un peu gris, Bear Dance, Two Dirges, and an Elegy.—Mr. Arthur Catterall at his recital on April 7, under the auspices of the British Music Society, played a Concerto by Hamilton Harty, Three Miniatures by Eileen O'Mally, a Romance by Millicent Duncan, Holbrooke's Humoreske, and the Delius Légende.

MANCHESTER.—On March 20 Miss Robinson's Quartet took part in Schönberg's Sextet, Transfigured Night, and also in Dame Ethel Smyth's Quartet in E minor.—At the Hallé concert on March 23, Mr. Hamilton Harty conducting, the programme included an Overture, Othello, a Berceuse for orchestra, and Three Ballades (Appassionato, Lento espressivo, and Con moto ed energico) for pianoforte by Michele Esposito, the composer being the pianist and also playing Mozart's Concerto in E flat with the orchestra. A symphonic poem, The Fountains of Rome, by Ottorino Respighi, was played.—The Apostles was performed at the concert on March 31.—On March 22 the Vocal Society sang Bach's cantata, O Eight Everlasting, Cornelius's The surrender of the soul to the Everlasting Love, and Parry's Music, when soft voices die, conducted by Mr. Harold Dawber.—At the Royal College of Music, on March 21, Brahms's Christmas Lullaby for contralto voice with viola obbligato was given. Miss Thelma Batty and Mr. W. J. Rees played Paderewski's Sonata for violin and pianoforte, and Mr. Stuart Redfern played a Concerto by Ernst.—At the Tuesday mid-day concert on March 22 the Catterall Quartet was joined by Mrs. Rawdon Briggs in Mozart's Quintet in C and Schubert's Op. 163.—Other works performed recently at the Hallé concerts have included Ravel's orchestral suite, Ma mère l'Oye, Debussy's Iberia, a symphonic entr'acte by Berlioz, The royal hunt and Storm in the forest, the Overture from Ducas's Suite Française, Saint-Saëns's symphonic poem, Le rouet d'Omphale, Mozart's Concerto for bassoon, and Schubert's Symphony, Op. 9.—At the Pension Fund Concert on April 6 a smallish audience heard a mixed programme that included the Euryanthe Overture, Saint-Saëns's Violoncello Concerto (Suggia), Dvorák's Carnaval Overture and Rhapsody, and a Strauss (Johann) Waltz. Madame Suggia's solo was the Bach C major Suite, and Miss Carrie Tubb sang.

NEWCASTLE.—At its fifty-first concert, on March 18, the Bach Choir sang the Mass in B minor, supported by an orchestra led by Mr. Alfred M. Wall. Dr. W. G. Whittaker conducted an impressive and meritorious performance.—The Dream of Gerontius was performed on March 23, by Newcastle and Gateshead Choral Union and the Leeds Symphony Orchestra, conducted by Dr. W. G. Whittaker, the orchestra also playing Walford Davies's Solemn Melody. Miss Helen Anderson, Mr. Frank Mullings, and Mr. William Hendry sang the solos in the oratorio.—Conducted by Mr. Cuthbert Horsley, Northumberland Orchestral Society, on March 30, played the Meistersinger Overture, Beethoven's seventh Symphony, and Edward German's Suite The Tempest.

OXFORD.—Arranged by the Provisional Council of Village Clubs, a concert given in Burford Church, on March 19, was enjoyed by an audience of over three hundred and fifty people. The programme consisted of organ music, string quartets and quintets, and oratorio excerpts.

PLYMOUTH.—On March 22 the Samuel Coleridge-Taylor Choral Society gave the first performance at Plymouth of that composer's Meg Blane, conducted by Mr. Douglas Durston, and supported by the string band of the Royal Marines. The choir also sang two 'Negro Spirituals'—Go down, Moses and Swing low, sweet chariot—and the orchestra, conducted by Lieut. P. S. G. O'Donnell, played the Othello Suite and Three Dream Dances.

ROCHESTER.—The last concert of the Choral Society on March 27, conducted by Mr. Hylton Stewart, consisted of mediæval music. Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch played music for harpsichord, virginal, lute, recorder, viol, and viola da gamba on 15th and 16th century instruments. This included John, come kiss me, for virginal and harpsichord; a 1640 version of Greensleeves, for violin and harpsichord; a Purcell Sonata for violin, accompanied by viola da gamba and harpsichord; and a Toccata for harpsichord (1658), also by Purcell, and two compositions by William Young (an Elizabethan composer). Mr. Gerald Cooper accompanied representative songs on the harpsichord, e.g., Let the dreadful engines of eternal will (Purcell), Come away, come sweet love, and Sleep, wayward thoughts (Dowland), Now I see thy looks were feigned (Thomas Ford), The Spanish Lady and Come, sweet lass (traditional, 17th century), and Phyllida flouts me (traditional, 16th century). The choir sang Now is the month of maying (Thomas Morley), Like two proud armies (Thomas Weekes), In fields abroad (William Byrd), The Silver Swan (Orlando Gibbons), Oft have I vowed (John Wilbye), and Fair Phyllis I saw (John Farmer).

SCARBOROUGH.—Conducted by Dr. Thomas Ely, the Philharmonic Society on March 29 performed King Olaf and excerpts from Die Meistersinger, Tristan und Isolde, Tannhäuser, and Siegfried.

SELBY.—The Philharmonic Society, of a hundred singers and players, gave its first concert on March 20 with Sterndale Bennett's May Queen, conducted by Mr. Arthur Simpson.

SETTLE.—Conducted by Mr. Frederic Lord, the Vocal Class, successor of the defunct Choral Union, gave a performance of Hiawatha's Wedding-Feast, on March 23, with orchestra.

SHEFFIELD.—Mr. Alick Maclean conducted an impressive performance of his oratorio The Annunciation (Part 1) by the Musical Union on March 23. The choir was familiar with the music, having taken part in its performance at the Scarborough Festival of last year, and the singing did justice to a work that fully deserves its recent access to popularity. The solo parts were taken by Miss Hilda Blake, Madame Eishaw, Mr. Ben Davies, and Mr. Stanley Beckett. The second part of the concert consisted of the Hymn of Praise, conducted by Dr. Coward.

WOLVERHAMPTON.—The Musical Society, conducted by Mr. Joseph Lewis, on March 23 produced Graham Godfrey's setting for choir and orchestra of Matthew Arnold's The Forsaken Merman.—The Choral Society, conducted by Dr. Ernest Darby, on March 30, performed The Dream of Gerontius with an orchestra mainly amateur in composition.

WORCESTER.—The Symphony Orchestra, on March 12, played Schubert's Symphony No. 7 and Beethoven's Prometheus Overture, conducted by Mr. George Austin, Jun.—Worcestershire Orchestral and Ladies' Choral Society, conducted by Sir Ivor Atkins, gave its seventeenth concert on March 24. The choir sang Elgar's Christmas Greeting, Vaughan Williams's Sound Sleep, Holst's Swallow, swallow, flying south, Ireland's See how the morning smiles, and Percy Buck's The blackbird's song. The orchestral numbers included Beethoven's seventh Symphony.—Bach's B minor Mass was performed by the Festival Choral Society, under Sir Ivor Atkins, on April 4. The choral singing was of festival standard throughout.

YORK.—On April 4 Dr. E. C. Bairstow conducted performances by the Musical Society of Brahms's Song of Destiny, Parry's Jerusalem, The Creation, and Butterworth's Orchestral Rhapsody, A Shropshire Lad.

Obituary

We regret to record the following deaths:

DANIEL WILBERFORCE ROTHAM, at Bristol, in his eighty-fifth year. For over fifty years he was one of the prominent figures in the musical life of Bristol, both as teacher and as conductor. He came to Bristol in 1852, and was soon appointed lay-clerk (bass) at the Cathedral. He took up the post of organist at St. Peter's, Clifton, in 1866. From 1878 he was chorus-master of the Festival Choral Society for eighteen years. His chief association was, however, with the Bristol Madrigal Society (founded in 1837), which he conducted from 1865 to 1915. Under his inspiring guidance the name of the Madrigal Society became known far and wide. One of its 'Ladies' nights' was the subject of a special article in the Musical Times for February, 1905. He made a special study of voice-production and the art of singing. His most successful pupil is Dame Clara Butt, whom he taught for over three years before she proceeded to the Royal College of Music. Mr. Rootham came of a musical family, whose tradition is now carried on by his son, Dr. Cyril B. Rootham, the well-known Cambridge musician.

E. DONAJOWSKI, on April 2, at the age of seventy-seven. He spent all his life in England, and devoted it to the well-known publishing business, of which he remained the head until his retirement in 1917. The Donajowsky series of miniature full scores have long been a household word among musicians.

HYLTON STEWART, aged seventy-two, Honorary Canon and Precentor of Chester Cathedral. Early in his career he was organist at Chichester Cathedral.

AN ITALIAN MUSIC CONGRESS

Last October a congress of musicians, promoted by three of the best-known music periodicals (Rivista Musicale, S. Cecilia, and Il Pianoforte), was held at Turin, and now the reports and speeches are published in book form by Messrs. Bocca, of Turin. English musicians were not represented at the meetings. Mr. Edward Dent was invited, but he was unable to attend. Papers of considerable importance were contributed on musical culture in Italy, on possible new developments of music publishing, on the teaching of music, &c. The bulk of these papers and lectures must necessarily be more interesting to Italians than to Englishmen, but many things said by the way deserve repetition. For instance, the speaker who lectured on 'Folklore' delivered incidentally a surprise attack on modern music:

'The modern musician can no longer be sincere.

If for a moment an idea occurs to him which bears the stamp of sincerity he immediately sets about to hide it or mask it, fearing that his sincerity might be mistaken for stupidity. The art of composition to-day is far more the result of thought than of sentiment. It has become a recipe with which any able chemist can concoct potions warranted to kill through ennui or irritation of the auricular nerves.'

The lecturer on 'Musical Publications' lamented the absence of a reliable corpus of the complete works of Italian musicians, and contrasted the inactivity of music publishers with the initiative shown by publishers of books on art. Messrs. Novello's volume on 'Dufay and his Contemporaries' was cited as an example to be followed by Italian publishers. An important protest was made against the restrictions surrounding, and indeed the repeated refusals to grant access to, the Tartini MSS. kept by the friars of the Cappella del Santo at Padua.

The discussion on the reform of musical colleges and of education threw a curious sidelight on the opinions of a composer already well known here, Ildebrando Pizzetti. Signor Pizzetti was, and perhaps still occupies the post of, professor of composition at the Bologna Conservatoire. He apparently does not believe that there is anything to be learnt from Beethoven, for Signor Giacomo Orefice told the Congress that as external examiner he found that the score of the Eroica was suggested as a test for sight-reading. He, of course, pointed out that the test was futile, as the Eroica must be known to all students of composition. He was assured, however, that Signor Pizzetti's students knew neither the score nor the work.

Finally it may be remarked that the Italian pianoforte manufacturer is apparently suffering from the slump of cheap German instruments. One of the speakers said that while he was ready to acknowledge the excellence of the best pianofortes which came from Germany, the inferior qualities sent to Italy were below the quality of the average Italian product. They found a ready market only because the low rate of exchange gave to German manufacturers an unfair advantage over their Italian competitors. And we imagine that the same cause contributes to handicap British industry as well.

F. B.

Musical Notes from Abroad

AMSTERDAM

In order to meet the exigencies of those classes who are hardest hit by the unsettled times, the Concertgebouw management has, besides the usual popular series, instituted a novel line of concerts the admittance to which is fixed at one guilder. As they are kept on the same level as the regular subscription concerts, it may fairly well be expected that this new venture will supply a real want. The concert of February 16 brought César Franck's Symphony and some delicate singing by Mlle. Mia Peltenburg. Subsequent programmes have introduced Borodin's second Symphony, Rachmaninov's Die Toteninsel, and Max Pauer in pianoforte concertos of Schumann and Mozart.

The scheme of the hundred and seventy-seventh Cecilia concert on March 2, consisted this time solely of works by Beethoven, viz., the Overture Leonore No. 3, the Emperor Concerto, in which M. Willem Andriessen acquitted himself creditably, and the fifth Symphony, of which I can hardly recall a finer performance. The Viennese pianist, Dr. Paul Weingarten, played the pianoforte part in Franck's Variations Symphoniques exquisitely on March 6, and Dr. Muck conducted d'Indy's Istar Variations. Madame Charles Cahier made her reappearance at Amsterdam as soloist of the following two concerts. She proved to be in first-rate form. Still we should have preferred to hear her in other works than Mahler's, or Berlioz's musically inferior scene La Captive. Ernest Bloch's Twenty-second Psalm, with its zealous religious outbursts, better suited her dramatic temperament.

In the line of chamber music concerts we have had of late some of the finest treats imaginable. The famous Capet Quartet gave a Beethoven evening which will be remembered for a long time to come. It is to be regretted that the splendid Hungarian String Quartet, in its otherwise praiseworthy desire to introduce something new, should have hit upon so unprofitable a work as Darius Milhaud's second String Quartet. We had, however, all reasons to be grateful for its fine performances of Beethoven's Op. 127 and Tchaikovsky's somewhat faded Quartet in D major. A complete victory may be said to have been gained by the Quatuor Poulet from Paris—indeed a finer reading of Debussy's unique String Quartet seems to me beyond the bounds of possibility. Gaston Poulet, the remarkable leader, played on this occasion Fauré's singularly fine Violin Sonata, ably seconded by M. Yves Nat, who joined forces with the Quartet in Franck's beautiful Pianoforte Quintet in F minor. Mesdames Madeleine Monnier (violoncello) and Marcella Herrenschildt (pianoforte), two Parisian artists, gave a sonata evening, when Beethoven's G minor Sonata, Albéric Magnard's Sonata in A, and Rachmaninov's E minor Sonata were produced. As it is hardly necessary to enlarge upon such important events as the pianoforte recitals given by Frederic Lamond and Moritz Rosenthal, my recording them will certainly be deemed sufficient.

W. HARMANS.

NEW YORK

Albert Coates has closed his season of conducting the New York Symphony Society, and Walter Damrosch has returned to his post. True to his predilections, Mr. Coates gave Scriabin's Poème de l'Extase for his final number, and true to his fondness for the classics Mr. Damrosch resumed his baton with a whole Beethoven programme, including the Emperor Concerto played by Josef Hofmann.

If, according to all musical traditions, jealousy rages in the breasts of our plethora of orchestral conductors, there was no evidence of it when no less than five of them appeared on the platform of Carnegie Hall in one evening, conducting in turn an orchestra of two hundred and twelve in a long programme, played for the establishing of a fellowship in the American Academy at Rome. The occasion was also made memorable by the presentation of a portrait bronze plaque to Mr. Damrosch, of himself, and the announcement that the fellowship was to be called the Walter Damrosch Fellowship, the conductor having spent fifty years of his life in America, a far longer period than any other of our foreign-born orchestral leaders have lived here. The players were picked from three orchestras—the Philharmonic, the New York Symphony Society, and the Philadelphia Orchestra. The five conductors were Josef Stransky, who was heard in Wagner and Beethoven, Artur Bodanzky in Wagner and Berlioz, Albert Coates in Brahms, Willem Mengelberg in Liszt, Leopold Stokowski closing the concert with Wagner. It was a popular programme and was enthusiastically received by an immense audience, who paid such high prices for their seats that a sum of about eighteen thousand dollars was realised for the project.

The Chicago Opera Company, in its five weeks' season at New York, produced only one novelty, The Love for Three Oranges, by Serge Prokofiev, who wrote the libretto as well as the music. The story is founded on a fairy-tale, written in the 18th century by Carlo Gozzi, an Italian author. It is a strangely and absurdly fantastic story, and the music 'fits the crime.' To call such stage antics 'acting' is as ridiculous as to call the noise made by the performers and the orchestra 'music.' The composer is a young Russian living at New York, and claims to be a pianist as well as a composer, but in neither line is he to be taken seriously except by the ultra-modernists. During the five weeks of the Chicago season, the rivalry ran high between that Company and the Metropolitan. The former (apparently in its anxiety to outdo the latter) had a wealth of voices—so many that there was not enough for them to do, with the result that the list of unearned salaries ran up to an enormous total. Several singers who were engaged for twelve or sixteen performances appeared only two or three times, but had to be paid for the number agreed upon, an enormous deficit for the McCormacks to pay—as much as eight hundred thousand dollars, it is said. As there is undoubtedly a bottom somewhere to the purse of even John D. Rockefeller, the McCormacks have withdrawn their support from the Chicago Opera Company, so that after this season the Company will have to forego absurd extravagances, and either be administered as a sane business proposition or go to the wall. But not all of Mr. Rockefeller's money is diverted to such foolishness, for he has paid for a series of four free orchestral concerts, given at the Metropolitan Museum of Art on Saturday evenings, which have drawn immense crowds—often, on fair nights, as many as ten thousand people occupying every available spot in the enormous main hall, in adjacent rooms, and the balconies above. Naturally the benches in the Museum provide only a limited number of seats, and the larger part of this audience stands, not only through the concert but for a long time beforehand to get an advantageous place. Mr. David Mannes conducts the orchestra, and the programmes are selected with great care, only the best music being given. A sample programme shows a Brahms Symphony, Mozart's Magic Flute Overture, Liszt's Les Préludes, a selection from Bach, and some Russian folk-songs. That part of the city to which the Museum is easily accessible is largely colonised by Russians, and every programme of these concerts contains some Russian music.

Catalan's Loreley was lately produced at the Metropolitan. It is distinctly an old-fashioned opera, simple, tuneful (but rather noisy) music, with plenty of chorus work and solos intervening, also two very pretty ballets. The action is supposed to take place on the banks of the Rhine, about the year 1500. It was curious to hear Alberich spoken of in the text, and to see the Rhine maidens disporting themselves in the river. Those who were disappointed in the novelties produced at the Metropolitan this winter are looking forward to the last one, which will be a revival of Mozart's Così fan tutte.

M. H. FLINT.

ROME

The principal attraction at the Royal Philharmonic Society's hall this month has been a cycle of three concerts given by the Roman violinist, Mario Corti, and Alexander Bustini (pianoforte), illustrative of the development of the sonata for violin and pianoforte. Modern music was represented by Samazeuilh's Sonata in E minor (1902-03), Guerrini's Sonata in A (1921, MS.), and John Ireland's in D minor (1909). All three compositions were played for the first time at Rome, and it must be confessed they were all received with somewhat of indifference. Other recent novelties have included a Suite for viola and pianoforte, the work of the young Roman Prince Leone Massimo, who is a distinguished amateur of music. His work was judged to be of good promise. At the Sala Bach the public has learnt to know what an excellent soloist the Costanzi orchestra hides in the person of Armando Delle Fornaci. He played at Rome what is regarded as an indisputable test of an artist's merit, the famous Concerto of Ernst, and gained an unqualified triumph.

The aristocratic ladies' club known as the Roman Lyceum organized an excellent Bach concert in which two well-known artists, Signora Mugnaini (vocalist) and Signor Dante Alderighi (pianoforte) took part. The programme included Suona Pur, two spiritual airs, and the air from the St. John Passion, for contralto, the Prelude and Fugue in D major, and a Minuet, March, and Musette (transcribed by Angelelli) for pianoforte.

At the Augusteum the most important event of the month has been a commemoration of Camille Saint-Saëns, given under the direction of Bernardino Molinari. The third Symphony was played, with Antonio Traversi at the organ and Signorina Tina Filipponi-Liniscalchi as pianist. The other two items were The Deluge and the Pianoforte Concerto in G minor.

At the Costanzi the principal events have been a visit of Mascagni to conduct his Piccolo Marat, and the presentation of Tannhäuser under Fritz Reiner. LEONARD PEYTON.

[Our notes from Paris, Vienna, and Berlin are held over, owing to late arrival.—ED., M. T.]

Miscellaneous

The twelfth annual Bohemian concert of the Harmony Glee Singers (a North London male-voice choir of twenty-five voices) was held at Cannon Street Hotel on March 29. Conducted by Mr. C. W. Pettit, the choir gave excellent interpretations of Webbe's The Mighty Conqueror, Goss's O Thou, Whose beams, Arcadelt's Now Spring in all her glory, Elgar's Feasting I watch, and other modern part-songs.

Capetown Orchestra held its eighth anniversary concert at the City Hall on February 28. Great enterprise was shown in the choice of a programme, which included the Suite from Stravinsky's Fire Bird (for the first time in South Africa), the Meistersinger Overture, Debussy's L'Après-midi d'un Faune, and L'Apprenti sorcier of Dukas.

A Julian Clifford Scholarship is to be founded at the Royal College of Music (for the training of conductors) if the subscriptions received amount to three thousand pounds. At present the amount subscribed is upwards of £500. The hon. treasurer is Mr. Cross, Barclay's Bank, St. Leonards-on-Sea.

Brahms's Requiem was sung at St. Paul's Church, Colwyn Bay, on April 14, under the direction of Mr. C. Morton Bailey. The soloists were Mrs. S. B. Moore, of Manchester, and Mr. J. C. Brien, of Liverpool Cathedral.

The Aberdeen Oratorio Choir, a new organization conducted by Mr. Willan Swainson, has recently sung the Christmas Oratorio, Brahms's Requiem, and Dvorák's Stabat Mater, and is now preparing for performances of Holst's Hymn of Jesus and Harty's The Mystic Trumpeter.

It is announced that the Leeds Choral Union is to perform The Apostles at Queen's Hall, London, on June 8 (in the afternoon), and at Canterbury Cathedral on June 9.

Mr. S. H. Anstey, the blind organist of the Parish Church, Basingstoke, has been appointed conductor of the Basingstoke Choral Society.

CONTENTS

Page

British Players and Singers: V.—Robert Radford (with Special Portrait)	307
Protection for Critics. By Ernest Newman	310
Zoltán Kodály. By Cecil Gray	312
Player-Piano Projects. By J. D. M. Rorke	315
Pearsall's Letters (continued). By W. Barclay Squire	318
Random Notes on a Recent European Tour. By C. A. Beckett Williams	319
New Light on Early Tudor Composers. XXV.—John Dygon. By W. H. Grattan Flood	320
Chopin. By Camille Saint-Saëns	321
A Remarkable Handel Collection: Christopher Smith's Transcripts of Handel's Works. By E. van der Straeten	322
An Italian View of British Music	324
Occasional Notes	325
Music in the Foreign Press. By M.-D. Calvocoressi	328
The Musician's Bookshelf	329
New Music	331
Gramophone Notes. By 'Discus'	341
London Concerts	342
Royal Choral Society	346
Opera in London	346
Dancers at Covent Garden	346
Dinner to Sir Landon Ronald	347
Church and Organ Music	348
Quality in Hymn Tunes: Lecture by Mr. H. C. Colles	348
Letters to the Editor	351
Sharps and Flats	354
Sixty Years Ago	354
Chamber Music for Amateurs	354
Gustav Holst on Purcell	354
The Duplex-Coupler Pianoforte	355
Early Charters of Incorporation granted to Musicians (concluded). By Muriel Silburn	356
Royal Academy of Music	357
Trinity College of Music	357
English Music at Bournemouth	357
Music in the Provinces	358
Obituary	360
An Italian Music Congress	360
Musical Notes from Abroad	360
Miscellaneous	361

Music:

Like as a Father . Anthem for Tenor Solo and Chorus. By GEORGE C. MARTIN	333
---	-----

THREE EXTRA SUPPLEMENTS are given with this Number:

1. Portrait of Robert Radford.
2. I will not leave you comfortless. Anthem for Whitsun-Day. By Bruce Steane.
3. Competition Festival Record.

DURING THE LAST MONTH.

Published by NOVELLO & CO., LIMITED.

BLAIR, HUGH.—"Gracious Spirit, Holy Ghost." Anthem for Whitsuntide or General Use. (No. 1006, Novello's Octavo Anthems.) 4d.

FLETCHER, PERCY E.—"Oh, the summer night." (No. 205, Novello's Two-part Songs.) 4d.
—"A Madrigal of Spring." (No. 206, Novello's Two-part Songs.) 3d.

H. A.—Andante. For Violoncello and Pianoforte. 2s.

HARRISS, CHARLES.—"The gold stars are fading." Part-song for S.A.T.B. 3d.

—"Try not to taunt me, fear." Part-song for S.A.T.B. 4d.

HOLLINS, ALFRED.—Concert Overture in F minor. (No. 88, Original Compositions for the Organ. New Series.) 3s.

MEDELSSOHN.—"I waited for the Lord." Arranged for Two Sopranos. (No. 204, Novello's Two-part Songs.) 3d.

PRENDERGAST, W.—"Come unto Him." Anthem. 4d.

ROBSON, R. WALKER.—"Baby Joy." Suite for Pianoforte. 2s. 6d.

SCHOOL MUSIC REVIEW, No. 359, contains the following music in both notations.—"Nightingale." Two-part Song on a Russian Melody. "Little Hunter." Junior Unison Song, from a French Nursery Rhyme. 2d.

TONIC SOL-FA SERIES:

No. 2379. "The Night Wind." Four-part Song.

G. RATHBONE 2d.

WATERS, C. F.—"Choral Melody." (No. 87, Original Compositions for the Organ. New Series.) 1s. 6d.

WILLIAMS, GERRARD.—(Arranged.) "The Bailiff's Daughter of Islington." (Traditional Ballad.) For Medium Voice. 2s.

—"Time." Song. In A minor for Contralto or Baritone. In C minor for Soprano or Tenor. 2s. each.

PUBLISHED FOR

THE H. W. GRAY CO., NEW YORK.

ANDREWS, MARK.—(Arranged.) "Skye Boat Song." For T.T.B.B. 12 cents (6d.).

DICKINSON, C.—Canzona. For Violin and Pianoforte.

FORSYTH, CECIL.—"The Dark Road." Theme for Viola Solo and String Orchestra. 82 (10s.). String Parts, 25 cents each (1s. each).

—"Highland Love." Part-song for T.T.B.B. 10 cents (4d.).

—"Highland Love." Part-song for S.S.A. 10 cents (4d.).

—"I know they'll shine again." For Soprano and Alto. 10 cents (4d.).

—"I know they'll shine again." For S.A.T.B. 10 cents (4d.).

WARREN, E. R.—"Arise, my heart, and sing." Anthem for Easter. 20 cents (10d.).

WEBBE, W. V.—"Jesu, do roses grow so red." Short Anthem. 10 cents (4d.).

CALISTHENICS

FOR THE MUSCLES USED IN SINGING

As taught and perfected for 20 years.

Astonishing increase of POWER, QUALITY, RANGE, and EASE of SINGING assured by five minutes' practice twice (better three) times daily.

No more sore or relaxed throat, or strained voice.

BY CORRESPONDENCE, £3 3s.

THOS. CHURCH SAXBY, L.Mus.T.C.L., UNDERCLIFFE, LEWES.

ORGAN MUSIC for SALE. Cheap. For Lists, write, "E.G.H.," 27, Lombard Street, Newark, Notts.

ORGAN MUSIC for SALE. List Free. Saint-Saëns, Dubois, Grison, Karg-Elert, Wely, Batiste, &c. Guilmant, Rheinberger, Widor Sonatas. Lacey, 21, Kingsmead Road, S.W. 2.

ORGANIST at large Surrey town, 12 miles London. Salary £60. Good choir; desires exchange to Dorking, Horsham, Guildford, or districts. A.R.C.O. standard. Smaller Salary no objection. Apply, "A.L.T.," c/o Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.1.

ESSAY.—A.R.C.O.—Eight model Essays on the two books set for next July exam. Valuable hints on writing. Send 5s. to "Essays," c/o Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.1.

FOR SALE. PIANO (Bluther), Upright. Rosewood. No. 77423. Condition as new. £150. Apply, "W.F.," c/o Novello & Co., Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.1.

SONGS OF LOVE AND LIFE.

WORDS BY RABINDRANATH TAGORE.

MUSIC BY ERIC FOGG.

1. ONE MORNING IN THE FLOWER GARDEN E (B to E) and G.
2. IT WAS IN MAY. D flat (A to D flat), and E flat
3. IN THE DUSKY PATH OF A DREAM. A flat to D.
4. PEACE. E flat, F (B to F), and G.
5. FREE ME FROM THE BONDS OF YOUR SWEETNESS. B to E.

Price each, 2s. net.

NOTE.—These songs were originally intended as a BARITONE Song-Cycle ; but "ONE MORNING IN THE FLOWER GARDEN" is very effective for TENOR VOICE in the higher key, and "PEACE" (published in three keys) is suitable for all voices.

The Bookman says : "An indefinable fascination exhales from Mr. Fogg's pages . . . With what faithfulness and flexibility they interpret the spirit of the words."

ELKIN & CO., LTD.,

8 & 10, BEAK STREET, REGENT STREET, LONDON, W.1.

AND OF ALL MUSIC SELLERS.

BECHSTEIN PIANOS

THE BECHSTEIN PIANO needs little recommendation to cultured tastes. Its beautiful tone and incomparable touch—qualities which have gained for it the esteem of every music-lover, and have set a standard to the world—are as exquisite and as characteristic as ever.

REDUCED PRICES.

Write or call for Catalogue.

SOLE AGENCY,

THE

Autoplayer Co., Ltd.,

126, NEW BOND STREET,

LONDON, W.1.

TELEPHONE: GERRARD 2653.

ERARD PIANOS PARIS.

THESE BEAUTIFUL INSTRUMENTS NOW ON VIEW.

Full particulars on application.

S. & P. ERARD,

18, GREAT MARLBOROUGH STREET, W. 1.

PIANO PEDALS, with Octave Coupler

This wonderful invention supersedes all Piano Pedals, and is a Master Patent.

St. George's Hall, Liverpool,
9th April, 1921.

"The simplicity of the attachment, and the clever sixteen-feet, eight-feet, or both combined, 'OPTIONAL OCTAVE' contrivance, astonished me.

"I was delighted with the Pedal touch and with the variety in that touch, which your Attachment makes possible. It is very responsive to the movements of the feet, and is reliable."

HERBERT F. ELLINGFORD, Mus. Bac. Oxon., F.R.C.O.

Terms: 17 guineas net cash, or monthly payments arranged.

Write for Lists, Prices, and Clients' Opinions, and References to THE MALKIN PATENT PEDAL CO., LTD.,
NEWCASTLE-UNDER-LYME.

ANTHEMS FOR ASCENSIONTIDE.

*Above all praise and all majesty	Mendelssohn	2d.	Let not your heart be troubled (Double Chorus unac.) ..	M. B. Foster	4d.
Achieved is the glorious work	Haydn	14d.	*Let not your heart (Four-part)	Myles B. Foster	2d.
*Achieved is the glorious work (and Chorus) ..	Haydn	2d.	*Let their celestial concerts all unite	Handel	2d.
All glory to the Lamb	Spohr	2d.	*Lift up your heads	Handel and J. L. Hopkins, each	2d.
Awake up, my glory	M. Wise	4d.	*Lift up your heads	S. Coleridge-Taylor	2d.
*Christ became obedient unto death	J. F. Bridge	2d.	Lift up your heads	W. Turner	2d.
Christ is not entered into the Holy Places ..	Eaton Fanning	2d.	*Look, ye saints	Myles B. Foster	2d.
Come, ye children	Henry John King	4d.	O all ye people, clap your hands	H. Purcell	4d.
For it became Him	Oliver King	2d.	*O clap your hands	J. Stainer	2d.
God is gone up	*Croft, 6d.; W. B. Gilbert	3d.	*O clap your hands	T. T. Trimmell	2d.
*God, my King	Bach	2d.	*O God, the King of Glory	H. Smart	6d.
Grant, we beseech Thee	H. Lahee	2d.	*O God, when Thou appearest	Mozart	6d.
Grant, we beseech Thee (Collect)	A. R. Gaul	4d.	*O how amiable	J. Barnby	2d.
*Hallelujah unto God's Almighty Son	Beethoven	4d.	*O Lord our Governour	H. Gadsby	2d.
*How excellent Thy Name, O Lord	Handel	2d.	*O Lord our Governour	Marcello	2d.
*If ye then be risen with Christ	Ivor Atkins	6d.	*O risen Lord	J. Barnby	2d.
If ye then be risen	*F. Osmond Carr and J. Naylor, ea.	4d.	*Open to me the gates	F. Adlam	6d.
If ye then be risen (Two parts)	F. W. Wadeley, 2d.; M. B. Foster	4d.	*Rejoice in the Lord	J. B. Calkin	2d.
In My Father's house	H. Elliot Button and J. Maude Crament, ea.	4d.	*Sing unto God	F. Bevan	4d.
In that day	George Elvey	6d.	*Ten thousand times ten thousand	E. Vine Hall	4d.
In that day (Open ye the gates)	F. C. Maker	4d.	The earth is the Lord's	T. T. Trimmell	6d.
*It shall come to pass	B. Tours	2d.	*The Lord is exalted	John E. West	2d.
I will not leave you comfortless	W. Byrd	4d.	The Lord is King	H. Gadsby, 8d.; H. J. King, 6d.; W. King	3d.
*King all-glorious	J. Barnby	81.	Thou art a priest for ever	S. Wesley	4d.
*King all-glorious (with Chorus arr. for four voices)	J. Barnby	61.	*Unfold, ye portals	Ch. Gounod	4d.
*Leave us not, neither forsake us	J. Stainer	2d.	*Where Thou reignest	Schubert	4d.
Let not your heart	Eaton Fanning and G. Gardner, each	4d.	Who is this so weak and helpless	Rayner	2d.

ANTHEMS FOR WHITSUNTIDE.

And all the people saw	J. Stainer	8d.	In My Father's house	J. Maude Crament	4d.
*And suddenly there came	Henry J. Wood	4d.	It shall come to pass	G. Garrett	8d.
And when the day of Pentecost	C. W. Smith	4d.	*It shall come to pass	B. Tours	2d.
*As pants the hart	Spohr	2d.	Let God arise	Greene	8d.
*As the hart pants	Mendelssohn	2d.	Let God arise	T. T. Trimmell	6d.
Behold, I send the promise	J. Varley Roberts	6d.	*Let not your heart be troubled	H. G. Tremblay	2d.
*Come, Holy Ghost	Attwood	2d.	Look down, Holy Dove	B. Luard-Selly	4d.
Ditto (Three-part, s.s.a.)	Attwood	3d.	*O clap your hands	J. Stainer	8d.
Come, Holy Ghost	Elvey and J. L. Hutton, each	6d.	*O give thanks	G. Elvey	4d.
Come, Holy Ghost	C. Lee Williams and *Palestrina, each	3d.	*O Holy Ghost, into our minds	G. A. Macfarren	2d.
Come, Thou Holy Spirit	J. F. Barnett	4d.	*Oh! for a closer walk with God	Myles B. Foster	2d.
Do not I fill heaven and earth	Hugh Blair	4d.	O taste and see	*Goss; A. H. Mann, each	4d.
*Eye hath not seen (Two-part setting)	Myles B. Foster	2d.	O taste and see	Sullivan	2d.
*Eye hath not seen (Four-part setting)	Myles B. Foster	2d.	O Thou, the true and only Light	Mendelssohn	3d.
Fear thou not	Josiah Booth	2d.	O where shall wisdom be found	Boyce	2d.
Give thanks unto God	Spohr	6d.	*Our blest Redeemer	E. V. Hall	4d.
Glorious and powerful God	Orlando Gibbons	6d.	*Peace I leave	J. V. Roberts	2d.
*God came from Teman	C. Steggall	6d.	*Praised be the Lord daily	J. B. Calkin	2d.
*God is a Spirit	W. S. Bennett	6d.	Sing to the Lord	Smart	2d.
*Great is the Lord	W. Hayes	6d.	*Spirit of mercy, truth, and love H. A. Chambers	B. Luard-Selly	2d.
*Grieve not the Holy Spirit	J. Stainer	4d.	The eyes of all wait upon Thee	Gibbons	6d.
Hail I breath of life	Thomas Adams	2d.	*The Glory of the God of Israel	T. Adams	2d.
Happy is the man	E. Prout	10d.	*The Lord came from Sinai	John E. West	4d.
He that dwelleth in the secret place	Josiah Booth	6d.	The Lord descended	Hayes	2d.
*Holy Spirit, come, O come (Ad Spiritum Sanctum)	G. C. Martin	2d.	The Lord is in His Holy Temple	J. Stainer	6d.
I was in the spirit	Blow	8d.	The Lord is in His Holy Temple	E. H. Thorne	2d.
*I will magnify Thee	J. H. Parry	4d.	The love of God is shed abroad	S. Reay	2d.
*I will not leave you comfortless	Bruce Steane	3d.	There is no condemnation	H. S. Irons	4d.
*I will pray the Father	G. W. Torrance	2d.	The Spirit of God	Arthur W. Marchant	4d.
*If I go not away	Thomas Adams	2d.	*The wilderness	John Goss, 3d.; *S. S. Wesley	8d.
*If I go not away	A. J. Caldicott	2d.	*When God of old came down from Heaven ..	E. V. Hall	4d.
If ye love Me	Bruce Steane, 3d.; C. S. Heap	2d.	We will rejoice	Croft	6d.
*If ye love Me	W. H. Monk, Tallis, and R. P. Stewart, each	4d.	When the Day of Pentecost	A. Kempton	4d.
If ye love Me	Herbert W. Wareing and W. J. Westbrook, each	4d.	Whoever drinketh	J. T. Field	2d.
*In divers tongues	Palestrina	3d.

ANTHEMS FOR TRINITYTIDE.

*Almighty and everlasting God	Gibbons	2d.	In sweet consent	E. H. Thorne	4d.
Almighty God, Who hast promised	H. Elliot Button	14d.	In the fear of the Lord	J. Varley Roberts	4d.
*Angel Spirits, ever blessed	Tchaikovsky	3d.	Let the peace of God	J. Stainer	6d.
Ascribe unto the Lord	S. S. Wesley	6d.	*Let Thy merciful ears	A. R. Gaul	2d.
Behold, God is great	E. W. Naylor	6d.	*Light of the world	E. Elgar	2d.
*Beloved, if God so loved us	J. Barnby	2d.	Lord of all power and might	E. T. Chipp	4d.
Beloved, let us love one another	Gerard F. Cobb	2d.	*Lord of all power and might	William Mason	2d.
Be ye all of one mind	Arthur E. Godfrey	4d.	Lord of all power and might (men's voices) ..	J. Barnby	3d.
Blessed is the man	John Goss	6d.	Lord, we pray Thee H. A. Chambers and *J. Varley	Roberts ea.	2d.
Blessing and glory	Boyce	2d.	O Father blest	J. Barnby	2d.
*Blessing, glory	Bach	8d.	O God, Who hast prepared	A. R. Gaul	2d.
Come, ye children	Josiah Booth	4d.	O joyful Light	B. Tours	6d.
God came from Teman	C. Steggall	6d.	*O Lord, my trust	King Hall	2d.
*God so loved the world	Matthew Kingston	2d.	O taste and see	*J. Goss and A. H. Mann, each	4d.
Grant, O Lord	Mozart	2d.	O taste and see	A. Sullivan	2d.
Grant to us, Lord	H. Elliot Button	14d.	O where shall wisdom be found?	Boyce	8d.
*Hail, gladdening Light	J. T. Field, 3d.; *G. C. Martin	6d.	Ponder my words, O Lord	Arnold D. Culey	2d.
*Holy, holy, holy	C. Croft	6d.	*Praise His awful Name	Spohr	3d.
Holy, Lord God Almighty	T. Bateson	6d.	Rejoice in the Lord	G. C. Martin	81.
*How goodly are Thy tents	F. Ouseley	2d.	*See what love hath the Father	Mendelssohn	2d.
*How lovely are Thy dwellings	Spohr	2d.	Sing to the Lord	Mendelssohn	10d.
*Hymn to the Trinity	Tchaikovsky	2d.	*Stand up and bless	J. Goss	61.
I am Alpha and Omega	Ch. Gounod, J. Varley Roberts each	4d.	Teach me Thy way	W. H. Gladstone, 3d.; Frank L. Moir	4d.
*I am Alpha and Omega	J. Stainer	2d.	*The Lord hath been mindful	S. S. Wesley	4d.
I beheld, and lo!	Blow	8d.	*The Lord is my Shepherd	G. A. Macfarren	2d.
I know that the Lord is great	F. Ouseley	8d.	*The Lord is my Shepherd	J. Shaw	41.
I saw the Lord	Cuthbert Harris, 4d.; *J. Stainer	8d.	The Lord will comfort Zion	H. Hiles	81.
I will magnify	J. Shaw	6d.	Thou art worthy, O Lord	F. E. Gladstone	4d.
*I will sing of Thy power	Greene	6d.	Thou shalt show me the path of life	Alan 'r'ay	2d.
*I will sing of Thy power	A. Sullivan	2d.	Three in One and One in Three (S.S.) ..	F. W. Wadeley	3d.
I will sing unto the Lord	H. Wareing	2d.	We humbly beseech Thee	H. Elliot Button	14d.
In humble faith	G. Garrett	2d.	Whosoever is born of God	H. Oakeley	4d.
*In Jewry is God known	J. Clarke-Whitfield	2d.	Who can comprehend Thee	Mozart	4d.

* * Anthems marked thus (*) may be had in Tonic Sol-fa, 14d. to 3d. each.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

COMPOSITIONS

BY

EDWARD BUNNETT, MUS. D., CANTAB.

SERVICES.

TE DEUM LAUDAMUS IN G	4d.
TE DEUM LAUDAMUS IN E	4d.
BENEDICITE IN E	2d.
BENEDICTUS AND JUBILATE IN E	4d.
MAGNIFICAT AND NUNC DIMITTIS IN E FLAT	4d.
MAGNIFICAT AND NUNC DIMITTIS IN D	4d.
COMMUNION SERVICE IN E MAJOR	1s.

ANTHEMS.

IF YE LOVE ME—WHIT SUNDAY	3d.
I WILL MAGNIFY THEE	4d.
I WAS GLAD	4d.
Do. Tonic Sol-fa	2d.
O HOW AMIABLE—SOLO AND CHORUS	4d.

SECULAR MUSIC.

PART-SONG—"May, sweet May"	4d.
Instrumental Parts can be hired on application to the Composer.
PART-SONG—"Beware"	1d.
Do. "Over hill, over dale"	4d.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

"Such settings as these cannot do otherwise than tend to popularise the Church Service."—Musical Standard, June 6th, 1891.
 "Good, effective, easy, and dignified."—Musical Times, April 1, 1891.
 "Admirably adapted to meet the requirements of the majority of choirs and congregations." "Deserve extensive recognition and use."—Musical News, September 4 and 25, 1891.
 Also recommended by the Guardian, Church Times, &c., &c.

POPULAR CHURCH MUSIC

BY

J. H. MAUNDER.

HARVEST ANTHEMS.

	Staff Notation.	Tonic Sol-fa.
Sing to the Lord of Harvest	4d.	3d.
While the earth remaineth	4d.	3d.
Blessed be the Name of the Lord	4d.	3d.

SERVICES

SERVICE IN G	2s.	1s. 4d.
Or, separately:—
Te Deum	4d.	3d.
Benedicite, omnia Opera	3d.	3d.
Benedictus	3d.	3d.
Jubilate	4d.	3d.
Office for the Holy Communion	10d.	8d.
Pater Noster from the above	3d.	3d.
Amen ditto	1½d.	1½d.
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis	4d.	3d.

SERVICE IN CHANT FORM (No. 1)	1s. 4d.	10d.
Or, separately:—
Te Deum, &c., with Kyrie	4d.	3d.
Office for the Holy Communion	8d.	6d.
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis	4d.	3d.
Te Deum in B flat	4d.	3d.
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C (partly Unison)	4d.	2d.
Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D	4d.	3d.

ORGAN.

Voix Seraphique (for Recitals)	2s.	—
CHURCH CANTATA.
Penitence, Pardon, and Peace (for General use)	2s.	1s. 4d.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

TE DEUM IN E FLAT.

COMPOSED BY

CUTHBERT HARRIS.

Published by NOVELLO & Co., LTD. Price Fourpence.

"Not beyond the powers of a well-trained Church choir, to whom it will appeal not only on account of the music, but because there is no elaborate development. Dr. Harris, in giving a jubilant ring to his music, has preserved its dignity."—Musical News.

Specimen copy from

Dr. HARRIS, 58, Avondale Road, Gorleston-on-Sea.

OVER SEVEN MILLION COPIES OF CALEB SIMPER'S Compositions in Church Music now sold.

NEW ANTHEMS, ETC.

COMPOSED BY CALEB SIMPER.

- *SING FORTH HIS PRAISE Harvest 4d.
 *BE THANKFUL UNTO HIM Harvest 5d.
 Both greatly admired and appreciated.
 *THE KING IN HIS BEAUTY New 4d.
 Full of expression and very effective.
 GOD IS OUR REFUGE 3rd Edit. 8d.
 Short Work. Solos and Choruses. Occupies about 18 minutes.
 *NEW No. 24 ANNIVERSARY SELECTION. Complete, 3d. Words only, 5s. per 100. Quantities on liberal terms. A charming Set of Seven Festival Hymns and Tunes.
 NEW No. 11 VOLUNTARY BOOK. 2s. Seventeen Pieces written on Two Staves with Pedal-part indicated. 4th Edition.
 Those marked * are also issued in Tonic Sol-fa.
 London: A. WREKES & Co., 14, Hanover Street, Regent Street, W.1.
 Chicago, U.S.A.: CLAYTON F. SUMMY Co., 429, S. Wabash Ave.

These Compositions are exceptionally Melodious, Interesting, and effective. Have attained world-wide appreciation.

POPULAR WHITSUN ANTHEMS

COMPOSED BY EDWYN A. CLARE.

- *PEACE I LEAVE WITH YOU 21st 1000 4d.
 *AND WHEN THE DAY OF PENTECOST 12th 1000 4d.
 *ABIDE IN MY LOVE 13th 1000 4d.
 *THE LORD REIGNETH (Festival) 20th 1000 4d.
 PRAISE THE LORD, O JERUSALEM (Festival) 40th 1000 4d.
 *THE BLESSING OF PEACE (I WILL EXTOL THEE) New 4d.
 FAVOURITE MAGNIFICAT AND NUNC DIMITTIS IN D 28th 1000 6d.
 Full of flowing melody. Sung at a Choral Festival.
 Those marked * are also issued in Tonic Sol-fa.
 London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Ltd., 160, Wardour Street, W.1.
 New York: THE H. W. GRAY Co., Sole Agents for the U.S.A.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE

OFFICE FOR THE HOLY COMMUNION

SET TO MUSIC IN KEY A

By CHARLES N. ALSOP, A.R.C.O.

Price ... One Shilling and Sixpence net.

FESTIVAL CHORUS (FOR ORGAN).

By T. H. DOBIE.

Price ... Two Shillings net.

DOLART & Co., 145, Oxford Street, London, W.1.

A SHORT AND EASY SETTING OF

THE OFFICE FOR THE

HOLY COMMUNION

IN THE KEY OF E FLAT.

1. KYRIE.
- 1a. RESPONSES TO THE COMMANDMENTS.
2. CREDO.
3. SANCTUS.
4. BENEDICTUS QUI VENIT.
5. AGNUS DEI.
6. GLORIA IN EXCELSIS.

COMPOSED BY

BASIL HARWOOD.

(Op. 35.)

PRICE, ONE SHILLING.

Voice Part only (for congregational use) price Sixpence.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

COMMUNION SERVICE IN F

(MEN'S VOICES)

BY

R. WALKER ROBSON.

Price One Shilling.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

Digitized by Google

THE CHURCH HYMNAL FOR THE CHRISTIAN YEAR

JUST PUBLISHED.

A NEW EDITION OF THE WORDS

Medium type, with musical expression marks.

For Choir Boys and General Use.

Price, Cloth, Three Shillings net.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

ORGAN-STOPS

AND THEIR

ARTISTIC REGISTRATION

NAMES, FORMS, CONSTRUCTION, TONALITIES, AND OFFICES IN
- . SCIENTIFIC COMBINATION . .

BY

GEORGE ASHDOWN AUDSLEY, LL.D.

ECCLESIASTICAL AND ORGAN ARCHITECT.

"... Dr. Audsley has made a valuable contribution to Organ literature which every organist worthy the name should add to his library."—Musical Times.

ILLUSTRATED.

Price, Cloth, Twelve Shillings and Sixpence net.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

New York: THE H. W. GRAY CO., Sole Agents for the U.S.A.

COMPOSITIONS by T. TERTIUS NOBLE.

486. TE DEUM AND JUBILATE in B minor. Price 8d.
487. MAGNIFICAT AND NUNC DIMITTIS in B minor. Price 8d.

TWELVE UNACCOMPANIED ANTHEMS.

492. SOULS OF THE RIGHTEOUS.
493. O HEarken THOU UNTO THE VOICE.
494. I WILL LAY ME DOWN IN PEACE.
495. O WISDOM, SPIRIT OF THE HOLY GOD.
496. FIRCE WAS THE WILD BILLOW.
497. Do. do. Male Voices.
498. COME, O THOU TRAVELLER UNKNOWN.
499. HAIL, GLADDENING LIGHT.
500. COME, O CREATOR SPIRIT.
501. JESU, THE VERY THOUGHT OF THEE IS SWEET.
507. THE SAINTS OF GOD.
626. LET ALL THE WORLD.

Price 4d. each.

JUST PUBLISHED.

798. INTO THE WOODS. Anthem.
806. NEW LIFE, NEW LOVE. T.T.B.B. } Part-Songs.
807. SWEET AND LOW. T.T.B.B. }
Price 4d. each.

BANKS & SON, MUSIC PUBLISHERS, YORK.

KEGAN PAUL & CO. INTERNATIONAL LIBRARY OF MUSIC.

Edited by A. EAGLEFIELD HULL, Mus. Doc. (Oxon.) and H. KEATLEY MOORE, Mus. Bac (Lond.), B.A. Large 8vo. First 3 vols. now ready

- (1) A MUSICAL TOUR THROUGH THE LAND OF THE PAST. By ROMAIN ROLLAND. 10s. 6d.

"The appearance of A Musical Tour, the fascinating Voyage Musical, in a most becoming English dress is something of an event. It is pure history written with all the fancy and none of the falsity of the historical novel. The translation (by Bernard Miall) could not be bettered."—London Mercury.

- (2) THE ART OF THE PLAYER-PIANO: a Text-book for Student and Teacher. By SYDNEY GREW. 12s. 6d. net.

"At last there is at the disposal of the player-piano performer a reliable and informative text-book that should prove useful alike to student and teacher. . . it may be said to mark an epoch in the development of the player-piano."—Musica.

"A most excellent text-book."—Glasgow Herald.

- (3) MUSICAL PORTRAITS. By PAUL ROSENFELD. 10s. 6d. net.

A series of twenty acute and sympathetic interpretations of Wagner, Moussorgsky, Berlioz, Debussy, Ravel, Rachmaninoff, Stravinsky, Reger, Sibelius, Ornstein, Strauss, Liszt, Franck, Borodin, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Scriabin, Mahler, Schoenberg, Loeffler, Bloch; with Appendix of Brief Biographies.

THREE MONOGRAPHS BY J. F. PORTE.
7s. 6d. net each.

Biographical sketches (personal and artistic) of composers, estimating the significance of their creative work in musical history. Each Opus is described separately (chronological order), and classified in an Index.

"Messrs. Kegan Paul are rendering British music a real service by publishing musical bibliographies of this kind."—Spectator.

- (1) SIR EDWARD ELGAR.

"A concise guide to the composer's works. Each is considered carefully. The value of these descriptive notes can scarcely be overrated. Altogether it makes a most useful reference book."—Musical Standard.

"This exceedingly useful volume."—Aberdeen Journal.

- (2) SIR CHARLES V. STANFORD.

"As a reliable guide to all this [Stanford's] music, Mr. Porte's volume will be invaluable."—Monthly Musical Record.

- (3) EDWARD MACDOWELL: a Great American Tone-Poet.—This Day.

CREATIVE TECHNIQUE: for Artists in General and Pianists in Particular. By GEORGE WOODHOUSE. 2s. 6d. net.

"The author, a distinguished artist and teacher, sums up for us the result of his knowledge and investigations in the all-important study of Technique."—Musical News.

Mr. GABRILOWITSCH writes: "I think it is really a most interesting work. Some of the passages in it should be read by every music student and teacher. The whole is most stimulating."

IMPROVISING: a Simple Method of Teaching the Subject to Children of Average Ability. By ETHEL HOME, Math. Tripos, Camb.; Headmistress, Kensington High School for Girls. With Musical illustrations. 4to, boards, 2s. net.

RECENTLY PUBLISHED

BRIDGE (SIR F.). TWELVE GOOD MUSICIANS. From JOHN BULL to HENRY PURCELL. With Two Portraits. 5s. net.

LONG (CONSTANCE W.). A BOOK OF CHILDREN'S GAMES: 100 Games for use in Schools and Play-centres, with Musical Scores of the 20 Singing-Games. 4to. 2s. 6d. net.

QUARRY (W. E.). DICTIONARY OF MUSICAL COMPOSITIONS AND COMPOSERS: with a Classified Bibliography of Music. 5s. net.

KEGAN PAUL & Co., LTD.,
68-74, CARTER LANE, LONDON, E.C.4.

SOLOS FROM THE SACRED CANTATAS

OF

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH.

Each Book, Two Shillings.

FIRST SET.

SOPRANO.

- Air WITHIN MY HEART OF HEARTS ("A Stronghold Sure").
- Air OUR JESUS HATH FOR AYE ("God goeth up").
- Air MY HEART EVER TRUSTING ("God so loved the world").
- Air O GRANT US, MIGHTY LORD ("Jesus, now will we praise Thee").
- Air SIGHING, WEEPING ("My Spirit was in heaviness").

ALTO.

- Air THOU, WHOSE PRAISES NEVER END ("Bide with us").
- Recit. { THE FATHER HATH APPOINTED HIM ("God goeth up").
- Air { MY SPIRIT HIM DESCRIBES ("God goeth up").
- Air INTO THY HANDS ("God's time is best").
- Air REJOICE, YE SOULS, ELECT AND HOLY ("O Light Everlasting").

TENOR.

- Air LORD, TO US THYSELF BE SHOWING ("Bide with us").
- Recit. { WHY HAST THOU THEN, O GOD ("My Spirit was in heaviness").
- Air { FAST MY BITTER TEARS ARE FLOWING ("My Spirit was in heaviness").
- Air REJOICE, O MY SPIRIT ("My Spirit was in heaviness").
- Recit. { THE MIGHTY GUARDIAN ("Thou Guide of Israel").
- Air { HIS FACE MY SHEPHERD LONG IS HIDING ("Thou Guide of Israel").
- Air AND WHY ART THOU, MY SOUL, SO FEARFUL ("When will God recall").

BASS.

- Recit. { HE COMES, THE LORD OF LORDS ("God goeth up").
- Air { 'TIS HE, WHO ALL ALONE ("God goeth up").
- Recit. { IT IS NOT MINE ("God so loved world").
- Air { ON MY BEHALF " " "
- Recit. { YEA, THIS THY WORD ("Thou Guide of Israel").
- Air { WHOM JESUS DEIGNS " " "
- Air YET SILENCE ("When will God recall").

SECOND SET.

SOPRANO.

- Air OPEN WIDE, MY HEART ("Come, Redeemer").
- Air FATHER, WHAT I PROFFER ("Give the hungry man thy bread").
- Air COME, VISIT, YE GLOWING ("How brightly shines").
- Air I HAVE WAITED FOR THE LORD ("If thou but sufferest").

ALTO.

- Air GOD'S ENSAMPLE THUS TO FOLLOW ("Give the hungry man thy bread").
- Air JESUS SLEEPS ("Jesus sleeps, what hope remaineth").
- Recit. { INCLINE THINE EAR ("Lord, rebuke me not").
- Air { THE LORD HATH HEARD ("Lord, rebuke me not").
- Air ALL EARTHLY POWERS FROM GOD INHERIT ("Praise thou the Lord").

TENOR.

- Recit. { THE SAVIOUR NOW APPEARETH ("Come, Redeemer").
- Aria { COME, JESU, COME ("Come, Redeemer").
- Air WHAT VOICE IS WITH THE TEMPEST ("From depths of woe").
- Air TUNEFUL HARPS AND VOICES ("How brightly shines").
- Air THOU ART MY GOD ("Lord, rebuke me not").

BASS.

- Air THE PASCHAL VICTIM HERE WE SEE ("Christ lay in death's dark prison").
- Air DO THINE ALMS ("Give the hungry man thy bread").
- Air WITH JESUS WILL I GO ("Wailing, crying").
- Recit. { AH, WHEN ON THAT GREAT DAY ("Watch ye, pray ye").
- Air { BLESSED RESURRECTION DAY ("Watch ye, pray ye").

THE PURCELL SOCIETY.

COMMITTEE.

PROF. SIR HUGH ALLEN, M.A., Mus. Doc.

G. E. P. ARKWRIGHT, Esq.

SIR J. FREDERICK BRIDGE, C.V.O.

ROBERT BRIDGES, Esq., M.A., M.B., D.LITT., LL.D., POET LAUREATE.

E. J. DENT, Esq., M.A., Mus. Bac.

J. A. FULLER-MAITLAND, Esq., M.A., F.S.A.

ALAN GRAY, Esq., LL.M., Mus. Doc.

AUGUSTUS LITTLETON, Esq.

SYDNEY H. NICHOLSON, Esq., M.A., Mus. Bac.

CYRIL B. ROTHAM, Esq., Mus. Doc.

W. BARCLAY SQUIRE, Esq., M.A., F.S.A., F.R.G.S., Hon. Sec.

SIR C. VILLIERS STANFORD, M.A., Mus. Doc.

Messrs. NOVELLO & Co. have the pleasure to announce that the Committee has decided to sell the Volumes to the general public at the uniform price of

TWENTY-FIVE SHILLINGS PER VOLUME NET.

The Subscription Price will remain at

ONE GUINEA PER VOLUME NET.

The following Volumes have now been published :

- | | |
|--|--|
| I. THE YORKSHIRE FEAST SONG. | XII. THE FAIRY QUEEN. |
| II. THE MASQUE IN TIMON OF
ATHENS. | XIIIA. SACRED MUSIC—PART I. |
| III. DIDO AND ÆNEAS. | XIV. SACRED MUSIC—PART II. |
| IV. ODE ON THE DUKE OF GLOU-
CESTER'S BIRTHDAY. | XV. WELCOME SONGS FOR CHARLES
II. AND JAMES II.—PART I. |
| V. TWELVE SONATAS OF THREE PARTS. | XVI. DRAMATIC MUSIC—PART I. |
| VI. HARPSICORD AND ORGAN
MUSIC. | XVII. SACRED MUSIC—PART III. |
| VII. TEN SONATAS OF FOUR PARTS. | XVIII. WELCOME SONGS—PART II. |
| VIII. ODE FOR ST. CECILIA'S DAY, 1692. | XIX. THE INDIAN QUEEN AND THE TEMPEST. |
| IX. DIOCLESIAN. | XX. DRAMATIC MUSIC—PART II. |
| X. THREE ODES FOR ST. CECILIA'S
DAY. | XXI. DRAMATIC MUSIC—PART III. |
| XI. BIRTHDAY ODES FOR QUEEN
MARY—PART I. | WILL BE ISSUED SHORTLY. |
| | XXII. DUETS, TRIOS, AND CATCHES. |

LONDON : NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

A NEW BOOK BY SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE

COMMANDER OF THE ROYAL VICTORIAN ORDER.

GRESHAM PROFESSOR OF MUSIC.

Dedicated to SIR JOHN JAMES BADDELEY, Lord Mayor of London.

THE OLD CRYES OF LONDON

WITH NUMEROUS ILLUSTRATIONS AND MUSICAL EXAMPLES AND A COLOURED FRONTISPIECE.

Eighty-Eight Pages, Crown 4to Price Seven Shillings net.

THE MORNING POST: "His book has a delightful antiquarian flavour, increased by its quaint illustrations, and the use of the old-style music type."

THE TIMES: "Under the title 'The Old Cryes of London' Sir Frederick Bridge has now written, and Messrs. Novello have published, a delightful little volume.

The best thing in this book is the author; and the next best things are the illustrations."

ARMY, NAVY, AND AIR FORCE GAZETTE: "A very unusually attractive book. It certainly forms a most welcome contribution to musical history."

THE REFEREE: "This contains a mine of antiquarian lore, reproductions of old woodcuts, and musical examples."

THE GUARDIAN: "Those individuals who were so unfortunate as to miss Sir Frederick Bridge's delightful lectures in the City on 'The Old Cryes of London' will derive both consolation and entertainment from this excellent volume."

THE CHRISTIAN WORLD: "This delightful little volume . . . an excellent piece of genial antiquarianism, musical, literary, and historical."

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

EURHYTHM: THOUGHT IN ACTION

The Principles and Practice of Vocal and Physical Therapy.

DESIGNED FOR THE USE OF TEACHERS AND STUDENTS OF VOCAL AND PHYSICAL EDUCATION

By H. H. HULBERT

CAPT. R.A.M.C., M.A. OXFORD, M.R.C.S., L.R.C.P., ETC.

176 Pages, Octavo Size, Cloth, Gilt Lettered PRICE NINE SHILLINGS NET.

SHORT SYNOPSIS OF CHAPTERS.

- I.—DEFINITION OF EURHYTHM.
- II.—THE ENGLISH PHYSIQUE AND ARTISTIC MOVEMENT. Science of games of skill—Movements of novice and master-man—Co-ordination in movement—Discipline of games.
- III.—THE POISE OF THE BODY AND TONICITY. Common deformities—Correct poise—Correct figure—Lumbar curve the centre of balance—Degrees of tonicity—Position of attention—Special exercises.
- IV.—THE SCIENCE OF APPRECIATION AND THE CONCEPTION OF THE BEAUTIFUL. Power of imagery—Knowledge of self—Kinds of appreciation—The five senses and experience—Sense of touch in music and games.
- V.—THE ART OF EXPRESSION AND CONTROL. Three nervous levels—Will and movement—The guiding sensation of movement—feeling—Self-control of the actor and public speaker—Euphonetics.
- VI.—THE CENTRAL APPARATUS OF SPEECH.
- VII.—THE SOUNDS OF THE ENGLISH LANGUAGE.
- VIII.—BREATHING FOR VOICE. Diagrammatic sketch of apparatus—Different kinds of breathing—Effects of types of breathing on voice hygiene and figure.
- IX.—THE ARTICULATORY APPARATUS.
- X.—THE LARYNX.
- XI.—HYGIENE FOR VOICE-USERS AND ORDINARY HEALTH EXERCISES. Voice-user's throat—Physiological congestion of throat—Voice-training prevents voice-user's throat—Loss of health through civilization—Physical exercises for health—Positions: movements of arms, head, body, and legs; balance exercises, jumping, and marching.
- XII.—EURHYTHMICS.—THE PRACTICE OF EURHYTHMICS.

"It was very much wanted, and now that it has arrived it proves to be the best book on the subject we have ever seen. . . . One would like to dwell lovingly on every stage of this monumental work did space permit, but it will only allow of a general commendation of every word from the beginning . . . to the end, which consists of music to accompany the rhythmic physical exercises."—The Morning Post, February 17, 1922.

"No teacher of singing should be without this wonderful book."—Musical Opinion.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

JOHN SEBASTIAN BACH

THE CHORALE PRELUDES

WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY ERNEST NEWMAN.

Complete in Five Books, to which is added a Sixth Book, containing the Chorales only.

CONTENTS.

	s.	d.		s.	d.
BOOK XV. Orgelbüchlein (Little Organ Book)...	10	0	BOOK XVIII. Miscellaneous Preludes (Part I.) ...	7	0
BOOK XVI. The Six "Schübler" Preludes and the "Clavierübung" (Part III.)	7	0	BOOK XIX. Miscellaneous Preludes (Part II.) and Variations ...	7	0
BOOK XVII. The Eighteen Preludes ...	7	0	BOOK XX. The Chorales only ...	7	0

"What is needed," wrote Schweitzer, in concluding a chapter on these magnificent works of the great master, "is a cheap edition of the Chorale Preludes in the original form, distinguishing the collections planned by Bach himself, from detached chorales that have come down to us." At length, in the excellent edition before us, we find admirably fulfilled every detail of Schweitzer's ideal.

"We have no hesitation in recommending this edition of the Chorale Preludes."—Aberdeen Free Press.

"This fine series is a triumph of British music publishing, and, with clear editing and informing prefaces and annotations, it should prove of the greatest value to students of the old master."—The Glasgow Herald.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THAYER'S LIFE OF BEETHOVEN

THE FIRST ENGLISH EDITION

CORRECTED, REVISED, AND EDITED BY

H. E. KREHBIEL.

The best biography of Beethoven, although it was originally written in English, has hitherto been obtainable only in German. This was the work of who wrote it while he was stationed at Trieste as Consul to the United States of America; to which circumstance no doubt must be attributed the fact that his work was first published in the German language from a translation by H. Deiters, of Bonn.

ALEXANDER WHELOCK THAYER

The first three volumes of the Biography were published by Weber, of Berlin. Vol. I. in 1866, Vol. II. in 1872, and Vol. III. in 1879. Vols. IV. and V. appeared later, and they were compiled respectively by Dr. Deiters and Dr. Riemann from a mass of notes left by Thayer at his death in 1897.

Referring to the original German edition the late Sir George Grove in his Dictionary remarks:

"When the work is completed it will be a mine of accurate information, indispensable for all future students. With some condensations an English edition would be very welcome."

Not only has the work been completed, but an English edition, with the desired condensations, is now published under the auspices of

THE BEETHOVEN ASSOCIATION OF NEW YORK, U.S.A.

The English edition has been revised and corrected by Henry Edward Krehbiel, the well-known critic and musical scholar of New York, from the original manuscript and other material entrusted to him by Mr. Thayer's heirs, and used in the spirit and with the purpose indicated by the author before his death.

It consists of Three Volumes containing in all 1,137 + xxxix. pages; many appendices and reproduced documents, which encumber the German text, being advantageously omitted.

By arrangement with the Beethoven Association of New York, Messrs. Novello & Company have undertaken the publication of the work under a Sole Agency Contract for Great Britain and the Colonies (other than Canada).

PRICE - - - £5 5s. NET.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

ALBUMS FOR THE ORGAN

PRICE SEVEN SHILLINGS EACH. CLOTH, TEN SHILLINGS EACH.

No.	No. 1.	No. 2.	No. 3.	No. 4.	No. 5.	No. 6.	No. 7 (Funeral Music).	No. 8 (Christmas Music).
1.	Interlude	Th. Dubois	Edward Elgar	S. Coleridge-Taylor	1.	Jour de Noces	J. Stuart Archer	1.	Chorale Prelude, "In dulci júbilo"	J. S. Bach
2.	Chanson de Matin	Edward Elgar	Myles B. Foster	Joseph Holbrooke	2.	Festival Prelude on "Ein feste Burg"	W. Faulkes	2.	Pastoral Symphony ("Christmas Oratorio")	J. S. Bach
3.	Fantasia on the old melody "Urbs Beata"	W. Faulkes	Alexandre Guilmant	Alfred Hollins	3.	Legend	Harvey Grace	3.	Quem Vidistis, Pastores	W. T. Best
4.	There is a green hill far away	Ch. Gounod	H. Hofmann	Alfred Hollins	4.	Allegretto Pastorale	H. M. Higgs	4.	Venite in Bethlehem	W. T. Best
5.	Marche Triomphale	Alexandre Guilmant	H. Hofmann	Bernard Johnson	5.	Benediction Nuptiale	Alfred Hollins	5.	December—Christmas Morn	Frederic H. Cowen
6.	Ave Maria	A. Henselt	Alfred Hollins	Sigfrid Karg-Elert	6.	Sursum Corda	John N. Ireland	6.	Fantasia on Old Christmas Carols	William Faulkes
7.	Grand Chœur No. 2	Alfred Hollins	Edwin H. Lemare	C. H. Lloyd	7.	Alla Marcia	John N. Ireland	7.	For unto us a Child is born ("Messiah")	Handel
8.	Andantino in D flat	Edwin H. Lemare	P. Tschalkowsky	A. L. Peace	8.	Adagio Cantabile	John N. Ireland	8.	Pastorale	Theodore Kullak
9.	Chanson Triste	P. Tschalkowsky	R. Wagner	J. Rheinberger	9.	Fanfare	J. Lemmens	9.	Chorus of Shepherds	J. Lemmens
10.	Prelude to "Lohengrin," Act I.	R. Wagner	W. Wolstenholme	P. Tschalkowsky	10.	Intermezzo	B. Luard-Selby	10.	Christmas Pastoral	Gustav Merkel
11.	Romanza	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	John E. West	11.	Easter Morn	John E. West	11.	A Christmas Pastoral	B. Luard-Selby
12.	Allegretto in E flat	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	12.	Finale in B flat	W. Wolstenholme	12.	Fantasy on Two Christmas Carols ("The First Nowell" and "Good King Wenceslas.")	John E. West
1.	Chanson de Nuit	Edward Elgar	Healey Willan	1.	Nocturne	Thomas F. Dunhill	1.	Funeral March (Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 26)	Beethoven
2.	Alla Marcia	Myles B. Foster	W. Wolstenholme	2.	Postludium	William Faulkes	2.	Blest are they that mourn (Requiem)	Brahms
3.	Minuetto	Alexandre Guilmant	W. Wolstenholme	3.	Andante Tranquillo	H. M. Higgs	3.	Funeral March (Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 35)	Chopin
4.	Lied	H. Hofmann	W. Wolstenholme	4.	In Springtime	Alfred Hollins	4.	Funeral March	William Faulkes
5.	Barcarolle	H. Hofmann	W. Wolstenholme	5.	Madrigal	Edwin H. Lemare	5.	Funeral March ("Saul")	Handel
6.	Spring Song	Alfred Hollins	W. Wolstenholme	6.	Triumphal March	J. Lemmens	6.	I know that my Redeemer liveth ("Messiah")	Handel
7.	The Curfew	Edwin H. Lemare	W. Wolstenholme	7.	Allegro in B flat	F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy	7.	Funeral March ("Lieder ohne Worte")	Mendelssohn
8.	Pastorale in E	Edwin H. Lemare	W. Wolstenholme	8.	Choral Prelude on "Rockingham"	C. Hubert H. Parry	8.	O rest in the Lord ("Elijah")	Mendelssohn
9.	Ave Maria d'Arcadelt	Franz Liszt	W. Wolstenholme	9.	Praeludium Pastorale	J. Stainer	9.	Marche Solennelle	Schubert
10.	Cantique d'Amour	Theo. Wendt	W. Wolstenholme	10.	Romance in F minor	Tschalkowsky	10.	Marche Funèbre	Tschalkowsky
11.	The Seraph's Strain	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	11.	Romance in A flat	H. Sandiford Turner	11.	Finale from "Symphonie Pathétique"	Tschalkowsky
12.	Le Carillon	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	12.	Festal Commemoration	John E. West	12.	Lament	John E. West
1.	Scherzo in A flat	Edward C. Bairstow	W. Wolstenholme	1.	Nocturne	Thomas F. Dunhill	1.	Funeral March (Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 26)	Beethoven
2.	Melody	S. Coleridge-Taylor	W. Wolstenholme	2.	Postludium	William Faulkes	2.	Blest are they that mourn (Requiem)	Brahms
3.	Serenade	H. Hofmann	W. Wolstenholme	3.	Andante Tranquillo	H. M. Higgs	3.	Funeral March (Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 35)	Chopin
4.	Bridal March	Alfred Hollins	W. Wolstenholme	4.	In Springtime	Alfred Hollins	4.	Funeral March	William Faulkes
5.	Berceuse	Edwin H. Lemare	W. Wolstenholme	5.	Madrigal	Edwin H. Lemare	5.	Funeral March ("Saul")	Handel
6.	Melodie in E	S. Rachmaninoff	W. Wolstenholme	6.	Triumphal March	J. Lemmens	6.	I know that my Redeemer liveth ("Messiah")	Handel
7.	Andante	A. Streliski	W. Wolstenholme	7.	Allegro in B flat	F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy	7.	Funeral March ("Lieder ohne Worte")	Mendelssohn
8.	Nocturne in C sharp minor	P. Tschalkowsky	W. Wolstenholme	8.	Choral Prelude on "Rockingham"	C. Hubert H. Parry	8.	O rest in the Lord ("Elijah")	Mendelssohn
9.	Procession to the Minster ("Lohengrin")	R. Wagner	W. Wolstenholme	9.	Praeludium Pastorale	J. Stainer	9.	Marche Solennelle	Schubert
10.	Pascaglia	John E. West	W. Wolstenholme	10.	Romance in F minor	Tschalkowsky	10.	Marche Funèbre	Tschalkowsky
11.	Fantasia upon the Plain-song Melody "Ad cenam Agni"	Healey Willan	W. Wolstenholme	11.	Romance in A flat	H. Sandiford Turner	11.	Finale from "Symphonie Pathétique"	Tschalkowsky
12.	Allegretto in A flat	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	12.	Festal Commemoration	John E. West	12.	Lament	John E. West
1.	Arietta	S. Coleridge-Taylor	W. Wolstenholme	1.	Nocturne	Thomas F. Dunhill	1.	Funeral March (Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 26)	Beethoven
2.	Souvenir de Printemps	Joseph Holbrooke	W. Wolstenholme	2.	Postludium	William Faulkes	2.	Blest are they that mourn (Requiem)	Brahms
3.	Andante in D	Alfred Hollins	W. Wolstenholme	3.	Andante Tranquillo	H. M. Higgs	3.	Funeral March (Pianoforte Sonata, Op. 35)	Chopin
4.	Pavane in A	Bernard Johnson	W. Wolstenholme	4.	In Springtime	Alfred Hollins	4.	Funeral March	William Faulkes
5.	Harmonies du Soir	Sigfrid Karg-Elert	W. Wolstenholme	5.	Madrigal	Edwin H. Lemare	5.	Funeral March ("Saul")	Handel
6.	An Eton Memorial March	C. H. Lloyd	W. Wolstenholme	6.	Triumphal March	J. Lemmens	6.	I know that my Redeemer liveth ("Messiah")	Handel
7.	Allegro alla Marcia	A. L. Peace	W. Wolstenholme	7.	Allegro in B flat	F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy	7.	Funeral March ("Lieder ohne Worte")	Mendelssohn
8.	Visione	J. Rheinberger	W. Wolstenholme	8.	Choral Prelude on "Rockingham"	C. Hubert H. Parry	8.	O rest in the Lord ("Elijah")	Mendelssohn
9.	Chant sans Paroles	P. Tschalkowsky	W. Wolstenholme	9.	Praeludium Pastorale	J. Stainer	9.	Marche Solennelle	Schubert
10.	Prelude to Act III. ("Die Meistersinger")	R. Wagner	W. Wolstenholme	10.	Romance in F minor	Tschalkowsky	10.	Marche Funèbre	Tschalkowsky
11.	Allegro Pomposo	John E. West	W. Wolstenholme	11.	Romance in A flat	H. Sandiford Turner	11.	Finale from "Symphonie Pathétique"	Tschalkowsky
12.	Canzona	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	12.	Festal Commemoration	John E. West	12.	Lament	John E. West

SHORT PRELUDES FOR THE ORGAN

PRICE TWO SHILLINGS EACH BOOK.

These Short Preludes are intended for use chiefly as Introductory Voluntaries to Divine Service, more especially in those churches where the time allowed for such is, of necessity, somewhat limited.

No.	Book I.	Book II.	Book III.	Book IV.	Book V.	Book VI.
1.	Andante Grazioso	Thomas Adams	Thomas Adams	1.	"Elevation"—Andante e Legato	Thomas Adams
2.	Andante	W. G. Alcock	W. G. Alcock	2.	Andante Religioso	Myles B. Foster
3.	Largamente	George J. Bennett	George J. Bennett	3.	"Simplicity"—Andante	Barry M. Gilholy
4.	Andante Religioso	Myles B. Foster	Myles B. Foster	4.	Largamente	R. G. Hailing
5.	Andantino	Alfred Hollins	Alfred Hollins	5.	"Dialogue"—Andante Grazioso	Charles H. Lloyd
6.	Adagio Cantabile	Alfred Hollins	Alfred Hollins	6.	Andantino	Arthur W. Marchant
7.	Larghetto	Charles J. May	Charles J. May	7.	Con Moto Moderato	William Sewell
8.	Andante con Moto	John E. West	John E. West	8.	Andante Amabile	William Sewell
9.	Andantino quasi Allegretto	John E. West	John E. West	9.	Andante	Clement M. Spurling
10.	Andante	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	10.	Andante Sostenuto	F. Cunningham Woods
1.	Andante con Moto	Thomas Adams	Thomas Adams	1.	"Invocation"—Andante Grazioso	Thomas Adams
2.	Con Moto	W. G. Alcock	W. G. Alcock	2.	Andante con Moto	Percy E. Fletcher
3.	Moderato	H. A. Chambers	H. A. Chambers	3.	Poco Adagio	Myles B. Foster
4.	Marziale, poco Lento	Myles B. Foster	Myles B. Foster	4.	Andante Espressivo	Ignace Gibsons
5.	Moderato	Alfred Hollins	Alfred Hollins	5.	Adagio	Alfred Hollins
6.	Andantino	Alfred Hollins	Alfred Hollins	6.	Poco Lento	Charles H. Lloyd
7.	Adagio	Charles J. May	Charles J. May	7.	Andante Dolente	Arthur W. Marchant
8.	"Hymnus"—Andante e Sostenuto	John E. West	John E. West	8.	Andantino con Tenezza	William Sewell
9.	Andante Serioso	John E. West	John E. West	9.	Andante con Moto	Clement M. Spurling
10.	Adagio	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	10.	Adagio Molto	F. Cunningham Woods
1.	Moderato e Legato	Thomas Adams	Thomas Adams	1.	Dolente	Edmund T. Chipp
2.	Moderato	W. G. Alcock	W. G. Alcock	2.	Andante Sostenuto	Myles B. Foster
3.	Andante con Moto	George J. Bennett	George J. Bennett	3.	Andantino	R. G. Hailing
4.	Andante	H. A. Chambers	H. A. Chambers	4.	Con Moto	Alfred Hollins
5.	Grazioso molto Espressivo	Myles B. Foster	Myles B. Foster	5.	"Communion"—Cantabile	J. Lemmens
6.	"Song without Words"—Con Moto	Alfred Hollins	Alfred Hollins	6.	Andante Religioso	Arthur W. Marchant
7.	Andante	Alfred Hollins	Alfred Hollins	7.	Lento	Charles J. May
8.	Andante Dolente	John E. West	John E. West	8.	Larghetto	Albert Robins
9.	Andante Pastorale	John E. West	John E. West	9.	Adagio e Mesto	William Sewell
10.	Adagio	W. Wolstenholme	W. Wolstenholme	10.	Andante Affettuoso	William Sewell

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

TWENTY SHORT AND EASY PIECES FOR THE ORGAN

SET I.		SET III.
No.		No.
1.	Andante Alfred H. Allen	1.	Melody A. Herbert Brewer
2.	Spring Song W. H. Bell	2.	Maestoso George Calkin
3.	Andante con Moto G. J. Bennett	3.	Ave Maria Edward T. Chipp
4.	Song of Thanksgiving Josiah Booth	4.	Interlude Percy E. Fletcher
5.	Church Preludes No. 5 R. E. Bryson	5.	Intermezzo Alan Gray
6.	Postlude H. Elliot Button	6.	Postlude Alex. Guilman
7.	Postlude G. Calkin	7.	Sursum Corda John Ireland
8.	Prelude Percy E. Fletcher	8.	Lieder Ohne Worte No. 22 F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
9.	Andante J. W. Gritton	9.	Andante Gustav Merkel
10.	Allegro Moderato Kate Loder	10.	Duetto in G Ernest Newton
11.	Allegro. Op. 21... .. Gustav Merkel	11.	Cavatina Joachim Raff
12.	Andante. Op. 162 Gustav Merkel	12.	Monologue No. 5 J. Rheinberger
13.	Introductory Voluntary on the Russian Hymn... .. J. T. Pye	13.	Melody in F Anton Rubinstein
14.	Prelude No. 2 A. Redhead	14.	Dreaming Schumann
15.	Larghetto and Allegro J. Varley Roberts	15.	The Poet Speaks... .. Schumann
16.	Allegretto Pastorale C. Steggall	16.	Soft Voluntary B. Luard-Selby
17.	Contemplation John E. West	17.	Menuetto Berthold Tours
18.	Postlude John E. West	18.	Aspiration John E. West
19.	Moderato Maestoso Kate Westrop	19.	Sketch in C minor John E. West
20.	Andante Pastorale W. G. Wood	20.	Andante con Moto W. G. Wood

SET II.		SET IV.
No.		No.
1.	Allegretto Grazioso George J. Bennett	1.	Romance W. H. Bell
2.	Church Prelude R. Ernest Bryson	2.	Minuet and Trio (Symphony in G minor) W. Sterndale Bennett
3.	Andante Tranquillo George Calkin	3.	Canzonetta César Cui
4.	For Holy Communion J. Baptiste Calkin	4.	Interlude Th. Dubois
5.	Postlude Percy E. Fletcher	5.	Elegy Edward Elgar
6.	Largo Handel	6.	Allegretto Niels W. Gade
7.	Berceuse Oliver King	7.	Judex ("Mors et Vita")... .. Ch. Gounod
8.	Adagio, from Sonata No. 2 Kuhlau	8.	Intermezzo No. 3... .. Alan Gray
9.	Allegretto... .. Kate Loder	9.	Chanson de Joie R. G. Hailing
10.	Andante in G G. F. Wesley Martin	10.	Hymnus A. C. Mackenzie
11.	Andanti Quasi Allegretto Gustav Merkel	11.	Lieder Ohne Worte No. 44 F. Mendelssohn-Bartholdy
12.	Cavatina in G Ernest Newton	12.	Trio J. Rheinberger
13.	Epilogue Joseph Rheinberger	13.	Short Postlude B. Luard-Selby
14.	Andante in A J. Varley Roberts	14.	Andante Maestoso B. Luard-Selby
15.	Andante in G Charles Steggall	15.	Prelude Henry Smart
16.	March in G Henry Smart	16.	Fughetta Henry Smart
17.	Andante Doloroso ("Marcia Funèbre") John E. West	17.	Choral Song S. S. Wesley
18.	Pastoral Melody John E. West	18.	Lamentation John E. West
19.	Andante Kate Westrop	19.	Allegretto Pastorale John E. West
20.	Allegretto Grazioso W. G. Wood	20.	Andante W. G. Wood

PRICE, PAPER COVER, FIVE SHILLINGS EACH SET.

CLOTH, EIGHT SHILLINGS EACH SET.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

TO THE BUSY MUSIC TEACHER

DON'T DELAY,

but send to us at once for our Thematic Lists of Piano Music which we send gratis and post free.

Recognising the difficulties and uncertainties of ordering pianoforte pieces without an opportunity of seeing them before doing so, we have prepared a series of thematic lists containing more than 70 pieces, thus providing a very varied selection from which a choice can be made. These lists we forward post free on application. Please note that these THEMATIC LISTS are admirably adapted for SIGHT-READING TESTS.

A FREE GUIDE TO PIANOFORTE TEACHERS.

Every teacher of the Pianoforte knows the difficulty of grading the Pupil's work from the elementary stages upwards, the time it takes, and the perplexity involved in finding the right piece at the right moment. In order to obviate this difficulty, A. HAMMOND & Co. have specially prepared a list of books of which can be had free on application. This list is no ordinary catalogue, but a comprehensive selection of over 150 Numbers, carefully graded from the "Very Easy" through thirteen sections to "Moderately Difficult," rendering it possible to select at a glance a book suitable to the capacity of any Pupil.

GRADED TEACHING PIECES

DENIS DUPRÉ. COMPOSITIONS FOR PIANO.

Thousands of people throughout the British Empire are daily enjoying the graceful and melodious pianoforte pieces by Denis Dupré, of which the Globe writes: "Graceful and tuneful, they have the virtues inherent in rhythmic strength and simplicity of design, and will be found decidedly useful for teaching purposes. The cover designs are pleasing, and the pieces are printed with admirable clearness."

Although these pieces have gained the appreciation of discriminating lovers of music to an extent which fully justifies us in strongly recommending them, in order to give you an opportunity for forming your own opinion and enabling you to "try before you buy," we have prepared a thematic list, which we forward post free. Please send for one and try them over. We are confident you will like them.

"Moderately difficult piano pieces, in nicely designed covers. The general characteristics of these pieces are clearness of harmonic structure, melodiousness, and a marked directness of rhythm." —Musical News.

London: A. HAMMOND & Co., 6, Kingly Street,
Regent Street, W.1.

TWO PIECES

FOR SMALL ORCHESTRA.

BY

HAROLD RAWLINSON.

SERENADE.

	s.	d.
String Parts	2	0
Wind Parts	1	8
Pianoforte Solo	2	3

AUBADE.

String Parts	2	8
Wind Parts	3	4
Pianoforte Solo	2	3

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

SELECTION FROM HIAWATHA'S WEDDING-FEAST

COMPOSED BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

Op. 30, No. 1.

ARRANGEMENT FOR SMALL ORCHESTRA

BY

W. G. ROSS.

	s.	d.
Pianoforte Conductor... ..	2	3
String Parts	8	3
Wind Parts, &c.	15	6

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

THE "DISCUS" REGD.
ORGAN BLOWER

THE QUIET EFFICIENCY OF THE "DISCUS"—

Blower is largely responsible for its widespread adoption in Cathedrals and Churches at home and abroad. Nearly a thousand are now in use. Apart from its quietness of working the "Discus" is a very attractive financial proposition. It saves the wages of a blower, and gives the organist the opportunity for rehearsal at all times. Any organ, large or small, can be fitted with the "Discus," and the motive power may be either electric motor, gas, or oil engine. Constructed of metal throughout, well designed and of the best workmanship. Its reliability and efficiency are guaranteed.

AS SUPPLIED TO WESTMINSTER ABBEY, YORK MINSTER, ETC., ETC.

WRITE FOR NEW BOOKLET.

MADE BY

B. WATKINS AND WATSON

ORGAN BLOWING SPECIALISTS FOR THE PAST THIRTY YEARS

Designers and Manufacturers of all types of Hydraulic Engines, Gears, and Fittings for Organ blowing.

WHITE LION STREET, LONDON, N.1.

ESTIMATES SUBMITTED FREE.

Telegrams: "HYDISBLOW, ISLING, LONDON."

Telephone: NORTH 3039.

Digitized by Google

NOVELLO'S

POPULAR PIANOFORTE ALBUMS

FOR YOUNG PERFORMERS.

HUBERT BATH
DOLL'S-HOUSE SUITE

Price Three Shillings.

FRANCESCO BERGER
EIGHTEEN LITTLE PIECES

Price Three Shillings.

EDMONDSTOUNE DUNCAN
HAPPY THOUGHTS

Price Four Shillings.

ARNOLD KRUG
TEN LITTLE PIECES

Op. 109.

In two Books. Price Three Shillings each.

ARNOLD KRUG
SCENES FROM FAIRY-LAND

In two Books. Price Four Shillings each.

TH. KULLAK
TWENTY-FOUR PIECES

Op. 62 AND 81.

In four Books. Price Two Shillings each.

MAX MAYER
BAGATELLES

Price Five Shillings.

MENDELSSOHN
SIX CHRISTMAS PIECES

Price Two Shillings.

ERNEST NEWTON
WOODLAND DANCES

Price Three Shillings.

HUBERT G. OKE
THREE PIECES

Price Three Shillings.

SCHUMANN
PIECES FOR THE YOUNG

Part I., Price 2s. ; Part II., Price 3s.

SCHUMANN
THREE PIANOFORTE SONATAS

(Part III. of Pieces for the Young).

Price One Shilling and Sixpence.

CLEMENT M. SPURLING
SIX SHORT AND EASY PIECES

Price Three Shillings.

CLEMENT M. SPURLING
OUR VILLAGE IN SUMMER

Price Two Shillings and Threepence.

E. A. SYDENHAM
SIX SHORT AND EASY PIECES

Price Three Shillings.

TSCHAIKOWSKY
CHRISTMAS ALBUM

In three Books. Price Two Shillings each.

FRANCESCO BERGER
FIRST STEPS AT THE PIANOFORTE

PRICE FIVE SHILLINGS.

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

CANTATAS, &c., BY J. S. BACH

IN THE WELSH LANGUAGE.

JESU, PRICELESS TREASURE

MOTET

WELSH TRANSLATION

BY

REV. GWILYM WILLIAMS, B.A.

Price Two Shillings.
Tonic Sol-fa, One Shilling.

IN THE PRESS.

BIDE WITH US (CANTATA).

GOD'S TIME IS THE BEST (CANTATA).

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

FUGUE IN C MINOR

By J. S. BACH.

TRANSCRIBED FOR FULL ORCHESTRA

By EDWARD ELGAR.

FULL SCORE

Price - - - 10s. 6d.
Orchestral Parts (on hire only).

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

JUST PUBLISHED.

THE BAILIFF'S DAUGHTER OF ISLINGTON

(TRADITIONAL BALLAD)

WORDS FROM

PERCY'S "RELIQUES."

MUSIC ARRANGED BY

GERRARD WILLIAMS.

Price Two Shillings.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

JUST PUBLISHED.

TIME

SONG.

POEM BY

P. B. SHELLEY.

MUSIC BY

GERRARD WILLIAMS.

TWO KEYS.

Price Two Shillings each.

London: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, Limited.

FOUR CHARACTERISTIC WALTZES

1. VALSE BOHÉMIENNE.

2. VALSE RUSTIQUE.

3. VALSE DE LA REINE.

4. VALSE MAURESQUE.

COMPOSED BY

S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR.

(Op. 22).

PIANOFORTE SOLO.

PRICE, COMPLETE, FIVE SHILLINGS; SEPARATELY, 2s. 3d. EACH.

			s.	d.					s.	d.
Violin and Pianoforte	complete	6	0	Full Score (Full Orchestra)...	15	0
Violin and Pianoforte	separately, each	2	3	Full Score (Small Orchestra), MS.
String Parts for Full or Small Orchestra		9	0	Arrangements, as Quintets, for Pianoforte and
Wind Parts for Small Orchestra		10	5	Strings, each Number	3	0
Ditto, for Full Orchestra		17	5	Separate String Parts, 8d. each.
						Military Band Arrangement	19	0

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED.

BOOSEY & CO.'S NEW ORCHESTRAL MUSIC

SUITE	"HARVEST TIME"	Haydn Wood
INCIDENTAL MUSIC	"FAUST"	Coleridge-Taylor
SELECTION	"THE BEGGAR'S OPERA"	Frederic Austin
SUITE	"AS YOU LIKE IT"	Roger Quilter
SUITE	"WAYSIDE SKETCHES"	Scott-Minchin
SUITE	"GIPSY PICTURES"	Hugh Mallory

F. O., 10s.; S. O., 8s.; P. C., 2s. 6d.; Ex., 1s. each.

OVERTURE IN B FLAT	Schubert
---------------------------	--------	----------

F. O., 6s.; S. O., 4s. 6d.; P. C., 2s.; Ex., 8d.; Organ, 1s.

INTERMEZZO	"TIP-TOES"	H. L. Cooke
*ENTR'ACTE	"MELODY"	Chas. G. Dawes

F. O., 3s.; S. O., 2s.; P. C., 1s.; Ex., 3d.; Pianoforte Solo, 2s.

* Played as a Violin Solo by HERR KREISLER

AND

MISS MARIE HALL.

All the above may be played in public without fee or licence.

BOOSEY & CO., 295, Regent Street, LONDON, W.1.

SPANISH DANCES FOR THE PIANO.

I. ALBENIZ.

SEGUIDILLAS - - - - - Price 2s. 6d. net.

MANUEL DE FALLA.

DANSE RITUELLE DU FEU (El Amor Brujo) - Price 2s. 6d. net.

DANSE DU MEUNIER (The Three-Cornered Hat) - Price 2s. net.

DANSE DE LA MEUNIÈRE (The Three-Cornered Hat) Price 3s. net.

J. TURINA.

TRES DANZAS FANTASTICAS:

1. Exaltación. 2. Ensueño. 3. Orgia.

Price each 3s. net.

J. & W. CHESTER, LTD.,
11, Great Marlborough Street, London, W.1.

JUN 1 4 1922

No.
952

Price
6d.

THE

MUSICAL TIMES

FOUNDED 1844

JUNE 1, 1922

Directory—
W. BERNARD
C. B. CALVERT

THE

WIGMORE HALL & PIANO GALLERIES

HAVE NOW REMOVED TO THEIR FORMER PREMISES^{LTD.}

ADJOINING WIGMORE HALL.

OVER 20 ADDITIONAL MUSIC STUDIOS

Electric Lift. Central Heating. Lavatories and Comfortable Lounges on each floor.

GRAND PIANO IN EVERY ROOM

32-40, WIGMORE STREET, W.-1.

The Name of

J. & J. HOPKINSON

*Stands for the HIGHEST ATTAINMENTS
in THE WORLD OF MUSIC*

REMARKABLE FOR THE EXQUISITE QUALITY OF TONE

J. & J. HOPKINSON, LTD.,

44, FITZROY ROAD, PRIMROSE HILL,
LONDON, N.W.-1

(ONLY ADDRESS).

An Indispensable Text Book
for School and Music Teachers
"Learning to Listen"
by means of the Gramophone.

By Percy A. Scholes.

With an Introduction by Dr. John Adams,
Professor of Education in the University of London.

Price 3/- nett.

Obtainable from all "His Master's Voice" accredited dealers.

This book is unique in that it is the first Text Book to set out a progressive study of music with the aid of the Gramophone. The vital importance of the part that the Gramophone is destined to play in the teaching of music—especially in the study of Appreciation—has long occupied the attention of the manufacturers of "His Master's Voice" Instruments and Records. "Learning to Listen" is the fruition of intensive and specialised research on all phases of musical study.

SYNOPSIS.

Introduction	Subject 5—Bach	Subject 13—Classical Music
Author's Preface	" 6—Haydn	and Romantic
Subject 1—Folk Music	" 7—Mozart	Music
" 2—The English Composers of Queen Elizabeth's Reign	" 8—The Orchestra	" 14—Grieg
" 3—Purcell	" 9—Beethoven	" 15—Elgar
" 4—Handel	" 10—Mendelssohn	Hints on the Use of the Gramophone
	" 11—Schumann
	" 12—Chopin

"His Master's Voice"

A cordial invitation is extended to all School and Music Teachers to the demonstrations on the Educational use of the Gramophone, which are held at 367 Oxford Street, W. 1, every Saturday morning from 10.30 to 12 o'clock. Kindly notify the Education Dept. of your intention to be present.

"His Master's Voice"
School Model,
Price £25.

THE GRAMOPHONE CO., LTD., 363-7 Oxford Street, London, W.1

Reproduced from a Photograph by Vadero.

CARRIE TUBB

The Musical Times

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR

JUNE 1 1922

BRITISH SINGERS AND PLAYERS

VI.—CARRIE TUBB

BY HERMAN KLEIN

The 'palmy days' of oratorio have long passed, and it is more than questionable whether their like will ever be seen again. Yet in the pale radiance of a lesser glory the thing itself, being endowed with indestructible vitality, continues to bask and flourish healthily enough. It even gives occupation, as aforetime, to our best exponents of declamatory vocal art, so that it still remains a very high compliment to say that 'such and such an artist is a fine or a first-rate oratorio singer.' Which lofty tribute, deserved by few, we can unhesitatingly bestow upon the subject of the present article, and add without fear of contradiction that her place among oratorio singers is in the very foremost rank.

How Miss Carrie Tubb arrived at that position of eminence it will shortly be our duty to show. First of all, however, let us draw attention to the fact that nine out of ten of the great oratorio artists of the past were also great opera singers. Their training for the lyric stage almost invariably preceded their experience upon the concert-platform; they graduated from one to the other as a matter of course. The art of acting was regarded as a well-nigh indispensable preliminary to the adequate interpretation of a character in oratorio. There were exceptions to the rule, of course—for example, Sainton-Dolby, Patey, Anna Williams, Edward Lloyd, Vernon Rigby, Cummings, Henschel, Andrew Black, and Frederic King. But in the other category stand a host of famous operatic names, including those of Jenny Lind, Tietjens, Nilsson, Patti, Lemmens-Sherrington, Albani, Trebelli, Sims Reeves, Santley, Agnesi, Weiss, Foli, Ben Davies, and many others, without coming down to the present generation of English oratorio artists.

Well [someone is asking], what is the exact point of connection between these bygone 'instances' and the career of Miss Carrie Tubb? Just this: that Miss Tubb, although far more associated in the public mind with the concert-room than the stage, did herself go through a complete course of training for opera, made a successful débüt therein, and then, through no fault of her own, relinquished (temporarily she still hopes) that branch of her art in favour of the one which she now adorns. In other words, she patiently pursued the most favourable line of study for the equipment of an all-round artist—vocal technique, musicianship, elocution, acting, opera, oratorio, concert work generally. Would that a few more of the thousands who aspire to the same end would employ the same effectual, modest, industrious means!

EARLY STRUGGLES AND STUDIES

The story has no features of novelty, but, as Miss Carrie Tubb tells it, it is worth pondering. She begins it with what is for the present writer a pleasant reminiscence:

'There can be no need to remind you that I was a pupil at the Guildhall School of Music, for it was at the time when you were a teacher there, not long before you went to America (which settles the date—1900-01). I studied first under Frederick Birch, and, after he retired, under Walter Austin. Both were excellent teachers, and what one did not develop or improve in me the other did. At the beginning, what a struggle it was! A poor London girl, one of a family of eight, born within sound of the Westminster chimes, I used to make dresses for my friends to earn the money to pay for my lessons.'

'When was it discovered that you had a voice?'

'I think when I was about three years old. At any rate, that was my age when they used to stand me on a table (à la Adelina Patti, my particular goddess), and I sang whatever I knew or had heard. My parents were not especially musical, but my mother used to tell me that her grandmother (an Irishwoman) had had a magnificent voice. As I grew up my deeper tones were the strongest, and I was thought to be a mezzo-soprano, for I could sing easily down to the low G, and can do so now if I choose. Hence a mistake that is too commonly made. But Mr. Austin quickly perceived that I was using my chest-tones too heavily, and soon changed my method into that of a genuine soprano. He taught me to sing Mozart, brought the real head-voice into play, and changed the whole character of the organ. It had required "stretching." I sang exercises every day, and ultimately took it easily up to the F in alt.'

'You have, then, the three octaves of the famous Alboni?'

'Literally, yes; only not, of course, with her contralto timbre, which must have been wonderful. Still, I have often asked myself whether those phenomenal old Italian singers, such as Alboni and Scalchi, were contraltos who could rise into alt or sopranos who could go down into the depths without the least injury to their voices. . . . But I am getting away from the G.S.M. Yes; I won prizes, but what brought me first into prominence was my appearance at one of the big school concerts, where I did so well that engagements began to come in, and before long I was singing at choral concerts all round London. Imagine the joy of earning money with my voice and being no longer compelled to stick to dress-making!'

A SINGER'S AMBITIONS

'But the difficulties — were they all removed?'

'Far from it. I had barely made my start (it was whilst I was living with my parents in London) when I met with an accident which led to a long and serious illness. During that time my voice stood still, so to speak. Then a little later another important event occurred—I got married. My husband, Mr. Alexander Oliveira, an engineer by profession, is a member of a Yorkshire family (his grandfather was an M.P.), probably of Spanish extraction; and my son, who is now sixteen, has just gone to Oundle School. But family life does not preclude artistic ambitions, does it?'

'I had two great ambitions. One was to model myself (without presumption) upon the last of the truly great singers, Adelina Patti, to hear whom at the Albert Hall I gladly deprived myself of necessities, and with whom it was my proud privilege to sing for once in my life at the charity concert arranged by Lady Randolph Churchill in aid of the Order of St. John of Jerusalem, at which she appeared in 1914. The other ambition I trace back to a week at Covent Garden, when I first heard the Ring under Richter. For it was then that I made up my mind to sing Wagner, and go in seriously for opera, to buy his scores and work at them, to become a Brünnhilde and an Isolde. Yet, after all, very naturally as it seems now, I did not inaugurate my stage career in either of those heroic parts. My operatic début was much more humbly achieved in Strauss's Electra, when Sir Thomas Beecham produced it during his short Covent Garden season in 1910. In that, if you please, I sang with much acceptance the rôle of the "fifth Maid."'

'But did you get no nearer to your ambition then?'

'Not at that moment. But Sir Thomas had noted my effort, and later on, when he gave his summer season at His Majesty's Theatre, he entrusted me with the part of the Witch in Hansel and Gretel. That you remember? I am glad, because that was my first real success on the stage; and another, which I won in the Fledermaus, combined to keep me in the Beecham Company for quite twelve months. But somehow, to my regret, opera of the kind I wanted to sing was not yet to claim me for its own. Fate or circumstance will sometimes insist on arranging these things for us. I was to achieve my first triumph as Isolde and Brünnhilde, not in the theatre, but upon the concert-platform.'

RECONSTRUCTING A CAREER

'How was it that you came to abandon opera?'

'I did not exactly say good-bye to it—only au revoir. I need not go into all the reasons, but they were various and conclusive. To succeed in grand opera, as it is termed, one must be allowed full scope for the exercise of the gifts which one feels capable of bringing to it. Anyhow I felt myself under the necessity for completely reconstructing my career as a singer, and to this end I was largely assisted by Sir Henry Wood, who engaged me for the autumn season of Promenade Concerts at Queen's Hall in 1911. I appeared at two of the Wagner concerts, singing Isolde's Liebestod at the first, and the closing scene from Götterdämmerung at the second. I made a very decided hit in both, and thenceforward my reputation as a concert singer, particularly in Wagnerian or declamatory music, was firmly established.

'Of course I had had only the usual one rehearsal for each concert, and I was terribly nervous; but I knew my music well—indeed, was as much in the skin of the characters as though I had been acting them. That, as it seems to me, is what every singer should strive to arrive at, not merely in Wagner, but in the rendering of every piece that calls for a dramatic or emotional interpretation. One must be able to forget the audience entirely, to know the music so thoroughly and be so absorbed in it that a mistake or slip is practically impossible, to feel what is being said and sung so deeply that the right colour or shade of expression is bound to be in every tone and word. I have been thinking out these points more than ever lately when singing some of the famous Lieder at my recitals. I prefer doing so through the medium of the best English translations that I can obtain, because I believe that the vast majority of our audiences enjoy them most when they can follow the exact meaning of the text. British singers should remember this. Instead of being content to pronounce foreign languages badly, they should seek rather to sing well in their own, and take the necessary pains to acquire the art of forming and uttering pure English vowels.'

'You agree that that is quite as important in the theatre as in the concert-room?'

'Certainly; if possible even more so. In either place the audience must be made to understand every word. Happily I was able to perceive this from the beginning. I never realised the importance of technique more vividly than when I first appeared at the Birmingham Town Hall at the opening performance of the Festival of 1912, when I sang the soprano solos in Elijah with Dame Clara Butt, Mr. John McCormack, and Mr. Clarence Whitehill in the other chief parts, and Sir Henry Wood as conductor.

'That is the kind of occasion that puts a young singer to the test in every way; and boldly projecting cornice, the whole being 38-ft. long by about 30-ft. in height. In the centre of this portico is a projecting porch which contains the entrance door surmounted by the arms of the College. Internally the alterations comprise an entrance hall, occupying the site of the original passage, assistant-secretary's room, and half the curator's room. This entrance hall forms a central space from which access is obtained to all parts of the College. On each side of the entrance hall stand, in pairs, eight fluted columns in wainscot oak with richly carved caps supporting a decorated plaster entablature, the upper members of which are returned across the ceiling, dividing it into three panels. At the north end the existing War Memorial is framed into oak panelling enriched with a wreath and swags of laurel leaves, and above is the coat of arms of the College surrounded with carved fruit and flowers. This feature is balanced by a corresponding treatment at the south end, forming an overmantel to a fireplace of golden scyros marble. On the east side, between two windows, are the entrance doors, the carved architraves of which fit between the two central pairs of columns, the door-head being finished with acroteria and cresting leading up to a seated figure of Pan in the centre. The west wall (that opposite to the entrance) is perforated by two enriched arched openings with keystones, each modelled with a female head. Through these arches a grand staircase in oak rises to the first floor. At the first landing on the stairs, and visible from the hall, a stained glass window, 15-ft. in height, gives a welcome touch of colour to the scheme. This window is the work of Mr. A. K. Nicholson, the well-known stained glass designer, and is of great artistic merit. The design shows a figure of John of Fornsete, the Benedictine monk of Reading, who composed the earliest example of English secular music which we now possess. In the centre is a wreath enclosing a scene with Reading Abbey in the distance, and in the foreground John of Fornsete composing Sumer is icumen in. In the lower portion of the window is the coat of arms of the College. Adjoining this window is another smaller window containing a figure of Henry Purcell, from a contemporary portrait, holding a scroll of music in his hand. These two figures are surrounded by canopy work, and eight medallions of English musicians.

From the corridor open the board-room and the concert-room. This has been panelled in oak up to the frieze level, being divided into bays by groups of flat fluted pilasters, and the ceiling has been enriched by a circular treatment of fans. The wainscot oak used is extremely fine, and is all picked timber acquired before the war. Colour is introduced again by means of stained glass in the fanlights of the windows, which contain the coats of arms of the past presidents of the College, beginning at the south end with Sir F. Gore Ouseley and Sir John Goss, followed by Lord Selborne and Lord Coleridge, the Marquis of Aberdeen, Lord St. Leven, Lord Alverstone, and Viscount Ridley, the window in the corner containing the arms of the present president, the Earl of Shaftesbury. The concert-room is illuminated by concealed lighting supplied by a hundred and forty-two lamps behind the cornice. The old organ has been retained. The remainder of the College has been redecorated throughout, and minor alterations of practical utility have been made, especially in the basement, where a students' dining-room has been opened out. The work has been executed to the designs and under the supervision of the architects, Messrs. Cheadle & Harding, with Messrs. Foster & Dicksee as general contractors. The carving and plaster work of the entrance hall and portico are by Messrs. Aumonier, and the carving of the staircase and ceiling in the concert-room is the work of Mr. Esmond Burton.

Round John of Fornsete are Lawes, Arne, Sullivan, and Elgar, and around Purcell are Byrd, Gibbons, Goss, and the present Chairman of the Board. The Fornsete window represents secular music, and the Purcell window sacred. The students of the College will thus get a daily lesson in musical history.

J. F. B.

MUSIC AND MATERIALISM

BY KEIGHLEY SNOWDEN

No one complains that music suffers because the age is materialistic, but let us not forget that music and the other arts have been mistresses of civilisations. They are needed now, and music especially is needed, for the repose and solace of many lives, for the joy of most, and for the cultivation of finer thought and emotion; but their authority is not great, and, broadly speaking, no artist commands his due share of cakes and ale. The arts lost authority in England when science was added to the teaching staff. Science dished them with the gospel of getting on and the means to practise it. Since then your Englishman has had little notion of an art of life, a wise and pleasant practice of the other arts, but has treated them as hangers-on. The worst of it is that the ability of science is not to be disputed, and that some of the arts, daunted by it, have begun to copy her methods. They have grown more intellectual and less æsthetic. They are obsessed with research and forget inspiration.

But there is something new at last. Science is in a way to restore authority to the arts. She must, in fact, establish it, and the prospect is important, for if she does we may be at the dawn of a great period for music. Let us look at it. The position is not hard to understand. After worrying out the evidence for evolution in a general way, science has come to take a little interest in the evolution of æsthetic faculty, and she suspects that faculty to be of more value to the human species than any one knew. It is perhaps our main guide and uplift. Mr. Shaw, for example, is behind the times with his fable of Back to Methuselah. Instead of putting away the arts as childish things, we shall cultivate nothing else so piously. This prospect is not as near as the settlement of Europe, but it can be discerned, and for the encouragement of musicians its reality is worth making plain.

It is a matter of seeing just what raised man above the other creatures, and goes on raising him. The older scientists and Mr. Shaw thought it was mainly curiosity, but, on a sudden, our modern psychologists are pondering man's sense of beauty. This cannot, they perceive, be a recent acquirement. It is instinctive, and practically as old as any other instinct. For the other creatures have it, too; it serves the purpose of sex among them, and some of them—the bower-bird and others—have eyes for more than their mates. A fortiori, so had the earliest man, besides curiosity and an elementary sense of peril. And it must have done as much for his mind as those two spurs; indeed, the psychologists point out that, once he had become self-conscious, the eternal sway of beauty and peril began to develop a soul in him. More than that, he must in any case have gone on from admiring beauty in visible things to seeing it in feeling and behaviour. Beauty and peril together would give him his first notions of religion and morals.

Now, beauty being a main concern of the arts, it is easy to see that music, which has more to do than any other in sublimating beauty of feeling, comes into her own with this discovery. Science pays her a heavy debt, making her aware at last of a share in the purpose of creation. Man, it seems, would never have come so far along the path of evolution without her services, teaching him refinement and self-mastery. Musicians have said as much themselves. It will soon be time to reassert the claim on grounds likely to be respected even by the Philistines. Observe that this claim on scientific grounds is for a place above the graphic arts and some others. Exquisite drawings were done by the cave men, and we need not be surprised at them. Admiration for the visible things came first. Beauty of sound expressing feeling is a higher fetch of evolution, and takes us further. Pace Mr. Shaw, there is nothing more important in the world than good feeling, not even a ripe old age of cogibundity, with the skill to hatch out full-grown youths and maidens from synthetic eggs.

But what then? Science may write the cheque: it will be no very straightforward business for artists to get it cashed. We have had to wait half a century for a fairly obvious gain of knowledge, and be it said that this article is written while the general body of scientists, preoccupied, know nothing of either payment or debt. Much less is there anything known of either to the bank of public opinion, totting up material profits. We must send in the account. With a view to press it, there are one or two considerations to be remembered. It was the default of science, and everyone's consequent absorption in those material profits, that lately brought about a world disaster. Why, during fifty years or more, had she no time for the soul of man? On learning that skulls had grown bigger, why did she assume that they had grown only by the development of her own kind of faculty? Is the bank well satisfied with the gains of mere curiosity in Europe?

The plain truth is that the arts, including the great art of life, are the main concern of man on his planet, and that, if they are neglected or belittled, the peril of his situation becomes unendurable and meaningless. The sooner they reassert some authority the better. If they indeed spring from the same root as morals and religion, we should demand from science that chapter on the æsthetic of evolution without more delay, and make the most of it. Any journalist catering for the man in the street would find it topical. Any man in the street, remembering what the mere beauty of the world meant to him in war-time, might begin to respect himself. As for music, whatever indirection she may have suffered, her special claim is that alone, perhaps, among the arts she has not bent the knee to materialism.

REBEL ROMANTICS

BY MRS. FRANK LIEBICH

An unruly 19th century romantic composer infringing the laws of his predecessors, the classicists, seems a tame, conciliatory individual compared with a combative and apparently untrammelled contemporary modernist. Yet to the foggymod of their time, Schumann, Chopin, Berlioz, Liszt, and even the reputable Brahms, were lawless revolutionaries. It is conceivable that the work of the most ultra-modern composers of to-day and to-morrow may appear as temperate and mellifluous to the plain man of the 21st century as the 19th century romantics seem now to us.

But these romantic composers had their own battles to fight, and much derision and abuse to contend with. Among them no finer knight-errants existed in the cause of music and the convictions of musicians than Schumann and Liszt. Delving among their writings we may come across paragraphs and pages that with slight substitution of terms and names might have been used by present-day writers commenting on contemporary composers and their compositions.

Schumann, most equitable of critics, writing to Keferstein, reproaches him for not displaying the same interest in the efforts of the younger generation of artists as he used to do. Keferstein had said that it was only through Bach and Kuhnau that he could understand where Mozart and Haydn got their music from, and that he could not imagine where modern composers got theirs:

'I don't quite share your opinion [says Schumann]. Mozart and Haydn had only a partial and imperfect knowledge of Bach, and we can have no idea how Bach, had they known him in all his greatness, would have affected their creative powers. But the thoughtful combinations, the poetry and humour of modern music, originate chiefly in Bach. Mendelssohn, Bennett, Chopin, Hiller—in fact, all the so-called romantic school (of course, I am speaking of Germans)—approach Bach far nearer in their music than Mozart ever did; indeed, all of them knew Bach most thoroughly. I myself confess my sins daily to that mighty one, and endeavour to purify and straighten myself through him.'

Schumann naturally dismisses the idea of Kuhnau being placed on a level with Bach. 'There is no getting near Bach,' he says, 'he is unfathomable.'

Among Schumann's articles contributed to the Neue Zeitschrift there is a short one headed The Devil's Romanticists. An attack, he says, had been made on them by a director of music at Breslau, and the Universal Musical Times 'for ever thunders against them':

'Where are they, and who are they? [he continues]. Perhaps Mendelssohn, Chopin, Bennett, Hiller, Henselt, Taubert? What have the old gentlemen to say against them? Are Vanhal, Pleyel, Herz, or Hüntten of more value? But if those and others are meant, people should speak more plainly about it. And if some people twaddle about the "torment and martyrdom of this epoch of transition," there are grateful and far-sighted ones enough who entertain different opinions. A stop ought to be put, however, to this mixing up of everything together, and of throwing suspicion on the endeavours of every young composer, merely because there are weak and objectionable points in the German-French school, as in Berlioz, Liszt, &c. And if you are not satisfied, old gentlemen, why not give us works yourselves—works, works, not only words?'

Schumann's remarks on equal and unequal rhythm and measure in connection with Berlioz's Symphony, The Life of an Artist, are in advance of his time, and have a bearing on the fluid time, the barring by phrase instead of by time-unit, even to the dancing of Massine to phrases instead of to measure.

'It seems [writes Schumann] as though the music sought to return to its origin before it was confined by the laws of time, and to elevate itself to more unfettered language, more poetic accent—such as we find in the Greek chorus, the language of the Bible, the prose of Jean Paul.'

Then he reminds his readers of the prophetic remark made many years ago by the child-like, poetic Carl Wagner (1722-1822):

'When it becomes possible [said he] to render the tyranny of measure in music wholly imperceptible and invisible, so that this art is made apparently free; when it attains self-consciousness, then it will possess the complete power of embodying lofty ideas, and become from that moment the first of the fine arts.'

The national movement in music is touched upon by Schumann in words which have an even stronger bearing on present-day methods than the beginnings of it in his own time. In an article on the Danish composer, Gade, and his Ossian Overture, Schumann says :

‘It really begins to look as if the nations bordering on Germany desired to emancipate themselves from the influence of German music. This might annoy a German nationalist, but it could only appear natural and cheering to the more profound thinker, if he understood human nature. So we see the French-Pole, Chopin ; Bennett, the Englishman ; Verhulst, the Hollander ; and the representatives of Hungarian music giving promise and performance of what must lead them to be regarded as most worthy embodiments of the artistic tendency of their native lands.’

Then he speaks of Lindblad, of Stockholm, transcribing old folk-songs, and Ole Bull—both pioneers of our own modern folk-song experts—and he reminds these Scandinavians of their lakes, mountains, aurora-borealis, and antique runes, so that the North may well dare to speak its own language.

Over and over again Schumann's insight and keen musical comprehension were placed at the service of his contemporaries. Thus in 1838, when writing to one of the contributors to his journal, the Neue Zeitschrift, A. W. von Zuccalmaglio, on the subject of another critic's objection to Berlioz's Overture to Les Francs Juges, he says :

‘Honestly I grudge the paper for it, for so far as I am concerned Berlioz is as clear to me as the blue sky. I think there is really a new era dawning for music,—in fact it must. Fifty years bring many changes and advances.’

And later, in 1852, writing to R. Pohl :

‘I am quite used to the public not understanding my compositions, especially the better and deeper ones, after a first hearing. Of course, without studying the score, no work that is at all important can be understood at a first hearing.’

Gade, Field, Chopin, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Liszt, one and all are considered in Schumann's Essays and Criticisms. There seemed no limit to his understanding—until one day there appeared a stumbling-block, and at the same time a lack of perception, the unhearing ear : a fate that may at any moment befall the widest- and clearest-minded critic of to-day. It may overtake anyone. When it does, he will know he has reached the end of his tether so far as modern music is concerned, and he will be wise to own to it. For Schumann the limit was Wagner. To-day the limit for some people is Bartók, Stravinsky, Malipiero, or a few of the younger Englishmen or Frenchmen :

‘There is Wagner [Schumann writes to Mendelssohn in 1845], who has just finished another opera [Tannhäuser], undoubtedly a clever fellow, full of crazy ideas, and bold to a degree . . . I declare he cannot write or imagine four consecutive bars that are melodious or even correct. And now the score lies beautifully printed before us, and its fifths and octaves into the bargain.’

B

Eight years later, writing to C. Van Bruyck, he resumes :

‘What you tell me about Wagner has interested me very much. To put it in as few words as possible, he is not a good musician, he lacks feeling for form and harmony. If you were to hear his operas on the stage I am sure you could not but feel deep emotion in a great many instances . . . But as I said before, the music apart from the whole performance is poor—often downright amateurish, meaningless, and repulsive.’

‘Neither Schumann nor Berlioz could rest satisfied at seeing the steady advance of Wagner's works,’ wrote Liszt to Dr. F. Brendel in 1868. Both of them suffered from a suppressed enthusiasm for the music of the future. But Schumann could see clearly ahead in most matters. Writing of Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor, he says :

‘Only Chopin begins and ends so : with dissonances through dissonances into dissonances. But how many beauties this piece contains! The idea of calling it a Sonata is a caprice, if not a jest, for he has bound together four of his wildest children, to smuggle them under this name into a place to which they could not else have penetrated.’

Then he proceeds to imagine a worthy country preceptor visiting a music-shop for the purpose of buying some new music. A pile of novelties is placed before him, but they do not interest him. Finally a Pianoforte Sonata is produced. It is Chopin's, in B flat minor. Thinking a sonata is a good old-time composition, he purchases it, and takes it home. Similarly, nowadays, another such an old-fashioned individual might inadvertently buy Bartók's latest Sonata for violin and pianoforte, and take it back to a quiet, retired home in the wolds. On closer acquaintance the German preceptor is shocked at the rank blasphemy of the composition, and tosses it aside. Then Schumann sees in fancy, in years to come, some descendant of this individual chancing on the Sonata, brushing the dust off its cover, playing it, and saying to himself, ‘This man was not very wrong.’

Elsewhere Schumann reminds his hearers that he prided himself on having introduced Chopin from an unknown world into publicity, and of how triumphantly Chopin issued from the fight with the ‘ignoramuses and Philistines.’

Parallels with the past and present can be found in plenty in the writings of this 19th century composer, which will furnish profitable subjects for meditation. The disagreements between rebels and reactionaries are and have been a constant source of interest and diversion. If ever they should cease much dullness would ensue, and a considerable amount of entertaining literature would be lost to posterity.

The Professional Classes Aid Council announces that owing to lack of funds it is necessary to refuse applications for assistance with the education of children, grants in illness and convalescence, and some other forms of help. Donations—to help professionals in their need—are urgently required, and should be sent to 251, Brompton Road, S.W. 3. The Council is registered under the War Charities Act, 1916.

THE NURSERIES OF ENGLISH SONG

BY FRANK KIDSON

I.

About the end of the 17th century a medical fad had vogue in the shape of a recommendation 'to drink the waters.' The more evil-tasting these waters were, the more virtue was believed to lie in them. As a consequence owners of fields near London (and there were many such fields) which could boast of a spring of evil-smelling and ill-tasting water were quick to take advantage of the prevalent credulity.

With a view to ulterior profit, the medical value of such springs was blazoned forth, and favourable opinions (for a consideration) were obtained from the profession as to their efficacy in all sorts of diseases. How all this led to the benefit of English song I shall endeavour to show.

There were many fields on the northern side of the river, and some across it to the south, where provision was made for 'taking the waters.' A pleasant half-hour's evening stroll from the City towards the Islington—or even nearer—fields could be made by all who desired to take the cure.

The proprietors of the spas did not fail to have ready supplies of strong waters for the gentlemen and cordials for the ladies, not only 'to take the taste off,' but with medical warranty that such 'taken immediately after the waters' would add a benefit which the pure spring lacked. And so benches were provided and shelters for showery weather, while to draw custom fiddlers and, in due time, singers were engaged to add to the general attractiveness. Thus more and more frequenters came—not to drink the health-giving waters, but to enjoy the social amusements of the place. We have the same ethics in our modern spas, English and foreign, where orchestras and refined variety-shows go hand in hand with sulphur water.

In the 17th and 18th centuries concerts as we know them had scarcely been created, and it remained for the spa people to introduce this form of musical entertainment on lines which the moderns have followed.

This was mainly the beginning of the London and provincial pleasure-gardens, though some of these gardens—Vauxhall, for instance—depended on their rusticity rather than on their spas or medical springs for custom.

Some few of the larger provincial towns followed the lead set by London, and in several places—I might name Liverpool for one—there were 'Ranelaghs,' 'Vauxhalls,' and 'Spring Gardens,' all apeing the London types, but now remembered only by the streets which, adjoining their sites, still bear their names. And so these London and provincial pleasure-gardens were the precursors of the later music-hall, which carried almost the same kind of programme. Vauxhall, among the London gardens, most readily occurs to mind, but Vauxhall was only one of many, some significant and some insignificant, yet all having the same features—a musical entertainment combined with a social element—where eating and drinking might be enjoyed. The last survival of this class of garden was probably Cremorne, while sundry provincial gardens remained in existence at a much later date.

Sadler's Wells commenced with a musical programme as early as 1684, while near at hand were other spas with similar diversions at an early date. Sadler's Wells (named after Thomas Sadler, who first saw money in his mineral spring, and was clever enough to make his resort attractive) had, as we know, a lengthy history, reaching in varied forms to our day, with plenty of vicissitudes to add interest to its story.

Vauxhall, as already stated, founded its chief attraction upon its rusticity, and Mr. Pepys, apparently with his household, made more than one visit to regale himself with the song of birds, the eating of a lobster or a syllabub, and the pulling of cherries.

Up to the early years of the 18th century vocal music at Vauxhall does not appear to have been very much a feature of the entertainment, though when Jonathan Tyers, who took over the concern in 1728, began to make improvements and to introduce new things, vocal music became part of the programme. This innovation probably occurred about 1737 or 1745. Dr. Burney fixes the latter date for the introduction of vocal music at Vauxhall. Singers from the theatres were engaged to help in forming a concert with the instrumentalists. An organ was erected, a permanent conductor engaged, with a free hand in the selection of performers, and encouragement for original compositions was provided. In this wise, Vauxhall, Marylebone, Ranelagh, and some other minor gardens were truly the nurseries of English music, especially of the vocal kind.

With the advent of singing at Vauxhall came a class of song with an artificial simplicity as its chief characteristic, that took the town. Of this type of lyric many hundreds were produced, and apparently became popular in private singing. A good example is the now familiar 'Lass with the delicate air,' with its delightful music by Michael Arne.

I must refer a little later to these Vauxhall lyrics, and trace the growth of the pleasure-garden movement so far as its relation to music is concerned. It may, however, be of interest in this place to give a typical Vauxhall effusion as sung there by Miss Stevenson in the season of 1752, when the musical directorship was in the hands of Dr. John Worgan, who composed the dainty, simple little tunes that were warbled by Miss Stevenson, Miss Burchell, and the tenor, Thomas Lowe.

To make the man kind and con-stant and true Whom your choice or your Des-tin-y brings un-to you, Take a hint from a friend whom ex-perience has taught, And ex-

-peri-ence, you know, nev-er fails when 'tis bought. And ex-

-peri-ence, you know, nev-er fails when 'tis bought.

The arts which you practised at first to ensare,
For in Love little arts, as in battle, are fair:
Whether neatness, or prudence, or wit were the bait,
Let the hook still be covered, and still play the cheat. Bis.

Marylebone Gardens, the chief rival to Vauxhall at about the middle of the 18th century, was in its earlier days (that is, near the end of the 17th century) an adjunct to a tavern—whose chief attraction was a bowling-green.

It was Daniel Gough, proprietor of this tavern (the 'Rose' Tavern), who saw the possibility of his grounds becoming a rival to Vauxhall, and in 1737 opened them as 'Marybone Gardens,' with an orchestra of instrumentalists, and, a couple of years later, an organ. There is not much record of the doings at Marylebone before the gardens were taken over by John Trusler, about 1756. There are, however, accounts that music of an instrumental kind was popular, and that in imitation of the Vauxhall introduction of singing, Miss Falkner, a vocalist of considerable repute, was engaged in 1737 as principal singer. From that period onwards, to the closing of the gardens in 1776, the songs sung at Marylebone were as famous as those at Vauxhall and Ranelagh. To John Trusler must be credited the fact that shortly after the middle of the 18th century Marylebone was as celebrated as Vauxhall. The gardens were situate near Marylebone High Street, and reached as far as Harley Street.

This was an advantage to those who did not care to take Thames wherry to cross to Vauxhall. Trusler was a pastrycook, whose daughter's reputation for tarts, cheese-cakes, and plum-cakes was well-known, and as people liked choice eating combined with fashionable amusement, Marylebone had its frequenters, among whom was the great Mr. Handel.

In 1755—shortly before Trusler came on the scene—John Beard, the singer, then at the height of his popularity, was either proprietor or manager of the gardens, and his sound musical knowledge and his own prestige must have helped to popularise the musical fame of Marylebone.

Leaving the account of Marylebone, it becomes necessary to speak of the other of the triad of gardens—Ranelagh. This was situate near Chelsea, on the banks of the stream that flowed from the Serpentine and some other of the brooks that ran down from the rising ground towards the Thames.

The situation enabled the proprietors to introduce special features not available in other resorts. For example, a wooden erection, in Chinese taste, was built in the centre of one of the streams where, no doubt, tea was served. But the chief feature of Ranelagh was its immense 'rotunda' where the musical entertainments were given.

Ranelagh commenced its career as a public pleasure-garden in 1742, taking its name from Richard Viscount Ranelagh, whose house and garden it had absorbed. (It may be mentioned in passing that the popular pronunciation was 'Runelow'.)

From the first holding itself aloof from the common herd that frequented Vauxhall and Marylebone, it was always esteemed to be an ultra-fashionable resort, even if rather dull. Its chief diversion, apart from music, was promenading the rotunda and the tree-shaded walks. As other more virile amusements came to the front, Ranelagh's day drew to a close and was finally ended in 1803.

Of the many minor gardens that followed the lead of the three greater ones, probably the most famous resort was 'Finch's Grotto Gardens,' that commenced in 1760, and was situate near St. George's Street, Southwark. The career of these gardens ended about 1773-75. Here the same class of musical entertainment was carried forward. One of the chief singers was a Mr. Dearle, though Mrs. Baddeley, the actress, was also engaged, and the tenor Thomas Lowe.

Cuper's Gardens, also on the south side of the river, now the site of Waterloo Bridge Road, was flourishing musically in 1740 and 1750. Instrumental music of a refined and fashionable character was there performed, and popular singers were engaged. Lewis Granom was one of the chief composers.

A further consideration of the music-makings at the London gardens, which formed and fashioned the taste in English vocal music, must be reserved for the second part of this article, from material in my own possession.

(To be continued.)

BRITISH MUSIC AT VIENNA

BY PAUL BECHERT

(OUR VIENNA CORRESPONDENT)

The Chinese Wall which surrounded our physical and spiritual life for four long war years is gradually being demolished, and once more our eyes are free to roam. Like Rip van Winkle, we find that these last eight years have wrought a vast change and a surprising development in the surrounding world. Not the least surprising of our new experiences was the season of English music which has just come to a close here. Most important of all, these English concerts have vanquished the old prejudice, held here for decades past, of the English nation's lack of musical talent. There were, to be sure, many arguments in favour of this prejudice, for up to the time immediately preceding the world war, English music so far as we knew it was embodied in the work of but two composers—Sir Edward Elgar and Dame Ethel Smyth, whose conceptions, moreover, however fine, were not indicative of any 'national' school, being rather influenced by the German symphonic principles of the last century of which Brahms and Strauss were the representative figures. Beyond that, what little of English music was generally known here consisted of a few more or less popularly pleasing songs of the 'drawing-room' kind. Of the modern musical tendencies there seemed hardly any trace in contemporary English music, save perhaps in the compositions of Cyril Scott, whose affinity to the impressionist methods of Debussy was quite clearly discernible.

How radically conditions must have changed in England of late! Suddenly we began hearing the names of such composers as Arthur Bliss, Gustav Holst, Arnold Bax, John Ireland, and others whose existence had hitherto been known only to a limited number of professionals, and we were even more astonished to find their compositions for the most part excellent works, and worthy of the most serious consideration. Their psychological aspects, as a matter of course, are quite different from those of our young German composers. Germany, let us not forget, is the home of Nietzsche and Schopenhauer, the land of intellectualism and the very birthplace of revolutionary movements. The intellectual element, and that philosophical attitude towards the world in general which are typical of the German mind, are more than ever predominant in the German music of our generation. Moreover, the revolutionary tendencies of present-day Germany readily lend themselves to music, as to all other things of everyday life, and they react in a musical radicalism which borders on anarchy. The works of our young composers, based on the Wilsonian principle of self-determination and on an adherence to self-chosen laws which are as yet unwritten, therefore frequently defy analysis. They are the outcome of the Sturm und Drang period which our generation is going through, and the definite forms of this new musical art are as yet in a process of crystallisation.

Of such intellectual and philosophical strife the modern English composers seem to know little. They are bright, healthy, and talented young fellows who do not pretend to set philosophical problems to music, but who love to revel in sound, colour, and rhythm. The strongly rhythmical character of their work which is frequently—all too frequently, perhaps—derived from the popular dances of the day, is in fact the predominant feature of their compositions. But a certain melodic freshness, akin to a folk-song element, constitutes the appealing quality common to the majority of their works. Most surprising of all is their preference for humorous, even grotesquely parodistic effects, which Gustav Holst and Arthur Bliss command with particular mastery. In Holst's Suite The Planets, it is a genial flash of wit when Jupiter interrupts his weirdly frolicsome fox-trot-like dance to indulge in a short incidental flirtation with Semele, who is very cleverly characterised by a truly Handel-like theme. This Suite may, in fact, be ranked with the most interesting orchestral novelties of recent years. The same spirit of humorous satire, next to a commendable attempt at introducing new orchestral colours—such as the employment of the bass-flute, which has very rarely been used heretofore—is the chief characteristic of Arthur Bliss, who was present personally to conduct his chamber suite Conversations, as well as his Rhapsody, Mêlée Fantastique, and the Storm Music for Shakespeare's The Tempest. Some of these pieces, I think, go rather too far in their extravagances, especially the last-named composition, whose excessive use of percussion instruments rather exceeds the limitations imposed by the average concert-hall.

Arthur Bliss, it seems, occupies a position at the left wing of British music, sharing the distinction of such radicalism with Kaikhosru Sorabji, who kept Vienna guessing as to the meaning of his two Pianoforte Sonatas, which are probably the very acme of musical modernism. By way of contrast, I may allude to Arnold Bax, whose symphonic poem entitled November Woods is of a considerably more moderate kind. Bax's Violin Sonata No. 1, splendidly played here by Mr. Ernest Whitfield, is still less radical, and in its melodic and harmonic treatment approaches the style of an Anglicised Grieg. Bax's songs, like those of Bliss and John Ireland—they were excellently sung by Mrs. Dorothy Moulton and Miss Anne Thursfield—disclose a leaning towards the folk-song style which is frequently made attractive by an interesting harmonic twist. Ireland seems at his best in his Violin Sonata No. 2, which Mr. Whitfield presented on another occasion: there is true melodic inspiration in this graceful piece of music, and its last movement abounds with genuine national colour. Ireland was less fortunate with his symphonic poem The Forgotten Rite, which Mr. Maurice Besly very ably conducted on the occasion of Miss Ursula Greville's concert. Miss Greville sang a number of modern English songs by Percival Garratt, Martin Shaw, Eric Fogg, and others, which, while pleasing the popular fancy, disappointed by the meagreness of their musical substance. The same may be said of some songs by Cyril Scott. This composer created a far deeper impression by his performance of his own Pianoforte Concerto—which is perhaps not so much a pianoforte concerto as an effective and well-constructed orchestral piece in which the pianoforte is allotted the rôle of an orchestral instrument, indulging chiefly in ornamental bywork or in passages played in unison with various orchestral groups.

To Mr. Whitfield we are indebted also for the first performance here of Frederick Delius's Violin Concerto, which is melodious without ever losing itself in the cheap or hackneyed. Delius, it seems, belongs to the group of more conservative English composers such as Sir Edward Elgar or Dame Ethel Smyth. The latter's Prelude to her opera The Wreckers is an exceedingly well orchestrated piece, and had a fine success here. Elgar, whose second Symphony was conducted with authority by Dr. Adrian C. Boult at one of his orchestral concerts here, might well be termed the classic among the English musical modernists. This Symphony, like his Sonata Op. 82, which formed part of Mr. Whitfield's programme, is good and scholarly music of a serious if not always inspired sort. Sincerity and earnestness also are the chief assets of Josef Holbrooke, whose Pianoforte Concerto—played by himself—like his symphonic poems, is strongly influenced by such German masters as Schumann and Wagner.

It still remains to record the successful local appearance of Mr. Dawson Freer, who sang English folk-songs as well as classical songs, and of Miss Violet Clarence, who played a number of pleasing but rather light pianoforte compositions by Balfour Gardiner, and some by her husband C. à Becket Williams. Particular praise is due to that organization consisting of three ladies and three gentlemen who term themselves 'The English Singers.' The many gems selected from the wealth of old English Madrigals which they presented with an astounding perfection of ensemble and with remarkably airy pianissimo effects, provided a welcome diversion from the many modern works. On the whole, the season of English music which has just terminated here has been one of the most interesting musical events of the year. Vienna gladly welcomed this glimpse of a new musical world which is just now being built up on the other side of the Channel.

THE FANCY

BY JEFFREY PULVER

Whether as the supplanter of the Madrigal in the popular taste or as the first form of instrumental music in the true sense of the word, whether as the forerunner of the sonata or the vehicle that gave to so many of our great composers the opportunity for displaying their genius, the Fancy or Fantasia is alike interesting to the musical historian and to the student of musical form. That it was a transition form in a transition period there can be no doubt. As the mechanics of lutherie became developed and instruments of music were evolved that could, in the hands of experienced players, produce music of really artistic quality, it followed as a natural sequence that music had to be supplied to give both players and instruments a fair chance of showing what they could do when called upon to replace the voice. The era of the Madrigal was the era of vocal music; the period that followed was pre-eminently that of instrumental music. It was no uncommon thing for Madrigals to be written in three, four, five, or more parts, and played upon sets of instruments when voices were not available—many 16th and 17th century publications stated on their title-pages that this could be done. The practice obtained in this way soon gave performers a sufficient technique to cause them to seek fresh material to work upon. Sets of 'divisions' or variations were thus evolved, based upon some given ground, a favourite theme being the In Nomine of the Roman liturgy. It was not long before such free compositions were known, brevi manu, as In Nomines; and out of this form the Fancy was derived. Since it was, as its name implied, of a free character, the composer was permitted to indulge in all kinds of devices, and some of the early Fancies abounded in very clever fugal and contrapuntal work, many of them worthy of more serious development. It is perfectly true that very early Fantasias are to be met with on the Continent, but whether these were independent developments or whether they influenced, or were influenced by, the English Fancy, as derived from the older In Nomine, is not quite clear. But although free compositions for instruments are frequent in foreign collections, they do not show quite the same characteristics as do the English Fancies for strings that attained to such popularity in Stuart days. This form of Fantasia, I think, may be looked upon as a purely native product, and since it tended to settle the later Suite and Sonata, we may have here some cause for pride in that thought. The nearest approach to the Fancy, after making allowance for the differences in the national idiom, was the Italian Ricercar or Fantasia which, at the beginning of the 17th century, ousted the Madrigal from favour in Italy. It would be an unprofitable waste of time to speculate as to which country used the term first. We find English Fancies in the 16th century; but, again, whether they were English inventions or influenced by earlier Italian work, must remain open to question. To decide this definitely it would be necessary to examine every known manuscript and to compare the character of the foreign product with that of the native. My own personal opinion, which I advance without any too great certainty, is that the English Fancy was first suggested by the Italian variety, but rapidly developed here along channels that soon made of it a distinct art-form, different in character and spirit from anything produced on the Continent. In this supposition I am at one with Roger North, who says:

And as alterations with endeavour to advance are continually profered, so the Italian masters who alwais did, or ought to lead the van in musick, printed pieces they called Fantazias, wherein was air and variety enough; and afterwards these were imitated by the English, who working more elaborately, improved upon their pattern, which gave occasion to an observation, that in vocall, the Italians, and in instrumentall musick, the English excelled:—Memoires of Musick.

Deriving its name originally, I suppose, from the circumstance that it did not adhere to the then popular dance-forms or ecclesiastical formulæ, the Fancy became developed along academic lines to such an extent that from being a popular form for the amateur it became as awe-inspiring as any of the 'classical' forms of the 18th century. This was so much the case, that by the time Christopher Sympson wrote his Compendium (1667) he was compelled to deplore the downfall of the Fancy, saying:

This style of music was much neglected because of the scarcity of auditors that understand it; their ears being more delighted with light and airy music.

Which shows that human nature has not altered much.

According to Henry Davey, the first mention of the term 'Fancy' occurs in Thomas Mulliner's Book, c. middle of the 16th century (Add. MS. 30513). The same historian cites a manuscript in Christ Church of 1581, which includes a Fancy $\sharp 3$ on the cuckoo's cry by one 'John Bawdwine' (Baldwin). My Lady Nevell's Virginal Book, finished in 1591, contains two Fancies of William Bird's, while Benjamin Cosyn's Virginal Book (at the turn of the century) has a couple of compositions in this form by Orlando Gibbons. Add. MS. 17786-91 includes a number of early Fancies by John Okeover, John Ward, Richard Deering, and Martin Pierson, and Add. MS. 29366-8 contains another five by Deering. John Dowland's Varietie of Lute Lessons (1610) contains seven Fantasias, while Add. MS. 17792-6 (after 1624) includes fifteen Fantasias by Thomas Tomkins ($\sharp 3$), and some by Ferabosco, Lupo, Ward, &c. The specimens in the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book are too familiar to need citing.

At this point it will perhaps be well to notice a difference in character between the examples just mentioned and the later Stuart specimens to be cited. It is just possible that those which have gone before are of a piece with the Fantasias written all over the Continent, while those which follow may not be a further development of these at all, but a distinct form, based, as has already been hinted, upon the English In Nomine.

Round about the middle of the 17th century we find literally thousands of these instrumental fancies exhibiting purely English characteristics. Further manuscripts containing Fancies are, inter alia, Add. MSS. 29290, 29427 (William Bird and Alfonso Ferabosco), 31423 (John Jenkins), 31428 (Id.), and 30487 (Id.). The most popular composers of Fancies were Orlando Gibbons (whose Three-Part Fantazias for two Trebles and a Basse engraven upon Copper were advertised in Lawes's Ayres and Dialogues of 1653), Michael East, William Lawes, John Jenkins, and Coperario (John Cooper). Purcell still wrote in the form, and produced some good examples in from three to seven parts. Charles I. was very fond of this form of composition, and, according to John Playford (Introduction to the Skill of Musick), 'could play his Part exactly well on the Bass-Viol, especially of those Incomparable Phantasies of Mr. Coperario to the Organ.' Charles II., on the other hand, did not like the Fancy at all, and Christopher Sympson may well have been thinking of him when he spoke of the 'light and airy music' mentioned above. Charles II.'s taste represented the spirit of the age, and that spirit was responsible for the limits placed upon the development of the Fancy.

A word of appreciation should be given to two gentlemen who have done much towards making this form of writing known to the present generation.

One of them is Sir Frederick Bridge, who has so often caused examples of these early Fancies to be heard at his London University lectures; and the other is Mr. W. W. Cobbett, for the good work he has done in reviving interest in the form, and in encouraging young composers to try their prentice hand in Fancies as their forefathers did before them.

Occasional Notes

In our March issue we made some unfavourable criticisms of the musical arrangements at the average cinema. We are glad to find our views endorsed in the April number of The Cinema by no less an authority than Dr. George Tootell, the musical director at the Stoll Picture Theatre. The fact that Dr. Tootell backs us up after setting out to do the exact opposite makes his support the more valuable and convincing. Our readers will remember that our chief complaint was that '... if the picture fails to grip, and we are thrown back on the music, the result is generally painful, because of the mistaken attempts to follow the film too closely. The effect is scrappy, and when the scraps consist of the mangled remains of standard compositions we feel like throwing things; when they are bits of conventional melodramatic "agits" and "hurries" they are tolerable only because they are not mutilated Beethoven or Wagner.'

Dr. Tootell defends the use of standard works as an accompaniment to the pictures, but agrees with us in objecting to their mutilation:

'Cuts from the works of the Masters [he says] should be made with the scalpel rather than with the axe, and should be made with discretion. It is admittedly against all artistic feeling to take short passages from well-known classics. The wise and artistic musical director will not introduce such music unless opportunity is offered for a reasonable length of the excerpt; but the blame for many "scrappy" settings to films does not rest with the musical director, but with the producer of the film.'

Dr. Tootell is in a better position than most of us when it comes to placing the blame for scrappiness. As a matter of fact, however, we hinted that the producer was generally the culprit. This by the way. As a proof that our criticism was well founded we quote Dr. Tootell further:

'To accompany the scene of an intoxicated man with the "Woodland Murmurs" from Siegfried, or a love scene between a coster and his "donah" with "Siegmund's Love Song" from the Valkyrie—I have heard this done!—obviously means a screw loose somewhere.'

Exactly; we have heard similar misfits, and that is why we complained. Dr. Tootell's own experiences are the amplest of justifications for the hardest things that have been said here and elsewhere against the cinema and its music.

As to those 'conventional melodramatic "agits" and "hurries"' against which we protested, Dr. Tootell backs us up handsomely by admitting that of the music written specially for the cinema 'much is simply rubbish.' He then goes on to express agreement with our suggestion that the best results will be attained by engaging a composer to write a special accompaniment to a film, such accompaniment being regarded as an integral part of the picture.

Now the amusing thing about this Cinema article is that, though it justifies in the completest way everything said in these columns, its preamble attempts to crush us for our presumption in daring to say them! We are told that '... it is an accepted axiom that a writer should understand the subject upon which he attempts to write... it does not follow that because a musician is an authority upon Bach, Beethoven, or the modern Russian school, he is ipso facto competent to say what should or should not be done in the cinemas.'

But it does follow that if a man is a trained musician and of average intelligence he is competent to express an opinion as to whether the musical accompaniment to a picture is scrappy, vulgar, or bad in any way. Since 'accepted axioms' are being handed out we ourselves will weigh in with a good old one to the effect that 'lookers-on see most of the game.' It is easily conceivable that the musical director of a cinema may, in a few years, become so hardened to the unsatisfactory results of having to supply scraps at the behest of the producer (as Dr. Tootell says is often the case) that his opinion on the artistic side of the matter may be of very little value. The average musician 'in front' is almost certain to be a better judge of the effect. But Dr. Tootell is so sure that the man behind the scenes knows best, that he talks scornfully of 'highbrow musicians stepping down from their pedestals to take notice of the music in the cinema, expressing their opinions and offering their criticism and advice publicly through the medium of various journals musical and otherwise,' and making 'futile and inane suggestions.' We hope Musical News and Herald and any other contemporaries who have published articles on this subject will bear up. Our own withers are unwrung, because, as we have shown, Dr. Tootell thoroughly agrees with us in the main—though he hadn't such intentions.

On one point only does Dr. Tootell part company with us. We expressed the view that 'a fatal weakness of the film is its inability to dispense with accompaniment.' Dr. Tootell is very scornful on this head. He says:

'If this statement is to be accepted, then the ballet, with which the film is analogous, is also suffering from the same "fatal weakness," and yet in spite of this "fatal weakness" the ballet has developed and grown from strength to strength from the 17th century to the present time. Either the ballet or the Musical Times writer is wrong—probably the ballet!'

It is even more probable that Dr. Tootell is wrong in his analogy. As the film, generally speaking, tells a story, its real analogy is surely the drama proper. That this is so is proved by two facts: first, the liberal use of explanatory notes (usually written in American or shaky English), and, second, the attempts constantly being made to synchronise sound and picture in order that the cinema may give us dialogue as well as action. In a ballet the story is as a rule nothing, the dancing and gesture everything. And the best ballets have a musical background which is at least organic, and often specially composed; whereas all but a few film stories are accompanied by a medley of the type condemned by Dr. Tootell himself.

Even if we accept the ballet as the analogy of the film our contention as to the fatal weakness of the latter still stands. The ballet, the film, and even the opera, are alike weak in that they are not pure art forms, but combinations of arts in which all the constituents are more or less spoilt. The best of Wagner's music is hindered rather than helped by the happenings on the stage. There are plenty of people who can enjoy long stretches of his finest operas only by closing their eyes and keeping their ears well open. In fact, Wagner was a great symphonic composer who took the wrong turning. He, not Brahms, should have written the Tenth Symphony.

Music needs no support from pictures, dancing, or acting. At its finest it can gain nothing from association with any other art. It will almost invariably lose, and the loss will be heavy when the 'Forest Murmurs' and 'Siegfried's Love Song' are used in the way Dr. Tootell rightly condemns.

Dr. Tootell favours the use of standard works as cinema music on the ground that he and his colleagues are out to get the best that can be had. The point may be conceded so long as the performance is good, and provided that such 'cuts' as are made are discreet. But when the Doctor goes on to support his claim by saying that 'had Mozart, Beethoven, and Wagner been living at the present day they would have been among the very first to realise the wonderful scope and possibilities offered by the cinema for the development and display of their genius' he uses an argument that may be turned against him. The great ones of the past, if alive to-day, would no doubt write film music, but they would not produce for the purpose C minor and 'Unfinished' Symphonies, 'Forest Murmurs,' and the like. We would pay a good sum to be on hand with a notebook while Beethoven was making a few appropriate remarks on finding his C minor Symphony being used to help out the crudities of The Trail of Blood or The Yellow Claw (just 'released,' in five reels, featuring Luce Tosh).

If cinema musical directors wish to draw on the standard repertory, let them use their spoils as overtures and interludes. In a general way they should keep their hands off when they want music for accompanying purposes. It is not a question of the axe or the scalpel; the point is that association with a film is apt to spoil the music for abstract use—which after all, was the purpose the composer had in view.

Finally, we believe the whole question will be settled shortly in a way that ought to be generally anticipated, though we have not seen it mentioned in this connection. We allude to the synchronisation of sound and film spoken of above. A few months ago we were present at a demonstration in which the results, though a good deal short of perfection, were sufficiently striking to make us confident that the talking film is very near at hand. When it arrives the musical director at the cinema will have pretty much the same job as his confrère at the ordinary theatre—he will provide merely the entr'actes and an occasional undercurrent of music for atmospheric purposes. With this prophecy we step back to the pedestal which, as highbrow musicians, we ought never to have left.

Musical journals so often complain of the comparatively limited space devoted to the art in the daily press that in fairness they should return thanks for any signs of improvement. We are therefore glad to note the enterprise of the Evening News in this respect. In the evening press as a whole music comes off badly. The few concert notices that appear usually bear obvious signs of the blue pencil, and often they are entirely squeezed out of the late editions. Many a time have we bought the Pall Mall Gazette, for example, in order to see what 'E. E.' had to say regarding an event of the previous day, only to find that his notice had appeared in an edition published hard on the heels of breakfast for the benefit of readers to whom the latest news from Gatwick or Epsom is the one thing that matters. Musicians as a rule are not interested in 'tips' and starting prices, and for them an evening paper is a paper published not in the morning but in the evening. Perhaps the P.M.G. will make a note of this little matter of policy. The Evening News does the thing handsomely by giving in its late edition lengthy notices of concerts, with frequent occasional paragraphs, crisply written, and containing not mere small talk, but ideas as well as news. As a result many a man in the Tube is reading more about music than he has ever done before. By thus taking in a daily supply of musical news as he takes in sporting and theatrical and other kinds, he will soon come to see that music is not an exotic affair for a handful of specially cultured enthusiasts, but one of the amenities and recreations which no person of average intelligence can ignore without loss. He may even end by reading a musical journal.

The quest for the Twelve Best Melodies has ended as such quests are bound to end. No two persons are agreed as to the Hundred Best Books; how then shall they be at one as to a mere dozen of anything? Sooner or later—sooner in this case—the lists become mere records of personal taste. We get not the best, but the best-liked, which is quite another thing. Mr. Kalisch's starting (in the Daily News) of this uncatchable hare was worth while, however, because it has made a good many people take some thought as to the characteristics of a good tune. For purposes of record, here is Mr. Kalisch's original choice:

- Purcell: 'When in Death,' from Dido and Æneas.
- Bach: Slow movement of the D minor Concerto for two violins.
- Haydn: Theme of the Variations in the Emperor Quartet ('Deutschland über Alles').
- Mozart: Dove sono.
- Beethoven: First theme of slow movement of B flat Pianoforte Trio.
- Beethoven: Slow movement in the seventh Symphony.
- Schubert: Slow movement of the C major Symphony.
- Schubert: The Young Nun.
- Schumann: 'Cello Melody in slow movement, Piano-forte Concerto.
- Wagner: Spring Song from the Valkyrie.
- Wagner: Quintet from the Die Meistersinger.
- Handel: Ombra mai fu (or 'The Largo').

This selection was not received with enthusiasm, as indeed no list of the kind was likely to be. Two of the choices seem to us to be particularly questionable—The Young Nun and the Quintet from the Meistersingers. The former may or may not be a fine song, but its effect lies chiefly in its declamatory character, and even more in the agitated and sombre accompaniment and gloomy harmonic scheme. The Meistersingers Quintet is out of the running just because it is a Quintet. Had Mr. Kalisch chosen instead 'The Prize Song' he would have had the public with him almost to a man—certainly to a woman. The Musical News and Herald commented on the list with some severity, pointing out that it '... was such as to offer special provocation, for, except Purcell's "When in Death," all Mr. Kalisch's good tunes come from Germany. . . . When we find eleven tunes of one country to one of another and none of the rest of the world, we begin to wonder whether the taste which is responsible for the selection is an unfettered one.'

Our contemporary further had the 'temerity to prefer The March of the Men of Harlech to the Emperor's Hymn'—a preference we heartily share. Indeed, our temerity is sufficient to lead us to declare that the Welsh tune is the finest of all the national anthems, beating its near competitor the Marseillaise because it is fine and stirring all through, whereas its French rival is spoilt by a dreadful bit of padding amidst ships :

In the Sunday Times Mr. Ernest Newman, commenting on Mr. Kalisch's list, pointed out that some of the choices ought to be ruled out because they were not so much melodies as parts of an elaborate musical scheme. Mr. Newman considered that so wide a scope would make it easy to compile a list 'not merely of twelve, but of twelve hundred, or perhaps twelve thousand, excellent melodies.' The terms of the competition must be made quite stringent: the winning melodies must be able to stand on their excellence as pure one-dimensional music.

'If [said Mr. Newman] we are offering a prize for the most beautiful girl in Bermondsey, we must settle the matter by an inspection of features alone; we must not hand over even a third prize to a girl who is only moderately good-looking but who appeals to the sentimental side of us by keeping a paralysed aunt.'

Strictly speaking, the only melodies eligible are those that are independent of instrumental and harmonic trappings, and inevitably this will bring in folk-song. Mr. Newman has most of us with him in placing the Londonderry Air in the very front rank, with a half-dozen picked Scotch and Irish melodies backing it up. Mention of folk-song suggests at once a kindred field that must not be overlooked in a discussion on pure, unaccompanied melody. That field is plainsong. Quite apart from religious associations, some of its finest examples have long been treasured by composers and people alike as tunes that, with their mixture of rugged strength, rhythmic freedom, and mystic appeal, are amongst the things in music that time is unable to touch. Such hymn tunes as Pange Lingua, Vexilla Regis, Ave Maris Stella, Jesu, dulcis memoria, for example, were popular ages before Bach lived, and their beauty is perhaps realised more fully to-day than ever before.

Mr. Newman having lifted the discussion on to a plane where something like definite conclusions were possible, the Daily News straightway brought it down again by asking Sir Landon Ronald for his list, based on 'his experience of thousands of concert-goers.' At once we have such choices as 'Opening of Pianoforte Concerto, Tchaikovsky; Third movement of Pathétique Symphony, Tchaikovsky,' and so on. Then the Gramophone and Eolian Companies were catechised, the resultant lists including some curious items, especially that of the Eolian Company, which gives us the Midsummer Night's Dream Overture, May Brahe's I passed by your window, Woodforde-Finden's Kashmir Song, and Sir Landon Ronald's Down in the Forest.

Finally, on comes the real arbiter in matters of art, 'Man in the street,' who in a letter to the Daily News, tells us that :

'The twelve best tunes are not necessarily buried in some scarce known symphony or concerto . . . they are those which are nearest the heart of the people.'

And amongst them this particular 'man in the street' includes The Church's one Foundation, O rest in the Lord, Softly awakes my heart, D'ye ken John Peel, Dvorák's Humoresque, and Mendelssohn's Spring Song.

'Most of these tunes [he says] have stood the test of time. All are well known. They are the tunes which all men, amateurs and professionals, critics, and composers, love to sing.'

We have often wondered what critics sang in their more expansive moments; now we know.

When Mr. Ernest Newman lightly trolls forth Mendelssohn's Spring Song, followed by Mr. Edwin Evans with his well-known dignified interpretation of The Church's one Foundation, may we be there to hear.

The celebration of the Royal Academy of Music Centenary will consist of a series of events spread over a fortnight—July 10 to 22. They include a Thanksgiving Service at St. Paul's Cathedral, twelve chamber concerts at Eolian Hall, six performances of English opera at the Academy, two dramatic performances, a reception at Queen's Hall, at which will be performed a Masque written for the occasion by Louis N. Parker, and F. Corder's fifty-part chorus, Sing unto God (composed for the opening of the present Academy building), three orchestral concerts at Queen's Hall, and a banquet at the Great Central Hotel. Programmes and other details will be announced shortly.

From the London correspondent of Musical America:

'Two unusually good violinists heard during the week were Harriet Cohen and Katie Goldsmith.'

Maybe; but we thought Miss Cohen so unusually good a pianist when we heard her recently, that somehow we shall always prefer her in that rôle.

We are glad to see 'Musicus' of the Daily Telegraph protesting against M. Dupré's consistent neglect of English organ music when touring among us. After stating that Dupré was announced to play a couple of recitals on the new organ at King George's Hall, Blackburn, and that the two programmes—thirteen works—contain no English music, 'Musicus' says:

'Really, one would respectfully ask M. Dupré if he is not acquainted with a few compositions of native English origin for the organ. After all is said and done, we have had for quite a long time an excellent school of organ-playing in this little country, and I freely assert that our organists of high rank know (and play) vastly more French music than French organists know (or play) of English music. But this does not prove that our organ music is fit only to be ignored in France.'

No; it is merely one more sign that the French attitude in musical matters is almost, if not quite, as hopelessly Chauvinistic as ever it was.

In the same issue of the Daily Telegraph appeared an article by Mr. Arthur Mason, entitled 'The Vatican Choir and English Singing.' In it Mr. Mason reproves some of our musical critics for their attitude towards the performances of the Vatican singers—an attitude which he describes as 'quite surprisingly provincial.' Mr. Mason, we think, is mistaken in his view that the question is one of English singing versus Italian singing. It is something far simpler and more arguable—a mere question of singing. Mr. Mason says he has 'suffered many times under the nasal reediness of Continental choirs of the really inferior sort.' So have a good many of the rest of us. Indeed, we have suffered from the same devastating timbre in England, in quires and places where the boys were untrained or badly trained. Nasal reediness is nasal reediness all the world over, and it is not clear why Mr. Mason should 'suffer' when he hears it from an inferior Continental choir and enjoy it when a rather better Continental choir brings it to the Albert Hall. It is not a bit more tolerable when used by a reputedly good choir on fine music—rather the reverse, in fact, because of the gap between what is and what might be. Presumably Mr. Mason, like most of our docile public, is influenced by the fact that on this occasion it comes to us bearing the august label of the Vatican. But our concern should be with the goods, not with the label, and because these Vatican boys sing with a 'nasal reediness' as pronounced as the worst we have ever heard at home or abroad, we for our part were unable to sit through the whole of the first concert. After all, a boy is a soprano, save on the rare occasions when he is an alto. There are many kinds of enjoyable timbre in soprano and contralto voices, but among them is not nasal reediness. It is never tolerated in a woman singer (except at certain of the lesser variety theatres, where it may be heard as often as Mr. Mason likes), and it is not yet regarded as a virtue when it is heard from the raw boys in a village church. Why then should we English be expected to acclaim it when we hear it from a famous foreign choir? The fact that the Italians like it may be due to one of two reasons: (1) their taste in this as in certain other musical matters is bad; (2) it is the only kind of boys' singing they have ever known. A kindred question is that of the organ music played in Italian churches. When Mendelssohn attacked the flippant strains he heard there—strains not merely light-hearted, but indisputably bad qua music, as may be seen by the extract in his letter—did people tell him that he must make allowance for the Italian point of view? Did anybody pretend that what was bad music on one side of the Alps was good on the other?

Another point raised by Mr. Mason demands a word. Anticipating that a reader might point out that 'British choral singing is admittedly our best form of the vocal art, and that its virtues are such as to make it pre-eminent in the world,' Mr. Mason says: 'To this I reply that a not unessential feature of the case against the claim has been omitted—the point of view of other peoples than ourselves.' Perhaps so, but the art of choral singing includes one factor about which there can be no dispute—ensemble. This factor is recognised as one of the prime necessities in concerted performances of all kinds, vocal and instrumental, from a quartet to a chorus, or from a string trio to a work for full orchestra. It has to be considered even in the planning of an organ. The Vatican Choir failed signally in this test. The balance was hopelessly wrong at times, the basses frequently riding rough-shod over the rest of the choir. Ensemble depends upon blend no less than upon balance. In the matter of blend there was failure simply because the tone-quality of the trebles, altos, and tenors in the loud passages was of a type that refused to blend. No musical tone, vocal or instrumental, in which there is such an overdose of upper partials can ever be satisfactory in ensemble. There are some matters in which we have a good deal to learn from the Continent, but choral singing is not one of them; the boot is very much on the other leg. We do not complain (as Mr. Mason seems to think we do) that the singing of the Vatican Choir is not like that of our best Cathedral bodies. We went to the Albert Hall expecting to hear something quite unlike the singing at St. Paul's or Westminster Cathedrals, but hoping it would be good none the less. We disliked it intensely, not because it was Italian or unfamiliar, but because it was harsh in tone, and lacking in some of the chief fundamentals of choral technique.

Since the above was written we have read some frank comments by Mr. Percy Scholes in the Observer. Like ourselves, Mr. Scholes refuses to be persuaded that there is no such thing as a kind of standard vocal tone. He asks, very pertinently:

'Can anything be said for a method of voice-production which renders impossible any tonal homogeneity, which gives you a delicate silver in pianissimo passages and a glaring scarlet in mezzo-forte, changing colour moment by moment like the fabled chameleon? What unity of effect is possible when you break your vocal line into these small pieces, entrusting three words to a young cherub in the skies, and the following three to the newsboy from the next street?'

None at all, of course, and an English choir going to work on these lines would have short shrift. But a choir from the Land of Song, the home of the bel canto, and (hush!) the Vatican, conducted by a Monsignore, and preceded by press paragraphs burbling about 'unbroken traditions of centuries' and so forth—how can they possibly be wrong?

Apparently some critics are of opinion that ensemble doesn't matter much after all. 'R. C.', for example, in the Daily Mail, highly approves of the Vatican Choir, although he calls their singing 'strident and unamalgamated.' There are moments in vocal music when stridency may have its place (though such moments rarely occur in the pure and other-worldly music of the Palestrina school), but there is no room in any kind of concerted music for 'unamalgamated' methods. We are afraid 'R. C.' allowed himself to be swayed by the splendour of the music itself, and by certain qualities of vigour, attack, and brilliance which are only to be expected from any touring choir of picked voices. To sing a pæan over the visitors for such qualities is as futile—even insulting—as to praise a man for washing his neck most mornings. 'R. C.' hopes the Choir will take back to Rome some of our Tudor Church music. We don't. Byrd and his fellows have been treated badly enough already by our centuries of neglect. Let us not add injury to insult by handing them over to these strident and unamalgamated Tuscans.

FESTIVAL WEEK AT OXFORD

BY H. E. WORTHAM

The Festival of music at Oxford is over, but it lingers delightfully in our memories. Though something of a novelty in a place that (we like to think) does not take kindly to new things, it was clearly agreeable to the genius loci, for its first three days were graced by radiant weather. True, an east wind then arose to remind us that we middle-aged interlopers did not share the divine youth of the young gods and goddesses around us, but it was stilled on the last Saturday when we sat about on the lawns of the New College gardens and watched these same juvenescent divinities pretending to be swains and country lasses dancing away a rustic holiday. Music, like most things, is affected by its environment. The Sheldonian Theatre is neither acoustically nor physically a perfect concert-hall, yet there are few secular buildings in England where I would prefer to listen to the B minor Mass. Nor can we hear a Quartet of Brahms's, the purest musical intelligence that the 19th century has produced, better than in the Hall of Balliol, which to those who know not Oxford from within, always appears a College which has emphasised in the broader paths of life, as Brahms did in the narrower field of music, the things of the mind. There was music to hear, too, in New College Chapel, which has solved the mysteries of acoustics better than most buildings in our country. But in case it be thought that I am dwelling over-much on the æsthetic charm of the surroundings, I may add that the Festival was not only of the University. The civic element had also its part, and both the Town Hall and the Corn Exchange—neither of them ideal places for music, whatever their other uses may be—were requisitioned.

Certainly the dominant impression left by the seven days' music was one of the enthusiasm with which Oxford cultivates the most social of the arts. The Oxford Bach Choir, on whose broad back the stately edifice of the present Festival was upraised, is the last word of youthful keenness—though it numbers grey heads amongst its members. It tackled the B minor Mass with a vigour that was almost athletic.

They are an efficient lot for their years, but we must always remember that they have a genius to conduct them. Sir Hugh Allen never forgets that Oxford is a place of education, of promise rather than of performance. Generations are short at the University, and every three years the whole choir is practically new. The Professor of Music's object is to take the Choir, within that period, over as wide a range as possible. At the Festival, in addition to the Mass, it gave Parry's De Profundis and Vaughan Williams's Sea Symphony, no inconsiderable feat for a body of singers who are all engaged in the full life of the University, and with 'Schools' looming a month ahead. What they lack in experience they make up for in freshness and vigour. The performance of the Sea Symphony, for instance, was extraordinarily spirited. Worthily too did the Oxford Orchestral Society play its part, and the two soloists, Miss Dorothy Silk and Mr. Frederick Ralanow, showed themselves the artists we know them to be. Miss Dorothy Silk thrilled us in the Finale with her surpassingly lovely high notes, and Mr. Ralanow was very impressive in the slow movement, where the chorus as if inspired by him rose in a crescendo at 'All souls, all living bodies!'—where the music modulates into A major—which for itself would have made the week memorable.

But to my task. The Festival began on Sunday, May 7, simultaneously in three different places. In New College Chapel the college choir gave us in Palestrina's Stabat Mater, which they repeated, what was perhaps the most finished piece of choral singing throughout the week. Holst's Four Songs for voice and violin, a beautiful example of that composer's austere and learned art, were shared by some of the boys with Mr. F. G. Lawrence as the instrumentalist. Their subject and treatment make them peculiarly suitable for the beautiful dry timbre of a boy's voice, which contrasts better with the richer, more vibrant, tone of the violin than would a woman's voice. Dr. H. G. Ley, who as a Bach organ player holds a unique place at Oxford, if not in England, was also opening the Festival with an organ recital at Christ Church, and the other inaugural music-making was at Balliol, where the College Musical Society was giving its seven-hundred-and-ninety-third concert. As Sir Hugh Allen says, these Sunday concerts are unique. I have not the space to add to this dictum.

Nor can I deal with all the proceedings as their importance deserves. On Monday the united choirs of New College, Magdalen, and Christ Church went through a programme of English music, embracing composers so different as Byrd and Stanford, Morley and Elgar. The singing would probably have been better had the choirs, instead of joining forces, been responsible each for a portion of the programme. The general criticism was that 'they sang in their surplises'—an expression we shall have to modify after hearing the Vatican Choir. In any case, the concert demonstrated that the leading Oxford choirs have definitely got out of the Elvey-Stainer groove in which not a few of our Cathedrals still appear to be stuck; additional proof of which was to be found in the high quality of the music sung by the choirs at the services in their respective chapels.

The B minor Mass, which was sung on Tuesday, must be passed by with a bare mention. At the Oxford Orchestral Society's concert on Wednesday, in the Town Hall, Mr. Maurice Besly proved himself a very capable conductor. The Enigma Variations were the pièce de résistance which the Society, with the supplementary assistance of professional wind players, surmounted with considerable success. Miss Myra Hess, fresh from her triumphs in America, played Mozart's D minor Concerto with that mixture of reverence, affection, and playfulness which only a woman, and a gifted woman at that, could show. If Busoni makes of Mozart the 'only Athenian who ever wrote music,' Miss Hess does something more: she shows him to be a man we can not only admire, but love.

After the O.C.M.C. and U. had given a concert at the Town Hall in honour of the fiftieth anniversary of the foundation of the Club, at which the London Chamber Music Players officiated, we enjoyed on Thursday evening the result of the union of music with the only art which we can definitely say is older. In some ways the Three Historical Ballets were the most interesting things in the Festival. In the Gentleman Dancing-Master we have a Ballet which will compare with those in the repertory of the Russians. Purcell and Wycherley combined to form a sparkling entertainment which delighted the house. The other Ballets were not less interesting musically, the music of the one being taken from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book and of the other from Bach's Suites.

A word in conclusion about Sir Hugh Allen's part in all this activity. Though he has not yet recovered from his recent indisposition, and had to conduct everything from his chair, he was indefatigable. Not only had he the Bach Choir to look after, but owing to Dr. Adrian C. Boul's absence in Spain he had also to conduct the Ballet, and he directed in addition the music on Saturday afternoon. His enthusiasm never faltered. At the rehearsals he was wonderful. I took down notes of one at which I was privileged to be present. But that is another story.

The Musician's Bookshelf

MORE ROLLAND ESSAYS

Romain Rolland's latest book, A Musical Tour through the Land of the Past (Kegan Paul, 10s. 6d.), is likely to be regarded as his most entertaining. In its favour is the fact that it deals with some composers of whom the average musician knows little, though they were of very nearly first-rate importance in the history of the art. As the author says in his preface, 'The Johann Sebastian Bachs tower too high above their time to influence it directly. It is the Telemanns, the Hasses, the Mannheim symphonists, who launch new movements.' Only by grasping this fact do we understand how it came to be that Bach the composer cut a less prominent figure than Bach the unrivalled performer on the organ and clavichord. The difficulty in the matter of publication accounts for something, of course, but not all; else how came so much smaller a man as Telemann to be esteemed as a greater composer than Bach? That he was so regarded is shown by M. Rolland in a fascinating chapter on the autobiography of Telemann. The very name is unknown to most of us:

'the peerless master,' whom the austere Mattheson declared to be the only musician who was above all praise, is to-day forgotten and despised.'

Bach thought sufficiently well of Telemann to transcribe some of his cantatas, and that he was a remarkable personality is shown by the bewildering number and variety of his activities. Among these may be mentioned the founding (in 1728) of the first musical journal published in Germany—Der Getreue Musik-Meister. He anticipated some modern journals by including in it pieces by contemporary composers, among others Bach, who was represented by a Canon for four voices. Another forgotten worthy treated by M. Rolland is Metastasio, the forerunner of Gluck. Yet another, Kuhnau, is shown in a new light as the author of a humorous musical novel of which M. Rolland gives us an account. In a valuable chapter on 'The Origins of the "Classic" Style in 18th Century Music' justice is done to other long-forgotten pioneers. Under the caption 'An English Amateur' M. Rolland gives us the musical tit-bits from Pepys's Diary, with a running commentary. One of his comments provokes retort. After some quotations which show the diarist in a stingy light so far as his paying for his beloved music is concerned, M. Rolland says:

'It is not surprising that under these circumstances music seems, to Pepys, the least costly of pleasures. Nor is it surprising that musicians should die of starvation in this England, where all declare themselves to be passionate lovers of music. . . . This is enough already to enlighten us as to the superficiality of the English passion for music.'

Is it? If so, we could as easily deduce from the biographies of Bach, Mozart, Schubert, Berlioz, Franck, and many others, including even Wagner, that the Germans and French are tarred with the same brush. The fact is, of course, that very few of the world's great creative artists have ever had their fair share of loaves and fishes, and no country is in a position to pat itself on the back so far as its treatment of genius is concerned. How fallacious is the mere money standard may be seen by a glance at quarters where the rewards are lavishly bestowed. To-day a couple of boxing champions can earn more in a contest of a few minutes' duration than Bach or Franck gathered in the whole of their long, hard-working lives. Does this mean that the great mass of the people care so much more for the prize-ring than for the concert-hall and the opera-house? Not a bit of it. The huge fortunes made by a Dempsey or a Carpentier come from the pockets of the small section of the community—long may it remain small!—that is able and willing to pay a fat price for a seat by the ring-side. When Rolland or any other historian begins throwing stones at races who have let their great men go on short commons all alike have to take cover. We may put M. Rolland's strictures down to a trifle of anti-English feeling—a sentiment which peeps out more than once or twice in the chapter on 'A Portrait of Handel.' However, we can afford to forgive him that and more for the sake of this enjoyable book. It should be added that further English interest is provided by a discussion of Burney's account of his European tour. Finally, a word of praise to Mr. Bernard Miall for his admirable translation, and a complaint on the score of Rolland's overuse of the foot-note. Hardly a page

' . . . there is no dust so dry as that of Telemann [says M. Rolland], whom posterity has forced to pay for the insolent victory which he won over Bach in his life-time. This man, whose music was admired in every country in Europe, from France to Russia, and whom Schubart called is free from its stack of notes, the great majority consisting of matter that ought to have been incorporated in the text. The limit is reached on page 46, the text of which consists of nine lines only, a couple of foot-notes giving us about forty lines of small type! An untidy habit, this, and so vexatious that to many a reader M. Rolland's asterisks, daggers, and double-daggers will beckon in vain.

H. G.

PROF. TOVEY ON 'THE NINTH'

The 'Choral' Symphony has probably been responsible for more good 'copy' than the rest of Beethoven's Symphonies lumped together. There is always something to be said about it, and whatever is said is sure of a host of understanding readers, because the work is so familiar—not through performance, for it is rarely heard in its entirety, but by means of pianoforte-duet arrangements and miniature scores. Here is Prof. Donald Tovey, with an uncommonly good contribution—Beethoven's Ninth Symphony: an Essay in Musical Analysis (Paterson, Edinburgh, 2s.), as full of acute observation as we expect it to be, and with the merit, above all, of saying with admirable clearness a good deal of what the average musician merely feels in his bones. For example, the opening of the first movement, with its whispered discussion of a thirdless triad, gives most of us a sense of the ominous and uncanny—a 'something round the corner' kind of feeling. We are sure, too, that if we were hearing the work for the first time, and in complete ignorance of what was to follow, we should know these sixteen bars were ushering in a movement of immense scope. When we have read what Prof. Tovey has to say about it we shall grasp the secret of this strange power. There is nothing better in the essay than his discussion of this question of scale and proportion—a factor more difficult to grasp in music than in any other art because the element concerned (time-duration) is exposed slowly, whereas breadth, size, height, and so on, by which we estimate the proportions in sculpture, architecture, and in pictorial art are seen more or less at a glance. Prof. Tovey shows us, too, how it is that this movement, though not the longest of Beethoven's, is yet the greatest, chiefly because of the scale of tone employed, which, of course, is less a mere question of ff and pp than of the difference between the dramatic and symphonic in orchestration. On such points as these the essay is full of wise and shrewd comment. In fact, it may be read with profit as a study in musical æsthetics, quite apart from its ostensible subject. Prof. Tovey, an enthusiast where the Ninth is concerned, is perhaps a trifle hard on those who are not out-and-outers. He says:

'If there are large numbers of contemporary music-lovers who are in heated revolt against the æsthetics of Beethoven's music, that is a nervous condition that concerns nobody but themselves. There will always be still larger numbers of music-lovers who have not yet heard anything like as much classical music as they wish to hear. It is just as well that they should realise that there is nothing more than an irritated condition of nerves behind the talk that now goes on as to the need of a revolt against Beethoven.'

If there be anything important enough to be called a revolt, it is not against Beethoven but against the blind and uncritical acceptance of a good deal of poor music that would have been shelved long since had it not borne Beethoven's name on the title-page. But Beethoven is not the only victim of the present generation's refusal to take the classics on trust. Yet why talk of 'victims'? The art will gain much and lose nothing from a frank realisation that the greatest of composers wrote on many days when they might have been better employed, and in the long run the great dead will be admired none the less. Discrimination is two-edged, and is as likely to rescue a neglected masterpiece as it is to dethrone a false idol.

After all, musicians are only now beginning to apply the critical test that has long since been used on the works of the greatest of poets, dramatists, and novelists. For example, Shakespeareans have never made any bones about expressing their opinion of his weak plays, and even of the weak spots in his masterpieces. The musical public has so far been less critical chiefly because it has been largely dependent upon conductors and public performers, who—to some extent inevitably—have a good many extra-musical factors to consider when making up their programmes.

In regard to this work of Beethoven Prof. Tovey appears to think that some of us question the Choral Finale just because it is choral, and he is at some pains to justify Beethoven's introduction of voices in a symphony. But surely the complaint is not that Beethoven has used a chorus here, but that he has abused it. Nobody objects to his bringing in voices, but a growing number of us object to his first giving them ungrateful music to sing and then adding insult to injury by drowning them half the time with his orchestration. Prof. Tovey admits that Beethoven was not a good choral writer, but he sees in the D major Mass an advance on the Finale of the Symphony, and infers that had the composer lived a few years longer there would have been 'a fourth period in Beethoven's development, which should have been distinguished by a body of choral work fully equal in power and perfection to the Symphonies and String Quartets.' This hypothesis disregards the obvious fact that from first to last Beethoven showed little realisation of the beauty of the human voice, especially in its choral aspect. It was his ill-luck to live at a period that, so far as choral music was concerned, was perhaps the worst in the history of music. In the whole of the works of his school we look almost in vain for any sign that the composers realised the beauty of unaccompanied singing. There is little reason to suppose that a fourth-period Beethoven, deaf, and hide-bound by forty years of thinking almost exclusively in terms of the orchestra, would have developed on the choral side. However, in this Ninth Finale, we are prepared to forgive the worst of its miscalculations for the sake of the main theme and its exquisite treatment by the strings and bassoon. Is this theme foreshadowed in the first movement? Sir Charles Stanford, in his recently published Interludes, says: 'The second subject of the Symphony:

if it is looked at closely, will disclose the Joy theme of the Finale.' Prof. Tovey will not have this. He dismisses the resemblance as 'superficial and entirely accidental,' adding, very reasonably, 'It cannot be too often or too strongly urged that no such thematic resemblances are of the slightest importance unless the composer himself establishes the connection on the spot by the most unmistakable methods.' The temptation to discuss others of the many interesting points raised in this essay is so strong that we must not dally with it. The only safe course is to break off right here, advising the reader to invest two shillings in one of the best bits of critical writing that has appeared for some years. H. G.

BOOKS ON SINGING

Two books on singing, recently published in America, contain features out of the ordinary and should prove of considerable interest and value to vocal students and teachers. Thaddeus Wronski's The Singer and His Art (D. Appleton & Co., New York; J. Curwen & Sons) is probably unique in that it combines in one volume expert advice on the three essential elements of the stage singer's success—the actual use of the voice, acting and mimicry, and make-up. According to a note by the publishers, the Italian edition has been proclaimed the greatest work yet written on vocal and dramatic matters. The author is a prominent operatic singer and teacher of singing, and has been connected with various American and European opera companies. At the beginning of the book appears a statement expressing emphatic approval of the writer's views, signed by a number of leading members of the Metropolitan Opera Company, New York.

In an introductory chapter we are told that most of the theories set forth in the book are adapted from the teachings of the great Italian masters of the last two centuries. The author does not wish his book to be considered as outlining a method of singing:

'Fundamental concepts in art are indeed universal; but their application is quite a different matter. . . . Individualities are all necessarily different. In vocal study the methods employed must by this very token be varied, modified, altered as need be to get the desired artistic results.'

The writer has carefully avoided any original experimentation, holding the view that only harm can result from divergence from soundly-tested fundamentals. He has consequently not departed from the scientific principles exemplified in the work of all really great artists.

The section devoted to singing occupies nearly a half of the book, and is treated under five main headings: Fundamentals (Essentials and Individual Characteristics, Classification of the Voice); General Conservation of the Voice (Breathing, Development of Voice, Interpretation, and Expression); Voice Placing—Discussion of Defective Voices; Peculiarities of Tone incident to different nationalities; Anatomy, Physiology, and Hygiene of the vocal organs.

In the opening chapter the importance of individuality is emphasised:

'The attempts of many tenors to sing "à la immortal Caruso" have resulted in the complete ruin of their voices. . . . To start one's career in the endeavour to duplicate somebody else's individuality is to kill the best that is in the student, his own individuality, which, properly cultivated, may create a new type on the singing stage.'

The method of teaching singing through imitation, which has many followers, is consequently condemned by the author, who also issues a warning concerning the use of the phonograph in this respect:

'I do not highly estimate the value of so-called tone-reproduction when the singer's art must be subordinated to a series of mechanical processes. . . . A phonographic record of a great artist will be of value to a student in developing his artistic point of view, his musical sense, his grasp of rhythm, his pronunciation of foreign tongues, but will prove disastrous should the student attempt to imitate the singer's tone, deformed by and subordinated to mechanical necessities.'

Concerning breathing in connection with voice-production M. Wronski considers that it has been specialised upon and magnified out of all proportion to its relative importance:

'To note the piles of literature that have accumulated one would think that none but those lucky enough to visit "Prof. X." had ever learned to draw a full breath for any purpose. And yet breathing correctly is perhaps the most common thing in the world.'

The author recalls the story of Patti, who, when asked how she produced her flawless tones, answered simply, 'Je ne sais pas'; and refers to an incident that occurred while returning from a European tour with many of the world's leading opera singers. (It was this group of famous artists, by the way, whose photographed indorsement of the author's views appears in this edition.) To each one the query was put: 'Tell me what method you use in breathing?' and each one, as if by agreement, answered practically in Patti's own words.

'What then [asks the writer] is the logical explanation of this apparent contradiction between the world's best singers and the general run of vocal teachers? The answer is simply this: The proper way to learn and teach tone-production is through the tone itself.'

For the development of this point the reader must be referred to the book. Breathing exercises are not condemned:

'A singer should be physically strong. Special exercises are advisable, but by no means should they be mixed with the study of voice.'

Four exercises (illustrated) are given.

The proper opening of the mouth is considered of prime importance:

'The slightest deviation from its correct position will lead to more or less dangerous contraction of the muscles. Any stiffening of the muscles of one part of the vocal machinery is automatically imparted to and shared by other parts, thus throwing out of gear the entire vocal apparatus.'

An instructive photograph shows various openings of the mouth—eight in number—only one of which is correct. Most of the others, however, appear by no means unfamiliar!

On the subject of humming, the writer's view is opposed to that of many authorities:

'To sing with the mouth closed is bad. To place the voice in a position which is not one of natural and normal phonation is absurd, no matter what the impression acquired through this original process may be. Humming is quite in favour to-day. . . . Humming may occasionally help to free a throaty voice, but it is dangerous, and may be said to be substituting one evil for another.'

A few quotations from the section, 'How to Practise,' may be of interest:

'Sing according to the voice you have—not the one you have not. Do not persist in practising for notes not yet matured, not ready, for it will result in breaks in the voice, and you may lose that note for ever—along with others. . . . Do not measure the strength of the voice by the effort that it costs. . . . For every strained effect the singer must pay, and pay dearly. . . . The voice develops by practising things it finds easy.'

The second half of this fascinating work is concerned with 'Acting and Mimicry' and 'Make-up.' It must suffice to say that both these subjects are treated in great detail, and are freely illustrated. This is decidedly a book all singers should read.

Coming to the second book, James Francis Cooke's Great Singers on the Art of Singing (Theo. Presser Co., Philadelphia), this is, as the title-page puts it, a collection of 'Educational conferences with foremost artists: a series of personal study-talks with the most renowned opera, concert, and oratorio singers of the time, specially planned for voice students.' There are close on thirty of these conferences dealing with various aspects of the singer's art, the majority of the artists concerned being connected with the Metropolitan Opera House at New York. A page of biographical notes, faced by the artist's photograph, accompanies each article. The conferences collected in this book, we are told, were secured during a period of from ten to fifteen years; and in every case the notes have been carefully, often microscopically, reviewed and approved by the artist. They are the record of actual accomplishment, and not mere 'metempirical opinions.'

One point that emerges from a perusal of this book is the importance attached by most of these singers to a good all-round musical education, particularly in instrumental music. Thus Mary Garden relates how she was first trained as a violinist and then as pianist:

'I was never a very fine pianist [she tells us], but the pianoforte unlocked the doors to thousands of musical treasure-houses—admitted me to musical literature through the main gate, and has been of invaluable aid to me in my career.'

Many will be surprised to learn that Madame Galli-Curci is practically self-taught. Taking as her text, 'Teaching yourself to sing,' she briefly traces the steps which have placed her in her present remarkable position. She considers it fortunate that she was at first trained as a pianist:

'Otherwise I should never have had that thorough musical drill which gave me an acquaintance with the art which I cannot believe could come in any other way.'

'The Value of Self-study in Voice-training,' by Giuseppe Campanari, and 'Self-help in Voice-study,' by Charles Dalmores, make interesting reading. Charles Dalmores, a dramatic tenor, studied at the Nancy Conservatoire, playing the French horn and the violoncello. When he applied to the Paris Conservatoire he was refused admission to the singing course because 'he was too good a musician to waste his time with singing!'

Admirers of Dame Clara Butt will turn with interest to her remarks on 'Success in Concert Singing.' In dealing with the development of a repertoire she warmly espouses the cause of:

' . . . the great circle of concert-goers who are not skilled musicians, who are too frank, too candid, to adopt any of the cant of those social frauds who revel in Reger and Schönberg, and just because it might stamp them as real connoisseurs, but who really can't recognise much difference between the Liebestod of Tristan und Isolde and Rule, Britannia—but the music-lovers who are too honest to fail to state that they like the Lost Chord or the lovely folk-songs of your American composer, Stephen Foster. Mr. Plunket Greene, in his work upon song-interpretation, makes no room for the existence of songs of this kind. Indeed, he would cast them all into the discard. This seems to me a huge mistake. Surely we cannot say that music is a monopoly of the few who have schooled their ears to enjoy outlandish dissonances with delight.'

But surely it is a far cry from 'outlandish dissonances' to such things as the Lost Chord and the songs of Stephen Foster. If this clumsily-worded paragraph is intended as a justification of the deplorable habit of some of our leading singers of including in their programmes songs of the cheap ballad type, then many will feel that in this matter, at any rate, Mr. Plunket Greene is the more reliable guide.

The young singer in a hurry will find much food for thought in reading of the methods adopted by the great singers of the past. Thus, Madame Geraldine Farrar, discoursing on 'What must I go through to become a prima donna?' recalls Madame Lehmann's favourite scale exercise which she taught to all her pupils:

Lehmann said of this scale:

'It is the only cure for all injuries . . . I sing it every day, often twice, even if I have to sing one of the heaviest rôles in the evening . . . I often take fifty minutes to go through it once, for I let no tone pass that is lacking in any degree in pitch, power, duration, &c.'

Some other contributors to this work are Melba ('Commonsense in training and preserving the voice'), Julia Claussen ('Modern roads to vocal success'), Ernestine Schumann-Heink ('Keeping the voice in prime condition'), Bernice de Pasquali ('Secrets of Bel Canto'), Alma Gluck ('Building a vocal repertoire'), and David Bispham ('The main elements of interpretation"). The last-named, in the course of an interesting and stimulating article, relates a story with which we will conclude this survey. Under the heading, 'Familiarity with vocal traditions,' the writer points out that we must, of course, study the traditional methods of interpreting vocal masterpieces, but we must not be slaves to these traditions. He then tells us of a young American singer who went to a European opera house with all the characteristic individuality and inquisitiveness of his people. In one opera the stage director told him to go to the back of the stage before singing his principal number and then walk straight down to the foot-lights and deliver the aria. 'Why must I go to the back first?' asked the young singer. The director was amazed, and blustered: 'Why? Why, because the great Rubini did it that way—he created the part; it is the tradition.' But the young singer was not satisfied, and finally found an old chorus man who had sung with Rubini, and asked him whether the tradition was founded upon a custom of the celebrated singer. 'Yes,' replied the chorus man, 'da gretta Rubini he granda man. He go waya back; then he comea front; then he sing. Ah, grandissimo!' 'But,' persisted the young American, 'Why did he go to the back before he sang?' 'Oh,' exclaimed the excited Italian, 'Why he go back? He go to spit!'

This very readable book should prove most helpful to young singers. It should go far in making it clear that much more than mere voice is required if one aspires to be a real artist. G. G.

A NEW BOOK ON HARMONY

Mr. Percy Scholes's new book, The Beginner's Guide to Harmony (Humphrey Milford, Oxford University Press), is, to quote from the title-page, 'An attempt at the simplest possible introduction to the subject, based entirely upon ear-training.' In a 'Private Note to the Teacher' the author expresses the opinion that of all the existing harmony books—even the most recent and best—in not one case are '... the implications of modern ideas on ear-training carried to their logical conclusion. . . . Writers still give ready-made rules, and say "obey." . . . The days of musical-composition-according-to-rule are ending. We are, of course, bound as teachers to give rules . . . but what is wanted is that the pupil should become accustomed to demand the reason for every rule, and the reason must, to be valid, be an "ear-reason," not a "head-reason."'

Here, however, we are up against the fact that to one musically untrained much that is musically bad may sound quite satisfactory, just as an illiterate person suffers no pangs on beholding or hearing an ungrammatical sentence. Mr. Scholes sees this, and anticipates the case of an independent-minded pupil

'... who declares that he likes a progression which you and the book call "bad," or dislikes one which you and the book call "good." . . . Of course, as he is in his pupilage, he must obey the book and you, and for the time write the "good" progressions in preference to the "bad."'

In other words (whisper the fact!) we must still give rules and still must say 'obey.'

The plan adopted in the book is to train the pupil by means of abundant work at the keyboard to recognise by ear, and then away from the pianoforte by the eye alone, the various common chords—major, minor, and diminished—cadences, &c., and to test for himself by experiment, and classify as good, bad, or indifferent, various chord arrangements, chord progressions, &c. Of course the watchful author's own opinions are given in every case, and perhaps Mr. Scholes is at times inclined to assume too lightly that the pupil's views will coincide with his own. However, there can be no doubt that a student who works through this little volume conscientiously according to the directions given will, to quote the writer:

'... at least have sharpened his ears and his wits, and elementary though his knowledge of harmony may be, will be the better musician for even this short term of harmony study.'

The course outlined comprises the recognition of chords as major, minor, or diminished, and their writing for four-part choir; the recognition of the chord of each degree of the scale; the recognition and writing of cadences; root progressions; triad of the leading-note and chord of the dominant seventh; first attempts at composition; and the harmonization of given basses, melodies, and inner parts.

Mr. Scholes's little book would make an admirable introduction to any of the existing text-books on harmony. G. G.

New Music

A PORTFOLIO OF MUSIC ANCIENT AND MODERN

The second half-yearly set of La Musique de Chambre (Sénart) provides an abundance of good things. The chamber music proper comprises a Violoncello Sonata by Sem Dresden (one of the main representatives of the contemporary Dutch school), an attractive Trio (violin, viola, and violoncello) by Roland Manuel, Milhaud's fourth String Quartet, which is one of his best works, and a variety of contributions by other contemporaries. The old masters represented are Gaviniés (three Violin Sonatas), Duport (Violoncello Sonata), Marin Marais (Violoncello Suite), J. C. F. Bach (three String Quartets), and Michael Haydn (String Quintet). The pianoforte music comprises works by Kœchlin, Migot, Labey, Henri Collet, E. Royer, Gunst, and Jean Cras among the moderns, Gaspard Le Roux, Rossi Romano, and J. P. Sweelinck among the ancients. Songs by Honegger, Trépard, d'Ollone, Bret, and arias by Méhul, Monsigny, and Philidor should also be mentioned.

The same firm has now issued a number of miniature scores of works previously published in parts only: Kœchlin's first String Quartet, Migot's Mouvements d'Eau, de la Tombelle's Suite for three violoncellos, Milhaud's fourth String Quartet, Jean Huré's second, and Marcelle de Manziar's Trio, among others. M.-D. C.

NEW VIOLIN MUSIC

Paganini redivivus is not an uncommon cry. But in this case it is not Paganini the performer but the composer who stands once more before us. The Universal Edition of Vienna has just issued four pieces: Movimento Perpetuo, Variazioni sopra un

Tema di Giuseppe Weigl, Cantabile e Valzer, and Cantabile. These works, says the preface, were discovered amongst Paganini's manuscripts after his death, and offered to the city of Genoa—his native town—which refused them. They were then acquired by Herr Wilhelm Heyer, of Cologne, where they were disinterred by the present enterprising editors, Messrs. G. Kinsky and Fr. Rothschild. Of their authenticity there can be no question. Two are accompanied by a facsimile reproduction of the Paganini manuscripts, and, as we all know, faked MSS. are the exception rather than the rule. The notion that these discoveries are merely attempts to improve by foreign trade the present low value of the Austrian krone can be put aside as the suggestion of an incorrigible sceptic, for besides the photographic copy of the manuscripts and the preface of the editors, there are other reasons why we should accept without hesitation these works as authentic. Even internal evidence is not always a deciding factor. It matters little that the Cantabile has none of the nobility and loftiness of the best Paganini cantabiles. The fact that the Movimento Perpetuo is more reminiscent of Ries than of Paganini, that not one of these compositions shows the rhythmical zest that sparkles through the theme of the twenty-fourth Capriccio, through his Allegro and Alla Caccia, does not matter in the least. The all-important thing is that no modern musician could have possibly tried to imitate Paganini's style—not a very difficult matter—without doing it better. Only a mistaken sense of what is due to the memory of a great man could induce an editor to leave untouched the appalling platitudes that are to be found here and there in these four pieces. Take, for instance, the Movimento Perpetuo (the Italians, by the way, usually call it 'Moto,' not 'Movimento' Perpetuo). The salient feature of the theme is a group of four notes in close proximity—E, F♯, E, D♯. This group, ineffective as it is, is repeated twelve times in the first ten bars. Clearly no one but Paganini could have made this thing pass in the concert-room. This must be his work; but it is also, unfortunately, the thinnest, least interesting Paganini we know. Would it not be better to search for the best amongst his already known compositions, and hand them to an editor who would add to them a more effective accompaniment? Amongst the less-known works there must also be one or two that deserve to be treated with greater deference than they have received so far. The twelfth Sonata, for instance, possesses more solid musical merit than many another work of its class and time.

B. V.

PIANOFORTE MUSIC

Of Cyril Scott's three Moods (Elkin), I doubt whether either represents him in his best creative vein. Sadness and Lassitude are thin in substance, and, so far as treatment goes, not particularly ingenious. Energy is far more satisfactory.

Messrs. J. & W. Chester publish a pianoforte arrangement by de Falla of his Homenaje composed for le Tombeau de Claude Debussy (originally written for guitar), and Eugène Goossens's Homage from the same set. Those who are so fortunate as to possess the original version of de Falla's piece may be interested in comparing it with the new version. Those who have had the rare good fortune of hearing the Homenaje performed by a really great guitar player (there are, experts say, only three; the present writer had the felicity of hearing Pujol) will wonder whether its intense pathos and perfect beauty can be realised as fully from the pianoforte version.

Armstrong Gibbs's Three Sketches (Elkin) and Albert Coates's Concert Study (Elkin) bring us back to pianoforte music pure and simple. Aaron Copland's Humorous Scherzo Le Chat et La Souris (Durand), is a fairly clever exemplification of a well-worn type of joke. M.-D. C.

PIANOFORTE DUETS

Here are duets both for beginners and skilful players. The latter will have all their work cut out in W. T. Fenney's arrangement of Holbrooke's The Wild Fowl Fantasy from The Children of Don (Goodwin & Tabb). This is one of the best of the composer's works, and although much of its effectiveness depends upon the vivid orchestration, enough is left in this version to make its study well worth while. Delius's Four North Country Sketches for orchestra (Augener) have been arranged by Philip Heseltine. The orchestration is indicated fully throughout—a plan that adds to the interest and gives the players some cue as to the style and tone required in certain passages. Perhaps Mr. Heseltine has tried to reproduce too much of the original; the duets would have been easier to play and not less effective had some of the detail been omitted. But there is no doubt about the picturesque quality of these movements, the Dance especially being a thing of joy. Autumn and Winter Landscape depend rather too much on sustained harmonies to suit the pianoforte, and a good deal of quiet restriking of chords will be necessary, though little aid of the kind is indicated. Easier and having the advantage of being conceived in pianoforte idiom are two albums of Polish Dances and Songs by Paderewski—Tatra-Album, Op. 12 (Augener). Players of moderate ability will be well suited here. Though comparatively easy, the pieces are worthy of a place beside the Slavonic Dances of Dvorák and the Hungarian Dances of Brahms. The Albums are issued by the same publishers for solo performance. Three books of Sight-Reading Duets (Augener) by Adam Carse provide excellent material for elementary players. Both parts are easy. H. G.

CHAMBER MUSIC

Kœchlin's Sonata for flute and pianoforte (Sénart) should rank among the best things he has written. It teems with beauty, and exemplifies to the full the earnestness and glow of his imagination. The first two movements (an Adagio and a Sicilienne) are short. An ample Finale follows. Anyone acquainted with Kœchlin's previous works (for instance, the Pianoforte Sonatinas) will see at a glance how typical is this Sonata of his style and fancy. It should be specially welcome to flautists, for whom nowadays so little good music is written. The composer does not exploit any of the effects of virtuosity special to the flute (and often wearisome to the hearer), and the interest is well distributed between both instruments. M.-D. C.

ORGAN MUSIC

Alfred Hollins's Concert Overture in F minor (Novello) is a very good successor to his popular work in C minor. It makes an immediate appeal to the listener, and it gives a brilliant player ample opportunity for showing his mettle all round, though it is perhaps a trifle less difficult than its predecessor. There are the familiar Hollins ingredients—the attractive tunes, spirited rhythms, and the skilful combination of the main subject with the secondary themes. As is usual, too, with the composer's works, there is little development, length and variety being obtained by restatement and decoration. As a result there are rather more full closes than some of us like, but to some extent this method of construction by means of sharply-defined sections is inevitable in a lengthy concert piece for organ. Works of the kind are bound to make a good deal of play with registration, and from time to time the tonal stage has to be reset, so to speak. Among the many happy touches should be mentioned the use of the second subject as a tenor solo under a staccato chordal presentation of the chief theme, and the two-fold appearance of the latter in the pedals against the second subject in the treble. Later, this second subject is used with expressive effect as a reed solo in the tenor register with a Choir flute background, followed by further treatment with Great diapasons. In fact, without resorting to any tricky or awkward registration, the composer throughout provides ample means of showing off a big organ to good advantage. The Overture should quickly become a popular recital work.

C. F. Waters's Choral Melody (Novello) is an unpretentious essay in a form that is well-suited to the organ, and also very effective for voluntary purposes—a broad, simple theme, of a hymn-like character, announced quietly, repeated with an increase of power, developed into a climax, and rounded off with a quiet ending. It is only moderately difficult, and is easy to register. The composer's over-use of the dominant minor ninth in the major key is a trifling blemish that will please the majority of his players and hearers.

Two short movements—Rosamund and March of St. George—from Quilter's music to Where the Rainbow ends, have been arranged by Leslie Woodgate, and issued under one cover by Elkin. Tuneful and easy to play, they will be specially useful to cinema organists.

The same may be said of Nos. 1 and 6 of Coleridge-Taylor's Three-Fours Valse Suite, transcribed by Oliver King (Augener). As these Waltzes are of fair length, they will serve well also as concert items.

H. G.

Gramophone Notes

BY 'DISCUS'

Let us take the best first. A 12-in. record of the Albert Hall Orchestra playing the Bach-Elgar C minor Fugue, conducted by Sir Edward himself, is one of the most successful I have ever heard. There is a reason for this. The music is bold and clear in texture, and the scoring brilliant and (even at its fullest) free from turgidity. The scurrying woodwind arabesques, and the telling work of the brass, are just the kind of things that come well out of the ordeal of recording. Nothing is better in this transcription than the extraordinary effect made by the little chromatic six-note theme in the middle section. At the hands of the brass it is worked up into a most dramatic utterance. Here is a record that will be in some danger of being worn out. I have encored mine again and again.

The Finale in the New World Symphony (Albert Hall Orchestra, under Sir Landon Ronald) has now been 'released,' as they would say at the movies—a capital 12-in. d.s., and a worthy wind-up to a successful batch.

Good operatic solo records are a 10-in. of Clarence Whitehill in Wotan's Farewell (in German); Giovanni Martinelli sobbing his way through 'Lontan lontan, lontan da me ne andaste,' from Eugene Onegin, 12-in., to every inch a tear; and a characteristically clear Galli-Curci, 'Come per me sereno,' from La Sonnambula, in which we forget the poverty of some of the music in our admiration for the beauty of the singer's long-held, soft, high notes.

The recent additions to the music of The Beggar's Opera have now been recorded on two 12-in. d.s. Delightful tunes they are, too, well able to bear comparison with any in the original version. The words emerge but fitfully, and for once the defect is of little consequence; the tunes and the rhythm are the things that matter.

The Flonzaley Quartet are heard to great advantage in a 12-in. record of Schumann's Quartet in A, Op. 41, No. 3, Assai Agitato.

Two pianoforte records well above the average are a 10-in. d.s. of Irene Scharrer and a 12-in. of Rachmaninov. Miss Scharrer plays a couple of Chopin pieces—the E minor Waltz and the fine F sharp minor Prelude; Rachmaninov is heard in his own transcription of Kreisler's Liebeslied, a clever bit of arranging, brilliantly played. All the above records are issued by H.M.V.

In the Daily News of May 20, 'K.,' writing of gramophone records, says he has received inquiries from correspondents anxious to know 'when we shall have some of Beethoven's Sonatas on the discs.' It has long since struck me as odd that these works should have been so neglected by gramophone companies. The only records of the kind known to me are of the Presto from the Sonata in F, Op. 10 (William Murdoch, Columbia, and Lamond, H.M.V.), the first two movements of the Moonlight, and the Finale of the C major, Op. 2, No. 3 (Lamond, H.M.V.). Yet there must be thousands of pianoforte teachers and pupils who would welcome the opportunity of hearing records of performances by players who are noted for their interpretation of the Sonatas. Moreover, judging from the records mentioned above, the results are likely to be above the average, because of the clear and straightforward character of the music save in a few of the latest Sonatas. Its familiarity is in its favour, too. When we know what we ought to be hearing, we can easily make good mentally any shortcomings in the reproduction. Here is a fine field, educative and popular, waiting to be worked.

The concert of the Great Eastern Railway Musical Society at Queen's Hall on April 29 had an excellent programme. The choir, formed of contingents from London, Cambridge, Ipswich, and Norwich, sang, among other things, Brahms's Rhapsody, with Miss Dorothy Clark as solo contralto, and Coleridge-Taylor's Viking Song. The orchestra played the last movement of Tchaikovsky's fourth Symphony, the Sylvia Ballet Suite, and Finlandia. The hon. conductor of the Society is Col. W. Johnson Galloway.

Opera in London

THE TEMPEST AS MUSIC DRAMA

NICHOLAS GATTY'S WORK AT THE 'OLD VIC.'

For the first time for many a long year there was a British musical work inspired by Shakespeare brought forward at the 'Old Vic.' in April as part of the celebrations of the poet's birthday. The work thus honoured was in every way worthy, for it was Nicholas Gatty's music-drama based on The Tempest. With the assistance of his skilful brother, Mr. R. Gatty, he has drawn up a special version of the play which makes a very good opera. The work, originally seen at the Surrey Theatre in 1920, is of great interest as being a contemporary contribution to Shakespearean literature. I discussed its merits—I hope with justice—when it was produced. Those merits have not diminished in force in the interval, and there can be no question that it is a significant contribution to Shakespearean opera in particular and British opera in general. It was very well done by the 'Old Vic.' Company, and I liked the presentation even better than I did that given further down the road two years ago. It was all very much more atmospheric; but then they understand the fairy spirit of Shakespeare thoroughly well in Waterloo Bridge Road, and the representations never fail to make history. The same with Shakespeare 'music'd.' There was charm in Miss Winifred Kennard's Miranda, subtlety in Mr. Joseph Farrington's Prospero, quaintness in Mr. Sumner Austin's Caliban, and becoming lightness in Miss Lallie Knowles's Ariel. All the other characters were well in the picture—Mr. Robert Curti Atkins who produced saw to that. And then the composer conducted, and the orchestra played well, so that the whole was a worthy and memorable production.

F. E. B.

THE BRITISH NATIONAL OPERA COMPANY

As the Musical Times (in common with other musical journals) has been refused the facilities granted to the daily and weekly papers, we are unable to report the performances now being given at Covent Garden by the British National Opera Company: We are well aware that this fact will not disturb the Company in the least; a monthly journal can, of course, be of little direct assistance to the box-office. But there are other aspects than that of the box-office, and the musical press plays its part in some of them. After all, its readers are all musicians, professional or amateur, and this very considerable body of instructed opinion is not without its influence on the general public. The power of the musical press is little, if any, the less valuable for being of a special and long-range kind, so to speak. Until the Covent Garden season began, this fact was recognised by the directors of the Company, if we may judge from the shower of paragraphs they wished us to insert, and from the circular-letter they recently sent to the editors of the various musical journals thanking them for their help in furthering the interests of the Company. Our usefulness, however, ceased abruptly when the time came for the allocation of seats for the press, when we were informed that the press list was already so long that the musical journals could not be added. We might have been satisfied with this explanation had we not known that the Company is able to spare no less than four seats for certain daily and weekly papers. If it can do this, we refuse to believe that it cannot spare one for each musical journal.

It is true that hopes were held out to us that if we wished to report any special performance endeavours would be made to find a seat for us. But we decline to go, cap in hand, on the chance of being given a stray seat while a representative of the daily press spreads himself over four. There is a principle at stake, and we intend to stand up for it. We wish the British National Opera Company all success, but so long as it refuses full recognition to the musical press, not a word about its activities will appear in our columns.

London Concerts

THE LONDON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Prokofiev, with the first performance of his Pianoforte Concerto No. 3, in C, was the chief attraction on April 24. Those who came expecting 'Chout'-like noises were disappointed—pleasantly or otherwise. Personally, I wished the work had given us more cacophony and less commonplace. We knew Prokofiev could be bizarre; we know now that he can be banal for a good long stretch. We shall be able to 'place' him when we see what he can do between these unsatisfactory extremes. A critic in the daily press likened the Concerto (on the whole, approvingly) to the slangy chatter of a group of young Flying Corps officers. Right; but everything in its place. Flying Corps back-chat would sound terribly inane to a hall-full of civilians, and its musical equivalent comes off no better. When you've heard it once you've grasped its slender all—the 'old bean' idiom in music speedily becomes the 'has been.' The Concerto was well received by the spectators. I say 'spectators' because it was obvious that much of the interest lay in the brilliant stunting of the composer at the pianoforte—lots of cross-handed chop-sticks up and down the keyboard, and other doings for the eye rather than for the ear. After this brittle and matter-of-fact work, the Pathetic Symphony—more than usually lachrymose by contrast, and with Mr. Coates leaving no pang unexpressed. Roger-Ducasse's Orphée was almost over when I reached the hall. The little I heard seemed to call for the accompanying choreography implied in its title, mimodrame lyrique.

BEETHOVEN'S MASS IN D

The final concert of the season (May 8) gave us one of our rare chances of hearing the Missa Solemnis. There was some fine all-round singing by the choir—the Philharmonic—sound work by the soloists (save in the ensembles, where the reedy and unduly passionate tone of the tenor stuck out), and the brilliant orchestral playing that could be counted on. If the total result of so much ability and hard work was sometimes unsatisfactory the blame must be laid first on the composer and secondly on Mr. Coates. It is late in the day to complain that Beethoven gives his singers too much work and too few chances (there are only about a dozen bars of unaccompanied singing in the Mass); but it is not too late to make the best of a bad job by toning down the orchestra—especially the brass—in some of the more over-scored passages. This Mr. Coates was unwilling or unable to do, with the result that occasionally when the choir—especially the basses—was singing low we had to look in order to be sure it was singing at all. Lip-reading is a useful accomplishment, but we don't want to have to fall back on it in the concert-room. The soloists were Dorothy Silk, Margaret Balfour, Sidney Pointer and Robert Radford. The choir improved as the evening went on. The high B flats in the Credo found some of the sopranos with less confidence than they showed in the 'Choral' Symphony recently. But a heat-wave, suddenly following a wintry week, is not helpful when singers embark on one of the most exacting of choral works. In attack and tone the choir was first-rate. There were subtleties, too, when the chances came. For example, in the Kyrie the tapering off from fortes to mere wisps of sound from which soloists emerged showed fine control. Mr. Kennedy Scott was brought on at the close and deservedly acclaimed. H. G.

QUEEN'S HALL SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The last of the Queen's Hall Symphony concerts attracted a large audience. The soloist was Lamond, who played Beethoven with his usual finish and authority. But the outstanding event of the afternoon was the exceedingly fine playing of the Rachmaninov Symphony by the orchestra, under the guidance of Sir Henry Wood. Discipline and enthusiasm are expected as a matter of course from an organization trained by Sir Henry. But this particular performance showed also a perfection of detail and of balance that raised it above the average—high as that is. Such playing as this compares very favourably with that of the best foreign orchestras. It is certain that neither Paris nor Rome can surpass such an achievement. A Bach Suite arranged by Sir Henry was also well given, but Till Eulenspiegel at the close of the programme found the players apparently a trifle tired. B. V.

ANOTHER NEW QUARTET

It has been raining string quartets lately; and though the showers have been brief, their frequency has afforded us a good deal of pleasure. An organization new to us, the Copenhagen String Quartet, announced three concerts, two of which have been heard at the time of writing. Its members are Gunna Breuning, Gerhard Rafn, Ella Faber, and Paulus Bache, the ladies playing first violin and viola. Can nationality be deduced from the playing of a quartet? Certainly it might safely be said, without knowing the names of these players, or even seeing them, that they come from a northern latitude. Though they play excellently together, their tone is consistently a little hard, and their expression is not very warm or subtle. Also, they do not joke with ease. They came nearest to doing so in the Scherzo of Borodin in D; but in his rather sentimental Notturmo, the mood, gracefully reflective as they made it, was too sober. They have given us plenty of good, steady playing (at its best in things like Brahms's Op. 67); but when they performed, for the first time here, the Op. 41 of their compatriot Carl Nielsen, the steadiness became stodginess. It was chiefly the composer's fault. His score needs freshening up, and pruning of the counterpoint for counterpoint's sake that is entangled in it. The inspiration is never of the first quality, but the work would be more acceptable if it were cut. The Copenhagen players gave it zealous attention, and showed quite a lot of musicianly qualities. If versatility is not among them, they still have enough of the other chamber music virtues to make their playing very agreeable. A.

THE CHAMBER MUSIC PLAYERS

The Chamber Music Players' concert at Wigmore Hall was quite as excellent as its predecessors in spite of the fact that one of the combination was new to the work, Mr. Arnold Trowell taking the place of Mr. Felix Salmond, now in America. The special feature of the concert was a performance of Bach's Chaconne on the viola. As an experiment it was most interesting, and it is hardly necessary to add that Mr. Lionel Tertis played it in masterly fashion. But it is curious what differences the transposition of a fifth can make. We missed often the crystal-like brilliance of the E string, but we missed even more the colour-range of the violin. There is far greater variety of tone between the G and the E string of the fiddle than between the C and A of the viola. Chords which sound bright and full on the violin sounded on the viola almost as if the instrument had been played con sordino. Certain variations gained in the main, and suggested a mellowness the violin could not have reproduced. But on the whole these experiments should not be encouraged—unless the 'perpetrator' be Lionel Tertis, for with him the attempt is sure to be made in a style that is in itself of very exceptional interest. B. V.

MASTER WEISBORD

The violin recital of Master Weisbord at Steinway Hall was remarkable mainly as a demonstration of the limitations of juveniles. Master Weisbord's technique is as efficient as it can be. There is apparently nothing too difficult, too arduous for him. Every trick of bowing, every test of left-hand technique was overcome with the greatest ease. And yet the performance left us wondering chiefly that nature should be so prodigal of material gifts without endowing her Benjamins also with the power to use them to the best purpose. Master Weisbord sang his melodies as well as can be expected from one whose vibrato is not excessive and whose intonation is generally good. But he never gave the slightest hint of choice or control or discrimination. He appeared to use lyrical phrases as he used the runs, scales, and arpeggios of the brilliant pieces de salon—as means to show off his very considerable dexterity and rare aptitude for the instrument. Of course insight and intelligence must in time develop, but in the meanwhile would it not be wiser to train the boy instead of exhibiting him, and endow him with the sound general education that alone can promise a wider outlook and a comprehensive grasp of musical art? B. V.

ANOTHER BAX SONATA

The revised version of Arnold Bax's second Violin Sonata was given its first performance on April 25, at Wigmore Hall, by Miss Bessie Rawlins and the composer. Its second movement bears the title The Grey Dancer in the Twilight, but grey might be taken to indicate the mood of the entire work. It was written in 1915, and is avowedly influenced by the events of that year. The form is cyclic, and the pervading theme is one that occurs in November Woods. The dance, with its faint suggestion of the macabre, and a somewhat acid underlying emotion, is poetically the key to the content of the entire work. Although romantically lyrical in character, and eminently musical in conception, it conveys an impression of subjective emotion, the basis of which would not be accurately described as romantic. We realise that the music was deeply felt at the time it was written, that it was, as the French say, vécu. Probably for this reason it is somewhat less accessible than Bax's other Sonata, and may not attain to the same popularity, though the more important of the two. The shortness of the final Allegro, and the length of the preceding Interlude, seem a little disproportionate, but we can well understand the composer's reluctance to interrupt the flow of meditation in the latter. The work was finely played, Miss Rawlins showing an intimate comprehension of its purport. The programme concluded with the Debussy Sonata. E. E.

HUNGARIAN QUARTET

Scarcely had the Léner left us when another quartet, officially styled the Hungarian, and led by Emeric Waldbauer, arrived in our midst. It is difficult to avoid comparisons, but it may be said without indiscretion that this party need not fear them. It has earned many golden opinions abroad, and when it appeared at the London Chamber Concert Society's meeting at the Grafton Galleries on May 9, had no difficulty in proving that the reports which had preceded its coming were well founded. Its outlook is evidently more modern than that of the Léner, for, whereas the latter was content to put forward Dohnányi as a representative of its country, this quartet made its first appearance in a work by Bartók, of which it gave the first London performance. This is his second String Quartet, Op. 17, a work that appears to be influenced by the composer's known fondness for the music of the Hungarian countryside. The work is individual rather than national. It might even be said that in this composition Bartók leaves the nationalism of earlier compositions behind him. But if he has changed his outlook, it does not necessarily imply that he has changed his affections, and the middle movement in particular reminds us that he loves the peasantry. The first and third sections are less easy to grasp at a single hearing, partly because the recurrence of certain themes appears to be governed by formal considerations which do not become evident before the end of the movements. But this is healthy, rich music, of neo-romantic tendency, by a composer who, whatever else we may think of him, certainly knows what he is doing. There is concentrated purpose in it. It has even been compared with the posthumous Beethoven Quartets. But in spite of this concentration it is free from the deliberate ingenuity of so much contemporary music. It was beautifully played, every point being made to stand out with the requisite character. At the same concert M. Max Karolik sang a group of songs, and Mr. Leonard Borwick, after playing some Chopin, joined the Quartet in Brahms's, Op. 25.

E. E.

WEBSTER MILLAR

Mr. Webster Millar, whose absence from Covent Garden is much regretted, gave a recital on May 2 at Æolian Hall. He began with a group of English songs, and sang with much variety of expression, making his chief hits with George Butterworth's Is my team ploughing? and Arnold Bax's Youth. He showed that his devotion to opera had not impaired his skill as a singer of song. He also made a great effect in three French songs, of which Georges Hùe's J'ai pleuré en rêve is the most familiar, and Charles Kœchlin's Si tu le veux was the most characteristic and the most artistically sung. Mr. Millar then sang the Serenade from the Fair Maid of Perth, in which he made one of his greatest successes on the stage, the charming little Aria from Gianni Schicchi of Puccini, and the love song from Cornelius's Barber of Bagdad, in all of which he was very much applauded. The concert ended with a group of German songs. A. K.

BATTISTINI

The baritone Mattia Battistini came back to London (Queen's Hall, May 3) after a long absence, and we heard the true bel canto. Varied applications of this term have too much obscured its significance. The teachings of Rubini and Porpora, the dignity and poise of the old Italian school of singing, have given ground to more careless methods. The voice nowadays is exploited for a transient success, although nature exacts her toll for this misuse. Voices become 'veiled'—first sign of disaster—and gradually fade while they ought still to be at the zenith. Training is too hurried. Singers are launched before their tones are moulded and strengthened enough to bear the strain, and breath control, which should be absolutely automatic, is influenced by a heart palpitating with nervousness. The old Italians studied for seven or eight years, whereas our singers are launched after only two or three. Such thoughts cross the mind when we hear Battistini, at sixty-five, singing as he does.

He will no doubt preserve his voice to his dying day. Shut your eyes, and his tones might be the tones of eternal youth. Sixty-five, and probably the first lyric baritone alive! After ninety minutes of singing his voice was still as fresh—indeed, he was better when he had fairly 'settled down.' He brought home to us how the voice is a 'stringed' so much more than a 'wind' instrument—his basic tones were comparable only to the legato of violin or 'cello. There was no suspicion of a 'glottis stroke,' and no exaggerated mouthing. He made singing look easy as well as sound easy. His attitude, unassuming and upright, was characteristic of his art. His only expression, beyond facial play, was an occasional opening and shutting of one hand. The ornaments, airily nonchalant, were perfectly subservient to the true line of song, and not in the least 'displayed.' Perfect mastery of the 'spinning' tone nowadays so seldom heard was proved in his marvellous mezza di voce at the end of a little song of Tosti's and also in two old Italian arias (Carissimi and Paisiello). Deliciously ironical was his 'Quand' ero Paggio' (Falstaff) and 'Non più andrai' (Figaro).

In the art of opening and shutting of tones when once focally placed Battistini must be considered unrivalled. His extreme lower notes are—as with the majority of lyric baritones, approximating as they do to tenors—more or less negligible. In the middle and higher realms he is the true baritone so beloved by Verdi. His Pagliacci Prologue was the Prologue of Victor Maurel, not clown-like, but gentlemanly. Not for long shall we forget the glorious floating tones, full of quiet emotion, of

(Continued on page 418)

Psalm lxxii. 18, 19

FULL ANTHEM, FROM "SING TO THE LORD"

Music by HENRY SMART

LONDON: NOVELLO AND COMPANY, LIMITED; NEW YORK: THE H. W. GRAY CO., SOLE AGENTS FOR THE U.S.A.

Allegro moderato $\text{♩} = 96$

SOPRANO f Bless - ed be the Lord God of

ALTO f Bless - ed be the Lord God of TENOR f Bless - ed be the Lord God of

BASS f Bless - ed be the Lord God of ORGAN mf Gt. Org. cres. f mf Gt. to Ped.

Is - ra - el, bless - ed be the Lord God of Is - ra - el,

Is - ra - el, bless - ed be the Lord God of Is - ra - el,

Is - ra - el, bless - ed be . . the Lord God of Is - ra - el,

Is - ra - el, bless - ed be the Lord God of Is - ra - el,

Ped. in 8ves.

and bless - ed be . . the . . name of His Ma - jes -

and bless - ed . . be the name of His Ma - jes -

and bless - ed be the name . . of His Ma - jes - and bless - ed be . . the . . name of His ty... for e - ver and e - - ver, for e - ver and ty for e - - ver and e - - ver, for e - ver and ty... for e - - ver and e - - ver, for e - ver and Ma-jes-ty for e - ver and e - - ver, for e - ver and e - - e - - ver, for e - ver and e - - ver.

 e - - ver, for e - ver and e - - ver.
 e - - ver, for e - - ver and e - - ver. Hal-le-lu-jah,
 - ver, for e - ver and e - ver, for e - ver and e - - ver.
mf
 Senza Ped.

Hal-le-lu-jah,
 Hal-le-lu-jah, A-men, A - - men, Hal-le-lu-jah,
 A-men, A - - men, A - - men, A - - men, Hal-le-lu-jah,
 Hal-le-lu-jah,

lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah Hal - le - lu lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah, A -

Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah,

Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah, A - - - men,

- jah, A - men, Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah, men, Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah,

A - - - men, Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah, A - men, Hal - le -

A - - - men, Hal - le - lu - jah, Hal - le - lu - jah, A - men, Hal - le -

Add Mixtures.

Hal - le - lu - jah, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men,

Hal - le - lu - jah, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men,

- lu - jah, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men,

- lu - jah, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men, A - men,

A - men, A - - men, A - - men. Bless - ed

A - men, A - men, A - - men. Bless - ed

A - men, A - - men, A - - men, Bless - ed

A - men, A - - - - - men. Bless - ed be the Lord God of Is - ra - el, and bless - ed be the

be the Lord God of Is - ra - el, and bless - ed be the

be the Lord God of Is - ra - el, and bless - ed be the

be the Lord God of Is - ra - el, and bless - ed be the name of His Ma - jes - ty for e - ver and e - ver. A - men. . .

name of His Ma - jes - ty for e - ver and e - ver. A - men. . .

name of His Ma - jes - ty for e - ver and e - ver. A - men. . .

name of His Ma - jes - ty for e - ver and e - ver. A - men. . .

ritard.

(Continued from page 412.)

'Un nido di memorie,' or the broader lines of the invocation later on. He put new life into hackneyed music, and we longed for all the baritones who plough their way eternally through these pages to hear this veteran. For very shame they would never again touch them! H. J. K.

TITTA RUFFO

Titta Ruffo, who followed Battistini at Queen's Hall (May 5) is a singer of quite different type. From the depth of a colossal chest he poured out tone with cheerful abandon. For the most part he was astonishingly effective in a flamboyant style; but he had some very indifferent moments, musically, and cannot be said to have been ever inspired. Of course it is difficult to rise to the promise of the new sonorous advertising. To be heralded as 'the world's greatest operatic baritone' is a handicap. After that, comparisons are inevitable, and the claims for Signor Ruffo can, then, hardly be allowed.

He may have been affected by the extreme boisterousness of his audience, and perhaps did not know of the sort of behaviour expected on our concert-platforms; anyway, he played into the hands of his noisy admirers in a way rather below our standard for a great artist, and carried on as though in full operatic trappings, innocent of restraint and repose. His exaggerations were least out of place in 'Largo al Factotum,' from Rossini's Barber, where the appeal must be theatrical—for the voice is wonderful, the high notes commanding, and he careered through the difficulties of the old music with the utmost ease. Indeed, it is difficult to imagine it better sung. In the bluff bravura style he is eminent, and also a few contemplative moments were sung with beauty of tone.

But it seemed characteristic that his two chief songs were a drinking song and a buffo air. Either Signor Ruffo is not so much a master of variety as he might be, or else he did not give us of his best. The quality of the voice is bass-baritone. We did not find its lack of the lyric baritone's legato quite compensated for by its various exceptional powers. Miss Yvonne d'Arle assisted at this concert. H. J. K.

RACHMANINOV

It was clear that the bulk of those who filled Queen's Hall at Rachmaninov's first recital on May 6 came to see the composer of a certain Prelude rather than to hear a pianist of unusual excellence. We felt that Mozart's Sonata in A, Beethoven's in E (Op. 90), a Chopin group, and Mendelssohn's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso were mere preliminaries. The real business of the afternoon, we knew, was to come at the end. And it was so. A batch of pieces in which the pianist figured as composer (a jolly Polka and the Preludes in G flat and B flat) and transcriber (Kreisler's Liebeslied) roused the assembled suburbanians for the supplementary recital without which no occasion of the kind is complete. Rachmaninov knew what was coming, if his depressed air was any guide. He had hardly sunk on to the piano-stool when cries of 'C sharp minor!' were fired at him, and he got to work with it at once, not even making a fresh start when the mob broke in on the opening notes with applause.

(What he thought of our concert-room manners may be guessed.) We have heard the Prelude mauled so often that it was good to hear it played. Rachmaninov got up a tremendous pace in the middle section, and played the recapitulation of the opening rather faster than we are accustomed to hear it. More enthusiasm followed, and he continued playing and his admirers went on making noises till the attendants applied the closure by switching off the lights and shutting the pianoforte. It would be a great treat to hear this fine and singularly unassuming pianist in a small hall from which all Prelude-maniacs had been barred.

He gave a second recital on May 20, when Queen's Hall was again crowded. They got that Prelude again. H. G.

JOSEPH HISLOP

Mr. Joseph Hislop, tenor, was welcomed back with uncommon warmth at the Queen's Hall concert on May 7. He is a British singer who can vie with the best Italian singers of to-day. The voice is of rare beauty, and ought to glow with still more intensity as experience comes. His restraint allows of just emphasis at vital moments in the true traditional manner.

He has been thought of mostly as a lyric tenor, but his voice has broadened to include a good deal of the heroic timbre. At this point Mr. Hislop will find thoughtful care advisable, for an operatic singer can rarely succeed in both styles. At present his physique seems not enough formed to allow him to make experiments. At bottom he is a lyric singer, and we feel that concentration on his naturally delightful dulcet quality is the best thing. Nearly every singer can go on making larger and larger noises; only a great artist can control and make beautiful the light voice. Give us more of the Bonci-Battistini sort of singing!

Mr. Hislop was not at his best in the martial recitative before Celeste Aida, but in the aria itself he sang with full, compressed tone, and made judicious use of the filà di voce. His top B flats were quite commanding. Mr. Hislop's manner is agreeable and unassuming. The audience was delighted with him. The programme was of popular operatic excerpts. Sir Henry Wood conducted the orchestra. H. J. K.

THE NOVELLO CHOIR

Seventy strong, these enterprising singers were heard to great advantage at the Bishopsgate Institute on May 9, when they sang Bantock's choral suite, A Pageant of Human Life, Elgar's Evening Scene, Vaughan Williams's Just as the tide was flowing, Balfour Gardiner's An old song resung, Holst's I sowed the seeds of love and The song of the Blacksmith, Pointer's Lament and Gather ye rosebuds, and a couple of Parry Motets. Especially well done were the Bantock and Holst works. The trebles and altos were excellent in Geoffrey Shaw's three Pan hymns. Anne Thursfield delighted everybody with three groups of songs, ranging from Giles Earle (1615) to Cyril Scott, Bax, and other writers of to-day, including Arthur Bliss, whose brilliant Two Nursery Rhymes for voice and clarinet (Mr. Charles Draper) brought down the house. Miss Marguerite Swale was at the pianoforte and Mr. Harold Brooke conducted. H. G.

MISCHA-LÉON—HUGO WOLF RECITAL

A glance at the many empty seats at Wigmore Hall on May 13 must have convinced M. Léon that the British public is not yet inclined to swallow a whole programme of Wolf. The fact that Elena Gerhardt is able to fill Queen's Hall with a one-composer recital affords no standard of comparison, because she is a consummate artist from whom one would take almost anything, whereas M. Léon (press notices to the contrary) is still an aspiring talent. As a matter of fact it is doubtful whether people in this country will ever really want two hours' Wolf from anyone, and, if they do, England will be Merrie England no more. Often during the recital one could not help thinking that this minor composer's psychological powers and talent for musical scansion have been grossly overrated; to mention him in the same breath with Schubert as a Lieder composer is,—well, not sacrilegious (for respect for the great masters of the past is no longer encouraged), but at any rate eccentric. One quite understands why Wolf is the favourite Sunday evening composer of many competent pianists and sight-readers. You just flog the accompaniments, give a sketch of the voice part—et voilà un homme! But Schubert—he must be sung.

M. Léon was not in particularly good voice, though his enunciation (but not his pronunciation) and flexibility of facial expression left little to be desired. The audience enjoyed hugely his performance of the delightful Mausfallsprüchlein, and no doubt sighed for some more songs of this kind in place of the dour padding of Alles endet was entsteht (no ordinary philosopher wrote this poem!) and the dismal commonplace and lack of humour of Nimmersatte Liebe.

R. L.

THE VATICAN CHOIR

At the Albert Hall, on May 13 and 20, a body of about seventy singers drawn from St. Peter of the Vatican, St. Mary Major, St. John Lateran, and the Sistine Chapel, gave a concert of ecclesiastical music by Palestrina, Vittoria, &c. Before a down-right opinion is given on their performance a few questions may be asked and answered: Is there a generally accepted standard of vocal tone? Yes. Does the standard apply to choral as well as to solo singing? Surely. In passing from piano to forte ought sopranos and altos to make a change of tone corresponding roughly to the difference between the flute and the corno Inglese? No. Is it good singing to make the change from one register to another so glaringly obvious that the effect is that of one singer leaving off and another with a totally different type of voice carrying on? No.

If these answers are right, then the singing of the Vatican Choir is bad. It is all very well for us English to play the courteous host, and make hedging remarks about differences of ideals and temperament. On these heads there is room for abundance of give-and-take, but in regard to certain fundamentals in singing there is no difference between Italy and England. Do the best Italian-trained solo singers commit any of the faults mentioned above? Would any Italian operatic chorus of female trebles and altos be allowed to rasp and screech as did the boy trebles and altos at the Albert Hall? If so, we should be surprised. The explanation probably lies in the apparent inability of our friends on the Continent to realise that children's voices need not be shrill, even in a forte.

Boys' voices require training, but these Vatican youngsters had evidently had little—if any. They were harmless enough in the soft passages, but when power was required the quality was painfully shrill. All the choir—save the basses—sang in this penetrating way, and (let it be said again) this is bad singing, whether we hear it in a village church or in the Vatican. In the matter of interpretation, Monsignore Raffaele Casimiri and his singers are entitled to their own views. Here taste and temperament come in, and criticism goes out. All that can be said is that gusty changes from pp to ff, sudden pp's at points where neither text nor music seem to call for them, an almost entire absence of any degree of power between the extremes of soft and loud, and the trick of ending most works with a long-held whisper, do not appeal to us when applied to the Palestrina school. Nor is this type of music helped by a lack of clearness in such comparatively few rapid divisions as occur, or by ill-balanced parts. The splendid basses, for example, frequently swamped the rest of the choir. The large audience listened with growing rapture, and was soon encoring everything. Nevertheless, if those who attended their parish church on the following Sunday had heard young Londoners make such noises as did these young Romans, they would have said that the choirmaster should be sacked and the boys smacked. And they would have been right.

H. G.

ELENA GERHARDT

The two recitals which Madame Elena Gerhardt devoted to Brahms on May 11, and Hugo Wolf on May 18, were interesting as demonstrating at once the great qualities of the tradition she represents—and its limitations. The Brahms programme could scarcely have been better. His songs do not suffer from being presented with classic uniformity of method. So long as they are given the traditional Innigkeit, their own plastic beauty is sufficient, and interpretation in the modern sense is scarcely required. But Brahms was a classical and Hugo Wolf a modern song-writer. Though a thorough German, the latter's close scrutiny of the poems he set to music, and his careful choice of them, bring him almost into a certain affinity with the French, in whom these scruples result from age-long literary taste and associations. Such songs demand equal scruples in the singer, and uniformity of sentimental expression does not meet the requirements. Madame Gerhardt sang Wolf with the same uniformity as she had sung Brahms, whereas a singer more familiar with modern feeling on the subject of song would have given proof of some emotional versatility, not to speak of a greater intellectual penetration. At both recitals Madame Gerhardt had the advantage of the beautiful accompanying of Miss Paula Hegner. In the Wolf songs it was quite remarkable, for it caught certain inflections of meaning which were passed over by the singer.

E. E.

MEGAN FOSTER

A song recital by Miss Megan Foster is one of the events—alas, that they should be so few!—that the critic anticipates with something approaching glee, for he knows that, though succumbing to the charm of her personality for the time being, there will be no occasion for diplomatic equivocation when the time comes for him to put his impressions on paper. Pleasurable expectations were fully realised at her last appearance at Æolian Hall on Monday evening, May 15, when her programme had, as usual, been chosen with a perception of music's first function—to make the hearer happy. Adept at turning the light and plaintive songs she had chosen from British and French sources of the 18th century, she showed that she can also, on occasion, assume a more tragic mask, as in a number from Manon. Discrimination again marked the choice of a group from contemporary British composers. There is no need to-day to stress the technical excellences of her method of vocal production, uncommon though they are in an age which seeks short-cuts to oral expression, but we are truly grateful to a singer who pronounces each syllable distinctly, no matter what language she uses. Mr. Ivor Foster assisted his accomplished daughter in duets, and offered on his own behalf the Vaughan Williams Songs of Travel. Mr. S. Liddle was a sympathetic accompanist. H. F.

MISCHA ELMAN

It would be easy to write pages about the merely technical virtues of Mischa Elman's violin playing, though easier and more profitable for the initiated to observe them at first hand for themselves. But, behind and directing them all, is that rare quality of universality, eloquence—call it what one may—which casts a spell, instant and profound, even on the lay listener. When Elman plays a masterpiece like the Beethoven Concerto—as he did at Queen's Hall on May 17—it is as if the very spirit of music were pronouncing a decree of ineffable finality. The human medium goes altogether into solution. And this is the more gratifying in that when he first came among us, at the age of sixteen, to play, if we remember aright, the Mendelssohn Concerto, a dozen years ago and more, he was regarded with the reserve that sad experience has taught the wary critic to maintain towards 'prodigies.' They are prone to wilt like the hot-house flower. Elman has thriven. The other Concertos of the evening—by Bach (in E) and Tchaikovsky—were read, as it seemed, with the same omniscience and played with the same omnipotence. Genius is no extravagant term in this case. The Queen's Hall Orchestra rose to the occasion, as it can do, under Sir Henry Wood's direction, so that artistic unity was never in peril.

H. F.

NORTHAMPTON MUSICAL SOCIETY: PRESENTATION TO MR. C. J. KING

In our May issue appeared a letter from Mr. H. C. Colles, entitled, 'A Great Musician,' wherein, after paying a tribute to Mr. John R. Toms, of Wellington, Somerset, the writer said:

'I do not know whether there are many such musicians in the country parts of England. I have never met another Mr. Toms, but I hope that he is not so unique as he seems to me to be, for of such is the kingdom of Music.'

Well, we know of several provincial musicians worthy of mention in this connection, though none of them have attained to the great age of Mr. Toms. Among them is Charles J. King, of Northampton, one of whose fields of activity was recalled to us by an account of a presentation made to him on the occasion of his retirement from the conductorship of the Northampton Musical Society. Mr. King has been the guiding spirit of the Society during twenty-three of the twenty-five years of its existence. Taking charge at a moment when it was in danger of failing at its birth, he made it strong and efficient, piloted it safely through the difficulties of the war period, and now hands it over, securely established, with a fine record of artistic achievement, and so strong in members that a waiting-list is necessary. From a recently-published history of the Society we learn that the long list of works performed includes Bach's Magnificat, Berlioz's Faust, Walford Davies's Everyman (twice), Caractacus, King Olaf (twice), Gerontius (twice), The Messiah (nine times), Israel in Egypt (twice), Hiawatha, A Tale of Old Japan, Parry's Pied Piper and Judith, and many smaller works, besides symphonic and other orchestral compositions. The Society had much help from Gervase Elwes, who was president from 1914-21. He appeared as soloist on several occasions—his singing of the title-rôle in Gerontius with the Society in December, 1920, was his last performance of the part before setting out on the American tour from which he was never to return.

The presentation alluded to above took place at Northampton Town Hall on May 5, when amid demonstrations of affection and enthusiasm, the Mayor handed to Mr. King a cheque for £220 and a beautiful silver casket containing a scroll on which were inscribed the names of the four hundred and fifty subscribers.

This happy occasion had to do with only one of Mr. King's activities. We happen to know something of the rest—of his work as organist, choir-master, recitalist, adjudicator, lecturer, all-round teacher, &c.—always up to his eyes in work, yet ever ready to find time for lending a hand in all sorts of local musical doings, from taking the chair at a meeting to joining with his viola in a chamber music adventure. In the letter we quoted at the beginning of this article Mr. Colles said, 'When people say that England has no musical life I think of Mr. Toms.' Exactly; and when we all give honour where honour is due, we shall think a great deal more than we do at present of the enthusiastic general practitioners of music—the Toms's, the King's, and their fellows scattered about the provinces. Without them there would indeed be no musical life, though 'stars' and 'international celebrities' toured in battalions.

CARNEGIE TRUST

The musical publication scheme of the Carnegie United Kingdom Trust has reached its sixth year, and the works selected for publication now number thirty-one. In their report for the year 1922 the adjudicators state that though on the whole the quality of the works submitted (numbering in all forty-three) is not so high as in some previous years, they are confident that the five compositions selected for the major award of publication will uphold the high standard which has been set by previous adjudicators. They express regret, however, that they have not been able to include in their recommendations any purely orchestral works.

The following is a list of the works selected for publication, with the adjudicators' remarks:

YORK BOWEN.—String Quartet in D minor. A well-written, pleasing, and effective piece of music in three movements, presenting no undue difficulty.

NICHOLAS C. GATTY.—Prince Ferelon, or The Princess's Suitors. A musical extravaganza in one Act. A charming little opera of moderate length. The libretto is amusing and original. The music, though full of beauty and character, is light and not abstruse, and is likely to appeal to a wide circle of music-lovers.

R. O. MORRIS.—Fantasy for string quartet. A beautiful and poetic composition, simple in character and deep in feeling. It is quite short, and should find a frequent place in the programmes of quartet concerts between two works on a larger scale.

CYRIL B. ROTHAM.—Brown Earth, for chorus, semi-chorus, and orchestra. A short choral setting of a beautiful poem, well-written both for voices and for orchestra; melodious and sincere in expression.

FELIX WHITE.—The Nymph's complaint for the Death of her Fawn. For oboe (or violin), viola, and pianoforte. A musical portrayal of Andrew Marvell's poem, full of fancy, occasionally perhaps somewhat far-fetched, but genuinely poetical in conception.

An additional award of MS. copies of score and parts is made in the case of one work:

RUPERT O. ERLEBACH.—Rhapsody Quintet for flute, cor Anglais (oboe), violin, viola, violoncello.

The last date for submitting works for the adjudication of 1923 is December 21. Composers are advised, before entering their works, to obtain full particulars from the Secretary, East Port, Dunfermline, in order that they may not submit compositions which are excluded by the terms of the scheme.

GRESHAM MUSIC LECTURES

Sir Frederick Bridge's Gresham Lectures, delivered on May 3 to 5, included two devoted to Arne, a repetition of the lecture on Shadwell's operatic version of The Tempest (repeated by special request), and a very interesting one on a novel subject, 'The Development of the Violin Solo.' The Arne lectures gave the Professor an opportunity for calling attention to the terribly mutilated state of Rule, Britannia, as it is generally rendered. Not only are there many alterations in the melody and words, but also in the harmony. What in Arne's original is particularly strong, is in many cases altered into a wretched sentimentalism. The audience was invited to sing the chorus correctly—after explanation—and responded admirably.

In 'The Development of the Violin Solo,' Sir Frederick showed how the leadership of the orchestra was wrested from the old cornet. Although not at first looked upon as a solo instrument, in 1620 a certain Beagio Marini, born at Brescia, wrote and published the first violin solo ever written. This was called 'Romanesca, per Violino Solo, e Basso (se piace)'—that is, the bass was ad lib. In this solo we meet with the trill for the first time in violin music. Once a beginning was made, the idea was quickly followed up. The 'Romanesca,' together with solos by Farina Meruka, Walther, and Matteis, were admirably played by Mr. Jeffrey Pulver. The consideration of this subject is to be continued in future lectures. The lectures were largely attended.

BYRDE AND HIS CONTEMPORARIES

A selection of sacred Motets and Anthems, with the above title, is being prepared under the editorship of Sir Frederick Bridge. During the past session Sir Frederick has lectured at the University of London on the great collection of sacred Motets edited by Sir William Leighton in 1614. There are over fifty of these interesting compositions by men of the first rank, including Byrde (five compositions), Gibbons, Dowland, Dr. Bull, Coperario, Wilbye, Ford, Warde, Pilkington, and Ferrabosco. Many of these composers are not known by sacred specimens, and this volume will be a useful collection of special interest as regards Byrde, whose tercentenary is to be celebrated next year. They are for four and five voices, and of course may be sung unaccompanied.

RECEPTION TO M. RACHMANINOV

The Music Club gave a reception on Wednesday, May 17, at the Grafton Galleries, to M. Rachmaninov, which was very largely attended. At his own request the programme of music performed consisted entirely of works of living British composers:

- | | | | |
|--|-----|-----|------------------|
| 'Sally in our Alley' } | ... | ... | Frank Bridge |
| 'Cherry Ripe' } | ... | ... | Frank Bridge |
| The Philharmonic String Quartet | | | |
| Pianoforte Solos | ... | ... | John Ireland |
| (a) 'Chelsea Reach' | ... | ... | John Ireland |
| (b) 'Soho Forenoons' | ... | ... | John Ireland |
| (c) 'Ragamuffin' | ... | ... | John Ireland |
| Mr. Evelyn Howard-Jones | | | |
| (a) Slow Movement from first Violin Sonata | ... | ... | Goossens |
| (b) 'Miss Bessie Rawlins' and Miss Harriet Cohen | ... | ... | Arnold Bax |
| 'Sea Fever' | ... | ... | John Ireland |
| 'Saw you but a white lily grow' | ... | ... | Delius |
| 'Two Songs of Travel' | ... | ... | Vaughan Williams |
| 'Pleading' | ... | ... | Elgar |
| 'The Wake Feast' | ... | ... | Hamilton Harty |
| 'When we were children' | ... | ... | Hamilton Harty |
| 'Ever your beauty' | ... | ... | Holbrooke |
| 'Stranger's Song' | ... | ... | Balfour Gardiner |
| Mr. Herbert Heyner | | | |
| (Accompanist—Mr. Berkeley Mason) | ... | ... | B. J. Dale |
| Slow Movement of Suite for Viola | ... | ... | B. J. Dale |
| Mr. Lionel Tertis and the Composer | ... | ... | Ethel Smyth |
| Finale from String Quartet | ... | ... | Ethel Smyth |
| The Philharmonic String Quartet | | | |

M. Rachmaninov at the close expressed himself to have been extremely interested in the whole programme, but was fain to confess that he found some of the music too advanced for his taste. At the same time he said that he left the room with a higher opinion of contemporary music than he had had when he entered it. Over three hundred guests were present, including Lord and Lady Swaythling, the Countess of Kimberley, Lady Mond, Mr. and Mrs. Emile Mond, Mr. Arnold Bennett, Mr. Leon M. Lion, and Mr. Mestrovetz. Among the musicians were Sir Landon and Lady Ronald, Mr. Arnold Bax, Mr. and Mrs. Harold Craxton, Mr. John Ireland, Mr. Julius Harrison, M. Moiseiwitsch and Miss Daisy Kennedy, Mr. Augustus Milner, Miss Dorothy Moulton, Mr. Fraser Gange and Miss Amy Evans, Mr. and Mrs. Albert Sammons, Dr. Vaughan Williams, Miss Anne Thursfield, Mr. Graham Petrie, and Mr. H. Waldo Warner.

Mr. Erich Korngold and Dr. Egon Wellesz were among the foreign visitors. They had before this occasion heard very little modern British music, and they expressed their pleasure and surprise at its excellence as illustrated by the programme. It may be interesting to put on record the fact that the name of Erich Korngold appeared on an English programme for the first time at one of the musical evenings of the Music Club before the war, at the time when he was a prodigy boy composer. A.K.

Church and Organ Music

THE ORGAN IN JOHANNESBURG TOWN HALL

Owing to the fact that this instrument was completed and opened during the progress of the war, it has not received the notice that it would no doubt have attracted at another time. Some particulars of it may be of interest to readers of this paper, especially as the present writer is well-acquainted with it, both from the constructional stand-point and from that of the player.

Built by Messrs. Norman & Beard in 1914, it is by no means one of the giants of the organ world, its ninety-seven speaking stops being a mere handful against some American monstrosities of which we have heard; but there are very few duplications even of name, and tonally there are none at all, so that each stop means something characteristic. It is distinguished among other large organs by the use of what are now known as 'floating' manual departments, a feature which, in part at least, is being adopted in some more recent schemes. There are the usual four manual claviers, controlling the usual departments of Choir, Great, Swell, and Solo; there are also two other complete departments, known as 'Bombarde' and 'Orchestral,' which may be played from any of the four claviers by touching the appropriate rocking tablet placed in the key jambs. There is a choice of tablets, for instance, on the Choir, giving 'Orchestral only' on that clavier or 'Orchestral to Choir.' Touching one such tablet automatically releases any other which may have been in action. This principle is applicable to any manual, and also in respect of the Bombarde. The 'Orchestral,' as its name implies, contains stops, nineteen in number, of a more markedly imitational character—a full range of strings, 16-ft., 8-ft., two-rank Celestes, 4-ft., and Mixture; flutes, 16-ft. Quintatön, 8-ft. and 4-ft. Harmonic with open wood pipes, 8-ft. Zauberflöte (harmonic stopped) with a flute celestes rank (Unda Maris); orchestral woodwind and trumpet; also carillon and glockenspiel. The Bombarde is really an enclosed section of the Great organ, comprising reeds of 32-ft. (to Tenor C), 16-ft., two of 8-ft., including a beautiful smooth Horn, a Horn Quint 5½-ft., and Clarion; also a fiery six-rank Mixture—the crescendo possibilities of this will be obvious.

We have mentioned these specialities first, as they will rouse the most curiosity; but the organ proper, so to speak, is no less worthy of note. The Great organ is a complete scheme of eighteen stops from a 32-ft. sub-foundation, Contra Hohlflöte and Contra Geigen 16-ft., three 8-ft. open, Geigen, Claribel, and stopped Diapason, two Principals and Waldflöte.

Photo by]

[Alan Yates

[Photo by]

[Alan Yates.]

Quint, 12th, 15th, a Sesquialtera giving 5th and 10th, and a four-rank Mixture with flat 21-ft. We miss, perhaps, a 16-ft. reed, there being only 8-ft. and 4-ft., but of course the Bombarde completes the scheme, as already mentioned. The Swell is fine and rich, a fifteen-stop scheme on familiar lines; the Choir (unenclosed) is a true Echo Great, with a complete family of tapering Gemshorns to a three-rank Mixture, with a 16-ft. Contra Salicional. There is a low-pressure Cornopean to complete the ensemble. The Solo is enclosed and has nine stops, 8-ft. and 4-ft. Harmonic flutes of metal, to contrast with those on the Orchestral which are of wood, a big clarinet, and 16-ft. Corno di bassetto; a violoncello; also for contrast a true Willis-type Salicional and gentle Celestes. The Tuba proper is on this manual, unenclosed, on 16-in. wind, and quadruple-harmonic in the trebles. It is very fine, though some might prefer a little more of the Willis fire in it. The Pedal organ has twenty stops, and provides full complement of proper bass to the organ, open wood 32-ft., 16-ft., and 8-ft., also a larger wood 'major bass' 16-ft.; open metal 16-ft., 8-ft., and 4-ft., Bourdons 16-ft. and 8-ft., and reeds on heavy wind 32-ft., 16-ft., and 8-ft. In addition, all the manual 16-ft. basses are borrowed, and give no less than four flue and two soft reed stops, all very useful in quiet work.

There are also some special effects—drums (side and bass) and triangle, operated through the pedals, and controlled by rocking tablets. These are all useful in a town hall organ, and to them the most rigid purist need not object, as they are additional to—and not in place of—the real organ.

Stop control of the most complete kind is available, there being for each manual department, in addition to some half-dozen fixed pistons, two adjustable pistons. The pedal stops are controlled by eight toe pistons, one being adjustable. For example, rocking tablets marked 'Great compositions to pistons' enable suitable bass for any manual combination to be provided on the pistons. There is also a Swell pedal which gives a graduated crescendo up to full organ, without moving the stops.

This wonderful scheme is the design of Mr. Alfred Hollins, who supervised the construction, and also came to South Africa to give the inaugural recitals. It goes without saying that he displayed to the full the marvellous capabilities of the instrument. The present town organist is Mr. John Connell, who has firmly established recitals on Sunday evenings, and also on Tuesdays at lunch-hour. His well-planned selections, brilliantly played, have won for him a steady public which fully appreciates his splendid command over the tonal possibilities at his disposal. A word should also be said here as to his work in connection with choralism. He is responsible for the work of four or five choral societies, and was the leading spirit in, and conductor of, a great choral tour to Durban and other places, referred to in the Musical Times of September, 1921. Another Festival—in which choirs from Natal and the Free State will combine with those of Pretoria and Johannesburg—is arranged for December, so that the spirit of reciprocity will be established, giving a great impetus to choral work throughout the whole country.

To complete our record of the organ it should be added that it was erected by Mr. A. M. F. Tomkins, of Cooper, Gill, & Tomkins (Johannesburg and Cape Town), and finished under the personal supervision of Mr. Herbert Norman, who came out for the purpose. The wind is supplied by a 'Discus,' with two 10-h.p. motors, the largest installation, so far, of its kind. The whole result is one of which Johannesburg and its town organist may well be proud, both for general conception and for the delicacy and beauty of its quieter and imitational registers, and that it is having its effect on musical taste in the district is undoubted.

J. S. YATES.

THE ORGANISTS' BENEVOLENT LEAGUE:

SIR FREDERICK BRIDGE'S APPEAL AT THE CITY TEMPLE

Sir Frederick Bridge was present at an organ recital given by Mr. Allan Brown, at the City Temple, on May 6, and played one of his own compositions. During the interval Sir Frederick addressed the gathering from the pulpit, and pleaded for support for the Organists' Benevolent League. He said that the necessity for such a League caused him to make the suggestion which resulted in its formation. There was no subscription and, Sir Frederick added, 'that had a wonderful effect.' But a promise was exacted from its members that they did something for the League, either by way of recital, lecture, or concert, and gave part of the proceeds to the League, an arrangement which had been very successful in providing pensions for old organists. Every case which had come before the League and which had borne investigation had been afforded relief. Sir Frederick continued:

'There is to be a silver collection presently. Don't put pennies in the plate. I don't think it is reverential. Remember that anything you give in a good cause always makes you better. I am going to play the organ presently. I don't play much now, and am getting decrepit, but I am willing to do anything for a good cause. I am going to strike a note for you. I happened to mention to a friend last night that I was going to speak at the City Temple, and he said he would give me a ten-shilling note for the collection. That is the note I am going to strike, and I am going to put it into the plate. I am very glad we are having the collection before I play the organ.'

A FINE FAMILY RECORD OF SERVICE

At the funeral of an old chorister of St. Mary's Church, Charlcombe, Bath, four of six brothers who at various times, extending over a period of thirty-eight years, had been connected with the Church as organists or choristers took part in the burial service, one brother presiding at the organ and three singing in the choir. At one period in the family history, one brother was organist and five brothers were choristers. There are still two of the brothers doing duty in the little Church, one as organist and the other as chorister. Four of the brothers developed alto voices, the fifth broke the family record by singing bass, while the sixth and junior member of the family is a tenor. Two of the brothers have been successful in obtaining Cathedral choir appointments as alto lay-clerks. The little old country Church of St. Mary has seating accommodation for only about ninety people, and has always been noted for its excellent musical services. The deceased chorister had been a member of the choir for twenty-eight years. He possessed a fine bass voice of beautiful quality and extraordinary compass, extending from CC to G—two octaves and a half.

VIERNE'S FOUR SYMPHONIES AT TWO SITTINGS

Mr. Matthias Turton performed a really remarkable feat at St. Aidan's, Leeds, recently, when he played Louis Vierne's four Symphonies at two recitals. Every organist in touch with modern music will agree that these Symphonies are amongst the handful of most difficult works in the whole of the repertory, and the performance of one alone is a heavy strain on the player. Even the listener has no easy task, especially in the case of No. 3, and in a lesser degree of No. 4. Mr. Turton was wise in mixing the order. He played Nos. 1 and 3 at the first recital and Nos. 2 and 4 at the second. We doubt if the whole set has been heard elsewhere in England—or, indeed, anywhere at all beyond the composer's own Church at Paris. It is to be hoped that Mr. Turton's strenuous propaganda will lead to these splendid works becoming as well known as they deserve to be.

The excellent mid-day organ recital movement is growing. A number of Church organs have for years past been profitably used for this purpose, and now two of the London Polytechnics—the South-Western at Chelsea and the Northampton Institute at Clerkenwell—are attracting hundreds of students and workers by recitals given between 1 and 2 o'clock on Tuesdays and Wednesdays respectively. Mr. Seymour Dicker, the Musical Director and Organist of these Institutions, tells us that there is no difficulty in making up programmes; 'requests' of a most catholic nature will keep him going for months to come.

The new organ built by Messrs. Willis & Sons and Lewis & Co. for the Victoria Hall, Hanley, was opened on May 4, when Mr. Sydney H. Wéalé, the Corporation organist, gave a couple of recitals, assisted by Miss Vera Victoria, Miss d'Alyce Webb, and Signor Livio Manucci. Mr. Wéalé's programmes included Widor's Pontifical March, Bonnet's Concert Variations, Franck's Finale in B flat, Hollins's Triumphal March, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D, the Finale from Tchaikovsky's Pathetic Symphony, and Finlandia. The organ is a four-manual of sixty-four stops, and a fine array of accessories.

A Bach recital was given at Newcastle Cathedral on May 6, by the Newcastle Bach Choir (conducted by Dr. W. G. Whittaker) and Mr. William Ellis, the Cathedral organist. The choir sang Jesu, Priceless Treasure, and a series of chorales, Mr. Ellis playing Bach's Prelude thereon—an excellent method of helping the hearers to an understanding of these fine pieces. The Preludes played were three on the Kyrie, Jesu, meine Freude, Liebster Jesu, Erbarm' dich mein, Aus der Tiefe, and Wir glauben all an Einen Gott.

In connection with the Portsmouth branch of the Hampshire Association of Organists, a Festival Service was sung by the united choirs of the branch, at Portsea Parish Church, on May 17. The singers numbered five hundred, and were very effective in a scheme that included Wesley's Blessed be the God and Father, the Chorale Sleepers, wake, as harmonised by Bach in the cantata, O gladsome Light, Beethoven's Hallelujah, and Smart's Te Deum in F. The conductors were Mr. Hugh Burry and Mr. R. H. Turner, and Mr. L. A. Lickfold was at the organ.

The organ at Sherwell Congregational Church, Plymouth, has been rebuilt by Messrs. Willis & Sons and Lewis & Co. The reopening took place recently, when Dr. W. G. Alcock gave a recital, the programme including his own Toccata, Mozart's Fantasia in F minor, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D major, Franck's Pièce Heroïque, and two movements from Widor's fifth Symphony. The organ is now a three-manual with thirty-seven speaking stops.

A recital given at St. Lawrence Jewry by Mr. Stanley Blizard (organist of St. Barnabas, Clapham Common) is worthy of note. Mr. Blizard lost the forefinger of his right hand in the war, but has pluckily overcome the disability to such an extent that he was able to give a fine performance of a programme that included Merkel's Variations on a Theme of Beethoven, Bach's Prelude and Fugue in D, and John E. West's Song of Triumph.

Dr. R. Walker Robson will give three lectures on 'Practical Choir Training (with special reference to the training of boys' voices)' at the Metropolitan Academy of Music, High Street, Marylebone, on July 17, 19, and 21, at 6.15. The lectures will be illustrated by the choir of Christ Church, Crouch End.

At a concert held in Kilburn Lane Primitive Methodist Church on April 20, in aid of the organ fund, Miss Clair James gave a fine performance of MacDowell's Pianoforte Concerto in D minor, the orchestral part being played on the organ by Mr. Harold T. Scull.

Rossini's Stabat Mater was sung at Christ Church, Southsea, on May 10, the accompaniments being played by a string orchestra. Mr. Alfred E. Labdon conducted, Mr. Leonard A. Pearce was at the organ, and Mr. Herbert Cains at the pianoforte.

A recital of the test-pieces for the July F.R.C.O. Examination will be given by Mr. H. V. Spanner, the well-known blind organist, at the National Institute for the Blind, 224, Great Portland Street, on June 7, at 3.

Fayfax's Albanus Mass will be sung at St. Alban's Cathedral on June 18, at the 11.30 service. It is intended that the work shall be sung annually on the Sunday nearest the Feast of St. Alban (June 17).

Dr. Harold Darke began his eighteenth series of mid-day recitals (Mondays, at 1.0) at St. Michael's, Cornhill, on May 8. The series lasts until July 24.

Mr. Albert Robins, a former pupil at the Birmingham Royal Institution for the Blind, has been appointed to the important post of organist at the U.F. Church, Forbes, N.B.

ORGAN RECITALS

Dr. H. C. L. Stocks, Godalming Parish Church—Concerto in B flat, Handel; Evening Song, Bairstow; Fugue in G minor, Bach.

Mr. T. Newbould, St. Paul's, King Cross, Halifax—Sonata No. 3, Mendelssohn; Preludes on 'Rockingham' and 'St. Ann's', Parry; Finale in B flat, Wolstenholme.

Mr. W. J. R. Gibbs, St. Jude's, Birmingham—Sonatas in E minor and E flat minor, Rheinberger; Cortège, Debussy; Prelude and Fugue in C minor and Toccata in C minor, Bach.

Mr. Cyril S. Christopher, Wesley Church, Dudley—Suite in F, Borowski; 'Pilgrim's Progress,' Parts 6 and 7, Ernest Austin; Gavotte, Rameau.

Mr. Louis H. Torr, St. Laurence, Southampton—Overture in E flat, Faulkes; Prayer and Cradle Song, Guilmant.

Miss T. V. Denman, Selsey Parish Church—Pastorale, Guilmant; Cantilène, Wolstenholme.

Mr. H. J. Timothy, Church of St. Vedast Foster—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Berceuse and Pastorale, Vierne.

Mr. Allan Brown, Bishopsgate Institute—Gothic Suite, Boëllmann; Funeral March and Hymn of Seraphs, Guilmant; Finale (Sonata in F minor), Rheinberger.

Mr. C. E. Blyton Dobson, High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham—Allegro appassionata (Sonata No. 1), Harwood; Largo from the 'New World' Symphony.

Mr. George Pritchard, Parish Church, Widnes—Fugue in A minor, Bach; 'Finlandia'; Holsworthy Church Bells, Wesley; Scherzo (Sonata No. 5), Guilmant.

Mr. J. Albert Sowerbutts, St. Lawrence Jewry—Symphony No. 3 (first movement), Vierne; Choral in E, Jongen; Choral Preludes, 'O world, I e'en must leave thee,' Brahms, and 'To God on high,' Bach.

Mr. A. A. Yeatman, Limsfield Parish Church—Concerto No. 2, Handel; Prelude and Fugue in G, Bach; Sonata in G, Rheinberger.

Mr. Charles J. King, St. Matthew's, Northampton—Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Largo, 'New World' Symphony; Cradle Song, Scherzo, and Toccata, Grace.

D

Mr. Herbert C. Morris, Queen Street Congregational Church, Wolverhampton—Toccata and Fugue in D minor and Prelude and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Andantino, Herbert C. Morris; Adagio and Allegro from Sonata, Reubke.

Mr. H. C. Warrilow, National Institute for the Blind, Great Portland Street—Fifth Concerto, Handel; Choral Prelude in F minor, Bach; Prelude, Fugue, and Variation, Franck.

Mr. Stephen Kirby, Southwark Cathedral—Solemn Festival, Rheinberger; Cradle Song and Rêverie, Grace; Fantasia in A, Franck.

Mr. H. Uttley, National Institute for the Blind—Choral No. 3, Franck; Passacaglia and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Prelude in F, Stanford.

Mr. R. Barrett-Watson, College and Kelvingrove U.F. Church, Glasgow—Andante con moto, Frank Bridge; Rêverie and Offertoire, Barrett-Watson; Resurgam, Grace.

Mr. Fred Gostelow, Parish Church, Southend—Overture in E flat, Faulkes; Sonata in A, Borowski; Allegretto, Wolstenholme.

Mr. N. S. Wallbank, Hexham Abbey—Toccata and Fugue in D minor, Bach; Harmonies du Soir, Karg-Elert; Allegretto, Wolstenholme.

Mr. Claude A. Forfar, St. John's, Forfar—Concerto No. 4 (first movement), Handel; Springtime, Hollins; Schiller March, Meyerbeer.

Mr. A. G. Colborn, St. Stephen's, Bristol—Cancion Triste, Torres; Slumber Song and Melody in E, Colborn.

Mr. E. Emlyn Davies, Westminster Congregational Church—Choral Song and Fugue, Wesley; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Bach; Choral No. 1, Franck; Elegiac Romance, John Ireland.

Mr. G. Leitch Owen, St. Domingo United Methodist Church, Liverpool—Prelude and Fugue in D minor, Mendelssohn; Prelude and Fugue in C minor, Bach.

Mr. Albert Orton, St. Saviour's, Paddington—Sonata No. 3, Mendelssohn; Three Choral Preludes, 'Farewell, will I,' Bach, 'O World,' Brahms, 'My inmost heart,' Karg-Elert; Basso Ostinato, Arensky.

Mr. Arthur S. Warrell, St. Nicholas, Bristol—Rhapsody No. 3, Saint-Saëns; Prelude on 'Bryn Calfaria,' Vaughan Williams; Cradle Song, Grace; Trumpet Tune, Purcell.

Mr. James M. Preston, St. John's Wesleyan Church, Sunderland—Allegro (Symphony No. 6), Widor; Fugue, Reubke; Prelude on 'Eventide,' Parry; Lament, Grace.

Mr. W. E. Kirby, St. Luke's, Southport—Gothic Suite, Boëllmann; Symphony No. 6, Widor; Rhapsodie in E, Saint-Saëns.

Mr. Stanley F. Lucas, Harecourt Congregational Church—March on a Ground-Bass, Dohnányi; Fantasia and Fugue in A minor, Bach; Prelude and Fugue in G, Mendelssohn.

APPOINTMENTS

Miss Emmie Bowman, organist and choirmaster, Barony Parish Church, Glasgow.

Mr. Leonard Dorsett, organist and choirmaster, Presbyterian Church of England, Richmond.

Mr. W. E. Kirby, organist and choirmaster, All Saints', Clifton, Bristol.

Mr. H. W. South, organist and choirmaster, St. Canice's Cathedral, Kilkenny.

In the interval of a concert given by the Faling Philharmonic Society on April 29, Mr. E. Victor Williams, founder of the Society and conductor for twenty-five years, was presented with a complete canteen of silver plate and cutlery in recognition of his services and as a token of the esteem in which he is held by his many friends. The presentation was made by the president of the Society, Mr. Edward German.

Letters to the Editor

'THE ENGLISH LITANY OF 1544-60'

SIR,—I thought that Dr. Grattan Flood's object in his article was to give your readers sound information, and I therefore imagined that he might welcome my letter; but it now appears that his chief concern is to uphold his own infallibility, and that he thinks that a mere repetition of his statements is sufficient to prove this. Of course, if he cannot understand Cranmer's plain English I cannot make him do so, but at least he might give a reference to Duchesne's writings, where he states that the 'Processioner' was synonymous with the 'Litany.' Dr. Flood again repeats his assertion about St. Augustine and his companions. Here is what Bede says (Plummer's Edition, Book I, chap. 25): 'Fertur autem, quia adpropinquantes civitati . . . hanc letaniam consona voce modularentur: Deprecamur te, &c.' What grounds has Dr. Flood for translating this 'the Litany and the Antiphon. Deprecamur te'? It is quite clear that poor, ignorant Bede thought the Antiphon, Deprecamur te, was the Litany which they sang, and the fact that Sir H. Howorth records that this anthem occurred in a Rogation Litany in use long after at Vienne has nothing to do with the point.

As to the melody of the 1544 Litany, Dr. Flood says that his point was that 'Stone did not compose music for the Litany at that time, but that the compilers adapted the ancient plainchant.' But his original statement was 'that the newly-translated English Litany was roughly adapted to the old plainchant melody,' which must mean the old plainchant melody of the Litany—and this is untrue.—Yours, &c.,

E. G. P. WYATT.

RESTIVE UNDER CRITICISM

SIR,—I have always felt that to cavil at a journalistic critique of one's work is an unsportsmanlike proceeding, and I am loth to do so now. But 'B. V.'s' criticism in your May number, of my Carnegie String Quartet, compels me thereto, since, in my opinion, he goes beyond the ne plus ultra of legitimate criticism in this particular case.

Arthur Bliss has also criticised this work rather adversely. But I have no quarrel with him, since his expression of opinion was concerned solely with æsthetics. Indeed, I should have been surprised had he admired my work. But 'B. V.' devotes almost half a column to a lecture upon my faults of technique. As I happen to be one of the 'academic crew' (to use 'R. L.'s' famous term), I am sure that Sir Hugh Allen and others, when they read 'B. V.'s' article, will bitterly regret having given me that Degree which is looked upon as, at least, the hall-mark of technical efficiency. Seriously does not 'B. V.' rather gratuitously arrogate to himself that infallibility against which he warns me, when he speaks of 'errors of judgment' and 'flaws' in regard to a work which, at any rate, bears the imprimatur of the Carnegie adjudicators? How sad were I, how chastened, how full of despair for the future, had I not their Report upon my work as a crumb of consolation in this dark hour!

By the way, who is 'B. V.'? And why does he thus blush unseen, when his proper sphere is that of Papal dictator to the Carnegie Trust?—Yours, &c.,

E. N. HAY.

9, Clifton Terrace,
Coleraine, Ireland, N.

[Dr. Hay is too sensitive. Composers who cannot face adverse criticism so temperately expressed as was that of 'B. V.' should keep their music in the sheltered security of manuscript. There will be an end to helpful criticism if reviewers are to accept a work as technically infallible merely because it is written by a Doctor of Music and has been blessed by the Carnegie Trust. The 'almost half a column lecture' on Dr. Hay's 'faults of technique' is really only a few lines dealing with a passage in which the balance struck 'B. V.' as miscalculated. Dr. Hay will not expect us to answer his question, 'Who is "B. V."?' But we don't mind saying what 'B. V.' is—a reviewer doubly qualified to deal with chamber works, being a musical critic of eminence and a violinist who has had long experience in orchestral and chamber music. Dr. Hay's opening sentence is so true that it is a pity his letter did not end at that point.—Ed., M.T.]

PIZZETTI AND BEETHOVEN

SIR,—As I was lately the author of an attack upon Pizzetti as a composer, to which you have alluded in the Musical Times, am I not the proper person to defend him against aspersions made on him by others? There is an implied reflection on him on the part of your reviewer, 'F. B.,' in your last month's issue. It amounts to nothing more than a little slip, perhaps, but nevertheless it may have given a wrong impression to any of your readers who are interested in the views of the very active group of modern Italian composers.

In discussing the report of the recent Congress of Italian musicians at Turin, your reviewer says:

'The discussion on the reform of musical colleges and of education threw a curious sidelight on the opinions of a composer already well-known here, Ildebrando Pizzetti. Signor Pizzetti was, and, perhaps, still occupies the post of, professor of composition at the Bologna Conservatoire. He apparently does not believe that there is anything to be learnt from Beethoven, for Signor Giacomo Orefice told the Congress that, as external examiner, he found that the score of the Eroica was suggested as a test for sight-reading. He, of course, pointed out that the test was futile, as the Eroica must be known to all students of composition. He was assured, however, that Signor Pizzetti's students knew neither the score nor the work.'

If your reviewer will look again he will see that Orefice was not 'assured that Signor Pizzetti's students knew neither the score nor the work,' but only that an individual student, Castelnovo-Tedesco, did not know them. This is, if true, sufficiently remarkable, for Castelnovo-Tedesco (now a well-known composer) had taken his pianoforte diploma at the Institution in 1914, and had spent the remaining four years in study culminating at this (1918) examination in the gaining of his diploma in composition. That any student should spend eight or ten years in a school of music and never come to know the Eroica is almost incredible; but we must not deduce from the incident (as your reviewer does, and, possibly, as Orefice might wish us to do) that Pizzetti 'does not believe that there is anything to be learned from Beethoven,' for in the preface of his Musicisti Contemporanei we have abundant record of his admiration for that composer. He describes (in terms, perhaps, warmer than an Englishman could bring himself to use of anyone or anything) his reverent feelings and those of d'Annunzio, as musician and poet went through some of Beethoven's works together.

Incidentally, it is incorrect to say 'Pizzetti was, and, perhaps, still occupies, the post of professor of composition at the Bologna Conservatoire' (though from the puzzling wording of the report your reviewer was justified in his mistake). The incident occurred at the Royal Musical Institution of Florence, of which Pizzetti is director, and of which Castelnovo-Tedesco was a student. Neither Pizzetti nor Castelnovo-Tedesco was, I think, ever at Bologna.

In the interests of accuracy, will you pardon these slight emendations of your contributor's interesting review of a publication that one is glad to see noticed in the British musical Press.—Yours, &c.,

PERCY A. SCHOLLS.

May 18, 1922.

THOSE 'BEST SELLERS'

SIR,—I have searched in vain in this month's issue for a reply from 'A. K.' to my letter which you courteously published in your April issue. Is it because 'A. K.' cannot defend his sweeping (and anonymous) assertions, or because he thinks his article was after all of so little importance?

I once more invite 'A. K.' to come out into the open and 'face the music' (even that of 'best-sellers'!) or for ever hold his peace.—Yours, &c.,

ALBERT W. KETELBY.

15, Frogna,
Hampstead, N.W.3.

May 4, 1922.

'QUALITY IN HYMN TUNES'

SIR,—Your excellent digest of the lecture by Mr. H. C. Colles on Hymn-tunes is a reminder of the fact—which your readers cannot have missed—that there is now a tendency to approach this subject by methods of musical, historical, and liturgical investigation, and it is increasingly evident to all students of this branch of Church music that a wealth of material of all ages is not only available but practicable for use to-day. In spite of this it is a sad fact that the vast majority of organists and clergy have never seriously looked outside their particular book in use. The most extraordinary notions are prevalent as to the contents of the English Hymnal; for instance, that it is all Plainsong, or German Chorales, English or Welsh folk-song, &c.

After seeing in your columns a few months ago the report of a lecture where the speaker seemed possessed by some of these delusions, I was moved to look into the Hymnal and see exactly what we had found of practical use during the past fourteen years, and was really amazed at the number, variety, and, above all, the real solid musical value of the collection.

The tunes in the list (which I append) are all actually in use and known by choir and regular congregation :

Plainsong Hymns	44
" Sequences	7
French Ecclesiastical	30
English: First period and Psalters	35
" Second period, to 1820	47
" c. 1820 to 1904	59
" 1904	18
Genevan Psalter	6
Hymn-Tunes from:
Irish sources	3
French	4
Welsh	6
Swiss	3
Spanish	1
Italian	2
U.S.A.	1
German Chorales	12
Hymn-tunes from Germany and Netherlands	54
Arr. from Traditional Melodies:
Welsh	1
Scotch	1
English	21
Miscellaneous (doubtful sources)	13

368

—Yours, &c.,

W. CRAWLEY.

Stanley Road, Wellingborough.

May 15, 1922.

'HAND DEVELOPMENT FOR THE PERFORMER'

SIR,—'O wad some power the giftie gie us, to see oursels as ithers see us.' Had Mr. Head never tried Mr. Matthay's admirable teaching, would he, I wonder, have ventured to express an opinion on its merits or otherwise?

Yet this is the actual position so far as the 'Techniquer' is concerned. He seems aggrieved that the 'Techniquer' makes any claim to justify its existence.

The following extract from a letter sent to the editor of one of the musical papers quite recently may be of interest to Mr. Head. The writer says:

'The result [after using a "Techniquer"] has been nothing short of marvellous. The Rotary principles advised by Matthay and his relaxation studies have now become not only possible, but a pleasure.'

Thus it would appear (as is actually the case) that the 'Techniquer' aids and abets Mr. Matthay's teachings. When all is said and done, users of the 'Techniquer' are the best fitted to express an opinion as to its efficacy, and it is surely a rash statement to say that all the eminent performers and teachers who have so kindly given their testimony are 'mistaken.'

At any rate, they one and all spent some considerable time testing it before expressing an opinion.—Yours, &c., 21, Boundary Road, N.W.8.

R. J. PITCHER.

May 11, 1922.

SIR,—Your correspondent Mr. Head, whose second letter appears in your May issue, admits he has never tried or even seen a 'Techniquer,' yet he is 'impelled to contest' its claims.

My small, stiff hand had been a complete set-back to progress at the pianoforte all my life. I tried every possible device and hand gymnastics, all to no purpose; and I shall ever be grateful to Mr. Pitcher and his 'Techniquer' for the wonderful difference it has made in my case. I cannot understand a seeker after truth not giving it a trial, after reading the convincing testimony that was sent to me.—Yours, &c.,

JEANIE J. SMITH.

Willowbank, Kilmacoll, Renfrewshire.

THE RAFF CENTENARY

SIR,—On May 27 it will be a hundred years since Joachim Raff first saw the light. He was one of the most famous and prolific composers of the 19th century, yet his numberless works are now most strangely and unjustly neglected. Though not a genius of the highest order (he was too eclectic for that), nevertheless many of Raff's compositions, notably the two of his eleven Symphonies, Im Walde and Leonore (both magnificent creations), chamber works (sonatas, trios, quartets, quintet, sextet, octet), pianoforte works, and others too numerous to mention are most masterly, charming, and delightful, and it is indeed an absolute shame that this splendid music is nowadays so seldom heard. Personally Raff was the most genial of men. I knew him well, having studied composition with him for half a year, for which lessons he generously declined to take any fee. He was a Swiss by birth. He died very suddenly on June 25, 1882, at the age of sixty, while occupying the distinguished post of Director of the Conservatoire at Frankfurt a/M.—Yours, &c.,

May 16, 1922.

ALGERNON ASHTON.

THE BALLAD IN AMERICA

SIR,—In his anxiety to lead us to despise the standard of song recitals in the United States, Mr. Kaikhosru Sorabji closes his letter (printed in your May issue) with a sentence more hasty than wise. The sneer at Charles Wakefield Cadman as a composer can be due only to ignorance of his works or failure to comprehend them. Cadman is probably the most distinguished American composer since MacDowell, and his works include orchestral, operatic, chamber, vocal, and pianoforte music. He has a truly rare gift of melody displayed in his songs, but perhaps Mr. Sorabji, being a modernist, despises anything so weak. Cadman's Pianoforte Sonata has been received as a finely-made work, full of vitality and feeling. Mr. Sorabji also has a Pianoforte Sonata, and I am waiting for a general verdict for it as good as that received by Cadman's example. With regard to Mr. Sorabji's jibe at American musical journalism, I am afraid this goes further than just musical matters. And he stresses the word 'cousins,' but he knows that white Americans and white Englishmen are just that, and that their music will draw them closer.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN FIELDER PORTE.

56, Mayall Road, S.E. 24. May 3, 1922.

THE LEAGUE OF ARTS

We are glad to be able to announce that the delightful entertainments given in Hyde Park last summer by the League of Arts are to be continued. On every Saturday from (and including) June 3 to July 29 performances will be given in the natural amphitheatre by the Boat-houses on the north side of the Serpentine. Tickets can be obtained, half an hour before each performance, at the Victoria and the Alexandra Gates. Two shows will be given on each Saturday, at 3.0 and 7.0 p.m., the programme being the same at each. Here is a list of works to be performed on the nine Saturdays, in order of date: Martin Shaw's Brer Rabbit, by the League of Arts; Folk-Songs and Dances, by the English Folk-Dance Society, directed by Mr. Cecil Sharp; Sea Songs and Shanties, with Dances, conducted by Mr. Geoffrey Shaw; The Blue Bird, produced by Miss Mildred Hodges; The Masque of the Holy Grail, by Ernest Rhys, music by Vincent Thomas, produced by Mr. Alexander Payne; Fools and Fairies, adapted from A Midsummer Night's Dream by Percy A. Scholes, music by Martin Shaw, produced by Mr. E. T. Evetts's operatic class of the L.A.M. (two Saturdays); Sea Songs and Folk-Songs, with Dances, conducted by Mr. Geoffrey Shaw. If the weather is wet, the performances will be given half an hour later at Eccleston Guildhouse, 12, Berwick Street, close to Victoria Station. Information as to prices of tickets, &c., may be obtained from the Secretary of the League, at the Guildhouse aforesaid.

Sixty Years Ago

From the Musical Times of June, 1862:

THE WILDERNESS AND THE SOLITARY PLACE.
Anthem, by Dr. Wesley. Score, 6s.; parts, 3d. each.
Composed for the reopening of a Cathedral Organ, 1831.
Publishers: Hall, Virtue & Co., 25, Paternoster Row, St. Paul's.

Just published.

THE WILDERNESS AND THE SOLITARY PLACE.
New Anthem for 4 voices, with organ accompaniment.
Composed by John Goss. Price 2s. 6d.; single vocal parts, 1s. 3d. London: Novello & Co., 69, Dean Street, Soho.

THE two hundred and eighth Festival of the Sons of the Clergy . . . took place yesterday afternoon, under the dome of St. Paul's Cathedral. . . . The organ used was the one recently purchased for the services 'under the dome'—perhaps the finest ever built by the eminent firm of 'Hill.' That it should still remain unfinished, uncased, unfurnished, and consequently unsightly; that it should still be unsupplied with the hydraulic process boasted by its venerable companion and predecessor, the work of Father Smith; still be dependent for its 'voices' on the muscles and sinews of eight stalwart organ-blowers; and thus still be inevitably out of order, seems difficult to explain. A general opinion is current that had this splendid organ been the property of a Gothic cathedral such would not have been the case—that money, in short, would have been found to provide the instrument with every requisite. Why this indifference should exist with regard to the noblest Italian ecclesiastical structure out of Rome, those may best explain who entertain it. The present condition of the noble organ in St. Paul's Cathedral is, at any rate, a disgrace to the 'metropolis.'

ST. JAMES'S HALL.—The Grosse Passions Musik, by Sebastian Bach, was performed here by the Bach Society, on Saturday evening, May 24, under the direction of Prof. Sterndale Bennett. The vocalists engaged for the solo parts were Miss Banks, Miss Martin, Madame Sainton-Dolby, Mr. Sims Reeves, Mr. Wallworth, and Mr. Weiss. The performance was highly creditable to all concerned in it, considering the difficulty of the task and the extreme severity of the style and character of the music. The Society deserves the thanks of all true lovers of the art for having brought forward this wonderful composition.

Sharps and Flats

Some believe that classical music is the only good music. Rats!—John C. Freund.

If only the British artist would tackle an aria as he does a hockey match—then he would be incomparable.—Maurice Noufflard.

It would be unnatural, even indecent, for one composer to discuss in print or in public his compatriot contemporaries.—Sir Charles Stanford.

Mr. Herbert Howells has just been writing about Dr. Vaughan Williams. Is Mr. Howells unnatural or merely indecent?—Ernest Newman.

The time has come, boys and girls, for us to declare our artistic and especially our musical independence. . . . We are spending every year between seven and eight hundred millions on music. . . . more than all the rest of the world put together. We have the finest symphony orchestras. We give the finest opera. We have the best music-teachers. . . .—John C. Freund.

The Berkshire Prize has again been captured by a foreigner. This is a contest in which chauvinism has no place. . . . The failure of any composer of native antecedents to gain the coveted award in the five years since the contest was instituted is not disheartening. . . .—Musical America.

Organists are very much underpaid. I have never known one who could live on his salary. I have often thought that the older organists played with one foot in the grave and the other on the swell pedal.—Sir Frederick Bridge.

The modern conception of instrumental writing with regard to the characteristic timbre and sonorous qualities of the given instruments underlies the whole design of the [Bartók] Sonata; and it is interesting to note that, some eight years after the first enunciation of this idea by myself, the academic critics, once scoffers, are anxiously seeking to catch up the contemporary trend by ostentatiously exploiting it.—Leigh Henry.

Hot weather! do you call this hot? I am sorry I have not put on my fur coat.—Rachmaninov.

Chamber Music for Amateurs

Under this heading we insert, free of charge, announcements by amateur chamber musicians who wish to get into touch with other players.

Young tenor desires to meet a pianist (lady or gentleman) for mutual practice a few evenings a week. Within five miles from Charing Cross.—J. B., c/o Musical Times.

Young lady accompanist (still studying) wishes to meet lady, either vocalist or instrumentalist, for mutual practice. S.E. district.—E., 4, Cedars Road, Beckenham, Kent.

Pianist would like to meet violinist or vocalist (at Oxford) for mutual practice.—T. J., c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist desires to meet violinist and pianist with view to mutual practice; East Dulwich district.—C. H. S., c/o Musical Times.

Young vocalist (silver medalist studying for diploma) wishes to meet pianist, preferably West London, for mutual practice; also another vocalist for duets, &c. Would like to join musical society in London.—C. M. M., c/o Musical Times.

Violinist with extensive library of classic and modern Sonatas would like to meet a pianist for mutual study. Also a 'cellist to join in trios. Middlesbrough district.—'STACCATO,' c/o Musical Times.

Mezzo-contralto, some professional experience, would like to join party or operatic society for study.—M. H., c/o Musical Times.

'Cellist (gentleman), Pianist (lady), would like a violinist (either sex) to join for mutual practice. Fine amount of music, classical, orchestral.—RISLEY, 66, Patshull Road, Camden Road, N.W.5.

Pianist (male), enthusiastic, desires to join orchestra or concert party. S.E. district preferred.—G. D., 113, Crampton Road, S.E.20.

Accompanist (male), good pianist, wishes to meet vocalists or instrumentalists with view to mutual practice. North London preferred.—A. BIGGS, 10, St. Edmund's Terrace, Regent's Park, N.W.8.

Amateur dance quartet requires a pianist and drummer to join violinist and clarinetist for practice.—Write, A. MORRIS, 92, High Road, Chiswick.

Young gentleman violinist would like to meet pianist, mutual practice. Must be enthusiastic; same sex.—1, St. Mark's Terrace, Easton, Bristol.

Violinist required for mutual practice one evening weekly, S.E. district.—A. N., 236, Malpas Road, S.E.4.

Amateur instrumentalists, all parts, required in orchestra at Cricklewood. Rehearsals Tuesdays, and Sunday service.—Write, M. E., 93, Chichele Road, Cricklewood, N.W.2.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC

A course of four lectures upon the 'History of Music' of the latter half of the 19th century has been given by Dr. Frederick G. Shinn on Wednesday afternoons, in the Duke's Hall. The illustrations included Sonata for violin and pianoforte by César Franck; pianoforte music by Brahms, Dvorák, Borodin, and a Pianoforte Quartet by A. C. Mackenzie.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC

Last term there were five chamber concerts, two choral and orchestral concerts, and four informal concerts, at which the following works by College composers were performed: two pieces for flute, oboe, violin, viola, and 'cello by Maurice Jacobson; four pieces for pianoforte solo by Ian D. Whyte; Variations for string quartet by Dorothy A. Peache; Scherzo and Trio for strings by Evelyn W. Willis; two songs by Kathleen C. Lart; three pieces for violin and pianoforte by A. Rose Crèver; Romance and Scherzo for violin by Percy Whitlock; song by Robert T. Featherstone; three pieces for violin by Rachel Macandrew; Organ Prelude and Trio for female voices by Mirabel Cobbold; and songs for voice and string trio by Gordon Jacob. M. J.

MUSIC IN THE UNIVERSITIES

Sir Hugh Allen had undertaken to read a paper on the above subject before the Musical Association on April 25, but unfortunately he was laid aside by illness before completing it, and in these circumstances Dr. Cyril B. Rootham took up the task, utilising Sir Hugh's notes and furnishing other information himself.

At Oxford, up to 1626, music formed a part of the ordinary arts course, and was confined to the study of the musical writings of Boethius. Efficiency in these was all that was required for B.Mus. up to the end of the 16th century. For D.Mus. some skill in composition had to be shown. The candidates for both degrees had to show that they had devoted themselves to the study and practice of music. The Chair of Music was founded in 1626, and there was then a clear idea of what a professor should do: not theory only, but practice also. The scheme was for a lecture on music, not to be given by the professor, but by an M.A. nominated by the Proctor once a year. The professor had to take weekly practices in the Music School for part-singing and playing. If this scheme had not been allowed to fall into abeyance about 1680-85, the whole business of University music would have been different. People would have learnt that music cannot flourish by theory only. You must make it, hear it, and live with it constantly in close companionship.

There was music going on at Oxford during the greater part of the century, especially chamber music. It was regularly a part of all big University functions, and those people who played and sang were called 'The Musick' or 'University Music' as opposed to the Town Band or Waits. From 1680-1730 Oxford musically had gone to sleep, and in practical music nothing was done. Then came Handel, and stirred things up a bit. From 1750 to about 1800, nine-tenths of all the music performed in the music-room was by Handel. During the early part of the 19th century little was done to cultivate music.

The Renaissance of Oxford music began with Ouseley's appointment as Professor. His position at the University gave a great fillip to music, and made people realise that a gentleman might have to do with music without being defiled. The lecturer also paid a tribute to the subsequent work of Stainer, Parratt, and Parry, and showed how during the last fifty years, chamber, orchestral, and choral music had developed at Oxford. Dr. Rootham also warmly praised the influence of Sir Hugh Allen, than whom none had put more energy and driving-power into the music of Oxford.

A Professor of Music was not appointed at Cambridge until 1684, though degrees in music were granted long before this. In the 18th century there was a project for building a music and amphitheatre for lectures, started by Walter Titley's donation, but it fell through, and even now at Cambridge there was not a square inch for musical purposes, although there was a scheme on foot for buildings, either for music or for a United Arts' Club. When William Sterndale Bennett was appointed Professor he made tremendous efforts to restore the dignity of musical degrees at Cambridge, the regulations for which had become most lax.

The C.U.M.S. was founded in 1843 as the Peterhouse Musical Society by a small body of amateurs. In the early days instrumental music mostly was played, then gradually choral and orchestral music obtained equal attention, as is the case to-day. Sir Charles Stanford used to introduce new and modern works, and brought composers to Cambridge to conduct their own works. He made music there a big and living thing. The Cambridge University Musical Club, started in 1891, has developed from a small beginning into a very big thing, so that on Saturday nights it is necessary to hire a hall to accommodate the members.

The two Universities of Oxford and Cambridge had the same sort of aims and much the same forces. The town of Oxford was larger than that of Cambridge, and therefore at the University they had rather more forces to draw upon, so far as the residents were concerned, than at Cambridge.

The paper was followed by a very full discussion in which the speakers gave particulars of music at the other Universities.

Later in the evening members and friends assembled at the Monico Restaurant, when the annual dinner was held for the first time since 1913. In the unavoidable absence of the president, Mr. F. Gilbert Webb occupied the chair. The speakers included Mr. Louis N. Parker, Prof. C. H. Kitson, Mr. Claude Aveling, and Dr. John E. Borland.

THOMAS BRITTON: THE MUSICAL SMALL-COAL MAN

BY C. EDGAR THOMAS

Practically all walks of life have possessed their eccentrics, and the arts and sciences have probably recruited more than their share. The world of music has been graced with the whimsical figure of Thomas Britton, popularly known as 'the musical small-coal man,' who as an eccentric, must be conceded a distinct niche in the realms of musical biography. Indeed, the story, at once curious and fanciful, is one of the most interesting romances of the 18th century—that age of romances—and of music.

A curiously dual personality was Britton's, for he somehow matched—and more wonderful still, reconciled—a keen business instinct with the credulity of a child; and he was versatile to boot, combining a wide knowledge of chemistry, old books—mainly concerned with the occult—and a more than average grasp of the theory and practice of music. A sincere votary of the arts and sciences, he was a general virtuoso rather than a real proficient in any one branch. His relations with his social superiors did not spoil him, and that is surely one of the tests of greatness.

The cry of 'Small-coal, small-coal' has now for long been hushed; it is no longer numbered among the discords of perambulatory jargon. Familiar to the ears of our great-grandparents, it is now retired, exalted with the dignity of a past street cry, and is only called to mind by the frequent allusions that may be found in contemporary literature. Several enliven the pages of the Spectator, and it figures in Gay's Trivia when the poet sings:

'When small-coal murmurs in the hoarser throat,
From smutty dangers guard thy threatened coat.'

Thomas Britton, the eccentric and many-sided genius who was destined to be numbered among the itinerant vendors of this ware in the past, was born, story says, at or near Higham Ferrers, Northamptonshire, somewhere about the year 1654. Of his education—such as it was—we know nothing. Our knowledge commences at the time when Britton left the place of his birth and, coming to London, entered into a seven years' apprenticeship to a small-coal man, whose business was in that part of the town known as St. John Street, Clerkenwell. These seven years of toil are likewise a void, much as one would like to know something of the life and condition of that sooty youth 'neath the shade of St. John's Gate. The period of servitude finished, Britton returned to the scene of his childhood, where he quickly contrived to exhaust his slender savings, and then returned to the metropolis and set-up for himself in the coal trade, hiring a humble stable in the neighbourhood of his apprenticeship. This stable, for which he paid in rent £4 yearly, he utilised for the two-fold purpose of store and dwelling-house. Diligent researchers have discovered that this precise stable was situated at the north-east corner of Jerusalem Passage, and that it was divided into two stories, the lower serving as the coal-shop and the upper, 'a long, low room to which access was gained by a ladder-like staircase from the outside,' for his domestic needs. A sorry property perhaps—'for his House is not much higher than a Canary Pipe, and the Window of his State Room but very little bigger than the Bunghole of a Cask,' as one contemporary description has it.' But, as we shall see, its sorry nature did not prevent the rise of an institution that was as wonderful in its own day as the story of it is now.

It was not long before he made the acquaintance of his neighbour Dr. Garencières, the distinguished chemist, who, taking an interest in the young man, granted him free access to his laboratory, of which privilege Britton was not slow to take advantage. In fact so much use did he make of this kindness that it was not long ere he vied with his patron and friend; so much so that he built himself a portable laboratory, where, says the antiquary, Hearne, with whom he was a great favourite, 'he performed with little expense and trouble such things as had never been done before.'

But it is with music and Britton that we are principally concerned. Music he was passionately fond of; he himself played creditably upon the viol de gamba, and in his miserable loft above his coal-store, the only access to which, as already indicated, was a narrow break-neck pair of steps, 'scarcely to be mounted without crawling,' he instituted regular concerts of vocal and orchestral music. These meetings commenced in 1678, and for close upon forty years were held regularly once a week. At first membership and admission were gratis, but the success of the enterprise, assured from the first, and the increasing membership, necessitated an annual subscription of ten shillings, and removal to more convenient and commodious premises in the next house. The removal to better quarters was certainly desirable, but it was not, strange to say, successful. And so Britton and his enthusiastic coterie returned to the ramshackle stable, of which Edward Ward said: 'Anybody that is willing to take a hearty sweat may have the pleasure of hearing many notable performances in the charming science of music.' The modest sum of ten shillings was continued as subscription, and for this Britton undertook to find the instruments, and to regale his fellow artists and guests with coffee at a penny a dish!

Clerkenwell was at that date a not unfashionable residential district—vide Musical Times, August, 1906, p. 529.

The noble and the great flocked to Britton's humble hovel, and in spite of its rudeness his assemblies were graced with the presence of the fair and the gay. From the first his patrons fell over each other to do him homage, and among them was that doyen of journalists and pamphleteers, Sir Roger L'Estrange, himself a performer upon the bass viol. Under such a humble roof, then, this extraordinary small-coal man instituted 'that elegant and rational amusement,' the musical concert. Although one of the earliest to do so, he does not appear to have been the first, for Banister had commenced concerts at his 'Musick-school' at Whitefriars some years previously. Britton's enterprise was immediately crowned with success, and here once a week could have been found gathered together over a mean coal-shop the musical genius of London. It was in such surroundings that Handel and Dr. Pepusch displayed their talents upon the harpsichord and organ; that John Banister—just mentioned—played first violin; that the painter, Woolaston—who twice painted Britton, once at the instance of Sir Hans Sloane, who purchased the portrait—proved himself to be a good performer upon both violin and flute; and that John Hughes, the poet, Philip Hart, the organist, Henry Symonds, Abel Whichello, the composer, Obadiah Shuttleworth, the violinist, and, later, Henry Neebler, among others, offered up burnt sacrifices at the altar of Apollo. Here, too, it is reported, Matthew Dubourg, when a child, played, 'standing upon a joint-stool,' the first solo that he ever executed in public.

Sir Richard Steel, commenting in No. 144 of the Guardian upon the odd and original characters produced by a free form of government, said:

'We have a small-coal man, who, beginning with two plain notes, which made up his daily cry, has made himself master of the whole compass of the gamut, and has frequent concerts of music at his own house, for the entertainment of himself and friends.'

And Britton's neighbour, Edward Ward, thus wrote:

'His Hut wherein he dwells, which has long been honoured with such good company, looks without side as if some of his Ancestors had happened to be executors to old snoring Diogenes, and that they had carefully transplanted the Athenian-Tub into Clerkenwell.'

Old book-stalls had a peculiar fascination for Britton. While upon his daily rounds he would spend a good deal of time poring over antiquated works on chemistry and music. But he was no mere man of parchments. So great was his discernment in the selection of works of merit, that during the rage for old books and manuscripts that set in towards the end of the 17th and beginning of the 18th centuries he was well employed in swelling (upon commission!) the collections of many of the noblest in the land. These included the Duke of Devonshire, the Earls of Oxford, Sunderland, and Winchelsea—all great book collectors, who allowed Britton to share in their conversation when they met to compare notes at a bookseller's shop in Ave Maria Lane after their rambles through the town. It was then that Britton would leave his coal-sack at the door of learning, and, dressed in his blue smock, spend many an agreeable hour with his co-enthusiasts thumbing reverend tomes and lingering long over curious manuscripts. In this connection how many remember that he assisted to form the famous Harleian collection, and that the Somers Tracts were of his collecting?

